socialist development are in the base of society: the producer, the work collective, the commune and socialist sociopolitical organizations. No mention is made of the republic as a vehicle of economic development. But in the constitution the vehicles of economic development are the republics and provinces; they must agree on every issue in the domain of the movement and development of the economy. Or again, the principle is set down in the party program that the social plan of Yugoslavia is to ensure harmonious development of the economy, economic stability, equalization of conditions for the conduct of economic activity, etc. Decisions on all these matters are to be made in the Chamber of Producers of Yugoslavia. The role of the republics comes down to drafting programs for development of the productive forces, but within the limits of the revenues which they realize in their jurisdictions under equal conditions for all individuals and for all economic organizations. There is none of all that in the constitution. The Chamber of Producers no longer exists. Now agreements are made on all matters concerning conduct of economic activity by representatives--delegates--in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces instead of by delegates of the workers in the Chamber of Producers. The gap between them is obvious. The workers are not entering into agreement with one another directly, through their delegations, but indirectly, through the delegates of the republics as states. And this cannot but create relations in decisionmaking that bypass the workers, cannot but create power centers alienated from the workers, and so on.

[Question] Judging by the applause at the Third Congress of Self-Managers, the workers have voiced a decisive No to these statisms and to the parcelization of Yugoslavia?

[Answer] Yes, they have voiced it.... But I, though I spoke at the congress, have failed to say one thing, I didn't think of it. But I would propose that the Congress of Self-Managers be the principal chamber in the SFRY Assembly, the one in which relations in production and distribution among the branches and groupings of the economy would be resolved. That in such a chamber the workers enter into direct agreement on equalization of conditions for conduct of economic activity for groupings engaged in the same kind of production, that is, agreements on prices, tariffs, the turnover tax on products and rebates whereby that equalization would be achieved. And they would enter into agreements concerning relations in distribution of the total income realized for productive and nonproductive expenditure for each grouping engaged in production of the same kind. And nothing more than that. That would be the framework within which the workers in organizations of associated labor would be altogether independent in making further decisions in production and distribution. The consequence would be that not a single social service or nonproduction sector would be able to realize larger material income than those in production. Then our children would not be grasping for office jobs, and we would not have to force them and drive them, through what is called targeted education, into what are referred to as worker occupations.... Direct self-management and--related to that--equalization of conditions for conduct of economic activity represents the only strategy and the only way, among other things, of preserving the unified Yugoslav economy and a unified Yugoslavia....

[Question] We have full-fledged theoretical debates being conducted concerning the economies of the republics, of the nationalities, economies which have been rounded off. The advocates of this concept assert that this is the way of guaranteeing prosperity and ethnic equality.

[Answer] That is the road that leads to a shattering of Yugoslavia. Let us guarantee every citizen of Yugoslavia access to a job under equal conditions, equal income for equal work, a place to live and all the political, cultural and self-management rights at any place in Yugoslavia--wouldn't that resolve the issue of ethnic, religious, linguistic ... equality?!

[Question] But have we guaranteed those things?

[Answer] No, we haven't, unfortunately. We are cutting ourselves off and setting up barriers in "our own republics," in "our own communities," in "our own yards." I am seriously concerned and afraid that this course will not bring anything good either to the working class or to Yugoslavia. Nothing good. Indeed, I said as much to Tito on the eve of the 11th LCY Congress.

[Question] What did you say to him?

[Answer] We had a talk on Brioni under a tent for more than 3 hours. I asked him at the very outset of the conversation: /"Old Man, what is happening to Yugoslavia?"/ [in boldface] In the manner peculiar to him Tito started, and I knew that he had understood what my question referred to. What he said was literally this: /"There is no Yugoslavia if we continue on this way. There will be eight dwarfish and economically autarkic little states which cannot enjoy the kind of prestige in the world they might have."/ [in boldface]

[Question] What else did Tito say to you at that time?

[Answer] I asked him: "If that is so, Old Man, why don't you do something, everyone would do what you say?" He responded with a question: "And why are you silent, why don't you do something?" I said: "Who is that 'you' you are referring to, Old Man?" Tito waved his hand: "It is clear who I am referred to, to you old revolutionaries and party members, and to you among them, Tempo." Then he added, in a rather worried voice: "I believed and I hoped that the working class would integrate Yugoslavia...." I asked him what he thought about the party, did it dare run the risk of being broken up among the republics and provinces so that the LCY would become a federation of eight independent parties? Tito came back like a shot: "Certainly not that! The party must remain unified." We talked for a long time and in detail about many problems, and we agreed in all respects. He was surprised when I told him certain things....

[Question] What things?

[Answer] I cannot and I do not wish to speak about everything we discussed, at least for the present. Those are things I will say as I continue my memoirs, which I am writing at a rapid pace. I can only say this: When Tito rebuked me and certain other old revolutionaries for our passive behavior, I was unable to restrain myself and told him that for all of 3 years before that meeting I had been trying unsuccessfully to reach him, to get access to Tito. I wrote to his office, but in vain. I was continually informed that the president is busy.... When we parted, Tito said to me: "Come as often as you can, whenever you deem it necessary for us to have a little talk."

[Question] You said that for 3 years you had tried in vain to get Tito to see you. How, then, did you succeed in reaching him?

[Answer] I don't know. On the advice of certain comrades, I addressed Tito directly. I wrote to him that I would be making a critical statement at the 11th congress and that I would like to talk to him directly before that. And what happened? Just a few days had passed when I received a call from the post office in Petrovac. A woman was on the other end and she said: "Comrade Tempo, yesterday a Mrs Brioni was urgently seeking you and left a number for you to call." That is exactly what she said, that a "Mrs Brioni" was asking for me. I supposed at once that Tito had received my letter and that someone in the Old Man's office was trying to find me. He received me immediately after that.... But even on that occasion I was not notified through my office in Belgrade, but through the post office in Petrovac.

[Question] As far as you know, was Tito preparing a radical showdown with the provincial and republic statisms, that is, with the tendencies to parcelize Yugoslavia?

[Answer] He certainly was. That was made evident in his closing address at the 11th LCY Congress, not to mention the initiative concerning the 1-year term of office which he took at the Eighth Congress of the Federation of Trade Unions. It is no accident that he said at that congress that he was well aware that the political bureaucracy was hindering the workers from taking the management of production and distribution into their own hands. He was looking for a way and a means of breaking up, of cutting the knots, of bureaucracy, of factionalism and of usurpation of self-management. For example, as far as I can remember, he was calling for the chairmen of the League of Communists in the republics to be replaced a year before the republic congresses were held. Obviously he was looking for a way of selecting with more freedom the personnel for new leadership bodies. I am convinced that it was in pursuit of that goal that he proposed the calling of the Third Congress of Self-Managers. He wanted to appeal to the workers and seek their support.

[Question] The republic and provincial borders have in many respects become boundaries that separate. Those who are setting up those boundaries are appealing to the revolution--they say that that is indeed what we fought for.

[Answer] That is nonsense. Both during and after the revolution those boundaries were regarded as fine and barely noticeable lines in a single block of marble. In fact during the war we believed that the boundaries would even vanish between the Balkan States.... Immediately after the liberation I was driving with Mosa Pijade over Cakor Mountain. When we came upon a stone there which on one side read /People's Republic of Serbia/ and on the other /People's Republic of Montenegro/. [in boldface] Mosa asked that we stop, got out of the car and pushed that stone over. He said: "We have been fighting all our lives against divisions and borders, and now we are looking at boundaries between states even within Yugoslavia."

[Question] Would he have a hard time today because of such an action?

[Answer] Indeed he would. Today they would immediately label him a unitarist, a hegemonist and I don't know what else.

[Question] What nationality are you, Comrade Tempo?

[Answer] A Yugoslav, what else would I be? I am not a Serb. I am a Montenegrin only by birth. A Yugoslav. An internationalist. Back in 1946, as a deputy from Montenegro, I wrote down that I was a Yugoslav. I also declared myself to be a Yugoslav in that period of Savka and Tripalo, when that was regarded as treason.

[Question] Were you younger, you would have a hard time getting your name on a list of personnel as a Yugoslav. We have representatives of the Serbs, of the Croats, of the Albanians, of the Slovenes ... but there is no representative of the Yugoslavs.

[Answer] No, there isn't. But there will be, there has to be. There are more and more mixed marriages, and the young people are oriented toward Yugoslavism. This cannot be prevented.

[Question] Will our present republics and ethnic divisions be confronted with a great challenge at the moment when several million people in Yugoslavia state in the blank marked "nationality" that they are Yugoslavs?

[Answer] That will happen. It will happen soon. See what is happening in America. People of various nationalities settled there. They are settling there even today. And they all feel themselves to be Americans.... What is happening in western Europe? The state companies are unifying, a unified market is being created, and even a European Parliament. But we--we are doing everything backwards. We are moving apart and are proclaiming those divisions to be unity and self-management consensus.

[Question] So, what is to be done?

[Answer] Let us fight, let us not allow them to divide and separate us. This is a cause in which you newspaper people can help quite a bit. Write, strike blows against the bureaucracy, strike blows against separatism, and spare only one thing: do no harm to self-management and Yugoslavia. Socialism and Yugoslavia--those must be our reference points. Only that. Of course, I cannot imagine Yugoslavia without equality among the nationalities. But the way I conceive that equality of nationalities is that we build a self-managing and socialist social community in which every man has the right to work and his material income depends on his work regardless of the nationality to which he belongs. After all, I learned from Marx that in a society in which exploitation of man by man has been abolished there are no conditions for emergence of exploitation of one nationality by another. That is basically the way relations among the nationalities have been set up in the program of our party. Only on that foundation can we successfully build the equality of the nationality from the political, cultural or any other standpoint. Only under such conditions can we prevent the struggle for equality of the nationalities from becoming a struggle for the equality of the bureaucracies of the various nationalities.

[Question] Before you retired, while you were still an officeholder, were you ever publicly criticized in the press by name?

[Answer] Yes, many times. On one occasion almost all the directors of business firms attacked me in a meeting of the Economic Chamber of Belgrade. They referred to my television speech in favor of forming work units an sabotage, an attempt to break up the Yugoslav economy.

[Question] You were realistically in a position to pull the chairs out from under certain of those critics and to pin labels on them.

[Answer] That I never did. It never occurred to me to do that. Socialist democracy simply cries out for dialogue, for debate, for a contest between differing views and opinions. Without that, without that "draft," there is neither creativity nor self-management. And we lack dialogue, frank conversation, however bitter that conversation might taste to some people or however much it might jeopardize their official posts, their comfort, their good night's sleep and social position.

[Question] I would remind you of a conversation which Lenin had with Bukharin, I see that you are reading Bukharin. This is the passage where Lenin cautions the Bolsheviks that without debate and freedom of criticism there is no democracy either in society or in the party....

[Answer] Right. Bukharin told Lenin on his sickbed that there were quite a few "insubordinates" in the party, mainly intellectuals who did not respect the established authorities and who were calling for public and open debate of all the key issues of socialism. Stalin was in favor of reading these "insubordinates" out of the party. When Lenin heard that, he reacted with a strident and prophetic warning that if that happened the party would soon become a party of docile fools. That is what he said. I always remember that when I hear the anemic and formula-ridden speechifying in our delegate assemblies, in congresses, in working meetings. As though the speaker's main goal was not to "distinguish" himself, to avoid saying anything "suspicious," to be sure not to offend anyone. Whatever is proposed by the forum or some established authority within the forum is accepted without objection, by acclimation. There is no dialogue, there are no sparks, no fresh air is let in, and there is no critical and creative spirit urging progress. In my opinion that is one of the key reasons for the stagnation of self-management and the flood tide of all those bad manifestations I have been talking about.

[Question] Are the preparations for the 12th LCY Congress an occasion for frank talk about these problems?

[Answer] I think that the situation has been created in the development of production and distribution and in social relations that necessitates radical changes. If the situation that has been created is to be changed, a discussion will have to be opened up among party members, without restriction and without name calling to the effect that some position is regarded as opposed to self-management if it calls for amendment of certain provisions of the constitution. We should not undertake to hold the 12th congress without that kind of broad and open discussion.

And something else. At the 12th congress there ought to be open discussion of how it came about that we got into this situation. Was it a question of unrealistic relations which were supposed to be established on the basis of the new constitution and law? Or is it that the personnel were not competent or did not know how to apply the constitutional provisions in practice or to see that it was impossible to implement all the provisions in practice? And so on, and so on. Whichever of these alternatives or all of them together is involved, the accountability of the party members, the leaders above all, who contributed to creation of this situation must not fail to come about before the 12th congress. After all, these relations have persisted for years and have not been changing. And they did not fall from the sky.

CPCZ WEEKLY ON DANGERS OF POLISH WORKER MANAGEMENT

Socialist System Endangered

Prague TRIBUNA in Czech No 37, 16 Sep 81 p 3

/First installment of article by Karel Horak: "In the Service of Counterrevolution" entitled "What Hides Behind Worker Self-Management"/

/Excerpt/ Solidarity's plan to form a so-called workers self-management in enterprises and willfully organizing a movement for implementation of this plan is also in full agreement with Solidarity's power aspirations. The plan is based on the intention to abolish the socialist collective ownership of the means of production and thus to deprive the socialist state of its economic support. According to Solidarity, the so-called workers self-management should be fully authorized to manage an enterprise, including the right of appointing the director, and the state should not intervene in enterprise management at all. That is not all. The ownership of the enterprise should be transferred from collective state ownership to ownership by the workers collective, that is to group ownership, which would gradually evolve into the capitalist type ownership.

The question, who should use these "collective enterprises"--as they should be called--is not without interest. An official document, which characterizes their conception, says: "Self-management can be formed only on the initiative and with the support of Solidarity...," no other initiatives in establishing self-management will be strong enough to assert themselves, or they will be used in an attempt by management to manipulate Solidarity.

The logic of development is inexorable. Very often it discloses the actual objectives and intentions of individual actors in the political struggle which is taking place. One, who wants political power must necessarily acquire control over the economy. Expressed simply, the ownership of the means of production is one of the fundamental factors defining the nature of political power. That is why Solidarity endeavors to abolish collective ownership, to convert it into group ownership (which is essentially private) and to liquidate the principles of socialist planned management of the economy.

Economic Base Threatened

/Second installment of article by Karel Horak: "In the Service of Counterrevolution"

/Excerpt/ The main attack at the congress was directed toward the very foundations of socialism--the collective ownership of the means of production. The congress approved the principles of the so-called economic reform, which is supposed to be implemented through "self-managed collective economic mechanisms." The essence of the reform is constituted by the demand to convert collective ownership of the means of production to group ownership (which in practice means private ownership), and to deprive the state of both any ability to influence the management of the economy and the authority to appoint enterprise directors. At the same time, the congress appealed to the Sejm not to accept the government proposed law on self-management and state enterprise and, instead, to organize a nationwide referendum on Solidarity's proposal. If the Sejm were to turn down this ultimatum, Solidarity decided to organize the referendum by itself, and if the Sejm approved of the government proposal on the laws, Solidarity would ignore them.

Solidarity modestly does not say that this approach aims at depriving the state of the economic base and thus in fact to liquidate it. The main essence of this so-called economic reform is hidden behind dogmatic phrases about transferring the factories to workers. It is not difficult to decide, who would control and manage them. It would be the same class which the Polish people deprived of the control of the country and the ownership of the means of production 36 years ago.

AUGUST 1981 ISSUE OF SED THEORETICAL JOURNAL REVIEWED

East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 5 Aug 81 p 4

[Rene Heilig review of East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 8, August 1981, signed to press 9 July 1981, pp 737-848: "Clear Conception for the 1980's." Translations and/or summaries of articles by authors cited below, as well as by others, are published in pages following this review]

[Text] Science in our society is a central theme in EINHEIT No 8, 1981. "Further shaping the developed socialist society in the GDR in economic, social and cultural respects today depends largely on our ability to use, and also to determine in fact, the results of the scientific-technical revolution," Kurt Hager observes. Through the economic strategy for the 1980's as developed at the 10th SED Congress, he emphasizes, we have a clear concept for the growth of social production and thus also for the fundamental requirement for science. An essential aspect of our science policy therefore was our still more closely combining the science potentials of the combines, academies and university institutions. It was important to extend branch-specific basic research in the combines and to continue in speeding up the applicability of data from the Academy and the universities.

Helmut Koziolek, the author of another article, continues those ideas. He explains essential aspects of our party's economic strategy and stresses the close interaction among the 10 key points in this far-reaching guideline.

Greater economic effectiveness should have to be attained by means of modern science. That was a constructive response to the changed requirements under which the main task was going to be smoothly continued in its unity of economic and social policy throughout the 1980's.

The August issue of EINHEIT also features experiences in interdisciplinary research at the Academy of Sciences, recorded by Ulrich Hofmann and Wolfgang Marschall, and an article by Wolfgang Herger about the growing responsibility of youth to coping with scientific-technical progress.

CLOSER ATTENTION TO 'CITIZENS' CONCERNS' URGED

Bonn IWE-TAGESDIENST in German No 115, 4 Aug 81 p 1

[Report from Berlin: "SED Criticizes Law Infringements by State Organs." A translation of the East Berlin EINHEIT article cited below follows this commentary]

[Text] Ernst Timm, party boss of Rostock Bezirk, now has accused the GDR state organs of not paying enough attention to citizens' concerns and of infringing the law in processing petitions. Recent surveys by the party control commission in Rostock Bezirk had confirmed that in this field "still many deficiencies" had to be "overcome." The functionary asked the SED kreis managements to check the state organs' "respect for law" in their processing petitions. At the same time he granted, at the most recent session of the SED bezirk management, that recently, especially during the debates for the recent people's elections, the work collectives and the population had presented concerns "in great number and partly most critically."

The SED organ EINHEIT (No 8, 1981) also has expressed great dissatisfaction with the processing of petitions. Everywhere one should have to struggle resolutely, the journal asked, "that petitions are nowhere handled contemptuously, superficially or even heartlessly." The citizens' trust in the state was being undermined by someone who disregarded established processing deadlines or, instead of checking all possibilities, sought a convenient way out by asserting: "it won't work."

SED Functionaries' Discussion

East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 8, Aug 81 (Signed to press 9 Jul 81) pp 799-805

['Party and People' feature article by Werner Boehme, sector chief, and Lothar Steglich, staff employee, SED Central Committee: "On Civic Closeness of Our People's Representations"]

> [Text] What makes for a civic closeness of our people's representations? What makes a working style relate to the people? How can we still more comprehensively mobilize the people's creative capacities by involving the citizens even while we are looking for decisions through highly effective publicity work and a careful handling of petitions with all their suggestions, criticisms and recommendations? Many experiences and examples are adduced as an answer to these questions.

The socialist state which embodies the power of the workers and farmers, also holds decided guarantees for obtaining the great goals the SED decided on at its 10th party congress for the good of the people. That is why the party always sees to it that the socialist state consistently fulfills its role as the main instrument of the working people under working class leadership. It places great expectations in the vital force of the people's representations as the elected organs of this state power and in the creative activities of its deputies--from the People's Chamber, the supreme power organ of the GDR, down to the smallest communal representation.[1] The people's representations are functioning corporate bodies which in and through their activity implement the unity of decision-making, implementation and supervision. Do do not act in place but on behalf of the citizens. The broad involvement of the working people in the management and planning of social processes becomes a more and more typical criterion of life in socialism and is indispensable for the work of the deputies and for good results of their work.

A People-related Working Style

Transforming the will of the citizens--to accept the challenges of the 1980's and further strengthen the GDR through great performance improvements, politically, economically and militarily--into concrete activities calls for a working style that is most relevant to life and marked by comradely relations with the citizens and by knowing what concerns them. Civic closeness, relevance to life, solidarity with the people--that requires and encourages the policy of the main task in its unity of economic and social policy, engaged in systematically and consistently, a policy that makes the good of the people into the measure of all things, as espoused in great unanimity by our country's citizens in the people's elections on 14 June.

Genuine people's power is deeply democratic. For the first time the working people, through establishing the political power of the workers class and creating socialist production relations, no longer are an object of political rule but the sole support and subject of political power. On that also is based the new human relationship which becomes more and more marked as one of comradely cooperation and mutual aid. In making this social innovation fully prevail with all its advantages, we create the conditions "for implementing on an increasingly higher level the meaning of socialism to do everything for the good of the people, the interests of the workers class, the cooperative farmers, the intelligentsia and the other working people."[2] Our socialist state, the main instrument of the workers class and its allies, fulfills its function in this process because it functions as the organizational form of socialist democracy and as the instrument for its development at one and because its organs, through being relevant to life and affiliated with the people, critically help release the social energies and creative capacities of the working people. Civic closeness and closeness with the people are implied by the nature of the people's political power, the nature of a policy that is oriented to the interests of the people.

Civic closeness and solidarity with the people--that logically is a decisive principle in the work of the people's representations and their organs, because nothing is done for its own sake, everything is done for the good of working people. Working with relevance to life and civic closeness implies familiarizing the working people with this policy in its entirety, and with the connection between domestic and foreign policy all the way down to communal problems. Relevance to life also means conferring with the citizens about the tasks at hand, jointly finding feasible approaches, and that means learning from them and teaching them, seeking their counsel and paying careful attention to their problems. Keeping an open ear for the citizens' concerns, showing them respect, understanding them and being understood by them--all that must inform the people's solidarity of our people's representations. Civic closeness is no catchphrase that might be interpreted at will, in accordance with subjective notions or local exigencies. Rather, it defines a working style that results objectively from the deeply democratic character of the workers' and farmers' state power and becomes all the more a compelling precept in view of the high demands of the 1980's.

The civic closeness of the people's representations and their organs is inherent even in the ways and means of their formation and composition: the deputies come out of the working class, the class of the cooperative farmers and from all other working strata. Even before the future candidates are nominated, they are checked over by the work collectives. In the places where they do their everyday work they are known by their work, and there it can be expertly judged whether their words and deeds conform in their political, occupational and personal lives. And those will pass their tests there who, as good custodians of the people's interests, of our socialist fatherland, have sound political knowledge, a fine education and technical skills, expertise and rich experience in life, and are deeply rooted in their work collective in the enterprise and in the social life of their residential area. Comrade Erich Honecker pointed that out at an election meeting in Karl-Marx-Stadt: "You have put your candidates through their paces. They stem from your ranks. They will carry out the policy contained in the election appeal from the National Front of the GDR, which is in the interest of the workers class and all the working people."[3] And these very deputies remain working people after being elected, remain tied to the people, have to account for their activity and can be dismissed if they fall short in their duties.

Mobilizing the People's Creative Capacities

Civic closeness becomes real, however, not merely by that there exist more than 200,000 deputies or by the quality and composition of the people's representations and their organs. Civic closeness ia made real precisely also by the systematic and consistent activity of the people's representations. That mainly means making the preparation and implementation of the plan the pivot and fulcrum of the work. The plan, after all, is the most concentrated expression of the party policy as aimed at the well-being of the people, in which the social requirements and the working people's and collectives' initiatives toward their solution crystallize. That the people's representation work according to plans consequently also means promoting the working people's initiatives in socialist competition and providing much space for their activities, because fulfilling and a targeted overfulfilling of the plan, and achieving the ambitious competition obligations, require the working people's creativity and innovator spirit in every enterprise as in every town and community. Working according to plan thus includes precise state management and a high personal commitment by each deputy, manager and associate in the state apparatus and their resolute everyday advocacy of high plan and state discipline.

Everywhere we want initiatives, a high sense of responsibility, conscious discipline, and spotting, and promoting, what is innovative and progressive. In Stassfurt Kreis for instance the deputies actively involved themselves in the discussion of the 1981 economic plan, explained the kreis draft plan in their collectives and familiarized the working people with their increased requirements. Together with their work collectives the deputies committed themselves to exceeding the plan. At the same time they intend to improve the efficiency of their own work and of deputy activity as such. Such targets can of course only be achieved if the initiators mobilize the whole work collective for it. Only together with his collective can a deputy assume such an obligation. To that end he must exercise a convincing and mobilizing effect, advance cogent arguments in political mass activity and set a model in persistence and standing power. This was the way in which, for instance, foundry worker Dietmar Fischer, kreis assmbly deputy of Stassfurt, led a large collective of 200 colleagues into creative action. As a result, among other things, 92 tons of cast metal were produced in excess of the plan, 150 tons of material were saved, rejects were diminished at a clip of 0.8 percent, and 2 percent was saved in melting costs.

The Citizens' Involvement in Decision-making

Civic closeness by the people's representations and their organs means conferring with the citizens in all crucial matters, familiarizing them with relevant aspects, explaining problems that arise to them, listening to their counsel and learning from them. The more complicated the tasks may be--as they are more multiform and far-reaching in their interconnections and ramifications--, the more necessary is the citizens' participation in various forms in the management of the state and the economy. We have a golden treasure here which must still more effectively be mined: the high educational level of the citizens, their class-bound political circumspection, and their greater interest in the clarification and settling of civic affairs and in effectively solving economic tasks. For developing a working style of civic closeness it is crucial to provide ideological clarity everywhere about the fact that in our socialist democracy awareness, responsibility and the citizens' participation depend on eachother: awareness, on the knowledge about what is socially necessary; responsibility, on the deliberate exercise of civic rights and duties; and participation, on direct involvement in forming a will all the way to the implementation of what has been resolved.

The strength of the people's representations and their organs is exponential to the degree that they use and convert in their activity these elements in the political exercise of power, civic activities in various ways and many different forms. Not the quantity but the result is what always matters. The value of socialist cooperative efforts is not measured by how many commissions and task forces there are. Rather, high results are achieved, e.g. in territorial rationalization, where after a careful feasibility study the citizens' means and activities are concentrated on major focal points, and where every consultation about it is well prepared and it is made clear what is to be done in whatever form. Deputies and councils in the city of Halle have demonstrated that by working closely together with the citizens, holding consultations "in situ," organizing conversations between groups of council members and working people on the job, receiving status reports from the managements, engaging in exchange of experiences and conveying the experiences of the best workers.

The permanent commissions of the city kreis assemblies are also working in such practically relevant manner. Members of the territorial rationalization commission have taken part directly in the 1981 plan discussion in enterprises in various economic branches and there, together with the working people, traced further possibilities for tapping territorial reserves. In the outcome, among other things, approximately 160,000 machine hours were put to use and an output of M 7.5 million was achieved, and a considerable saving of fuel resulted in intra-plant traffic through deeper cooperative work.

To involve the citizens in searching for decisions is an important side of the people's representations' and their councils' work in civic closeness. The Stralsund construction information center, doing that, picked up directly the citizens' concern for urban renewal. Construction blueprints, models and sketches challenged the visitors to express their own opinions and come up with suggestions themselves. Thousands of citizens have made use of such a possibility. The number of their recommendations and suggestions--down to the color and architectural design of facades in the city center--exceeded all expectations. In conferences between deputies, state functionaries and architects many a solution was then rendered more specific or was reconsidered.

Working in civic closeness calls for a working style that pays attention even to time economy in this public partnership. What is the form to be used to achieve the optimum? This aspect also governs the interaction between the deputies with their responsible tasks and their work collectives and the contact with their voters in the election districts and residential areas. They combine every day the occupational work, the political work of the deputies in their work collectives, and the concerted efforts of the deputy groups in enterprises and cooperatives with the problems of the working people. When deputies conduct hours for public inquiries in the enterprises, about plan fulfillment, the application of best experiences, the way of how to get to top achievements, industrial cooperation with public state organs, and the use of territorial reserves for performance development, as they have been doing in Magdeburg Bezirk, the point precisely is that they want to use the citizens' opinions, suggestions, references and criticism in state management activity. So always again new impulses can be released for implementing the decisions and for working out solution alternatives for ripened development problems. How the workers' word, the experiences of the working class, crystallize in state decisions, that to a good part expresses what we mean by civic closeness.

Increased Effectiveness for Publicity

Another, no less important, aspect of working in civic closeness is found in the deputies' contact with their voters and in the cooperation between the state organs and their associates and the citizens in their residential areas. The experiences of the elections emphatically teach us this: A relationship of trust becomes most intimate where deputies have a concrete area of responsibility in certain houses, housing communities and families over a long period. A relationship of trust grows out of permanent contact and in many places leads to the readiness to participate more vigorously in the future in the elaboration, preparation, implementation and supervision of state decisions.

To do that, a deputy or state functionary must be fully informed. On their knowledge and skill largely depends how the citizens' great demands for expert information can be satisfied. After all, we are dealing here "with knowledgeable, educated people who will not settle for commonplace and hackneyed phrases. They expect comprehensive information and cogent arguments to gain the proper political orientation."[4] Answering the deputies' questions at meetings of the people's representations, active work in the election districts, a joint elaboration of standpoints and of argumentations and of targeted, objective information, and on concrete problems in matters of communal policy, serve the satisfaction of the need for information. The council of Frankfurt (Oder) Bezirk has set down concrete stipulations for how the political mass activity is to be organized throughout the entire bezirk and how the information policy and the cooperation with publication organs are to be rendered effective. Among the various methods in state publicity work that have been found useful, as part of mass political work, are the publication of information and reports, public answers to readers' letters, and the clarification of issues that arise under standard rubrics such "deputies enroute," "on the agenda," "the interview," "city-hall information," "information from the council," "letter from the mayor," "local schedule," "on the track of decisions."

Public council meetings have been found a very good method for further reinforcing the relationship of trust between the state organs and the citizens and making the bond still tighter between the voters and the elected and arousing their interest in the solution of the task and sparking initiatives. In the city kreises of Frankfurt (Oder), Eisenhuettenstadt and Schwedt, in Rostock and in our capital Berlin, in city and town districts, such council meetings are publicly prepared, started with a touring of the town, and public conferences then continue on major tasking areas in the territory, which conclude with laying down commitments for the continuing efforts. In the eastern part of Eisenhuettenstadt, 220 citizens attended such a council session. In Schwedt there have already been three such conferences this year in municipal districts and one in the Heinersdorf suburb. In Dessau this method has been practiced for several years and has been found as expedient there as in other towns.

All this proves: "The more convincingly we explain the tasks ahead of us, and the more thoroughly they are understood, the better we succeed in involving all working people and in solving them. The key is a working style that is most relevant to life, comradely relations of the party, state and economic functionaries with the citizens, and an accurate knowledge of what concerns them. The highest value must always be attached to that in our political mass activity. Because that encourages initiative and reinforces the confidence between the party and the people, the citizens' bonds with their socialist state."[5] The citizens are by no means merely passive recipients of information. They expect concreteness, truth, together with political guidance and directions for active participation.

At an experience exchange on mass-effective forms and methods for state publicity work last year in Neubrandenburg, sponsored jointly by the city council of Neubrandenburg and the Academy of Political Science and Jurisprudence, it was found:

be it the plan fulfillment in the construction industry, the expediting of urgent repairs in apartment houses, plan fulfillment in agriculture and the foodstuffs industry, a matter of public supplies, or conferring on problems in public education, health or culture, it all also always involves ideological demands and thus, tasks of the state organs in effective publicity work. Normally, after all, this involves measures affecting many people's working and living conditions, for which reason they must be discussed with them and can only be solved with them. That even applies to seemingly small matters, like changing business hours or traffic patterns, or reconstruction, which are important to the citizens because they affect the habitual life pattern in communal areas. When one delays publicity work until questions and problems pile up, one practically gives away what should be the guarantee for success: the working people's conscious readiness to dedicate themselves totally to a task.[6]

Careful Handling All Petitions

Great importance to shaping a working style of civic closeness also is a responsible handling of petitions, advice, suggestions and criticism--whether offered in letters to the councils or orally. That deputies, and members and associates of the state apparatus, keep an open ear to that specifically is of high political rank. A citizen, after all, addresses the state organs in confidence with his concern which, he likes to think, is in good hands there. That is why we must struggle resolutely everywhere for petitions nowhere to be treated contemptuously, superficially or even heartlessly. He who disregards established processing deadlines or, instead of checking all possibilities, seeks a convenient way out by asserting "it won't work," instead of changing things where that is necessary and possible, undermines the great trust the citizens place in the work of the people's representations. Granted, not every petition can receive a positive response, yet the general principle must be carefully to examine, process and take care of each petition. And the more this is done right on the spot together with the citizens and their collectives, the more convincing will the answer be. There is this maxim that is also incumbent on the deputies and state functionaries: "Whoever bears responsibility as a functionary in our party, state and economy will make the workers' words be heard, respond sensitively to the citizens' concerns, keenly watch all signals, react fast and carefully to the proposals and criticism of the working people and provide for solutions where they are necessary and possible. Poor routine, bureaucratic narrow-mindedness, arrogance and heartlessness in dealing with people will be found to be deeply alien to them."[7]

Especially during the election movement many citizens submitted suggestions for the development of production and on state management and communal policy tasks. Now inferences have to be drawn from them for the continued activity of the state organs, as Comrade Erich Honecker asserted at the second Central Committee session--no thought, no suggestion, no recommendation or advice must be disregarded or treated with contempt.

The participation by increasingly more working people in the exercise of state power, among them more than 200,000 deputies of the people's representations and hundreds of thousands of citizens actively engaged in volunteer work in the various forms of our socialist society's political organization form a reliable foundation for the stability of our socialist state. All their knowledge and skill, their experiences and creative capacities must now be summoned more than ever to cope with success also with the great challenges of the 1980's. Especially from the new dimensions of the tasks to be solved arises for the work of the people's representations and the associates of the state apparatus all the more of an obligation to work in civic closeness and people's solidarity.

Civic closeness is not merely one attribute but a basic feature of the workers and farmers power. And the more we advance in the shaping of the developed socialist society and the more penetrating the political, economic, social and intellectual-cultural changes become which we intend to achieve, the more closely must the work of the people's representations be oriented to life, to the citizens. That strengthens the authority and functioning capacity of the organs of socialist state power and reflects the ever stronger molding and perfection of socialist democracy, the main trend in the further development of our socialist state.

SUMMARIES OF OTHER MAJOR 'EINHEIT' ARTICLES

East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 8, Aug 81 (Signed to press 9 Jul 81)
'Resumes' addendum

Science and Society

[Summary of 'Science in Our Society' feature article, originally a lecture at Freiberg Mining Academy given on the occasion of Miners' and Foundrymen's Day, 23 June 1981, by Kurt Hager, SED Politburo member and Central Committee secretary for culture and science; pp 748-760. A translation of this article is published as part of a series of related items under the heading, "Basic Research Seen as Key to Production Success," in a recent JPRS issue of EAST EUROPE REPORT: ECONOMIC AND INDUSTRIAL AFFAIRS]

> [Text] Proceeding from the functions of science in socialism, the impulses for its development and the wholly new qualitative relations between production and science today, the article deals with fundamental conditions for the needed acceleration of scientific-technical progress, especially with basic research strategy, the correct development and use of the research potential and the further development of scientific creativity. Through a polemic against theories hostile to progress, in capitalist countries, the article explains our position on science as shaped by socialist humanism.

Economic Strategy and Development of Science

[Summary of 'Science in Our Society' feature article by Prof Dr Helmut Koziolek, economist; member, SED Central Committee; director, Central Institute for Socialist Economic Management, SED CC; chairman, Economic Research Council; member, GDR Academy of Sciences; member, EINHEIT editorial board; pp 761-769. A translation of this article is published as part of a series of related items under the heading, "Basic Research Seen as Key to Production Success," in a recent JPRS issue of EAST EUROPE REPORT: ECONOMIC AND INDUSTRIAL AFFAIRS]

> [Text] The basic feature that controls our party's economic strategy consists in taking another step toward combining the advantages of socialism with the scientific-technical revolution. How is, in particular, the intellectual-creative potential of our country being used to that end? Which main trends in science development have been set down in considering the ongoing speed-up, worldwide, of the scientific-technical revolution and the social exigencies and requirements?

Interdisciplinary Research Must Be Intensified

[Summary of 'Science in Our Society' feature article by Prof Dr Ulrich Hofmann, engineer, vice president, GDR Academy of Sciences; and Prof Dr Wolfgang Marschall, engineer, economist, department head, Central Institute for Economic Sciences, GDR Academy of Sciences; pp 770-776. A translation of this article is published under the heading, "Interdisciplinary Cooperation Urged for S&T Research," in a recent JPRS issue of EAST EUROPE REPORT: ECONOMIC AND INDUSTRIAL AFFAIRS]

[Text] Through more effective cooperation among the natural, social and technical sciences, the science contribution to the shaping of the developed socialist society must be intensified. What explains the need for more intensive interdisciplinary cooperation? What are the experiences of the Academy of Sciences, and what fosters and what blocks the development of interdisciplinary cooperation? What demands arise with respect to its management and planning?

Science and Technology--Youth's Proving Ground

[Summary of 'Science in Our Society' feature article by Dr Wolfgang Herger, member, department chief, SED Central Committee; pp 777-784]

[Text] Continuing on a higher level the communist education of all youth is the strategic line of SED youth policy. In it, the coping with the scientific-technical revolution gains in importance under the following aspects: providing youth with the knowledge needed for coping with scientific-technical progress, working youth meeting its test in implementing the scientific-technical tasks assigned by the 10th party congress; the growing responsibility of our young scientific-technical intelligentsia.

Our Policy, Closely Tied to the People, Must Be Effectively Implemented

[Summary of 'Party and People' feature article by Hans Albrecht, engineer, economist; member, SED Central Committee; first secretary, SED Suhl Bezirk Management; pp 785-790]

[Text] The 10th party congress decisions provided a scientific orientation and guidance for practical action for the communists, party organizations and all citizens. That the working people make the policy that is committed to the well-being of the people their very own business also is the concern of political leadership activity in the Suhl Bezirk party organization. Deepening mass solidarity and enforcing our economic strategy--higher demands arise from all that, which we must meet.

The Marxist-Leninist Party and Its Growing Leadership Role

[Summary of 'Party and People' feature article by Prof Dr Manfred Herold, economist; candidate member, SED Central Committee; first dean (prorektor). Karl Marx Party College, SED CC; pp 791-798

> [Text] Considering the challenges of the 1980's, the article shows how our Marxist-Leninist party through political creativity and with a progressive conception that is turned to the masses, which are thereby mobilized, proves once again its real leadership capacity and fulfills its growing role in the political leadership for all social processes. In arguing aggressively, the article combatively fights against the bourgeois misrepresentations of that fact.

Safeguarding Peace and Defense Preparedness

[Summary of article by Dr Werner Huebner, colonel, sector chief, SED Central Committee; pp 806-813]

> [Text] Safeguarding the peace and fulfilling our main task come indivisibly combined. The realization of that is becoming increasingly a motive for action for the GDR citizens that marks their growing willingness to contribute through increased personal efforts also to the military protection of our socialist fatherland. We shall do all we can in our commitment to our people and in our international responsibility in making our contribution to the safeguarding of peace in firm alliance with the Soviet Union and the peoples in the socialist community.

Historic Inevitability and Epochal Understanding in Our Time

[Summary of article by Prof Dr Wolfgang Kuettler, research office head, Central Institute for History, GDR Academy of Sciences; pp 814-821]

> [Text] In looking at the course of history as it really is in our era and by taking issue above all with the positivistic bourgeois conceptions of history, the following is being explored: How do laws affect history? What are the indications of that in the basic processes of our era, particularly in the struggle for peace and social progress? Why does this development not proceed in a straight line but full of contradictions and conflicts? What role is played by the subjective factor in enforcing historic inevitability?

Aesthetic Education of School Youth

[Summary of article by Dr Heinz Sallmon, lecturer, deputy director, Institute for Social Science Teaching, GDR Academy of Pedagogical Sciences; pp 822-828]

> [Text] The aesthetic, as a component of communist education, is not confined to the encounter and occupation with art but embraces all of culture. The vital areas students are exposed to contain elements of beauty, but also of ugliness. It is the task mainly of the pedagogues to provide all children with the sense and knowledge of what to us not only in art but also in our lives and interhuman relations is beautiful or ugly, what has to be fostered and what has to be surmounted.

USA's Arms Buildup Course--A Threat to Mankind

[Summary of excerpts from "The Greatest Robbery in History," a brochure published in New York, November 1980, written by Victor Perlo, member, USCP Central Committee; pp 829-834]

> [Text] Through taking issue with the lie about the threat, this is being shown: the U.S. government has started the most dangerous arms buildup of all times. The "national defense" budget is a budget for spreading U.S. military power all over the world. The first strike threats are coming from the United States, while the Soviet Union keeps taking the initiative to end the arms race. Big business interests in dominating and profiteering are the impulses for the arms buildup which is accompanied in the United States by a reactionary offensive. The U.S. communists are rigorously fighting against that course of arms buildup.

ACTIVITY OF 'AGERPRES' DISCUSSED BY DIRECTOR

Bucharest PRESA NOASTRA in Romanian Jul 81 pp 15-19

[Interview with Ion Cumpanasu, director general of the Romanian Press Agency, AGERPRES, by Virgil Danciulescu; "Serving the Party and the People With Devotion"—date and place not specified]

[Text] [Question] The Romanian Press Agency, AGERPRES, has within the overall means of mass communication a specific task of great political-social responsibility of informing the public in our country and abroad through the press and radio-television about domestic and foreign policies and political, economic, social, scientific and cultural-artistic affairs in Romania, as well as disseminating in our country news from abroad. How is this task carried out?

[Answer] In speaking about this fundamental task, I feel that there is no lack of interest in stressing the fact that a single staff, the one dealing with domestic news, monthly provides an average of approximately 2,000 news items, with 500 dealing with the activities of our party and state leadership and other political, economic and cultural-scientific events, 500 dealing with subject news, including sports and approximately 1,000 news items being provided especially for radio-television within the framework of a separate bulletin.

At AGERPRES, significant reporting sources are concentrated for events in all the corners of the world. In this regard, I can mention that daily telegraph reports are received from over 50 national and international press agencies, reports that produce a volume of items of approximately 2,500 pages. The Daily Staff Buletin of Foreign News contains up to 100 items destined for the press or radio-television. These include briefs, notes, daily and subject editorials, press reviews, statements, opinions, profiles of international political figures, summaries referring to achievements in the socialist countries and in the developing nations, energy problems and so forth. Radio and television are sent news items in special forms - short news items and flashes on developing events, keeping in mind the specific requirements of this means of mass information with a broad public audience.

The agency publishes 12 periodic bulletins covering a vast subject area: international political affairs, economic problems in general and international economic trade, domestic affairs in the socialist countries, the international communist and workers movements, events in the developing nations, military affairs, technical-scientific affairs and the problems of energy and fuels. These bulletins total approximately 1,300 to 1,500 pages per month.

[Question] What is the principal content of this informative activity?

[Answer] A central place in the agency's activities is held by reflecting, through news items and reports, as well as photographs, the political events and official or working meetings and visits of the secretary general of the party and the other actions of the party and state leadership. In order to carry out this task of great responsibility under optimum conditions, which require a special effectiveness and a high professional level coupled with a thorough political training, a significant number of writers and photo-reporters are brought together and a mirsculous organizational effort is made that will guarantee a proper journalistic level in the texts and pictures and the accuracy of the facts and figures mentioned in the news items and reports.

Paralleling reflecting the central political events, the agency has the significant task of presenting, through news items, summaries and reports, the manner in which the ministries, central institutes, counties, large enterprises and agricultural units implement the tasks and directives established by the party congresses and the party and state leadership in the different fields of socialist construction - industry, agriculture, construction, social-cultural activities, science and education - in the continual broadening of the workers participation in the management of the country's political and economic affairs, and in the raising of the people's material and spiritual standard of living.

[Question] One of AGERPRES's fundamental attributes is informing the public abroad about Romania's domestic and foreign policies and presenting the economic, social, political, cultural and scientific realities of the process of building socialism. By what means does the Romanian Press Agency achieve this important task?

[Answer] Through the Foreign Broadcasts Staff, the agency makes events known, as well as their meaning and significance, and transmites to foreign countries materials that reflect the progress of the Romanien economy, the continuing development of socialist democracy in our country and the complex mechanism for bringing the mass of workers together in the management of the entire society and in the improvement of the leadership of society. A significant number of items present the international activities of the party and state and their contribution to the solution of the complex problems of international affairs and to the strengthening and unification of the revolutionary, democratic, antiimperialist forces that are fighting for the cause of social progress, detente and peace.

The most effective means of reporting, especially slated for press agencies, is the radio broadcast or cable, conducted in four languages - Russian, English, French and Spanish, with a broadcast time totalling approximately 31 hours daily. These broadcasts are received by approximately 50 agencies. Similarly, we provide a telex news service for approximately 15 national agencies. For publications and institutions abroad, as well as numerous persons who are interested in Romanian realities, AGERPRES publishes the weekly magazine ACTUALITATEA ROMANEASCA [Romanian Current Affairs] in English and French, versions of the magazine LUMEA [The World] in Russian, English, French, Spanish and German, and the magazine ROMANIA - FILE DE ISTORIE [Romanian - Pages of History] in five versions (Russian, English, French, Spanish and German). Similarly, a series of bulletins are published in six languages - Russian, English, French, Spanish, German and Arabic, on a daily, weekly and monthly basis with a total run of approximately 14,000 copies dealing with the vast problem of the internal and foreign activities of our party and state and the economic and social-cultural relations of socialist Romania.

AGERPRES publications are disseminated in approximately 100 countries in Europe, Africa, Asia, the two Americas and Australia.

Placing on film the most significant events of the last 30 years, the Photo-reporting Staff maintains in its film and photograph libraries a true illustrated chronicle of socialist Romania. For that reason, there is a special responsibility for preserving and using the unique photo library of high level events, in accordance with the regulations in effect. The Staff conducts photo-reporting at official events, as well as subject reporting for the press and other users. At the same time, it maintains an exchange relationship with 80 agencies abroad, to which it monthly forwards approximately 4,000 photographs and from which it receives approximately 1,500 photos each month. The specialized staff publishes on a bi-monthly basis the photo-magazine FOTOCRONICA AGERPRES in a run of 14,000 copies.

[Question] How does AGERPRES work on the international level in the great competition for information?

[Answer] The world of international press agencies is today, as is well known, the arena of a fierce struggle. A small number of agencies are enormous, multi-national or trans-national enterprises that collect and transmite news from and to the entire world. These agencies are after not only the priority in obtaining and spreading news, but frequently exclusivity; they are concerned with sensational aspects, frequently with political scandals more than economic phenomena.

Each of the great international agencies has offices in over 100 countries and thousands of correspondents who transmite millions of words. These agencies disseminate news 24 hours per day to thousands of subscribers - national agencies, newspapers, radio and television stations - and have ultramodern means of tele-communication available, including radio transmission via communication satellites, intercontinental submarine cables and so forth.

Currently, there are national news agencies in approximately 120 countries, most for transmiting domestic and foreign news to the national press and radio-television, with some of them also disseminating news abroad about their countries.

In contrast to the large agencies, the majority of the national agencies are faced with immense difficulties: a precarious financial situation, a lack of technical means and specialists, a lack of journalists and a poor development of telecommunications in many countries. In some cases, the communications between neighboring countries still take place through the intermediary of the former mother countries. Additionally, in relation to the national income, the charges for telephone calls are exorbitant.

I wanted to give these several points on the world of press agencies since I feel they are necessary to understand the objectives, means and ways of action used by AGERPRES in order to provide, with the means available, an accurate and objective reporting in all the areas of the world and in order to allow the broadest possible penetration of information about Romanian affairs and the domestic and foreign political actions of our country.

AGERPRES maintains relations for collaboration with 72 foreign agencies, including over 66 on the basis of agreements. Among these are all the international agencies, 14 agencies in socialist countries and 34 agencies in the developing nations. AGERPRES participates as an observer in the pool of the nonalined nations' agencies and in other forms of regional press agency collaboration.

The contracts concluded with different agencies and the use of the multiplex system ensure the cable telex reception (the most rapid and certain system of telecommunications) of all the large agencies, the majority of the socialist agencies and other important agencies. Through the same channels, we ensure the dissemination of news about Romania to the main international and national agencies, as well as tele-photo reception and transmission.

[Question] Under the current conditions when, on the world information market, the great agencies frequently unilaterally or even in a distorted manner present events in different areas, what are the possibilities for AGERPRES to provide correct, truthful information and to avoid certain pitfalls sometimes presented by one agency or another?

[Answer] Practice has proven the need that in relating an important event to depend upon a number of agencies and to retain those facts confirmed from different sources. But, the most important source is the news agency in the country where the event has occurred and, for that reason, its use is a general rule for us.

The publication of news from the national agency source creates, at the same time for this moral obligation, the need to publish from the AGERPRES source news about Romania.

[Question] What are AGERPRES's concerns for improving the reporting of our central and local press and radio-television?

[Answer] The principal subject of all of our staff groups has been for a long time the broad constructive program and the themes and tasks of historical significance contained in comrade Nicolae Ceausescu's Report and in the documents and decisions of the 12th RCP Congress. The agency's workers consider it a duty of honor to do everything to present in a convincing and journalistic manner the inspired program of continuing the process of building a multilaterally developed socialist society and advancing Romania towards communism, the achievements of our people in implementing this program and the actions carried out on an international level for a better and more just world.

In the area of domestic news, one constant concern is the qualitative, journalistic improvement of reporting on central events and other activities involving the party and state leadership. Taking into consideration some of the elements stemming from a comparison of similar previous events, we must be permanently open to new things, to the qualitatively special element in an event, an element that must be brought out with journalistic competence.

In the information related to the vast subject of socialist construction in our country, in addition to those subjects illustrating the continuation of development programs in industry, agriculture, housing construction and foreign trade, we insist upon the qualitatively new aspects of economic activities.

A significant concern is the presentation, in its full complexity, of the broad democracy of our society and of the growth of the participation of the masses of workers in the adoption of party and state decisions and in the management of economic-social affairs.

Naturally, we present and will present in varied forms the continuing growth of all the people's material and spiritual well-being, the supreme objective of our party's policies.

The above objective also guides the activities of the Photo-Reporting Staff, where we place a strong accent on improving the quality and variety of the pictures produced and on enrichening the photo library with the most significant achievements in socialist construction in all the counties of the country.

[Question] In our media, and sometimes even in PRESA NOASTRA, there is criticism with regards to the effectiveness of transmissions and a certain decrease in the amount of information in the country and especially photographs. Is this criticism founded? What actions are being taken to meet the increased demands of our media?

[Answer] Without rejecting the criticism regarding the effectiveness of the information provided by our agency, I must point out that in many cases the delays are caused by the need for certain additional verifications so as not to err in publishing inaccurate news items or, especially in the foreign realm, presenting confusing situations during an uncertain evolution of events.

The agency's management is concerned with the justified criticism regarding a certain decrease in the number of photographs, as well as the news reflecting the economic-social affairs of the country, and we are working to satisfy those requirements of the press.

We must say, however, that there is no great interest for subject photography at AGERPRES since most publications and especially dailies and periodicals, as well as illustrated magazines, have their own photo-reporters, and it is somewhat natural for these to publish their own materials. It happens that the photographs taken from the agency are not only not signed by their authors (normally not even by the collective group - AGERPRES), but they appear signed by the photoreporters of the respective newspaper. This also sometimes happens with some of the news items that the newspaper correspondents could not get prior to the Agency. In connection with this, more than once the news item from the agency which the newspaper does not have from its own staff is not picked up because this item bears the caveat "proxy." I said "proxy" in quotes because sometimes this informational material is also based on an agency news item.

Leaving aside these small problems, I must, nonetheless, say that our users have the right to feel dissatisfied, but I think that not so much because of the quantity of the information, but especially for its quality. We have discussed this problem with the leaderships of the newspaper staffs and radio-television and we have taken a series of measures in this direction, measures that are now being applied.

[Question] In the field of foreign political affairs, what objective does AGERPRES pursue in its reporting activities?

[Answer] In the field of reporting international affairs, through the bulletins of the foreign news staffs and informational materials, as well as through the magazine LUMEA, which is also published by AGERPRES, the principal task is to consistently reflect the dynamic, constructive policy carried out by our party and the powerful echo created by the theses and initiatives of our country's president in the most important problems of the contemporary era.

We are especially involved in the statement and support through actions of the party and state declarations on certain major ideas, such as: the need to continue the process of detente and eliminate the sources of international tensions; general disarmament, first of all nuclear disarmament - a fundamental requirement of the contemporary era; disarmament, an indispensible condition for ensuring the elimination of underdevelopment; a European security that directly involves military disengagement; the active participation of the small and medium-sized countries, a condition for democratizing international affairs; a new international economic order, the fundamental requirement for ensuring peace in the world; the new conditions of relations between the communist and workers parties; and the need for unity of the broadest democratic and progressive forces in the struggle against imperialism and for social progress. Certainly, the ideas listed here do not exhaust the broad subject and, at the same time, are the priorities of our foreign policy which AGERPRES must deal with in this field.

I would also like to stress that in foreign information we try to give greater attention to the economic problems of the contemporary world in order to inform the public about the new means of understanding energy consumption. We will continue to disseminate columns in our bulletins such as "The Energy Agenda," "Economic-Social Realities in the Developing Nations," "From the World of Capital" and so forth. Similarly, we are involved in reflecting the growth, even in the capitalist countries, of opposition to the mentality and practice of the consumer society.

[Question] Keeping in mind the weight of the AGERPRES's "editorial" activities, it would be appropriate to have some mention to reflect the publications' concer for providing information for foreign consumption.

[Answer] With regards to propaganda for foreign consumption, the materials will pursue the more powerful expression of the new realities of Romanian society and the outlining of its broad democracy and the new humanism of the order that is being built in Romania. We are aware that the propaganda abroad must become more active and more combative, giving in convincing forms a more significant portion to counter-propaganda.

In order to ensure an increased efficiency for this material, we will attempt to have, to a greater degree than up to now, a more differentiated approach to the subject and a more accentuated targetting according to the different categories of destinations.

In the future, perhaps that even the magazines in foreign languages, ACTUALITATEA ROMANEASCA and LUMEA, should be differentiated not only with regards to the versions by language, but also according to their destinations. And, the problem of differentiating propaganda abroad is a complex, long-term problem tied both to personnel problems and financial ones. However, we must do everything in order to advance in this direction because this serves as the basis for improving our propaganda abroad to the level and favorable conditions created by the growing prestige socialist Romania enjoys in the world, as well as its domestic and foreign policy, wisely and smartly promoted for the most noble aspirations of humanity by the president of the country, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu.

[Question] The reporting activities carried out by AGERPRES also require a continuing improvement of its own reporting activities. How are the "reporters" reporting? How are the relations with the public institutions designed to provide information operating? Through spokespersons? What about the network of correspondents?

[Answer] The question touches on a problem whose solution has kept us busy for a long time. Certainly, the main amount of data accumulated by those you have called "reporters" must be the results of their own, persistent and continuing efforts. In this sense, our staffs have broad possibilities available, first of all the contacts with life, with the land and with the places where special events take place worthy of being noted in the news by the agency. Therefore, we have a very broad interest and direct contact with the authors of these events. Then, they have on-hand Romanian and foreign publications, ministry bulletins, statistical bulletins and documentary publications, as well as a permanent tie with the ministries, other central institutes and large units, in accordance with the existing divisions within the staffs, with each one having a certain field in which, perhaps it is said too often, there is specialization.

To this, we must add those forms of reporting necessary to our profession, such as the press conference, speeches on situations in different fields and contacts with spokespersons in the central institutes and public organizations. In this direction, steps have been taken, but still insufficient in number, especially under the conditions where each field of activity must today be regarded through the prism of the manner in which it reflects in its achievements the requirements for a new quality, which guide the efforts of all our people.

With regards to the spokesperson, I would like to add the fact that if, after a good period when in accordance with the requirements received AGERPRES collected for use by the press so-called weekly bulletins from each ministry and central institute regarding new activities in their areas and those events worthy of being noted by the press in these fields of activities, now our people cover the path to the offices of these spokespersons in vain because, with extremely few exceptions, no one is interested in these especially useful activities. I say especially useful referring, certainly, to those that have a very serious content and not those that are simple formalities. It seems to me that there should be more energetic actions, not only through the Journalists' Council, but also through the staffs of the different publications, to get the spokespersons in the institutes involved, in accordance with the provisions of the Press Law. And, because I have mentioned the Press Law, I would like to point out the fact that if it is taken into consideration with regards to the responsibility of the staffs and the reporter in order to apply its provisions, otherwise the obligation belongs to someone else for the proper execution of press activities. I am referring first of all to the access to news sources, but, certainly, not just to this.

[Question] Reporting is an important, essential step in the formative-educational process. It requires a thorough political-professional training. What is being done to improve the reporters and editors and to strengthen their qualities as militant communists in the field of press activities?

[Answer] The constantly growing requirements of working in the agency imperatively raise the need to continually improve newspaper personnel, both in a political sense and in a professional one. I must point out that the level of exigencies in this area were continually raised. Just 5 to 6 years ago, we were satisfied if a foreign news editor knew a foreign language well. Today, nearly all know two foreign languages well and many of them know three or four foreign languages. Similarly, several years ago, we still had numerous editors who were completing their higher studies and, in some cases, barely their high school studies. Currently, of the staff personnel, 90 percent have high studies and 10 percent (in the great majority of jobs that do not require higher studies) have average educations, with nine of these workers pursuing correspondence courses in journalism departments. In the ranks of the staff personnel, there are 28 graduates of post-university courses. At the same time, we can mention that over 90 percent of the staff have graduated from or are currently enrolled in higher party courses.

The staff personnel have almost all graduated from up-grade training courses. A contribution to the improvement of the political-professional level of the journalists is made by the political education groups in each staff and groups for the study and discussion of party documents after they appear, as well as specific forms for professional discussions, such as the "journalists' workshops" in the staffs.

In presenting a series of achievements in this area, we are at the same time aware that we still have much to do and that the level of training is not satisfactory for all. For the ever greater requirements made on the agency, we must provide a political and professional training at an ever higher level.

At the same time, I think that right now the accent must move to the better use of the increased knowledge gained by our workers on both a political and professional level in practical activities and in the content and variety of the materials produced.

ACTIVITY OF PRESENTING ROMANIA ABROAD DISCUSSED

[Interview with George Potra, chief editor of the Publications for Foreign Consumption Staff, Serban Stati and Victor Botez, secretaries responsible for editing on the Staff, by Cristina Dumitrescu; "How we are Presenting the Picture of Today's Romania to the World — date and place not specified

[Text] In the realm of Romanian journalism, the written press for foreign consumption has tasks of special importance, with a constantly richer content in direct relation to the dynamics of our international affairs and to the lively pulse of socialist Romania's current political, economic and cultural relations with the countries and peoples throughout the world.

A discussion dealing with the specific professional problems of this area of the press seemed to us to be worthy of interest so we called upon our colleagues at the Publications for Foreign Consumption Staff - George Potra, the chief editor, Serban Stati, a secretary responsible for editing, and Victor Botez, another secretary responsible for editing - to give some opinions, experiences and points of view regarding the specific content of their activities.

This dialogue will be continued also at AGERPRES, where there is a powerful sector of activity dealing with informing the entire world about Romanian political, socio-economic and cultural activities, as well as at Romanian Radio-Television where there is a rich experience in the field of programs for foreign consumption.

Before turning this over to our interlocutor, we wish to succinctly note several points:

Last year, the Publications for Foreign Consumption Staff celebrated its 30th anniversary of existence. Over time, the number of publications produced has increased and diversified in direct correlation with the needs of our foreign propaganda, stemming from the increase itself in socialist Romania's involvement in the field of international relations and the unequalled prestige that it has acquired in the world. This correlation is expressed, on one hand, by the increase in the number of versions and popular foreign language editions, while, on the other hand, by the increase in the number of copies. As a result of this evolutionary process, a process of transformation and permanently keeping up to date, it publishes periodicals in six languages: French, English, German, Spanish, Chinese and Russian. One and one-half years ago, the Publications for Foreign Consumption Staff was given the task to create and publish the magazine of the National Center for Promoting Friendship with Other Peoples, the magazine VEAC NOU. This publication joins the magazines ROMANIA AZI (in English, French, German and Spanish), ROMANIA with the literary supplement BIBLIOTECA ROMANA and ORIZONTURI ROMANESTI in Russian, ROMANIA in Chinese and REVISTA ROMANA (French, English, German and Russian). Similarly, the Staff publishes the Romanian version of the magazine UNIUNEA SOVIETICA, a task that requires more than a simple technical operation, being produced by a micro-staff that deals exclusively with putting out this publication.

[Question] What is the content today of the press's foreign propaganda and how is this activity characterized in 1981 under the conditions of an unprecedented intensification of socialist Romania's relations with countries throughout the world and the growth of its role and prestige in the contemporary world?

Potra: The Ninth RCP Congress and the period that followed it saw a concern and, to an equal degree, the success of turning domestic and foreign Romanian propaganda into a coherent system that brings together directives, objectives and means. Certainly, during the years, there have been numerous statements in the program documents of the RCP, in the speeches of its secretary general and in other party and state documents related to the area of activity, the means of use and the stress that we must place on one situation or another, in one area or another. Over the course of a decade and one-half the Romanian concept of foreign propaganda has substantially improved and permits us to currently speak, through its fundamental data, of a coherent system in which the press occupies a distinct but not singular position, with the other instruments and means being associated with it.

A moment of special significance for foreign propaganda in general and for press propaganda in particular was the March 1978 adoption of the Political Executive Committee Decision regarding the development of relations of friendship and assistance, the first decision dedicated exclusively to this field and which set directions, objectives, means and responsibilities. Through this decision, specific measures were adopted regarding broadening the framework for carrying out foreign propaganda activities in the press. The increase in the means used (the appearance of certain new publications of this type), the numerous improvements that have occurred in the activities of the existing press organs (REVISTA ROMANA's monthly appearance instead of a quarterly issue, for example) and the measures to improve the content and the graphic and polygraphic conditions for the appearance of publications for foreign consumption are merely several of the specific results of this decision. Through such measures that principally involve the press, today we have more magazines, in more copies and a wider area for dissemination. We can state with complete certainty that, without having an ideal situation, we are closer to the requirements and values of our foreign policy. Certainly, we, the journalists who work in the field of international relations, always aim high at the values of our foreign policy, unceasingly trying to get closer to these high points. We must have the most effective reflection possible and the most profound reflection of the great altitudes of the ideas expressed in the field of Romanian foreign policy and of its exemplary dynamism. For us and for the entire front of propaganda activities, this is the source to the necessity to attempt to overcome the stage of reflecting and writting down, with ourselves achieving an action which, by virtue of the fundamental guidelines of the party, will be capable of foreseeing and anticipating events through journalistic actions and methods based upon the best knowledge of international public opinion and the centers of interest on both a subject and regional level.

[Question] If we were to make a comparison between the press for domestic consumption and the press for foreign consumption, what would you note as the primary defining element, from a professional point of view, for the latter?

Botez: In differing from the domestic press where you assume that the reader knows something about the subject, is aware and has a background of information accumulated over time from diverse sources, in the press for foreign consumption the social-political theme must keep in mind the premise that the reader knows much less or even nothing about the subject. Certainly, this does not mean that each article requires an exhaustive approach. In the strategy of planning and producing articles, we keep in mind that each of our publications has dealt, over the years, with such a subject and we must also avoid a repetition that can become annoying. The main problem lies precisely in the existing distances in the spiritual geography.

[Question] Generally, in producing a publication you have in mind a certain make up of the public and there is a correlation between the type of newspaper or magazine and the category or categories of readers who are targetted. How is this correlation resolved in the case of the publications for foreign consumption?

Stati: There are some magazines (in Russian and Chinese) that address a sufficiently precise area, but for others the public is very heteroclitic with regards to age, occupation and spiritual profile. The magazine ROMANIA AZI, for example, which appears in four versions - French, German, English and Spanish - or REVISTA ROMANA - in French, English, German and Russian - is also read by the French and the French-speaking public in Africa, by Americans and by Indians, and by the Spanish and by the Cubans. The versions of these magazines are 70 percent identical and it is difficult for you to find a common area of concerns and the means of approaching subjects that will be of equal interest. There are differences in psychology, cultural formation and ideological education that we must keep in mind. We cannot rely on a regional jargon since the magazine must be conceived and produced so it interests the reader in New York and the one in Lagos.

Stati: I am convinced that a simple, clear expression, without the stylistic embellishments that we are still used to in the domestic press, ensures a good reception. Recently, we had meetings with readers of REVISTA ROMANA. Foreign students who are studying in Bucharest participated in the discussions, as well as cultural persons from Timisoara. One of the problems discussed was pomposity, especially in the cultural journalism. For translators, such stylistic shortcomings raise great problems. If the style is preserved in English or in German, for example, it becomes dull and the readers will reject this type of journalism. The problem of pomposity and the temptation to turn a journalistic text into a literary one constitute aspects that we are especially concerned about.

From a subject point of view, one of the essential aspects of our work is the selection process. In the domestic press, not just the specialized magazines, but also the dailies present almost everything new that happens in the different areas of activity. Our publications do not have the possibility of covering everything and the selection process becomes essential and is carried out with maximum responsibilty. Not even the reporting can be done the way it is for the domestic press. Let us take the example of a book review: you must give the reader more information about the subject of the book and about the author, beginning with the idea that what is well-known to the Romanian public can be totally unknown to the foreign public and that this book is not available to them. Similarly, the similarities and dissociations that are at play must also be carefully considered so that the reader can understand the terms of comparison. It is not very easy to achieve this, without committing the sin of using a didactic style, and this is one of the difficulties related to working with collaborators who are not always ready to modify their approach and the writing style they have become accustomed to. We must not forget, however, that the main purpose of our publications is to explain things to the foreign public: to explain our country's policies, to explain Romanian realities and to explain the principles of developing our society. To explain clearly, convincingly and soundly.

Botez: We must carry out a good propaganda for our economic, social, cultural and scientific values. Therefore, this means the existence of an axiological process and a rigorous selection that will show the entire world we are addressing (our magazines go to approximately 90 countries) the significant competitive Romanian values. In order to make them better known, we must keep in mind the regions we are addressing and the comprehensive nature of the masses of readers that are found in countries with very different cultural levels and that are of a specific spiritual nature. There is also need to find a common denominator, a vocabulary that will be accessible to all categories of readers. Along these lines what I think must be stated, however, is the need for our journalistic approach to preserve its specific brand, to let us remain ourselves. We must express ourselves according to our national spiritual nature and our means of communicating.

[Question] In what way are personnel trained and selected for this area of journalism? Can we speak of a certain specialization?

Potra: Without a doubt, the journalist of our days has a background of political and professional knowledge that is broader than his predecessors. We can find in this portrait of the 1981 journalist a series of objective factors, years and years of material efforts, organizational efforts. I am thinking about the establishment and operation of the journalism departments, certain post-graduate courses for journalists and all the editorial efforts dedicated to the political and professional improvement of the journalists. Similarly, I am thinking about the broad actions, first of all political actions and then, barely in second place, professional ones, related to the certification of journalists, and so forth. There are some very important things that we have done and which find all their corollaries and their framework for affirmation and expression in the Press Law, which incorporated these new things into a statute on the operations and responsibilities of the journalism profession.

Similarly, we must mention the importance of the decisions made by the leadership of our party regarding the disestablishment of censorship, proof of the fact that the level of the journalists' political and professional training in the Romania of our times serves in itself as the foundations for actions that no longer require an external control.

Under these conditions of a high level of political and professional training of journalists, I believe that we, nonetheless, cannot permit the mistake of accepting that a journalist can be used anywhere and in any way. I believe in specialties, I believe in specialization and I am convinced that the activities of a journalist in one area of another of the profession cannot be, should not be, determined by criteria of an administrative nature. In my opinion, in foreign affairs journalism there is need perhaps more than anywhere else for specialized journalists. And, I believe that our journalism department, in addition to all the good things that it has done over the years, should be able to also take into consideration just such a specialized training. I have in mind, for example, the thorough knowledge of at least two foreign languages so that the article can be directly written in the respective foreign languages. The expressions would be better, more exact, more accurately relate the ideas. Similarly, it is necessary to achieve a better understanding of current international relations and the phenomena, trends and processes that are taking place in the contemporary world, and, to an equal degree, of the new press techniques and changes that are taking place in this entire area represented by the mass media. We are taking part not only in the development of press techniques, but also the modification of vocabulary and the message. It is necessary for the linguistic and non-linguistic message that we disseminate to be understandable to the readers everywhere. Therefore, I believe in the need to create a specialized journalist in this field, in this specific job. More than all his colleagues, he must be a person with an exemplary political training that is constantly kept up to date and a person with a broad intellectual horizon. I believe that we can no longer accept the idea that in this sphere of foreign propaganda beginners will be accepted. In an internal selection process that the company itself has to promote, we must arrive at a separation of values - not in an ideal situation, but in a normal situation - that will bring about the concentration of persons in the sphere of foreign propaganda journalism who have been recommended as having an exemplary awareness and professional training.

[Question] In the case of publications for foreign consumption, to what degree is there a dialogue with the readers, an essential element in the activities of the domestic press? How can you evaluate the efficient of your work?

Botez: Our public, as has been noted, is very diverse both in their geographic locations and in their axiological sensitivities. We receive several hundreds of letters each year and this correspondence is very important for us. Another index of interest is the number of copies demanded of our publications in different countries. Similarly, we have personal contacts during documentation trips made by our writers and during readers' visits in our country.

Stati: Another means of linking the content of the publications to the areas of interest of the readers is facilitated by the information and responses received via diplomatic channels. Our embassies abroad, the cultural offices and the friendship associations are such sources of special value. For example, the Romanian-Japanese Friendship Association is very active.

Botez: There are numerous proofs of the efficiency of our activities. I had the pleasure to find out, for example, that a publishing house in England and one in France decided to translate certain Romanian books after they read portions of these books in REVISTA ROMANA.

Stati: It must also be noted that in the USSR they have produced plays by Horia Lovinescu and Aurel Baranga after the appearance of certain translations in our special collection of literature published in Russian. REVISTA ROMANA, a magazine on Romanian culture and civilization, has the advantage of having a less heterogeneous public that is more specialized by region, concerns and level of education. We frequently receive information referring to the real utility of our magazine for cultural people in other countries. In order to have the best possible understanding of the values of our national spiritual nature, REVISTA ROMANIA and our social-political-cultural publications publish broad works (sometimes monographic pieces) devoted to certain persons in Romanian culture. A very good response was enjoyed by the pieces dedicated to Eminescu, Goga, Arghezi and so forth. In REVISTA ROMANA we also had some subject pieces. Those dedicated to Romanian science fiction were, for example, also very well received.

[Question] In this regard, you have therefore done more than the domestic press, where this theme is very rarely presented, a fact criticized more than once by the readers.

Stati: Remarkable successed have been recorded by REVISTA ROMANA and the other publications last year, on the anniversary of 2050 years since the creation of the first centralized and independent Dacian state and on the occasion of the International Congress of Historical Science in Bucharest. We are preparing similar special pieces this year for the International Congress on the History of Science. The effect of these monographic and subject pieces is very good. In connection with this, what we are concerned with is the permanent improvement of the manner of conceiving them so as not to attain a sameness in their construction or, in other works, a monotony.

Botez: There is a portion of our magazines, a certain vocabulary accessible to everyone: the photographs. It is a modern language that must be used very well so that its ability to convince can be decisive. This also brings up the problem of selection and of presenting the most significant illustrations that are turly relevant, from the point of view of the content and the artistic aspect. We have been involved in the development of this department of editorial work and we are happy to note that there has been some effective progress.

Potra: We should not lose sight of the fact that the publications we produce have an illustrate magazine character. This attribute takes into consideration a necessity of the modern world confronted with an ever greater amount of informational material. There is need, therefore, for concentrated expressions of a subject and of a geographic and temporal reality. No national issue destined for foreign consumption can avoid the idea that it is confronted with an extraordinary informational wealth and that it will come into competition - and it will matter in this competition - through the seriousness of the publication, through the accuracy of the message addressed in the name of a political, intellectual and national awareness, and through a journalistic expression of clear intelligence and separate attractiveness. At this level, I also place the problem of the non-linguistic message and the illustrations. In our publications, there has been a thorough modification between the proportions of the written text and the illustrations. Currently, this relationship is about 50-50 and we expect to reach a level of 60 to 65 percent illustrations, figuring that this percentage corresponds to the modern spirit of the press and that the linguistic portion will lose nothing by being concise. Perhaps, on the contrary, we could gain, eliminating any temptation to use rhetoric and the excessive amount of lyricism that we still frequently encounter. The truth is that we still are promoting a heavy, thick style that communicates more feelings and sensations than ideas. We sometimes risk killing the idea, the message of a culture, a civilization, drowning in words. I believe in the need for logical, coherent, precisely structured expressions. Before we introduce words into circulation, let us find comprehensible concepts and let us establish connotations that are accessible to foreign readers so that our realities that suggest the specific values of the Romanian spiritual nature will not remain cryptic formulas and indecipherable hieroglyphics.

Our efforts are directed to an equal degree towards the cultivation of a precise and beautiful language and we believe that in recent times we have succeeded in overcoming in this regard an inertia accumulated over two and one-half decades. We are profoundly appreciative of the assistance we have received from the RCP Central Committee Section for Press and Radio-Television and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for the professional training of our translators in England, the FRG and the USSR.

And, this action also includes the efforts we have made for credibility, accuracy and quality in our journalistic style. A publication must be of its times, this is the condition for its existence, and linkage to the pace of the present is achieved also at the level of creating a publication, the genre promoted and the style.

ROLE OF SOCIOLOGIST IN SOCIALIST SOCIETY

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 16, 20 Aug 81 pp 24-25

/Article by Adrian Dinu Rachieru: "Position of the Young Sociologist," in reference to Achim Mihu, "Values and Limits in Current Romanian Sociology," ERA SOCIALISTA No 12, 1981/

/Text/ In a recent article Achim Mihu suggests an extensive discussion of the state and future of Romanian sociology for purposes of enhancing its role in furthering the scientific character of social knowledge. To discuss the value and limitations of the current Romanian sociological movement, as the Cluj sociologist does, is to abandon flights into the abstract and motivations of interest in an "ardent" discipline but one evolving in a theoretically ambiguous context. The criticisms made in the said article are unquestionably true and valid: The naivete of some studies and the failure to use or make adequate use of the available data make it impossible to draw and advance any truly sociological conclusions, since this valuable store of raw data is not organized from any theoretical-axiological viewpoint characteristic of sociology. And then, in the broad scope of problems that motivate sociological work, the research choices and priorities that are soundly substantiated coexist with socially useless research initiatives that present common knowledge in a sociological guise, some from the start and others because of inadequate and irrelevant information. Clearly such "investigations" cannot contribute to development of sociological theory, since they even retard their own scientific maturity, nor can they be applied to social programs, since their use and usefulness are very limited.

But surprisingly enough Achim Mihu's article, which was in fact the occasion for these comments, avoids discussion of the sociologists' professional status, which we consider important to the very future and effectiveness of the discipline in our intellectual life. We even believe that sociology's necessary contemplation of its own condition cannot evade or neglect discussion (pointed because of both the difficulties inherent in the discipline and those of the profession) of the status of its practitioners. Hence the urgency of the sociologists' attempt (however timid) to examine their own activity scientifically in the area where, paradoxically, sociology appears to be "losing ground" while their professional status remains ambiguous.

Let us briefly review here some other known and reported findings on sociology, with emphasis of course upon the Romanian sociological phenomenon, revived more than 15 years ago and setting off a veritable explosion and even an inflation of sociology that have visibly compromised the great applied qualities of the "renaissance" and its rapid advance.

In the first place, as we know, there is an epistemological obstacle created by familiarization with the social universe. Exotericism accordingly becomes a disadvantage, fostering an irrational, "popular-emotional" sociology (as I. Iordachel called it), giving rise to interpretations for household use, and feeding the illusion of competence. Then we shall note the logical evolution of sociology toward consolidation of its scientific status and self-reproduction and that of professionalization, specialization and institutionalization, following the organizational pattern of "industrialism." Sociological research is accordingly in the nature of a collective undertaking, in spite of some inevitable discontinuities. Sociological knowledge is cumulative while the sociological output is intensively socialized.

In this connection let us examine the young sociologist's position more closely, bringing the analysis "down" to the actual level of his activities. But we do not mean the happy lot of those engaged in research work properly speaking, on the "teams" of institutions of higher education or sociological laboratories and research units and benefiting by proper institutional organizational structures and their results. On the contrary, the industrial (enterprise) sociologist's position is less than active, unsuitable, unintegrated and even unstable and leads to waste of the scientific potential of these graduates with a distinct, special and institutionally confirmed training, because of his solitary, isolated, still unaccustomed and sometimes perfunctory presence in such jobs, where he is used for other purposes or assimilated with other personnel. And practical activity is decisive in the exercise of the profession and the "social recognition" of this category (handicapped by failure to solve the problem of professional status), since it combines the personal aspirations and standards, the desire to advance and the dynamism of those who can strengthen or diminish the very presence and effectiveness of sociology by virtue of their actual position and role, regardless of the level on which it is performed.

But we shall not ignore or minimize the difficulties experienced in the activity of these professionals. We refer particularly to the system of training, and coordination of training and familiarization with the actual future demands, which are not actually known until after assignment. The idea, also mentioned in VIITORUL SOCIAL (1), of founding a methodological center for guidance and improvement is also noteworthy, since it provides "methodological aid" and facilitates continuing professional improvement of all these specialists, whose postuniversity training (excepting, of course, those who make diligent personal efforts or those belonging to research institutes) is not the subject of regular, centralized efforts, so that an undesirable and harmful fragmentation of the "forces" is perpetuated.

But under enterprise conditions the traditional attitude of "production fetishism" favors separation of production tasks from psychosocial ones, the relationship between them being one of subordination rather than interdependence. Therefore some decision making collectives will be short of psychosociological training and information, not going beyond the finding stage or contemplative approach, perhaps requesting the collaboration and help of these specialists but not using their completed investigations to prepare the alternatives ("counciling" the decision making activity itself). And so Achim Mihu is right again in noting that the interest taken in malfunctions is confined to the "behavior indicators" and economic discipline, adopting the organizational viewpoint but overlooking the aspects of the very broad field of sociohuman problems, so that the implemented decisions and suggestions, when they are out of touch with the state of the social relations, inevitably lack lasting effectiveness.

The presence of a sociologist in a socioeconomic organization is advisable but not indispensable, since his strictly or narrowly professional contribution alone is not required. On behalf of rationalization and scientific substantiation of all activities (including public-cultural ones, circulation of information and political-educational work), his efforts will be required for crystallization and diffusion of the new culture of participation with an eye to actual dissemination of the principles of collective management. But one point must be made: Since he is either secretary of the workers council (as he is in some enterprises) or he is organizationally attached to it and not dependent upon other operational sections or even affiliated with them (being engaged in many other activities, entailing the risk of deprofessionalization), the young sociologist is involved in this regular participation in the activity of the unit but he does not have any cogent experience.

The real and critical question in connection with the grouping of sociohuman disciplines as "sciences of intervention" is whether their involvement in a detailed pragmatism does not undermine the very position of these professionals as "scientific agents." By emphasizing the pragmatic-engineering function and devoting himself solely to the applied function, the sociologist-technician ultimately "cripples" his personality. Neither his purely theoretical position, where he is solely concerned with academic study and pedantries, nor the other extreme, where he on the course of hyperempiricism (as a "supplier of data") and uninterested in the consequences of his suggestions, is acceptable. Moreover this contrast between the theoretical sociologist (cultivating an armchair sociology) and the one interested in "social engineering" (sacrificing macrosociological perspective in his empirical outlook) accentuates characteristics of overspecialization conducive to a luxuriant development of "sciences." But in the case of sociology, self-restriction of the field of vision by "seclusion in a specialty" and exaggeration of the perceptive value of the raw data (inaugurating a "sociological naturalism," as Alain Touraine says) eclipses the very viewpoint of sociology properly speaking, as A. Roth remarked (2).

To be sure sociology has become a profession and the sociologist has become a specialist, while the process of differentiation and specialization (dealing with "slices" of social existence) is to be accepted, but not by virtue of an excessive intensification ignoring the integralist epistemological effort (a consequence of the "adventure" of the analytical spirit and "elimination of contacts," of isolation in the tight compartment of one's own competence, and of truths "excavated" from the plot of a specialization actually eclipsed by "tunnel vision"). Dispersion of disciplines can even be a rejection or negation of knowledge, since as Mario Bunge noted scientific progress means a gain in complete understanding of entireties. Let us acknowledge that the constantly invoked desideratum of the interdisciplinary approach has barely arrived, with actual results that are rather modest (meaning additions of disciplines and not their correlation), while the sociological coordinating "treatment" is still understood, regrettably and harmfully, not in a methodological sense but in an administrative one.

But by means of competence sociological investigations and interventions may become effective (accepting the "restrained optimism" to which Robert K. Merton called attention), by a combined effort to enhance the means and to determine the limits. "Realistic expectations" are recommended to both the sociologist and the beneficiary, underestimates and exaggerations being equally unacceptable.

When the sociologist develops as a cultural personality and the organization develops as an integrating structure conducive to initiatives and activism, the requirement for detailed comprehensiveness in cultural achievement can be met in and through an organization. But naturally the personality of the sociologist as a communist intellectual is developed and revealed in his activity, the action expressing the objective, applied acculturation. In dwelling on this point we may even wonder whether such a personality is adequately determined by the intellectual values it conveys by assimilating and "producing" knowledge. In displaying an enthusiastic and dedicated spirit, using his powers of social expression, and being receptive to all sociohuman problems, the sociologist will be intimately concerned with developing not only his scientific-sociological consciousness but also his moral-political one, related in our ebullient era to what Eduard Shills called "the incipient formation of a world sociological culture." Then his "creative" potential itself and, more broadly, the creative phenomenon in sociology supports and necessitates some qualifications. It is clear the sociological front will repudiate those exercises (actually gratuitous but socially harmful), "rediscovering" commonplaces (not above the level of common knowledge), just as it is clear that it must be found that in view of the said cumulative nature of sociological knowledge the cognitive ideal will not be to construct entirely original sociological systems but to amplify the conceptualized, widely applicable and mutually controllable disciplines. There is a differential creative productivity of age groups, while future creativity is known to be difficult to predict. Development of the "creative man" and democratization of creativity (as a mass social process during construction of our new society), however, are not a matter of absolute originality but of releasing the nonconformist intelligence by abandoning the stereotypes of thought and nonparticipation. The young sociologist (a questionable term if it implies a value judgment, but we consider it useful in the discussion in view of the age of those who are active) may become, through a pseudocreativity and through the inauguration of self-sufficiency, a routine practitioner divorced from research, the causality not being necessarily or invariably external. Therefore he will try to avoid such restrictions by fully adjusting to the flexibility of the period and the intellectual flexibility of the discipline and determining the role and position of sociology in the contemporary context.

A final comment on the critical purpose and predisposition of the sociological procedures, which are obscured in some studies. We refer not to criticism within sociology (regarded by R. Boudon for example as a possible standard orientation detectable in a "pure" state) but to the critical function of sociology (as society's scientific knowledge of itself). As part of a culture sociology may also have a mystifying use, serving the status quo and fortifying the establishment, and the realities of "late" capitalism unequivocally confirm the conclusion. But as a reflex action it will also foster the structuring of critical trends of a disconcerting variety and varying widely in their capacity for radicalism. At any rate the idea of a critical sociology (performing the criticism of apologetic, "integrated" sociology but not proposing any coherent theoretical system) is an incomplete criticism that will not generate any political activity. A questioning and prospective science par excellence, sociology is impracticable if it minimizes practical-critical activity and substitutes critical action through theoretical criticism (the case of the pretentious reflective sociology known as "critical").

We do not think the critical function of sociology (also operative in a socialist context, involving management through rationalization by realizing the applicative potentials on the tactical or strategic level) can be reduced to the claims or disabilities of "critical sociology," and for the same reason we cannot accept criticism (sociological) as one of the aims of sociology alongside the others. Actually an active, effective sociology as a science "of position" regards its critical aspect as a model of its applicative, comprehensive-interrogative and predictive procedures.

Benefiting by the fine tradition of the Romanian sociological movement in the period between the wars, Romanian sociology will test its twofold function (theoretical and applicative) as Romanian society inevitably presents many original problems requiring specific, systematic and complete treatment in the multidisciplinary and interdisciplinary spirit, avoiding illustrativism, empiricism and evasion of contradictions. As a uniform whole (theoretical and empirical) offering a global, historical and determinist view of the social whole and its developmental trends and naturally passing through the period of diversification and institutionalization of its studies and of specialization and professionalization of its exponents, Romanian sociology (as I. Dragan noted) is still mainly descriptive and demonstrative, not going beyond the desiderative aspect of the conclusions and producing rather modest results with a low coefficient of applicability.

And if the superiority of socialism is to be not only asserted but demonstrated by facts and realities, as Nicolae Ceausescu has pointed out so many times, sociology (as society's scientific knowledge of itself) can meet this high obligation by activating its critical and self-critical function.

LEGAL ASPECTS OF ORGAN TRANSPLANT PROCESS EXAMINED

Bucharest REVISTA ROMANA DE DREPT in Romanian Jul 81 pp 13-18

[Article by Ioan Chelaru, attorney, BCAJ Roman]

[Text] Within the framework of non-property personal rights, one category of rights for which the law provides special protection, is the one associated with a person's existence and physical integrity. That is why as a rule, a medical treatment, an operation, and so on, can be performed only with the consent of the person involved, except in cases in which the law expressely stipulates the compulsory nature of the treatment. Added to this is the fact that the right to dispose of a human body after death is recognized by regulations in force, except in cases in which for reasons of public order or health, another measure can be imposed by justice, district attorney, or administrative organs.

A few years ago, the legal literature (1) pointed out the absence of a legal provision intended to regulate the removal and transplantation of human organs.

In 1978, the adoption of Law No 3, regarding the assurance of the population's health (2), which in chapter V, section 2, regulates "Blood, Plasma, and Blood Derivatives Therapy. Removal of Human Organs and Tissues," responded to a need that had become obvious.

It must be emphasized that this regulation sought to contribute to the development of a new therapy "for the good of man, using death to save lives," (3) based on humanistic ethical and legal principles.

It is particularly well known that any action which causes the removal of organs from the human body, severely and directly affects man's life and physical integrity, a circumstance which constitutes an infraction and is sanctioned as such (4). At the same time, the point is made that a doctor's major concern must be the protection of health and the safeguarding of life, that a doctor must have the confidence of the patient, and that this trust is a major element in assuming responsibility, even though an organ transplant imposes itself as a supreme act of man's gift to man, an action on the part of man, who despite his inalienable rights upon his body, is a member of society and can thereby be of service to his fellow man, but under the conditions of a "healthy and reasonable" generosity.

The problems raised by the practice of organ removal and transplantation assume greater proportions every day, furthered as they are by the development of medical technology. In the present paper, we propose to respond to some of the questions raised both by the medical and legal literatures, as well as by the inadequacy of current regulations. In this respect, we propose to analyze the manner in which two persons--the donor and the recipient--can dispose of their rights, and determine which medical and state agencies are entitled to approve, perform, and control such operations.

Manner in Which Donor and Recipient can Dispose of Their Own Rights

A distinction must first be made of whether we are concerned with a temporary effect on the body's integrity (sale of hair, or blood donation), or with an irreversible effect (donation of a kidney). It must also be noted whether we are concerned with actions which produce their effects among living persons or after death, as well as whether the actions are paid or free. Moreover, we must present the need for consent as an essential condition, as well as the legal value of this consent (5).

Within its two paragraphs, article 131 of Law No 3/1978 makes two important stipulations, to wit: that "the removal of human organs as well as the transplantation of human tissues and organs can be performed for therapeutic purposes under the conditions of the present law" (paragraph 1); and that such operations "cannot be the object of any transaction" (paragraph 2).

In the text of our law, the removal of human tissues and organs falls under special regulations, depending on whether it concerns acts among living persons or acts resulting from death. For instance, article 132 of the law stipulates that "the removal of tissues and organs from living persons is performed only if no danger exists to the donor's life, and with the latter's written consent given to the head doctor of the department of the health unit in which the donor is admitted, in the presence of two witnesses." The legislators thus introduce two cumulative conditions which must be fulfilled in order for the removal to be performed.

The first condition--that no danger exist to the donor's life--is considered to have a relative value (6) since there does exist an inherent risk, a degree of uncertainty, associated with any surgical intervention. The manner in which the doctor acts, the importance of his actions, and the doctor's social responsibility, ultimately depend on the training and conscience of his professional group, and rigid restrictions on the manner of action would represent a barrier in the path of new advances in medical science. In paragraph 2 of article 132, Law No 3/1978 provides that "the donor's consent can be given only after the doctor has informed him of eventual medical risks that can be incurred from the act of removal." The legislators themselves, thus recognize the existence of a risk. Under such conditions, sufficient opinions have supported the inadmissibility of the transfer of some organs among living persons (7), or the possibility of donating only tissues but not organs for transplants (8).

But because, as Rabindranat Tagore has said, "life is a gift which we deserve only when we give it," and because under equitable socio-human conditions, a refusal to donate a tissue or organ is subject to ethical implications, it can happen that a parent will donate a kidney or an eye to his child, when the possibility exists of saving the child's life. We believe that such an act springs from, and corresponds to, the principles of socialist humanism. On the other hand, if it becomes a matter of single organs--whose removal would result in the donor's demise--the law implicitly forbids such operations through actions among living persons.

The second condition--that the donor give a written consent under special circumstances--also leads to a number of explanations. From its formulation, it would appear that the legislators sought to grant the respective action the character of an authentic act. We are basing our opinion on the fact that the law expressly demands a written consent, which must be given to a specially empowered agency and in the presence of two witnesses. This special authentic act, unlike the usual regulation in civil law regarding the irrevocability of acts performed for free, can be revoked, since the donor can withdraw his given consent after the doctor presents the existing risks. It should be stressed that the law does not contain detailed provisions about the manner in which the established conditions are to be entered into a document, and that the same agency is authorized to receive the consent of both the donor and recipient.

Pursuing the general policy of protecting minors and adult persons incapable of judgement, in article 133 the legislators forbid the removal of organs from such persons, as well as from persons who suffer from various diseases established by the Ministry of Health.

The law contains separate regulations regarding the removal of human organs and tissues from dead persons. Article 134, paragraph 1, stipulates that "the removal of tissues and organs from dead persons is performed only if biological death has been medically confirmed. In this case, the removal of tissues and organs from dead persons can be performed only with the written approval of one of the adult family members, in the following order: spouse, parent, child, brother, or sister." This specific provision would reopen the question--widely analyzed in the specialized literature--of establishing the moment of death of the donor. Even though no unanimity of opinion currently exists on this matter at present (9), we will not delve on it in this paper. We will however point out that the doctor must exhaust all known medical means to maintain the life of the person, and that only after this has been done "the death must be confirmed by two doctors--members of the commission (formed for the organ removal and transplant, n.b.)--and by a forensic expert, with the conclusions being entered in an official report," as stipulated in article 137, last paragraph, of the law.

In fact, this provision correlates with the one in Decree No 278/1960, which stipulates that "the recording of a death is to be based on the document issued by the doctor."

It would appear that the extensive discussion being conducted in the specialized literature will continue, partly because of the tendency to attend to serious cases through the transplantation of organs which should not be impaired, and partly because of the urgency of matters and of the responsibility assumed by doctors (10). For organ removal, the legislators also require other circumstances in addition to medical confirmation of biological death. For instance, "this operation is forbidden if the deceased has expressed in writing the wish that such a removal not be performed, or when the removal would impair a medico-legal autopsy." (Article 135 of Law No 3/1978).

In the absence of an express, written interdiction on the part of the deceased, the operation is possible in accordance with the law (article 134, paragraph 1), only with the written consent of adult family members, in the following order: spouse, parent, child, brother or sister (11). As distinct from transplantation, removal is thus not possible without the consent of one family member, in the order stipulated by the law. We believe that this provision unfortunately creates a serious obstacle in terms of existing urgencies, a reason for which some questions become necessary. To which family members does the law refer: all those who are living, or only those who are present? What happens when members of the family with equal levels of kinship have different opinions? Or when, for illegal purposes, the first of those who must grant approval does not give it, with all the other members of family being in agreement? The regulations formulated to apply the law must clarify these situations as fairly as possible.

Legal aspects concern both the donor, who as we have indicated can undergo moral or physical harm, and the recipient, for whom a risk has been created. In terms of legal rights, matters of almost equal interest are the condition of the recipient, the group of persons who can donate organs, the legality of their consents, the moment of removal, and so on.

These intimate interconnections bring into discussion, a fortiori, the need to establish interest priorities which can form the foundation of the legal regulations that we are analyzing here.

In our society, only one solution appears possible, which is that the donor's interests be predominant. In fact, it should be pointed out from the beginning that the legislators envisage transplantation as a measure of last resort, making it acceptable "only if it is the sole intervention capable of saving the health or the physical integrity of the recipient" (article 136, paragraph 1). This feature is also emphasized by the different regulations covering removal and transplantation. For instance, removals are permissible "if no danger exists to the donor's life," while in the case of transplants, the doctor's only obligation is to inform the recipient about existing risks. In this respect, an analysis must also be made of the second condition required by the law, "the written consent of the donor, given in the presence of the head doctor of the department in which the donor is admitted, and of two witnesses." In this light, we ask what is the legal value of this consent, and how final is it?

That is why the patient has the obvious right, weighted by the ethic-pshychologic obligation of being informed of the risk to which he is exposed, so that "the transplant cannot be performed without his written consent." There undoubtedly exist persons who in such a situation would refuse a transplant, but in most cases, those finding themselves in conditions of last resort have no other choice. In this light, the wish expressed by a recipient appears as irrelevant. And still in this light, it can be readily observed that the declared consent of the donor is free and altruistic in all respects, whereas that of the recipient is given under special conditions, in which "choice" implies only one possibility. This reasoning reopens the question of the need for a written consent from family members--in the same order of priority--when the recipient is incapable of expressing his own will. This consent would have the character encountered in special legal trusteeships (12).

But what will be the attitude of the doctor who finds his efforts to perform a lifesaving transplant, stymied by opposition from family members, who for irrational or dishonest reasons refuse to give their consent, and who consequently prevent him from saving the patient's life?

The law also provides that for persons placed under interdiction, consent can be given by their parents or other legal protectors.

The exceptional, serious, and urgent nature of a transplant situation has caused legislators to also foresee the possibility--frequent enough, in fact--that the consent of the recipient or members of his family is no longer necessary, if "steps cannot be taken in proper time," but only in cases where "delays would inevitably lead to the loss of the recipient's life." The action is recorded in a document by the chief doctor of the department, and by two witnesses.

We believe that the witnesses should be specialized medical personnel, given the knowledge that is needed to determine the probability that the patient will die.

Authorized Medical Organs Will Approve, Perform, and Supervise the Removal and Transplant of Human Organs

Article 137 of Law No 3/1978 stipulates: "The removal and transplantation of human organs and tissues is performed only by doctors, and only in hospitals authorized by the Ministry of Health. The need for removal and transplantation, as well as approval for their performance, will be given by commissions specially formed by the hospital's management.

Biologic death is confirmed by at least two doctors in this commission, with the participation of a forensic expert."

These measures reflect the concept of legislators, which is to assure a maximum of guarantees for maintaining the physical integrity of those involved, and free will, and while providing appropriate medical care. The conditions that are imposed reflect on one hand the exceptional nature of these operations, and the fact that the number of units in which they can be performed is limited, and on the other hand, a certain level of endowment in medical technology at the current stage of our country.

From a legal standpoint, however, it must be emphasized that the intervention must have a therapeutic, exclusively humanitarian purpose, followed by a scientific one, that the tissue or organ must be donated, not sold, and that the action must have clear probabilities of success (is not rash).

Law No 3/1978 contains no provisions regarding relationships between donors and recipients. Since the operations are performed in hospitals established by the Ministry of Health and authorized by special commissions, under some conditions of consent of the parties, it is possible for no kind of relationship to exist between the two persons. In the absence of a special restrictive provision, we believe that nothing prevents the removal of organs of living persons or from the dead, to be performed intuitu personae.

But the transplantation of human organs also raises other problems, which will certainly be solved by the regulations which we hope will be issued for applying the law. Should the removal of an organ from a healthy person be allowed, even though it is known that its transplantation will prolong the recipient's life by only a few months or years? How will the recipient be chosen when several patients could benefit from the transplant, but when only one, or very few donors are available? Who will receive priority, a child, or an adult? Who has the right to make the choice? To what extent is the doctor entitled to select between the risk to which the donor is subjected, and the value of the recipient's life (13)?

Regarding the declared consent of the person who is to undergo the organ removal, article 135 of Law No 3/1978 stipulates that the removal is forbidden if the deceased person expressed "in writing the wish that such removals not be performed." The consequence therefore, is that in the absence of such a manifestation of will, silence is considered as consent.

In most cases, the donor's consent can no longer be obtained, with the doctors having no other task than to confirm the biological death. In this situation, article 134 of the law stipulates imperatively that "removal can be performed with the written consent of one of the adult family members, in the following order: spouse, parent, child, brother, sister."

One important problem of interest, is that of the persons who can fall under the law regarding the removal and transplantation of human organs. Article 125 in chapter V, which refers to "Medical Assistance for the Population," section I, regarding "General and Emergency Medical Assistance," stipulates: "Emergency medical assistance is provided by all permanent health units, at any time of day or night, independently of the person's place of residence." At no point does this chapter make any sort of distinction among persons who are entitled to medical assistance, including transplants and the removal of human organs. The only exception provided by the law is for minors and for those incapable of judgement. Thus, any person, independently of nationality, race, or sex, benefits from equal medical assistance treatment. For reasons of egality, the legislators have therefore adopted the application of territorial law (14).

This reopens the discussion of some aspects of the complex question of human organ removal and transplantation. Insofar as many other legal aspects still remain to be clarified, we belive that both OMS and the UN could initiate a number of measures aimed at helping the nations which practice such operations, to elucidate and understand some facets of this complex matter.

In general, instances of common law, both in England and the United States, starting from the older concept according to which no property right exists on a dead body, the latter being res nullius, nevertheless recognize that a surviving spouse, children, or other next of kin, have a right to the cadaver for burial, a right which also implies the one of receiving the body of the deceased in the condition in which it was at the moment of death. In France, the Caillavet Law of 4 April 1978 regarding the removal of organs, does not contain this condition, if the removal is likely to extend the life of another person.

The draft mentioned here tends to regulate only the removal of human tissues and organs, and not transplantation as well; in another respect, it refers only to the removal of tissues and organs from dead persons, and not from those alive as well. As in the Romanian law, two principles stand at the basis of the regulation: a) the principle of respecting the right to dispose of one's own person, even after death, as an expression of the freedom of, and respect for human beings; and b) the general social interest presented by the performance of these removal and transplantation operations.

ADDITIONAL COMMENTS FROM IVAN STAMBOLIC INTERVIEW

Zagreb VJESNIK in Serbo-Croatian 26 Sep 81 SEDAM DANA Supplement pp 4-5

[Interview with Ivan Stambolic, chairman of the Executive Council of the Assembly of SR [Socialist Republic] Serbia, by Seska Stanojlovic: "Our Inflation Is Our Product"; date and place not specified]

[Excerpt] [Question] During the debate of the causes and consequences of the counterrevolution in Kosovo at the May Plenum of the Serbian League of Communists Central Committee you spoke inter alia about the adverse political consequences of arbitrarily giving other names to SR Serbia and to its nuclear part particularly. By force of circumstances we newspaper people, and also you politicians, and indeed you personally frequently use the terms "Serbia proper," "Serbia without the provinces," "Serbia outside the provinces" ... which you yourself say contribute to the public's confusion....

[Answer] It is not just from the terminological standpoint that these expressions are unfitting. I would remind you, however, that this issue has another more important side.

In their time Svetozar Markovic and Dimitrije Tucovic settled accounts with Garasanin's 19th century idea of Great Serbia. But it has been repeated many times since then, the working class movement in Serbia has had to settle accounts with it down through virtually its entire history.

The attitude of Serbian communists toward this nationalistic and hegemonistic thesis and idea has always been clearly defined and confirmed by their successful concrete revolutionary struggle and policy. That kind of struggle and that kind of attitude are indispensable even today. Especially since we must be aware that the idea of the so-called small Serbia, of a Serbia which does not exist, of Serbia in the form of the Belgrade pashaluk [district under jurisdiction of a pasha] whose boundaries and map are being tendentiously drawn and printed by nationalists and enemies not only of the Serbian people and the Socialist Republic of Serbia, but indeed of all the other nationalities and ethnic minorities in the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, finds its point of support in the idea of Great Serbia. They want in that way to demonstrate that there is not even any SR Serbia without Great Serbia. This is the soil on which the thesis arises which Lazar Kolisevski recently spoke about: "A weak Serbia--a strong Yugoslavia."

We must say that only a unified SR Serbia, as a socialist republic born in the revolution, that is unified and strong in conformity with the program of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia and Tito's policy of equality, brotherhood and unity, and self-management, and only the unified and strong republics, which also arose in the revolution, of Bosnia-Hercegovina, Montenegro, Croatia, Macedonia, and Slovenia and the autonomous provinces of Kosovo and Vojvodina comprise a strong and powerful Yugoslavia as a workers' state, as a free and independent socialist and nonaligned community of equal nationalities and ethnic minorities. Weakening of any one of them, including Serbia, which includes the autonomous provinces, signifies a weakening and destabilization of Yugoslavia.

That is why I think that calling SR Serbia by various names is not an ordinary question of language.

[Question] Since you are the chairman of the executive council, we must ask you something about the relationship between the state and self-management. In recent debates on stabilization there has been more and more (critical) talk about administrative intervention and the "meddling" of the government in the relations of self-management. You often advocate constructing a comprehensive policy of economic stabilization, and it would be interesting to hear your opinion about the degree of "government" involvement in that.

[Answer] Let me first tell you something about that concept of stabilization. There is not a man in Yugoslavia today who does not feel the burden of the economic situation on his own back. Some more, some less, but that is another topic. For that reason we are now coming to an increasingly correct understanding of the policy of economic stabilization, seeing it as a necessity for us to produce more and spend less. We had broken the natural tie between production and consumption, and now we must pay for that--in cash. No one can fall head first down the stairs without any consequences whatsoever for his own head!

In building the policy of economic stabilization and in implementing it so far we have mainly concentrated on suppressing excessive spending and have been less concerned with more efficient production, and I fear lest we again fail to bring production and consumption into line with one another in good time--only now in a different way. That is why I mention so frequently the need for a more organized effort to construct a comprehensive concept and program of economic stabilization, referring thereby primarily to production.

My point of departure is that we possess the material conditions for overcoming our economic difficulties and for opening up real prospects for further material development. I am therefore convinced that the principal issue in the policy of economic stabilization of the future is becoming how to raise labor productivity, how to speed up the turnover of capital, how to reduce the level of indebtedness, how to lower production costs, how to increase the efficiency of capital investment, and so on. How to open up ourselves economically toward the outside world more effectively and how to expose ourselves to the judgment of the world market, how to overcome difficulties and restrictions related to the balance of payments? It would seem that we all know what we ought to do, but the question is--How?

Neither administrative regulation on the one hand nor the so-called free market on the other represents one of our choices in finding a way out of the economic difficulties we have fallen into. We must seek the way out through development of socialist self-management--by conclusion of compacts and accords--but that does not mean that now we should turn our head away from the market and renounce the government. If the government does not do everything now which it must do, the day might come when it could take everything into its hands.

In other words, the conclusion of social compacts and self-management accords must proceed on the basis of objective economic laws of commodity production on the foundations of self-management, while by virtue of its measures the government would guarantee and stimulate that direction in the development of socio-economic relations. Only in that way is it possible to guarantee both democracy and efficiency in a self-managed economy, above all through optimum use of the huge mass of social capital.

Ambiguous Slogan

[Question] You mean to say that a self-managing government also has quite definite obligations toward "its own" self-management?

[Answer] Exactly. To that we should add that there also exist certain social contradictions which can be resolved only by "government methods." That was the case earlier, it is true today, and it will also be true tomorrow. Certain social contradictions, and indeed even social conflicts, if you like, must and can be resolved only by the means of socialist government coercion.

To overlook that fact in the present world and time is the same, to put it simply, as if the police, for example, use no other means than to deliver sermons on how theft is not permitted by law.

[Question] At the same time demands for "freeing us of statism," whose correctness and progressiveness are truly difficult to dispute, are echoing ever more loudly in the public. What does this mean in concrete terms in the context of the questions we have spoken about so far, especially in the case of SR Serbia, where it also arises as a question of the scope and role of the statehood of the republic and the provinces?

[Answer] Let me answer by asking another question: Who actually are all these people advocating liberation from statism? This demand, just like that general slogan of "Anticentralism," is both undefined and ambiguous. I would remind you that Dr Vladimir Bakaric even pointed out on one occasion that such demands in certain situations may be reactionary instead of progressive.

That is, who is it who is to be freed of government control? If it is the working class, if it is a question of liberating space for self-management, then the question is not in dispute. But if the bureaucratic-technocratic apparatus, whether it be the one in the republic, in the province, in the opstina, in the bank, or indeed even in the organization of associated labor, is supposed to get freedom to manage the surplus value as it pleases, then that demand, as Dr Bakaric has said, is essentially reactionary.

[Question] For decades our social development has been going in the direction of gradual decentralization of what are referred to as government functions so as to broaden the degree of democracy and to augment the rights of citizens and self-managers. Do the debates of the role of so-called regional statehood also signify that that statehood is greater or smaller than it should be?

[Answer] I could answer you most simply by saying that in some respects it should be greater and in some smaller. But that does not signify a great deal. If statehood in our context--in proportion to the place in government regulation and in conformity with social development--is "divided" among the Federation, the republics (which comprise the Federation), the provinces (which are also an integral part of one republic) and the opstinas, then there is no need for debate of the "greater" or "lesser" responsibility of any of these entities.

There are functions which could not be transferred to the opstinas; there are those which represent the very identity of the Federation as a government. Take any opstina, say in Vojvodina or in Kosovo: its statehood is manifested in the scope of definite power which the opstina wields. The scope of power is "divided" between it and its parent province in such a way that its statehood is an integral part of the statehood of the province. And the statehood of the autonomous provinces is in turn manifested in the scope of their power and is regulated by the "division" of power between the republic and autonomous provinces on the basis of the Constitution of SR Serbia. The statehood of the autonomous provinces is an integral part of the statehood of the republic--they are not states which are components of the Federation, but they do have their own statehood--as a function of realizing socialist self-management. Is there any need to recall by way of illustration all the damage inflicted and the extent of the impetus given to the counterrevolution in Kosovo by assumption of a greater degree of statehood than set forth in the SFRY Constitution and the Constitution of SR Serbia?

[Question] We all know that in Yugoslavia there is no equality of the nationalities and ethnic minorities without economic equality. We also know that there is no true community consensus on the basis of self-management without corresponding economic community consensus. Nevertheless, there is less and less community consensus, there is more and more autarky, and the economy is gradually becoming confined within "government boundaries" of the opstinas, the republics and the provinces.

[Answer] Since the pluralism of self-management interests presupposes a development of political relations whereby they are more and more transformed into socioeconomic relations, I am afraid that we have not always been aware of all the kinds of political relations that could come about if there should be less and less economic community consensus in Yugoslavia. Autarky seriously threatens to cut off social development in the direction of pluralism of self-management interests and to turn us exclusively toward pluralism of governmentalized interests. That is why I think that it is not possible to simultaneously be in favor of Yugoslavia's political unity and the foundations of socialist self-management and to be against economic community consensus in the self-managing forms of pooling labor and capital and to be in favor of autarky.

In analyzing the problems of autarky we must now become all-embracing and must altogether seek answers which will guarantee a rapid change of direction. I would also say that even individuals who are well known as advocates of dogmatic and other ideological premises unacceptable to us are now trying to join in our justified criticism of autarky and the low level of the economy's integration in Yugoslav economic space--as well as of the other problems that are arising out of the halt in development of self-management.

Two Conclusions Concerning Inflation

[Question] You mean to say that even here we are coming to have unwanted "allies"?

[Answer] Yes. Individuals who criticize the Yugoslav economy's lack of integration from the positions of statism, unitarianism and the policy of a firm hand would like to join in our justified criticism of the lag in integration on the basis of self-management.

Since we have permanently rejected administrative-bureaucratic centralism, our criticism of the closed economies of the republics and provinces and of the regionalization of capital is based on the positions of socialist self-management, of self-managing pooling of labor and capital. That is why we must constantly set ourselves apart and wage an ideological showdown with all those who see the republics and provinces only as obstacles to self-management integration, and not as an instrument of self-management, people who through criticism of autarky would even call into question the very existence of the republics and autonomous provinces.

We must, then, vigorously reject all the more or less pronounced and truly bureaucratic-centralistic and similar conceptions being passed off on us as the right solutions, the only solutions, and indeed even the self-management solutions. That is why we must emphasize more and more that outside the foundations of the constitutional concept of the Yugoslav Federation, outside the foundations of the constitutional concept of the republics and provinces, and aside from the clearly articulated political line of the League of Communists, no other concept is acceptable to us.

Criticism not only of the mechanisms and instruments, but indeed of the foundations of the economic system, ought not to deceive us. As a rule we are dealing with criticism of the political system. This criticism is all the fiercer as the criticism of the foundations of the economic system becomes more radical. And it is that exemption of the political system from the debate, the supposed failure to mention it, supposedly so as not to "intervene" in politics, that makes it incumbent upon us to make a good examination of the ideological positions which are the premises of that kind of criticism of the economic system. Are we not dealing, then, with the same kind of radical criticism of the political system, except that it is stated in terms of the economic system, appears to be ideologically neutral, and is committed only verbally to socialist self-management.

[Question] In a conversation with business executives of Serbia last week you dwelled particularly on inflation, insisting on the line of argument that Yugo-inflation, however much it may be a part of today's world economic processes, has its own very specific domestic features.

[Answer] Yugoslav inflation has been studied many times and elucidated from the economic standpoint. The analyses coincide with one another quite a bit and come down to several conclusions. Two are the most essential ones: underutilization of capital investments and underutilization of labor. Both show that the social organization of production has not been in line with the available material and human potential. And if that is to be achieved, the correct merger of interests is needed: of the person who, for example, is making decisions on investment of capital and the interests of the person who will be working with those assets and will depend on the dimensions of expanded reproduction. That linkup is a rarity with us. That is, when the investment process begins, both proceed mainly on the basis of how many new jobs and how much new income will be obtained, without making a serious analysis of how much accumulation can be expected and what are the long-term possibilities for the survival and reproduction of such facilities on the domestic and world markets.

It seems to me that the whole time this has been creating the impression that there exists available social capital which "we" could make better use of than "others" if our share in decisionmaking were greater (our political share, say).

In various periods there have been various formulas which pointed specifically to this. Among them the one which only recently disappeared: "There is money enough for every good project." That type of behavior arose out of the mistaken impression already created concerning the limited possibility of using someone else's capital for one's own needs. That is how excessive foreign indebtedness came about and how the credit relationship became the predominant relationship in the economy and in society.

[Question] Another frequent "slogan," now that we are discussing them, is the one that holds that we are the victim of world economic troubles because we are an open country.

[Answer] I have already said what I think: Yugoslav inflation is a Yugoslav product. We should seek the causes here at home, on our own unstable market. The strategic directions for emerging from this situation are possible only in stretching out the inflationary spiral over a long period of time in which it would gradually decrease and in which the bad aspects of the previous economic strategy and tactics would be eliminated. I think that we ought to acknowledge the real level of inflation, reevaluate in market terms the planned system for the conduct of economic activity (the market is the most important part of the planning orientation), defend ourselves against artificial equalization of employed persons for the sake of welfare, achieving at the same time socialist solidarity, and return still more radically to the idea of division according to labor and the results of labor.

Nor, to be sure, can we neglect the influence of the world economic crisis, but neither should we overemphasize it. We must free ourselves of the fear of greater openness toward the world market, but we must be better integrated through self-management on the unified Yugoslav market. It is easy to be brave when there is no other choice.

PAY SCALES FOR OFFICIALS ANALYZED, ARGUED

Call for Publication, Change

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1604, 27 Sep 81 pp 10-12

[Article by Scepan Rabrenovic: "How To Pay Officials"]

[Text] Do you perhaps know the size of the personal income of the president of your opstina? Or of any of the political officials whose election you participated in?

Which accounts for all the mystification and conjecturing about how much political officeholders earn. This has even been discussed in a session of the Federal Social Council for Questions of the Social System, which last Friday debated the uniform elements for remuneration of officeholders. It was literally said in that meeting that there has been manipulation with the earnings of political officeholders, that they are exaggerated, that people are saying that they earn between 70,000 and 100,000 dinars, which, it was also said, is not true. Which is why, it was emphasized at that meeting, the earnings of political officeholders should be accessible to the public.

Actually there are no figures on how much political officeholders earn monthly. Not even in newspaper documentation, which is regarded as a "storehouse of data," did we encounter any reliable figures on this in the more recent period. According to that documentation, the last public debates on the level of the monthly earnings of political officials were conducted in 1970 and 1971. It was proposed at that time that the highest monthly personal income of a political officeholder in the republic or province could not be greater than 7,000 dinars and "that the president of the youth organization should not have more than 4,000 dinars."

And that is all.

Outside the System

On the basis of which and what sort of criteria have political officeholders been "earning" their personal income up to now? On the basis of the so-called coefficient, which is the ratio 1:5. In practical terms this means that no political officeholder can have monthly income exceeding fivefold the average income of the work force in the socialized sector. When we know that the average earnings of persons employed in the socialized sector was slightly over 9,000 dinars in June, then no political officeholder in that month could receive more than 45,000 dinars. It was said at that same meeting that in practice use is not made of the possibility granted by the coefficient in the ratio 1:5, which in practice means that the highest monthly earning of an official amounts to less than 45,000 dinars.

But what is least known about and what is least covered by the data are the so-called supplements of the office.

On the whole remuneration of officeholders "according to the coefficient" is not in line with our present system. After all, most of the legislative acts regulating the personal incomes of officials from the Federation to the opstina were adopted before adoption of the law on associated labor and the law on the foundations of the system of government administration, and also before the principle of collective work, decisionmaking and responsibility was implemented in practice. That is why there is a need to bring remuneration of officeholders into conformity with development of the socioeconomic and sociopolitical systems.

It is with these remarks that the proposal was indeed presented of a social compact which insists that the same criteria and the same scales apply to all sociopolitical officeholders in all sociopolitical communities, and they are to be adjusted to remuneration in associated labor.

What are the essential changes this proposal contains?

First of all, the principle that there cannot exist one system for the personal incomes of political officeholders and another system for the remainder of the work force in the socialized sector. In practice this means that work and the results of work will determine the material and social status of political officeholders as well, depending on the overall contribution of past and present labor. This is one of the future criteria, which number nine in all. Moreover, an officeholder's personal income would depend among other things on the rise of the social productivity of labor and the trend of income and personal incomes in the economy of the particular sociopolitical community. The other criteria pertain mostly to the functioning of the social and political system.

Funds for the personal incomes of officials would be provided separately to each body and agency and organization in their total amount, "on the basis of the jointly agreed bases and scales and on the basis of the relevant legislative acts for each sociopolitical community.

When the decision is being made on the size of the total funds for each body and agency and organization, an assessment would be made of the function's value to society, the sociopolitical significance of the function, independence and intensity of work and tasks which constitute the content of the function and the direct social accountability for performance of particular functions, while the criteria and scales pertaining to earnings on the basis of past and present labor would also be stated precisely.

In future officeholders would not have any supplement of the office whatsoever, and "all other" income would be in conformity with "other income" in associated labor. Thus per diems for official travel in Yugoslavia would be able to go as high as 12 percent of the average monthly personal income earned by the work force in the economy of the particular sociopolitical community; reimbursement of moving expenses would be paid on the basis of the carrier's bill (or a lump-sum payment would be made not to exceed the amount of that official's monthly personal income); compensation for use of annual vacation could not be greater than 60 percent of the average monthly personal income in the economy of the particular sociopolitical community; severance pay at the time of retirement would be paid up to the amount of three monthly personal incomes of that official, and all officeholders living separately from their families would have the right to four monthly visits, the expenses to be justified.

The proposal which was discussed and the discussion in the meeting itself emphasized that the number of political officeholders ought to be reduced. To be specific: the term "officeholder" would extend only down through the deputy federal, republic or provincial secretary and corresponding offices in sociopolitical organizations and opstinas." Should this proposal be adopted, the number of officeholders would be considerably reduced. In addition, it would be precisely known who the political officeholders are, which up to now has not been the case. (In some places, for example, even the head of an officeholder's office staff was referred to as a "political officeholder.")

Fewer Officeholders

The proposal of that social compact was basically accepted in the meeting we have mentioned, but quite a few objections were also made. Among others, that certain solutions had been taken over from the old system and that past labor is being given preference over present labor in remuneration, which runs counter to the Law on Associated Labor. It was said that the new system ought to contribute to faster deprofessionalization of political office.

There ought not to be any acquired rights, it was specifically emphasized, with respect to the remuneration of officeholders.

When the meeting had ended, one got the impression that quite a bit of the job still remained to be done so that the remuneration of officeholders might be "fitted in" as a function of associated labor. Especially since associated labor itself does not have valid criteria for evaluating the results of work, which means that it lacks them for distribution as well. If associated labor lacks clear criteria concerning distribution, and that is at least the case in a majority of work organizations, how, then, can they be defined concerning the remuneration of officeholders? To go further, in what respect would the criteria concerning distribution in associated labor still differ from that applied to political officeholders: associated labor must first realize income, and only then divide it up on the basis of criteria concerning the results of work.

In the case of officeholders, on the other hand, the only thing to be done is to devise criteria concerning distribution, since the funds are appropriated through the budget or in some other fiscal manner.

Inflation "is opposed" to the drafting of clear criteria and also to their application throughout society. The higher the level of inflation, the more leveling is evident in distribution. Nor is it any surprise that officeholders are complaining of leveling. It was stated in that meeting, for example, that certain heads of the office staff of officeholders have personal incomes only 4,000 dinars less than their bosses.

Incidentally, the social compact on remuneration of officeholders on which everyone insists has to be enacted before the next elections.

Situation in Serbia

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1604, 27 Sep 81 pp 10-11

[Article by D. Jovanovic]

[Text] There are at least two (extreme) opinions concerning the pay of officeholders in Serbia. According to one that is widespread in the population, they are too high and also difficult to justify; according to the other, which is held by fewer people and is based on better information, the republic administration in Serbia has the lowest pay of any republic or province. The second line of argument was supposedly taken even by Ivan Stambolic, chairman of the Executive Council of the Serbian Assembly, in a semiclosed meeting. But in an interview lasting only a moment Stambolic told us: "No, I did not say that. I said that our administration is the smallest in view of the work which it has. And so that it might be seen which republic administration and which officeholders are the best paid and the worst paid, the payroll list ought to be published in the newspapers: publicly."

Zivorad Jakovljevic, chairman of the administrative commission of the Serbian Assembly is the man whose desk contains all the payroll lists of elected officials, from those "top ones" to the deputy republic secretaries. Jakovljevic spoke to us first about the criteria for setting the pay level of officeholders, mentioning for his own part how devilishly difficult and even illusory that job is:

"We have striven as far as possible for the basic principle to be distribution on the basis of the results of work. But how is one to measure the work of an officeholder? How is one to determine whether the meeting of the chambers of the assembly attended by the president of the Serbian Assembly is more important than consulting with the presidents of opstinas, whose proceedings he also participated in that same day? Finally, it may sound as though I'm on the defensive, but in society at large we have not solved the problem of remuneration according to work even in production proper."

Nevertheless, the work of officeholders in Serbia has been measured and classified by groups according to the importance, responsibility and complexity of the tasks that go with each political office. There are five groups, and each has its own coefficient used to determine the level of the officeholder's personal income (when it is multiplied by the average personal income in the republic's economy).

In the first group, with a coefficient of 4.2, are the so-called "top-level officials": the chairman of the SR Serbia State Presidency, the president of the Serbian Assembly, the chairman of the Executive Council of the Serbian Assembly, the chairman of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia, the chairman of the Republic Conference of the SAWP, the president of the republic trade unions and the president of the republic SUBNOR [Federation of Associations of Veterans of the National Liberation War].

In the second group, with a coefficient of 3.73, are the vice presidents in the Serbian Assembly, the presidents of the chambers of the assembly, the vice chairmen of the Executive Council of the Serbian Assembly, the president of the Serbian Constitutional Court, members of the State Presidency of SR Serbia, members of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia, and members of the Presidium of the Republic Conference of the SAWP.

The third group (coefficient 3.52) is made up of the chairmen of the working bodies of the Serbian Assembly, members of the Executive Council of the Serbian Assembly, the associate judges of the Constitutional Court, chairmen of republic judicial bodies, chairmen for the forms of activity of the Republic Conference of the SAWP, chairmen of committees and commissions of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia, and executive secretaries of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia.

In the fourth group (coefficient 3.30) are the republic secretaries working in the Serbian Assembly and Executive Council of the Serbian Assembly and directors of directorates and organizations of interest to the republic (the Bureau for Statistics of SR Serbia, the Bureau for Public Administration, the Republic Geodetic Administration and the Directorate of Commodity Reserves).

And in the fifth group, whose coefficient is 3.10, are the deputy republic secretaries and judges of the Supreme Court of Serbia.

As we have said, the coefficients are multiplied by the average personal income in the republic's economy, which last year was 7,334 dinars in Serbia. But it has been agreed at the level of the republic that the base which is to be multiplied by the coefficient will be lower than the average republic personal income and is to be 6,520 dinars. Since this January the pay of officeholders has been raised 12 percent "though it might have been raised 26 percent on the basis of the self-management accord."

The personal incomes of elected officials this year looked like this by groups (past labor was not taken into account): officials in the first group have been receiving 27,384 dinars of personal income, those in the second group 24 320 dinars, in the third group 22,951 dinars, in the fourth 21,516, and in the fifth 20,212 dinars per month.

Officeholders receive on the basis of past labor 0.5 percent for each year of service, but the amount paid for past labor cannot exceed 20 percent of the personal income. It follows that no elected republic official in Serbia can have a personal income larger than 32,861 dinars, Jakovljevic added.

Then comes the inevitable question of the supplements of the office.

Aside from the lump-sum payment of four per diems (which amounts to 2,800 dinars, since the officeholder's per diem is 700 dinars) which in future will be received only by delegates working on a permanent basis in the SFRY Assembly and in the republic and provincial assemblies, there are no other supplements or privileges whatsoever, Jakovljevic says. The lump-sum payments, which are "a situation inherited from the period of deputies," are living out, then, their last days, though certain delegates receiving them feel that they are small and that visits to their electoral units are becoming more and more expensive.

Do officeholders in Serbia have certain other privileges?

"Aside from the 'top-level officials' no one is entitled to use an automobile to travel to and from work. Except for them no one has the right to alcoholic beverages for purposes of public relations," Jakovljevic says.

According to figures on official travel which were available to us, it turns out that officeholders are rather thrifty. The average number of per diems paid for all of 1980 is 10.5 per official; along with Jakovljevic's remark that officeholders as a rule are not paid a per diem for official travel on which they depart in the morning and return in the evening. As everywhere, there are, of course, exceptions.

In conclusion, the person we talked to announced that thought is being given to raising the pay of officeholders before the end of the year.

Situation in Slovenia

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1604, 27 Sep 81 p 12

[Article reprinted from the Ljubljana newspaper DELO, 29 April 1981]

[Text] Personal incomes (and total income) of delegates, elected and appointed officeholders, and holders of public positions in SR Slovenia were as follows as of 31 March 1981:

1. A personal income from 25,000 to 31,860 goes to the chairman of the State Presidency of SR Slovenia, the chairman of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Slovenia, the chairman of the Republic Conference of the SAWP, members of the State Presidency of SR Slovenia, the president of the Republic Assembly and the chairman of the Executive Council of Slovenia, the president of the Constitutional Court and the presiding officers of the republic trade unions, the republic committee of the Federation of Veterans, the Economic Chamber of Slovenia, and the secretaries of the Presidium of the League of Communists of Slovenia.

The personal income of members of the Council of the Federation From SR Slovenia who are not receiving pensions ranged from 24,060 to 31,854 dinars.

ii. A personal income ranging from 22,919 to 25,780 dinars was paid to the vice presidents of the republic assembly and vice chairmen of the executive council, the presidents of the chambers of the assembly, the chairman of the Republic Conference of the SAWP and the republic council of the Federation of Trade Unions, members of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Slovenia, the chairmen of the republic social councils for questions of the social system, economic development and economic policy, the republic public defender of self-management law, the secretary of the Slovenian Republic Conference of the SAWP and the secretary of the republic committee of the Federation of Veterans. Within that same range were the personal incomes of the president of the Supreme Court of SR Slovenia, the Court of Associated Labor of SR Slovenia, the republic public prosecutor and the associate judges of the Constitutional Court.

iii. A personal income within the range from 19,502 to 23,057 dinars was paid to members of the republic executive council, republic secretaries or chairmen of republic committees, the director of the Bureau of SR Slovenia for Social Questions, the chairman of the commissions of the Assembly of SR Slovenia; members of the republic presidium of the Conference of the SAWP, of the republic council of the Federation of Trade Unions, executive secretaries and chairmen of commissions of the Presidium of the League of Communists of Slovenia, the vice president of the republic economic chamber and the chairmen of the executive committees of the general associations, the deputy republic defender of self-management law, the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Assembly of the Community of Culture of SR Slovenia. In that same range are the personal incomes of the solicitor general of SR Slovenia, the associate judges of the Supreme Court and the Court of Associated Labor and the deputy public prosecutors of SR Slovenia.

iv. Personal incomes ranging from 18,950 to 21,574 dinars are distributed to the chairman of the republic Conference of the Socialist Youth League, that organization's vice president and secretary, the secretary of the republic Conference of the Federation of Reserve Military Officers, deputy republic secretaries and deputy chairmen of republic committees, the deputy director of the Bureau for Social Planning of SR Slovenia, the deputy solicitor general of SR Slovenia and the president of the republic Court for Misdemeanors.

These personal incomes are augmented by a certain percentage on the basis of the Regulation on Past Labor. This increase ranges from 1 percent for employees who have less than 5 years of service to 12 percent for workers with more than 30 years of service. For example: if an officeholder whose personal income is 31,860 dinars has more than 30 years of longevity, which is fairly likely, that increase would amount to 3,498 dinars, for a total of 35,358 dinars.

These are the figures reported by the Commission of Signatories of the Social Compact on Bases and Scales of Personal Incomes and Other Income of Delegates of Elected and Appointed Officials and Holders of Public Office in SR Slovenia as of 31 March 1981.

Croatian Trade Unionist Interviewed

Belgrade ILUSTROVANA POLITIKA in Serbo-Croatian No 1196, 6 Oct 81 pp 14-15

[Interview with Dusan Dragun, secretary of the Council of the Federation of Croatian Trade Unions, by Stevan Zec in Zagreb during October: "There Is a Yardstick Even for Officeholders"]

> [Text] These past several weeks there has been debate in all the republics, provinces and also the Federation on who is and who is not an officeholder and who should and who should not receive an officeholder's personal income. As we examined the accessible material and reports, we asked for an interview with Dusan Dragun, secretary of the Council of the Federation of Croatian Trade Unions, who is also chairman of the commission for monitoring enforcement of the self-management accord on remuneration of officeholders in Croatia and at the same time a member of the commission for resolving the housing problems of officeholders in Zagreb.

A Supplement, Yes, But Not Another Salary

[Question] Comrade Dragun, why are the incomes of officeholders being debated at this time? Does the reason lie in the upcoming elections, or is something else involved?

[Answer] The discussions about remuneration of officeholders in sociopolitical communities and sociopolitical organizations did not begin, at least here in Croatia, because of any excessive situations—which do occur—but out of a need for maximum application of our constitution and the Law on Associated Labor to this remuneration. Moreover, I think that there is a need to speak in public about this, as indeed about everything else. Every veil of secrecy should be removed from this question, since there are no reasons to hide anything, either because of what has already occurred or in particular because of what will be in the future. The policy governing the personal incomes of officeholders must be absolutely public, if for no other reason to avoid the situation where a man who looks at the television news says: "Who is this man to talk about stabilization when he has a salary of 5 or 6 million!" It is certain that there is quite a bit of mistrust with people precisely because there was not enough public access. At a meeting of the Federal Council for the Social System one member of the SFRY State Presidency said that even his relatives and close friends did not believe that he had a monthly income of 37,000 dinars and certain other very limited benefits.

[Question] What will be the principal change in the manner of remuneration of officeholders in SR Croatia, and what did you advocate in meetings at the federal level?

[Answer] We are in favor of every person elected to public office of having the personal income which he brought with him from his work organization, but to this would be added an appropriate supplement that goes with the post, which he would receive while he is in that position. When his term of office is over, that supplement is, of course, also terminated. The officeholder's supplement ought to be determined in such a way as above all to precisely evaluate the position and to establish the complexity of the work, the responsibility and the working conditions. For example, a worker from an organization of associated labor has been elected, and he has been receiving 15,000 dinars a month, and the position to which he has been elected is evaluated at 22,000 dinars. During his term of office he would receive from the forum or institution 7,000 dinars and from his own work organization he would continue to receive his personal income which he was earning there previously. This is especially important because of the system of collective leadership. A man remains a member of the collective governing body, but he is an officeholder for only 1 year, while he is the chairman, and only during that time can he receive the officeholder's supplement, but not afterward.

[Question] How is the personal income to be determined for officeholders who do not come from associated labor, but who are only moving from one public office to another?

[Answer] That example was also taken up in the meetings of the republic commission. Our point of departure should be the fact that in all our political commitments we oppose repetition of the term of office and the circulation of the same people from a forum of the League of Communists to the trade unions or to the SAWP, or from the executive council to the Croatian Assembly. Yet there are, and there will probably continue to be, people who left associated labor long ago. That is why we are demanding that conditions be drafted in the social compact under which transitional solutions would be found for the personal incomes of people moving from one public office to another. I think there will be fewer and fewer such people. Perhaps for just a few more years, until the principle of collective leadership becomes altogether firm.

Halving the Number of Officeholders

[Question] Within these changes it is being proposed only in SR Croatia that there be a reduction in the number of people who are now on the payroll as officeholders. What is this really all about?

[Answer] In Croatia at the present time there are about 6,500 people who earn their personal income under the system which we refer to as the officeholders' system. These are people in the assemblies of opstinas, communities of opstinas, in the republic and in the courts. Nor does this number include senior officials in self-managing communities of interest. We are demanding that this number be at least cut in half in this republic. Of course, we will not be driving these people out at all, but they will rather be moved where they belong, and that is the work communities in which work is evaluated by other criteria. Another innovation is that the term "officeholders" will apply only to those who are appointed by the highest forums of delegate bodies: assemblies of opstinas, the republic assembly and the highest bodies of sociopolitical organizations: the central committee of the republic's League of Communists, the republic Conference of SAWP, of SUBNOR, of the Socialist Youth League, and the republic trade union council. None of those chosen by executive bodies can be officeholders. Likewise judges cannot receive officeholders' personal incomes, but must be included in work communities.

[Question] In a recent meeting in Belgrade the opinion was expressed that SR Serbia has fewer officeholders than any republic or province. Does SR Croatia want to reduce the number of officeholders because it has the largest number?

[Answer] No, neither does Serbia have the least, nor does Croatia have the largest number of officeholders. It is a matter of what is meant by the officeholder and who are all those people who receive the same personal income as received by elected officials. It is certain that we in Croatia think that we have a great number, even too many paid officials. In the further development of the delegate system we must demand that there be fewer and fewer professionals and more and more of those who are voluntarily performing sociopolitical functions. When we reduce, that is, reduce to half, the number of people who figure as officeholders in the manner in which they earn their income, we will not reduce the size of the staff, but we will only be compelling those who are not objectively officeholders to move into work communities and to earn their income like the rest of the administrative apparatus.

[Question] Will those people be receiving smaller income in the work communities than what they are now receiving as officeholders?

[Answer] No, in the work communities they are receiving approximately the same income. The specialized staff services of committees, of assemblies, of republic conferences and similar bodies even now have rather high incomes, almost as high as those of officeholders, so that those people who give up their places on the payroll of officeholders will not be hurt if they do enough work. It is just that work will be better measured in the work communities. They will have to work more to earn what they have now been receiving, as I would put it, on almost a lump-sum basis. The highest personal income of an officeholder in SR Croatia is the chairman of the Presidency, who receives 37,000 dinars per month. The lowest incomes of officeholders in our republic are 21,800 dinars. We believe that those are decent personal incomes, but we also feel that they are not superhigh incomes. There are quite a few people in associated labor who have considerably higher incomes. There are even a few hundred persons employed in the economy and noneconomic activities who earn more than 35,000 dinars a month. These are business executives, specialists, university professors and scientists. There are also skilled and highly skilled workers, miners, lumberjacks, masons and metalworkers who have monthly earnings of 30,000 or even 40,000 dinars. We feel that this is normal.

To Each According to the Community

[Question] When the new social compact is implemented, will the real personal incomes of elected officials be larger or smaller than now?

[Answer] Over the last 5 years, if we compare the income of officeholders to the economy, their earnings have been dropping steadily. According to my estimates, applying the new scales for personal incomes of officials ought to mean a smaller decline of their real earnings; that is, they should be greater in real terms than they are now.

[Question] Does that mean that certain people have begun to renounce public office because their earnings are greater in work organizations?

[Answer] Yes, exactly so. There are cases where people do not want to become judges, since their colleagues who are lawyers in the economy have passed them by a considerable amount. This is yet another reason why we must transfer judges from the payroll of officeholders to work communities.

[Question] The most highly developed of our republics is Slovenia, and the most underdeveloped federal unit it is SAP [Socialist Autonomous Province] Kosovo. The chairmen of the presidencies of that republic and that province have up to now been receiving approximately the same personal incomes, but how will it be in the future?

[Answer] There have to be differences. By the very fact that incomes will be indexed to the success of associated labor in the relevant community rather than to some federal or republic average, there will have to be a difference between the personal incomes of officials. There will be differences in income at the same level of officeholders from one republic or province to another, just as there will be differences in earnings, say, of opstina presidents within a single republic. This is inevitable.

[Question] When the new system for remuneration of officeholders was being debated at the federal level, what were the differences in views of the delegations of the republics and provinces?

[Answer] We more or less agreed on all essential questions. Yet there were differences. Above all about how to measure and pay for the past labor of officeholders. We from Croatia felt that the proposals of certain republics and provinces were unrealistic in proposing that the past labor of officeholders be paid at a higher level than past labor of workers in associated labor. There ought not to be any differences whatsoever in other rights based on labor and arising out of labor either. Here again officeholders can be put on a par with other working people. It is unacceptable for them to have larger remuneration for separation from family, a higher supplement for longevity, higher per diems, larger severance pay and higher moving expenses. Our position is that these supplements cannot be lower than they are in the economy, but not higher either.

[Question] How do you measure the value of the officeholder's labor?

[Answer] The first and basic thing is that one does not pay for a name, but for the value or complexity of the position. There has been quite a bit of reflection about whether there should be a reduction of the personal income of, for example, the chairman of the executive council if within a particular period that forum as a whole does not do its job well enough. What seems to me the correct conclusion was drawn to the effect that the entire executive council will not do better work in the following months if its chairman is receiving a personal income 5 or 10 percent below what it was. There is a need to put the question of personal responsibility in a more exacting way, to take other social measures, including recall or removal if necessary. Reducing the personal incomes of office holders can only be an auxiliary, but by no means the principal reaction to poor work in some public office.

[Question] There was also talk about whether members of the Council of the Republic or Council of the Federation are officeholders or not. Are they to receive their personal incomes according to the same scale as elected officials? What position was taken by the commission in SR Croatia?

[Answer] In our case there are very few, an almost negligible number, of people who are members of the Council of the Republic and who are receiving a personal income. The members of the council are mainly retired people. However, if there are people who are not pensioners, in Croatia we will apply to them the same scales as those which apply to other officeholders. As for the Council of the Federation, it is our position that that kind of solution and the opinion that we have arrived at in the republic be honored here.

Who Is Entitled to an Official Dinner?

[Question] The public feels that perhaps net personal incomes of officeholders are not excessively high, but that a number of other benefits objectively raises the standard of living of those people. Recently a query was put in the assembly as to why certain officeholders are going for medical treatment and summer vacations at federal expense. There was also mention of use of the villa at Igalo for this purpose, when heating the swimming pool alone cost 10,000 dinars. Are there similar benefits for summer vacations and travel of officeholders in SR Croatia?

[Answer] These are exceptions and isolated cases, but at the federal level. In our case, for instance, the republic assembly or the central committee and the republic conferences do not have special facilities for special purposes. There are no opportunities to take advantage of privileges on this basis. For several years now the trade unions have advocated not giving the discount for annual vacations to those who earn more than 15,000 dinars monthly. This year not a single officeholder in the republic council of Croatian trade unions received the discount. Unfortunately, that is not the case in the Assembly of SR Croatia, the executive council, and so on. I hope that in a year or two we will reach the point where no officeholder will receive the discount any longer. Nor are officeholders in Croatia receiving tickets for hot meals, but members of work communities are receiving them. Not a single officeholder in SR Croatia has any sort of reduction on public transportation except the delegates to the republic assembly, and that applies only when they are coming to meetings. Republic institutions also have a small jet airplane which is used exclusively for emergency meetings at the federal level. Not a single one of our sociopolitical organizations has its own airplane. To be sure, the assembly of one opstina wanted to buy an airplane, but that fell through.

[Question] In looking at television we become convinced that officeholders take official trips frequently. When they travel, they receive per diems. Then again, it is well known that there are quite a few official lunches and dinners. What are all the benefits paid to an officeholder during official travel?

[Answer] Per diems in SR Croatia amount to 600 dinars, and if a bill is presented for lodgings, then 800 dinars. If anyone is traveling for less than 12 hours, his per diem amounts to 300 dinars. We have very strict auditing and internal monitoring of sociopolitical communities and organizations. It is certainly taken into account that no opstina can pay a republic official's hotel bill. Perhaps there are exceptions, but those are exceptions that confirm the rule. Incidentally, it is normal for officeholders to use hotel services and to pay for that themselves. Perhaps there are cases to the contrary, but they are very rare; I would say they are negligible cases from the standpoint of the individual's material benefit. But from the standpoint of social harm not a single solitary case ought to be allowed to happen. As for meals, these joint lunches and dinners have been reduced to a minimum, at least with us in the trade unions. As a rule they are arranged only when the most responsible comrades come. It is my judgment that this is considerably less than done by business people in associated labor. To be sure, it is not a justification for officeholders if this is done in certain other places, and this should be abolished. It is worth stressing that things like this which we did have are now being recorded more and more rarely thanks to public scrutiny of public business. Even this conversation of ours will have a considerable impact in eliminating those things.

Bachelor's Apartment for the Duration of the Term of Office

[Question] In discussing the standard of living of officeholders it is impossible to avoid housing. What happens in practice is that a man receives an apartment thanks to the office he holds. When his term of office is over, he keeps the apartment. Will there be any changes in this respect?

[Answer] We are insisting in housing policy that the city decision to the effect that the maximum housing space is one room per member of the family be applied to republic officials as it is applied to other citizens of Zagreb. That means that a three-member family would have a three-room apartment, a four-member family a four-room apartment.... That is the upper limit. But the fact that some officeholder does not leave his family apartment which he has received on taking up his office is a matter of personnel policy in the republic, that is, a matter of his moving from position to position, and not of his refusing to leave that apartment. However, we have already let contracts for some 50 bachelor's apartments. They will be for republic officeholders who come from the provinces, and after their term of office expires, they will leave them to their successors.

POLICY FOR 1980'S TOWARD 'FREEDOM MOVEMENTS' EXPLAINED

West German Commentary

Bonn IWE-TAGESDIENST in German No 147, 9 Oct 81 p 2

/Report from Berlin: "GDR Intends to Cooperate More Closely with 'Freedom Movements.'" A translation of the East Berlin DEUTSCHE AUSSENPOLITIK article cited below follows this commentary/

/Text/ "In the struggle against imperialism" the GDR intends even more closely to cooperate with the "liberation movements" and "progressive nations" in Asia, Africa and Latin America. That was proclaimed in the latest edition of the East Berlin periodical DEUTSCHE AUSSENPOLITIK (No 10, 1981). Cooperation of the socialist countries with the "liberation movements" is said "to have decisively changed the international balance of power, so that the joint struggle in the 1980's may be conducted from far stronger positions than ever before," the journal emphasized. Nevertheless, the full exploitation of these positions required "an even greater extent of internationally coordinated action." The SED would do everything in its power to help this advance.

In this connection the East Berlin periodical rejects Western concepts which make the further pursuit of detente dependent on the maintenance of the international political and social status quo and demand "restraint" from the socialist countries, especially in regions in crisis. It is claimed that the "internationalist politics" of the socialist countries and "their support for the war of liberation" offend neither the spirit nor the principles of international detente, rather do they narrow the "scope for aggressive imperialist actions."

SED Academician's Discussion

East Berlin DEUTSCHE AUSSENPOLITIK in German Vol 26 No 10, Oct 81 (signed to press 3 Sep 81) pp 5-15

/Lead article by Prof Dr Gerhard Powik, Academy of Social Sciences, SED Central Committee: "GDR's Internationalist Positions in the 1980's." A translation of Hermann Axen's article cited in footnote 9 is published under the heading, "Axen on Proletarian Internationalism in Light of October Revolution," in JPRS 70417, 5 Jan 78, No 1492 of this series, pp 14-27/

/Text/ Thanks to the momentous work done by the working class, cooperative farmers, members of the intelligentsia and all working people in the GDR which celebrates its 32d anniversary this month, the Tenth SED Congress was able to draw up a satisfactory balance sheet. Relying on creativity and initiative the Tenth SED Congress sketched the GDR's path in the 1980's. The results achieved and the further goals in the organization of the developed socialist society embody the unity of socialist patriotism and proletarian internationalism which are of the essence of SED politics. Everything we do for the construction of the socialist society in the GDR is also done for the further strengthening of the socialist community and the revolutionary world movement. The GDR has always met its national and international obligations in the serious class conflict with imperialism. At the present time also, in the presence of the complications conjured up by the confrontation politics of imperialism and its threat to peace and the peoples of the world, the GDR is demonstrably a stable pillar of peace and socialism in Europe, a socialist country linked indisputably to the main revolutionary power of our age, which is conscious of its role and obligation at the border between socialism and imperialism. The great esteem the GDR therefore enjoys among the revolutionary and anti-imperialist forces worldwide was reflected in the attendance of 125 foreign delegations at the Tenth SED Congress and their moving words of praise for our party and its internationalist policies.

As Erich Honecker assured the foreign delegations in his concluding address, we thereby feel "confirmed in our regard for the common cause. You may be sure that the SED will always do its duty in the spirit of proletarian internationalism and international solidarity."[1]

As the conscious and organized advance guard of the working class of the working people in the socialist German Democratic Republic the SED carries out "the tasks and targets of the revolutionary workers movement established by Marx, Engels and Lenin." It is part of the international communist movement and "firmly stands on the soil of proletarian internationalism"[2] the spirit and principle of which permeate the entire theory and practice of the SED.

The Tenth SED Congress started from the assumption that the SED will be confronted in the 1980's with new and more advanced tasks from the national as well as the international aspect. For the SED, as for all fraternal parties of the socialist community, the new and higher criteria for its internationalist efforts arise forst of all from the advanced standard of social development achieved, the greater weight of socialism in the international arena, the advances and successes of the other revolutionary and anti-imperialist forces. In the common struggle against imperialism they achieved outstanding results already in the past decades. As regards their work of construction, the defense of peace and the independence of the peoples, the socialist countries have accomplished results of great historical import in the 1970s/ At the beginning of the 1980's the Soviet Union and the countries closely linked to it enjoy an unprecedented international consequence and influence.

Increased therefore is the responsibility of the countries of real socialism in the worldwide sharp conflicts regarding the issues vital for mankind. Most of all that applies to the security of peace which more and more represents the focus of the tremendous struggle. Here we see ever more clearly that peace and socialism are identical. Socialist constructions rises by the diligent and creative work of the people and, in order to increasingly benefit all, it needs peace. We also see ever more clearly that the parties interested in the arms race and the imperialist spirit of aggression involved therein represent a terrible danger to mankind.

The transition to a policy of confrontation, threats and boycotts by imperialist circles, especially in the United States, demonstrates that imperialism has not changed its nature and remains a constant source of danger to peace. These forces are not willing to accept the realities of the modern world, the consolidation of the positions of socialism, the successes of the national liberation movement and the growing strength of the forces of social progress. Their strategy of confrontation is directed to the removal of the present approximate military balance of power and to the establishment of military superiority over the countries of socialism. Openly and without scruples they pronounce entire continents their spheres of interest, threaten the sovereignty and independence of other states and interfere in their internal affairs, whether this be in the Near and Middle East, the Caribbean or Europe. Their machinations threaten to destroy much of what was achieved in the way of detente and progress in the 1980's.

The extent of the dangers again threatening peace, security and the advance of the peoples may be discerned from the nuclear first strike strategy decided upon by the American Administration, the immense rearmament projects and adventurism of their foreign politics, the threats and attempts at blackmail. That is why there is no more important task in the 1980's than to maintain peace, defend and pursue detente, put a stop to the arms race, in other words defeat the imperialist politics of confrontation and bring about the thorough and long-term recovery of the world situation. That is the challenge of the 1980's, that must be the focus of the efforts and goals of all revolutionary and anti-imperialist forces. So to phrase the issue does not mean the abandonment of the class conflict standpoint, does not mean that we should subordinate the class struggle to the struggle for peace. In complete agreement with the CPSU and the other fraternal parties the SED considers the struggle for peace the core of its international activities, the reason being that the politics of confrontation represent the main danger not only to the survival of mankind but, directly, also to economic and social development, progress and the freedom of the peoples. In the current international situation detente, the defense and stabilization of peace are not only prerequisites for social progress, they are themselves part and parcel of this progress.

As the issue of war and peace is the main issue of present international developments, it is up to socialism to act as the main force in the struggle for the prevention of a thermo-nuclear disaster, in other words for saving our civilization from annihilation. In so doing it secures the necessary external conditions for the accomplishment of the tasks confronting the socialist countris and, at the same time, settles a problem of truly international dimensions. These two related aspects are also reflected in the foreign policy line adopted by the Tenth SED Congress. The GDR makes its own the peace program submitted to the Twenty-Sixth CPSU Congress, because it shows the approach to the defeat of the imperialist line of confrontation, the warding off of the danger of nuclear war and to again advancing detente. We thereby respond to the basic interests of our people and, at the same time, to the GDR's international responsibilities on the border between the Warsaw Pact and NATO.

Starting from socialism's mission of peace and our national interests, the SED Congress therefore made a point of emphasizing the following as the principal target of foreign policy: "Purposeful extension of the fraternal alliance with the Soviet Union and the other countries of the socialist community..., setting course toward the all-round strengthening and increase of the international attraction of socialism."[3]

After all, the socialist community of nations is the main support of the positive basic trend in international development. On the further growth of their strength, their solidarity, the increasingly perfect evolution of the benefits of socialism, largely depends the fate of their peace strategy.

It was emphasized at the Tenth SED Congress that progress and peace are certainly not divisible at this time. We see this very clearly in the nature and the targets of the two opposing basic trends of international development.

The champions of the imperialist line of confrontation candidly state that they wish to make peace, detente and peaceful coexistence dependent on the maintenance of the political and social status quo in the world, on the "good behavior" of the Soviet Union and the socialist countries in international affairs, on their renunciation of international support for the just liberation struggles of the peoples, in other words on the socialist countries more or less offering a guarantee for untrammeled imperialist expansion, control and exploitation of the peoples.

This reflects the Western admission that internationalist solidarity of, in particular, the socialist countries has turned into a powerful factor for worldwide social progress.

Obviously the most reactionary imperialist circles fear most of all the effect of proletarian internationalism, involuted by the power of socialism, the cooperation, reciprocal solidarity and support of all anti-imperialist forces. The potency of this principle in the new international realities as a real power in the defense of peace and the implementation of social progress is to be offset by playing the card of a nuclear first strike, the reckless handling of the military bludgeon against the peoples.

This same logic of imperialist power politics is also at the base of the hypocritical justifications of Western politicians and media when they assert that it had been the Soviet Union's solidarity with revolutionary Afghanistan and its subsequent military aid which had exacerbated the international situation and put detente at risk. Years ago already help for newly liberated Angola against South African intervention had been similarly described and "restraint" demanded of the socialist countries.

Basically all this is designed to obfuscate the imperialist policy of aggression and interference while slandering international solidarity in the consciousness of the peoples as expansionism, intervention, as actions threatening peace. At the same time self-sacrificing internationalist aid is depicted as running counter to the peoples longing for peace.

Do the internationalist politics of the socialist countries, their support for the peoples battles for liberation really endanger peace, do they offend against the spirit and the principles of international detente, are international solidarity and peaceful coexistence contradictory?

Our answer must be a decided no. If we accepted this false alternative, we would have to consider irreconcilable peace on the one hand and the freedom and progress of the peoples on the other. In that case we would subject all peoples to the dictate of imperialism and its policy of robbery and exploitation, which has always been the real cause of tension, conflict and war.

Peace is not threatened by the struggle of the peoples for independence, freedom and the achievement of full powers over their natural wealth, for equality in international economic relations also, nor by the victories they score for their just cause. In fact their growing power and successes strengthen the cause of peace, narrow the scope for aggressive imperialist actions. The victory of the Vietnamese people and its reunification served peace not only in East Asia but all over the world; a dangerously smoldering source of conflict was removed. The liberation of Angola and Mozambique ended a long-standing colonial war and strengthened the cause of peace in southern Africa. The Iranian revolution destroyed a regime which international monopoly capital had invested with the role of military guardian against the peoples of the region. Aided by worldwide solidarity the peoples of Vietnam, Laos and Kampuchea achieved victory over all agressors as well as internal reaction. The dearly bought victory of the peoples in the struggle for the independence and sovereignty of Angola, Mozambique, Ethiopia, the People's Republic of Yemen, Zimbabwe and other countries represents a powerful contribution to the cause of the liberation of mankind.

The popular revolutions in Afghanistan, Iran, Nicaragua and Grenada destroyed important fortresses of despotism and opened the door to freedom for these peoples. New impetus was given the struggle against unpopular fascist and military-fascist regimes in El Salvador, Bolivia, Chile and South Korea.

At the very core of the principles of detente, the policy of peaceful coexistence, is the renunciation of the use and threat of the use of force, absolute respect for the unrestricted right of the peoples to self-determination. This totally agrees with the nature and goals of proletarian internationalism. On the other hand it runs counter completely to the nature of imperialism and its urge toward aggression and violence, its practice of interference and intervention, the export of counterrevolution which is the order of the day in Latin America, Africa, Asia and Europe --everywhere in fact where imperialism considers its unpopular interests and goals threatened.

The SED and the GDR altogether will always unreservedly take the side of the fighters against imperialism, colonialism and for national liberation on all continents. Together with the progressive forces the world over we aided the Vietnamese people in its struggle against U.S.aggression, the peoples of Kampuchea and Laos and Angola's fight for independence just as the struggles of other peoples who are defending their right to national sovereignty and social progress and making resolute use of the sovereignty and independence achieved. Their word is increasingly weighty in the decisions about the great issues of our age.

Ww all know that the countries of the socialist community send internationalist aid to the progressive countries. They support them in matters of politics and increasingly send economic and scientific-technological aid. Up to now the GDR has handed over to these countries 500 objects, complete factories, equipment, plant and educational facilities. "We concentrated mutually beneficial cooperation on such areas as are crucial for the conquest of economic backwardness, the achievement and consolidation of economic independence."[4]

CEMA aid goes to 86 nationally liberated countries; 4,400 projects were planned, 3,000 of which are already in operation (745 with GDR involvement). Our country's solidarity fund is replenished every year by about M200 in voluntary contributions from the working people. They are used for gifts of aid merchandise, the financing of medical treatment and the training of cadres.[5]

Socialism's contribution to the settlement of these countries problems is even more extensive. Due to its grown strength and increasing international influence, real socialism restrains imperialist striving for world domination. Socialism has greatly expanded the radius of action of these states. Cooperation between the states of the socialist community and the countries liberated from the yoke of colonialism is based on such standards of international law as respect for national sovereignty and territorial integrity, noninterference in internal affairs, equality and mutual benefit.

The SED actively encourages the strengthening of the GDR's close alliance with the peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America, who struggle against imperialism and neocolonialism. Our state now entertains diplomatic relations with 87 countries of these regions. Since 1971 it has concluded more than 350 government treaties and agreements as well as agreements at ministerial level. They represent a sound contractual basis for deepening reciprocal relations.

It is therefore evident that the basic interests of real socialism and the national liberation movements are tightly interlinked in the struggle for peace and social progress, against imperialism. Their cooperation has crucially changed the international balance of power, so that their joint struggle in the 1980's may be conducted from far stronger positions than ever before. However, utilization of these positions requires an even greater extent of internationall coordinated approaches. After the Tenth SED Congress the SED will continue to do everything in its power to promote this goal.

"International solidarity with all peoples fighting for their freedom remains the supreme law of our actions. All peoples who struggle for national and social liberation, for independence, democracy and progress will be able in future also to count on the solidarity of the German Democratic Republic."[6]

By their attendance at the party congress the foreign delegations demonstrated that they hold the GDR's solidarity in great esteem; after all, they rely on aid from the socialist countries for the victory of their just cause.

The course and results of the Tenth SED Congress and the great international attention it received from the progressive forces the world over bear witness to the growth and cooperation of the three great revolutionary mainstreams of our age, bear witness to the unbroken vitality of proletarian internationalism in our age and are a constructive contribution so to develop the cooperation of communist and workers parties in all suitable forms that the communist movement may do even better justice to the demands of the age.

The SED never considered proletarian internationalism as a principle of the exclusiveness of the communist parties. On the contrary--proletarian internationalism serves it as well as all Marxist-Leninist parties to develop widespread cooperation with all forces of the workers movement, all anti-imperialist and revolutionary forces in the world, including the national liberation movements.

An outstanding example was the international scientific conference held in Berlin on the topic "the common struggle of the workers movement and the national liberation movement against imperialism, for social progress." This was attended by the senior delegates from 116 communist and workers parties, other revolutionary parties and national liberation movements from 103 countries. It was the largest and broadest ever meeting of its kind in the history of the revolutionary movement. The organization and results of this conference responded to the profound needs of the anti-imperialist struggle in our age and evidenced the urge of the revolutionary forces to cooperate and act in common for common goals.

The SED holds that the rise in the requirements on internationalism, the growth of the tasks and duties common to all revolutionary forces on the international level has objective causes. This process is profoundly rooted in the inevitabilities of social development, the process of the international class conflict.

What is the result of the rapidly advancing internationalization of the class conflict for the relation between international and national considerations in SED politics? Does the rise in international tasks proceed at the expense of national interests, does it require a "scaling down" of national aspects, the subordination of national interests to superior goals and requirements?

Hostile ideologues continue to insinuate that the SED holds such a rigid interpretation of internationalism as to contradict national interests. However, such an interpretation of internationalism is entirely foreign to the nature of our politics, the traditions of our party and its goals. Our party is at all times conscious of its responsibilities to our own people as well as to the international working class. This is not to say that the unity of national and international aspects arises spontaneously in the politics of our party and the actions of every communist party. Properly to link these two aspects--that is the art and the duty, the central issue of truly internationalist politics.

In the conditions of the complex class conflict it is certainly not always easy to reconcile the specific national and common international interests. To achieve this requires the Marxist-Leninist parties basically always to start from the class interests of the working class. This class interest always includes national as well as international aspects. After all, there is an objective unity of class interests of the proletariat on the national and international level. The fundamental issue, therefore, does not consist in replacing specific national aspects by common international aspects, or vice versa. Instead it is imperative to produce the proper connection between these two aspects. From the very beginning that requirement was particularly crucial for SED politics. As in all other socialist countries, the achievement of the dictatorship of the proletariat in the GDR was the basic condition for the construction of socialism. In the course of its organization and exercise as well as its steady consolidation the SED always endeavored to take into account historial and national features and find appropriate specific solutions while carrying out and observing the general inevitabilities of the socialist revolution. That resulted, for example, in the survival of several parties, the methods of cooperation between the SED and the other democratic parties. When nationalizing the means of production, the general inevitabilities were again applied to our actual national conditions. This included the fact, for example, that land was not nationalized, that state investment in small and medium private industrial enterprises gradually conducted these enterprises to socialism without expropriation. In socialist farming we have developed specific types suitable for the introduction of industrial production methods and the linking of industry and agriculture.

The increasingly close links between the GDR and the Soviet Union and the other countries of the socialist community were and are an indispensable basic condition of the successful construction of the socialist society. Nor can the socialist society in the GDR develop without, with the leadership of the SED, constantly coping with its own tasks in all areas of social life, seeking and finding new ways and means of accomplishing those tasks which respond to the specific conditions of our country.

Firmly rooted in the alliance with the Soviet Union and the other countries of the socialist community and utilizing their experiences, the Tenth SED Congress directed us to do everything to expand the economic base of our country, pursue the main task in its unity of economic and social policy and thus contribute to the strengthening of socialism, the improvement of its stability and international attraction. Precisely by its close cooperation with the Soviet Union and the other CEMA member countries the GDR is able even in the changed conditions of the 1980's to guarantee its stable and dynamic development as a firm element of the socialist community of nations. In this dialectic interrelation the SED's internationalist line accords with Lenin's demand fully to exploit all internal opportunities for the consolidation and greatest possible development of socialism and communism within the country and, at the same time, for the support and evolution of the revolutionary struggle in the world as a whole.

It would therefore be very one-sided if we were to restrict the struggle and the responsibility of a Marxist-Leninist party entirely to the struggle and the revolution or construction of the new social order in the home country.

Above and beyond this it has other internationalist obligations respecting the concern for consolidating the unity of the socialist world system, concern for the development of the worldwide revolutionary process, the effective and common struggle against imperialism. Needed, therefore, is the correct balance of all national and international factors in the respective concrete situation, from the standpoint of the overall interests of the working class, the overall interests of socialism and communism. It is precisely this unity of national and international interests which is featured in the Tenth SED Congress resolutions, in the SED's strategy and policies for the 1980's.

The development of the revolutionary anti-imperialist popular movements in the world, the great example of our socialist community of nations as an alliance of a totally new type demonstrate and constantly reaffirm that internationalism on the one hand and independence of the peoples on the other postulate one another. Our own experiences in the GDR prove to us each day that the indestructible fraternal alliance with the Soviet Union, the firm roots of the GDR in the community of socialist nations remains for our people the stable foundation of its independence, security and success in the organization of the developed socialist society. These facts refute the assertion by imperialist ideologues that loyalty to proletarian internationalism and independence are mutually exclusive. The intention is so to represent things as if the affirmation of loyalty to the Soviet Union and the CPSU amounted to the surrender of independence. Criticism of the Soviet Union, distancing from Lenin's party, the social socialist reality in the USSR and its politics, on the other hand, are considered the criterion of independence and orginality.

At the conclusion of the Tenth SED Congress Erich Honecker, general secretary of the SED Central Committee, emphasized: "Our party...is tied for good to the party of Lenin, the communist party of the Soviet Union."[7] In fact the peoples of the Soviet Union and the GDR have become allies, comrades-at-arms and friends. At the same time we are further developing our fraternal relations with the Soviet Union in all areas. The focus is on the even closer interrelation of the material and intellectual potentials of our two countries for coping with the tasks ranging far into the future. The long-range program of specialization and cooperation in production through 1990, agreed between the USSR and the GDR, is directed to the settlement of such important issues of the present and the future as stable energy and raw material supplies and the constantly more effective coupling of the benefits of socialism with the achievements of the scientific-technological revolution.

The fact that the deepening of relations leads to the increasing rapprochement of our peoples is demonstrated by the contacts established in the most varied fields and include many personal relations. All these serve to solidify our unity. The increasing similarity of the tasks and problems to be settled in both countries make it possible and indeed challenge us to exploit and apply our positive experiences even better and more usefully. From the standpoint of the USSR developments in the GDR, for example, supply valuable experiences regarding the rationalization of production and the conservation of energy, raw materials and other materials. When paying its respects to the successful balance sheet displayed at the Twenty-sixth CPSU Congress, our party emphasized that the practical long-standing experiences of the CPSU are gaining increased importance for the conscious application of the fundamental inevitabilities of socialist and communist construction. In other words, the practice of real socialism in the USSR reaffirms the basic principle of our party, established in its program, according to which the attitude to the CPSU and the USSR is the touchstone of loyalty to Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.[8]

Our attitude to the Soviet Union is decided by the following three basic considerations:

-- The extent of social progress achieved in the Soviet Union;

-- The role played by Lenin's party and fatherland within the revolutionary movement;

-- The power and influence exercised by the Soviet Union on the international balance of power and the fate of mankind.[9]

For more than 60 years the USSR has proven itself the most powerful and decisive pioneer of social progress, the chief fortress of socialism and communism, the standard bearer in the struggle for peace.

Our party always considered it an enormous advantage to be able to build socialism in the GDR in firm alliance with the land of Red October. In realization of the Tenth SED Congress resolutions it will multiply its efforts in order, at the side of the CPSU and the USSR as well as the other fraternal parties and countries of rhw socialist community, to conduct the struggle against imperialist confrontation politics, for peace, independence and the progress of the peoples, for the prosperity of our socialist society.

DUTCH VIEW OF PEACE MOVEMENT WITHIN GDR CHURCH

Amsterdam ELSEVIERS MAGAZINE in Dutch Vol 37 No 41, 10 Oct 81 pp 70-72, 77-78

[Last of three articles on recent peace movement activities in The Netherlands, the FRG and the GDR, by Rex Brico, head, 'Religion, Man and Society' department, ELSEVIERS MAGAZINE: "Hopeful Signs from the GDR: Peace at All Costs--Profile of a Movement"]

> [Text] After the fusion of the Dutch peace movement with the IKV [Interchurch Peace Council] campaign, the "Dutch Disease" [antinuclear arms sentiment] spread particularly to the FRG, as shown by the previous two articles in this series. This third and last installment describes the manner in which the peace movement in the GDR is determined through both ideologic and Christian initiatives. The latter initiatives, however, are the ones which are getting the support of the churches.

"I am drawing attention to the monopolized mass media (in the West) because they often hamper objective reporting on important events which are aimed at securing peace. In the current discussions on armament, in particular with respect to the NATO resolution on modernization and the American neutron weapons, the reports are primarily publications by those newspaper empires which are trying to justify the course of armament and discriminate against its opponents."

The man who makes this judgment is Hubertus Guske, editor-in-chief of BEGEGNUNG, a magazine for "Catholics in the church and in society." The place where it is being given is a press center in East Berlin where a meeting is taking place of the so-called BK -- the Berlin Conference of European Catholics. Mr Guske is one of the four speakers at this meeting which deals with "communication and action of catholics in the service of peace."

Just how Roman Catholic is this BK? Not too terribly Roman, for according to rumors the Vatican representative,who was to attend the event, withdrew at the last moment at the instigation of the [West] German bishops. This absence does not, however, keep Mr Guske from putting Johannes Paulus II extensively in the forefront of his argument. In his message of 31 May this year the Pope, namely, warned of the danger of manipulation in communication. Guske concludes that that can only refer to the Western media, for those are hampered by "commercialization, pursuit of profit and concentration." In the GDR, he says, there is neither official press censorship, nor are there rules concerning the content of papers and magazines.

Apparently it doesn't bother Mr Guske that there are a few Western journalists in the hall who only a few weeks previously attended the meeting of the World Council of Churches which was held in Dresden, GDR this year. Even the most uncritical among them were able to determine there how every word of criticism of the GDR or the Soviet Union, no matter how implicit, was left out of local press reports, even if quotations had to be cut up for that. On the other hand, the slightest criticism of the United States or NATO was emphasized so much that the meeting looked more like an anti-Western rally than like a world church meeting.

In all fairness, it must be admitted that Mr Guske was not representative of the speakers and discussion circles at the BK meeting. Among them there were also a Pax Christi [Catholic Peace Movement] representative in the person of Father Donald O'Mahoney, who said aloud that the church in the Eastern bloc "must be given the freedom to deliver its message, and the social implications of the message, to the people without fear of censorship, which undoubtedly exists." There was also the Polish journalist Anna Maria Borowska, who stated that there could not be peace without justice and that justice has failed to exist in her country for 30 years. "We must also talk about social factors which prepare for a war," said Mrs Borowska. And then there was the Irish journalist, Louis McRedmond, who vented his ire about the views in which the opponent is pictured as black and one's own party as white. He called it "a sin against the Holy Ghost." Whoever expected this sort of remark to be included in the final report, however, was sorely mistaken. In it, one talked exclusively about the good peace initiatives of the Soviet Union and the nastiness of the United States and NATO. It was this final report which the next day was sent onto the socialist radio network on all wavelengths by the GDR rado. It indeed resembled a sin against the Holy Ghost.

Although in general one cannot expect a much different line from the BK than that which is laid out by the governments of the Eastern bloc, the line of the BK's reformed-orthodox equivalent, the (Prague) Christian Peace Conference, CFK, is not much different. First the CFK approved of the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan; later, under the influence of discussions with Western participants, it withdrew the approval. The value of peace movements such as the BK and CFK is therefore more at the level of personal meetings than in the public standpoints through which they address the world. Those public standpoints don't serve much but communist propaganda, while for many Eastern European church people the meetings form the only opportunity to exchange ideas with others without being censored.

Communist propaganda in the Eastern bloc actually abuses the desire for peace in such a flagrant manner that even the word alone has been devaluated into a hollow cliche. Everywhere in East German cities life-size slogans are to be seen in which peace is identified with both state socialism and the state itself. And not only there. A priest from another Eastern bloc country tells me in the hallways of the BK congress that his countrymen merely shrug their shoulders when peace campaigns are discussed. "Over here the feeling predominates that the Soviets determine that peace and that we are completely powerless in it," he says. "We have been badgered with the word peace for so many years that it no longer makes any impression on us." Not even if the (Roman Catholic) Church exerts itself for that peace? I ask. A bitter smile appears on his face. "We often think that people from the state, that is to say Marxist officials from the department of culture, have more understanding and feeling for what the Second Vatican Council has proclaimed than do our own bishops," he says. "Those bishops are thinking in completely pre-council terms, to the extent they can think at all. They know nothing of theology and have no contact whatsoever with the people. The only body with which they maintain contact is Rome. I myself have been criticized a number of times by my bishop because I talked and wrote about peace. That is not part of a priest's duty, he says. Our church is headed by a hierarchy of bureaucrats."

Does all this mean that there are no Christians in the Eastern bloc who really exert themselves for peace and that peace is not discussed? The answer is: "no." That was apparent, for example, during a so-called ecumenical coffee in Dresden, organized by the reformed clergywoman Be Ruys. During this coffee, where the American World Council Adviser Dwain Epps, our former General M. von Meyenfeldt and the East German physicist Dr Walter Romberg answered questions of young Christians, the latter noted an increasing frankness in the GDR with respect to questions about peace and also a growing willingness to go into those questions more profoundly. During this session Dr Romberg even pleaded for the GDR to consider unilateral initiatives also, after the Dutch model, in order to come to bilateral disarmament. He called such an initiative the abandoning of arms systems which in case of war could be turned into nuclear systems (for there are no permanently stationed nuclear arms or nuclear warheads on GDR territory).

It was not the first time that Dr Walter Romberg stuck out his neck for effective peace initiatives in his own country. Although he is a member of the CFK mentioned earlier, in 1977 he initiated a disarmament task force which since that time has played a much more believable role than the CFK or the aforementioned BK. The task force was an outcome of the Theologic Study Division, which was founded in 1974 and financed by the Federation of Evangelic Churches in the GDR. Already at the time of its founding, the disarmament task force asked itself how the churches in the GDR would be able to take an independent position in a responsible manner with respect to the armament and disarmament question. In any event, they did not think that the answer was in conforming to or identifying with the standpoints of the state on that. Then where? In the very same year, a so-called Problem Outline was drawn up which did not really give a conclusive answer, but which in any event indicated the direction in which the churches should go. The latter would have to give higher priority to an analysis of the social, social-psychological and anthropological factors which govern armament. The problem outline itself utilized political-military analyses based -- particularly -- on the Stockholm peace foundation SIPRI. In it, the task force came to similar conclusions as the IKV had in the Netherlands, namely that negotiations in practice lead only to ceilings and not to disarmament, that technology has an increasing influence on arms production, and that proliferation of nuclear arms is alarmingly close at hand.

That similarity to the IKF was not coincidental; inspired by the nuclear arms statement of the Dutch Reformed Synod of 1963, Walter Romberg sought contact with the Dutch peace council already in 1977-78. And it was in conjunction with this peace council that his disarmament task force in May 1980 wrote a joint letter to Dr Philip Potter, secretary-general of the World Council of churches.

For it was the World Council which during its assembly in Nairobi (1975) had created an anti-militarism program which summoned Christians to live without the protection of arms. In this letter of the IKV and the task force both parties appealed to their states to consider "unilateral first steps, even if a risk should be attached." Further, the letter writers stated that they "would not participate in a war which would be waged with such (nuclear) arms. We understand this pronouncement as the now unavoidable consequence of a peace testimonial which is based on the liberating gospel of God's acting through Jesus Christ.

The letter was an implicit answer -- which can be called unique in the official documents of churches in Eastern Europe -- to the so-called Heidelberg Theses which had started to prevail in the FRG and which stated that Christians could fight for peace either with or without nuclear arms (see last week's ELSEVIERS). However, the World Council of Churches did not understand it as such and limited itself to a polite thank-you note. We might say: in contrast to the religious press in the GDR which published the letter in detail.

Meanwhile the Reformed Synod in our country had adopted the so-called "pastoral letter" with regard to nuclear arms, with which this synod aligned itself behind the IKV campaign entitled: "Nuclear Arms out of the World, starting with the Netherlands." The Synod also sent this letter to the earlier mentioned Theologic Study Division in Berlin, which in turn sent it to the eight regional churches in the GDR, as well as to a number of parishes and groups. In an accompanying letter the division wrote: "Through this statement we feel encouraged to do our utmost for our churches' again taking up this question after much hesitation and for the seeking of a solution which is based on belief and obedience." The Study Division moreover adopted a statement last March in which it argued in favor of the route of the Dutch Reformed Church and in which it stated very concretely this time: "We are of the opinion that an initiative taken in consultation with the allies of the Warsaw Pact to abandon arms systems with nuclear tasks in the GDR must be aspired to as a step toward the denuclearization of Europe." The intention of the statement was to give an answer to the Dutch synod and simultaneously to provoke a type of parallelism or symmetry with it: a church initiative toward a unilateral step in Eastern Europe as a reaction to a similar sort of initiative in Western Europe. However, the statement clearly went too far for the Federation of Evangelical Churches in the GDR. It accused the theologic division of having created the impression that the entire Federation was behind the statement and of having created concrete political expectations which for the time being had no basis. "Before we endorse this, there will have to be a lot more discussion," one bishop said. On the other hand, the statement found strong resonance during a religious peace consultation in Berlin-Brandenburg at the beginning of April. Was the government just as enthusiastic? A collaborator: "Probably not. On the other hand, the government knows very well that the ecumenical discussion on disarmament is becoming a European fact. And I suspect that it is possible to swallow the political context, in spite of its critical elements. Moreover, it moves at a certain level; it is not an issue of the common man." Not an issue, or /as yet/ not an issue?

It may be obvious why the Dutch IKV has made neither the BK nor the CFK an ally -- as the Christians for Socialism desired and aspired to explicitly -- but has, however, made the above mentioned Theologic Study Division an ally.

Dr Mient Jan Faber [secretary of the IKV]: "Organizations such as the BK or CFK have adopted too much of the black-and-white thinking of the ruling systems in the Eastern bloc countries to be able to look at the matter critically. Therefore the evangelical churches in the GDR are not participating either. Those churches accept the fact that they are churches within socialism; they do not resist it, but they do not accept everything from it either. They are one of the very few not too highly structured mass organizations in the Eastern bloc which are taking an independent position. They have attained that position because they often kept quiet in the past. But now they feel that they can no longer be silent on certain issues. Certainly not in matters of security and peace which often are determined by the state in a strongly ideological manner. Of course an institute such as the Theologic Study Division must take much more time in making decisions than we; they are much more vulnerable. We cannot simply transfer our position to theirs. But through that we learn a lot from them also. For example, their joy over a sentence in the pastoral letter in which it is recognized that one can be a Christian in any system. That was terribly important to them, precisely because many people think that one can be a Christian only here."

It is difficult to record the initiatives taking place within those churches in the creating of consciousness and other areas. This is, thus a religious official explained to me, because there are few cross connections between the groups who take those initiatives. The ties are primarily vertical, between the church leadership of a province and the membership. That church leadership must be as informed as possible in order to be able to account for as much as possible. The latter they often do courageously and persistently. Thus, in May this year a number of young Christians from Saksen appealed to their parishes in seeking a so-called /social peace service/ [in italics]. Already since 1964 the GDR has been acquainted with the function of Bausoldaten [construction soldiers] for those who have to join the army but don't want to bear arms. These Bausoldaten wear uniforms and are kept busy with military projects. In the past the latter were often military construction activities; at present they usually are functions in an infrastructure, such as provisions etc. The social peace service, which wants the young people mentioned, is a civilian duty, however, and is supposed to take place in health and welfare care. Bishop Johannes Hempel of Dresden, in whose diocese the young people live, listened to them, named their calling entirely evangelical and promised to bring up the matter at the next session of the synod. Before that took place, however, Secretary of State Klaus Gysi announced publicly that there was no possibility for that type of substitute military service. Nevertheless, the synod of Gustrow, which took place the week before last, supported the request of the youth by a great majority.

Already 3 years ago the Federation of Evangelical Churches fiercely opposed the introduction of military education which currently threatens to be expanded to secondary education. And last September the Federation unanimously adopted the statement of a peace seminar in which the military education of the East German youth was fiercely attacked. In the same statement a 1965 pronouncement of the evangelical churches was recalled in which the Bausoldaten service and conscientious objection were pictured as "a clear testimonial of the peace commandment of our Lord." The protests of the Federation had -- and still have -- a profound effect on the parishes, where military toys were recently burned during services as a symbolic action against the military education.

Of course some evangelic bishops in the GDR are more frank than others. Thus Bishop Werner Krusche of Magdeborg, who last week succeeded Bishop Schonherr of Berlin-Brandeburg as chairman of the Federation, gave a speech in Frankfurt am Main last December which not only must have been heard with bewilderment by the governments of both Germanies, but also by the majority of the [West] German bishops, both Roman Catholic and Evangelic. After a short analysis of the military-political situation in the world, comparable to that of the IKF, Bishop Schonherr [as published] asked whether the churches must let themselves be led exclusively by that which seemed politically feasible. "Is that which is realistic really only that which the government considers feasible? Is a rational policy only that policy which emanates from the ruling standpoints? Or should we, being the church, make it clear how realistic a peace policy could be which sticks to the promise of Jesus that the weak -- thus those who don't build on a policy of strength and threats -- will inherit the earth?" Bishop Heinrich Rathke of Schwerin recently even went so far as to accuse those who use the word "pacifist" as a swearword. "Pacifists must prepare for peace; we need such people," said Rathke.

Even if bishops of the Evangelical Churches in the GDR cannot always adjust to the tempo of their Theologic Study Division, it is fairly certain that they help propel the peace movement inspired by that division by word and deed, and that in so doing they exhibit a clearness which not only provides Christians in the Eastern bloc with some prospect, but also Christians in the West who find it difficult to believe that a peace movement is possible on the other side of the curtain. The spirit of peace blows where it wants to.

KANT'S PHILOSOPHY VIEWED AS 'SOURCE OF MARXISM'

Dresden SAECHSISCHE ZEITUNG in German 18 Sep 81 'WIR' Supplement p 2

[('Past and Current History' feature article by Prof Dr Siegfried Wollgast, Technical University, Dresden: "Prepared the Way for Dialectical Thinking — 200th Anniversary of Kant's 'Critique of Pure Reason'")]

[Text] Appearing in Riga in 1781 was a work by Koenigsberg philosophy professor Immanuel Kant, who had labored over the text for nearly 10 years. This "Critique of Pure Reason" seems to have appeared too "erudite" for many a reader of the time, so the author decided in 1783 to publish an interpretation of his principal work ("Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics"). Thus the second edition of the "Critique of Pure Reason" (in 1787) was the one that led to world renown for Kant, whose name commands the greatest respect to this day.

'German Theory of the French Revolution'

In terms of the philosophy of enlightenment, human reason is for Kant the standard by which (irrational) reality is measured. Kant critiques reason itself, examines its capacity, its limits.

Kant treats of bourgeois reason, which was directed against feudality in general and its ideology in particular. His interest therefore lies in a "free and public examination" of religion and its feudal laws.

In the process he comes to this conclusion: The existence of God cannot be proven. Kant refutes once and for all the so-called ontological proof of God in which theologists and philosophers had invested so much sagacity. This proof holds that the concept of the absolute being must of necessity embrace the existence of same; otherwise the absolute would be imperfect — would thus not be absolute. Kant destroys this sophistic argument by demonstrating that existence can never be "picked out" of the concept by itself. A hundred real talers — taken as a concept — cannot possibly comprise more than 100. But it makes a big difference whether I have them only in my head or in my pocket. Thus, the existence of God cannot be deduced from the existence of the concept of God; but God does not exist in our own experience, so his existence cannot be proven. It follows that theology, the doctrine that has made him its object, can make no claim to being scientific in nature.

Kant's attack on the altar also shook the throne, since the feudal rulers based their sovereign rights on the grace of God. Heinrich Heine held Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason" in high esteem precisely because of its religious criticism.

Karl Marx paid tribute to Kant's philosophy as a "German theory of the French Revolution," thus emphasizing the basic social and political orientation of the Kant critique. By characterizing it as a specifically German theory, he gives expression to the limits and inconsistencies — caused by Germany's backward conditions — of Kant's critique of religion and feudality, for this criticism remained confined to the framework of the theoretical and ideological. In clear contrast to the French materialists of the 18th century, the revolution in this instance is declared only for the world of ideas.

Power of Human Knowledge

The fundamental problem of classical bourgeois philosophy — the philosophy that ranges from F. Bacon and R. Descartes all the way to Hegel and Feuerbach — consists in this question: How can man gain a rational grasp of nature and society? This philosophy is based on the thesis of man's ability to grasp objective reality by virtue of his reason. And Kant, proceeding on the basis of mathematical knowledge but also differentiating from the philosophical rationalism and empiricism of his predecessors, sought in his "Critique of Pure Reason" a solution to the aforementioned fundamental problem, first in the theoretical sphere and then, in his "Critique of Practical Reason," in the practical realm.

Kant's theoretical philosophy is mainly concerned with developing his theory of knowledge. In the "Critique of Pure Reason" he breaks down the main question — how is scientific knowledge possible at all — into three subcategories: 1. How is pure mathematics possible? 2. How is pure natural science possible? 3. How is philosophy as a science possible?

Kant's intention here is to transform philosophy into a true (exact) science modeled after the mathematical sciences and to establish a correspondingly secure base for its presuppositions with regard to knowledge. Kant thus develops a series of dialectical determinants of the process of knowing and terms contradiction a necessary determinant of reason (knowledge).

Using these dialectical insights, Kant puts behind him the metaphysical methods of thinking, thus paving the way for development of the idealistic dialectic within classic bourgeois German philosophy. Marx noted in his "Feuerbach Theses" that it was to the credit of classical bourgeois philosophy that it had focused on the problem of man's activity in shaping his natural and social environment. Kant consciously initiated this process with his dialectical rendering of the problem of knowledge. For him there is no doubt that all knowledge begins with experience.

But what is experience, and how is it possible? Kant differentiates between observation and experience. Observational judgments have to do with individual, fortuitous and unconnected moments, while the empirical judgment expresses a causal relationship in which the observational moments appear to be linked. According to Kant, however, this linkage cannot already be existent in the observation itself; only understanding is able to connect the moments of observation. The way in which they are linked depends not on things, but solely on the forms of our perception. Kant declared these forms as existing "a priori." He thus assumes a "pure" knowledge that precedes any sensient experience, that makes it at all possible. Space and time are a priori, as well as concepts of understanding (categories).

Kant's Philosophical Compromise

Kant thus broke down man's power of mental comprehension and expressed it philosophically as a dialectical process. But for him, things in themselves cannot be known; if objective reality remains ultimately unknowable, reality is always perceived only in the way it looks to us through the prism of our forms of perception and understanding. Then, however, human understanding is also dictating its laws to nature.

Although Kant's analysis of the process of knowing revealed in a splendid way the active role of man's understanding, he was unable to grasp the true origin and the essence of these categories because of his ahistorical rendering of the subject of knowledge. Kant is forced to take refuge in agnosticism — in a (partial) state of the unknowable. This became a rallying point for criticism of Kant "from the right" and "from the left." V.I. Lenin gave a convincing explanation of this in his "Materialism and Empirical Criticism."

"The main feature of Kantian philosophy," noted V.I. Lenin, "is the reconciling of materialism with idealism, a compromise between the two, a linking of different kinds of contradictory philosophical schools of thought to one system. When Kant acknowledges that our ideas are something outside of ourselves, some kind of thing -in-itself, in this respect he is a materialist. When he declares this thing-in-itself to be unknowable, transcendent, otherworldly, he emerges as an idealist. By acknowledging experience, the sensibilities, as the sole source of our knowledge, Kant directs his philosophy toward sensualism and, under certain conditions, beyond sensualism to materialism as well. By declaring the a priori nature of space, time, causality, etc, Kant steers his philosophy in the direction of idealism."

Those Who Misrepresent Kant and Those Who Preserve His Legacy

This battle of ideas over the philosophical legacy of Immanuel Kant continues to this day. By way of Bernstein and the revisionism of the turn of the century, idealistic Neo-Kantianism made its way into the workers' movement, where it was used in an attempt to join Marx with Kant, or to replace Marx with Kant. These attempts have experienced a growing revival in the FRG since the 1960's. A prime example of the misrepresentation of Kant has been provided by Helmut Schmidt, the FRG chancellor, who boldly claims Kant as the theoretical basis for his politics and philosophy. Following in his tracks are influential ideologues of social reform (like P. von Oertzen, J. Steffen, K.D. Voigt and others) who seek to establish theoretical grounds for a "democratic socialism" using Kant and an — amputated — Marx.

As far as Marxism-Leninism is concerned, Kant belongs among the great figures in the history of the dialectic. It initiated the progress in philosophy that led from Fichte and Schelling to Hegel — in other words, to the development of the idealistic dialectic within classical bourgeois German philosophy. Indeed, this dialectic constitutes one of the three sources of Marxism. From this aspect, we too study and pay homage to Kant's principal work, the "Critique of Pure Reason."

INTENSIFIED IDEOLOGICAL PROPAGANDA IN EDUCATION URGED

Frankfurt/Main FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 26 Oct 81 p 4

[Text] The weekend edition of the SED central organ NEUES DEUTSCHLAND features on the frontpage, by text and pictures, Erich Honecker as the SED general secretary and Margot Honecker, minister for public education and chairperson of the now concluded fourth conference of the ministers for public education of socialist states. In the central committee building Erich Honecker acknowledged the report submitted to the Central Committee on the occasion of the 5-year anniversary of the central youth project, "FDJ Initiative Berlin." Within the scope of that initiative, reportedly, 355 construction projects were completed, more than 20,000 dwelling units among them. "A more and more beautiful Berlin," Honecker said, should continue to be the GDR's calling card, and only socialism could solve the housing problem.

The hard line in the GDR's educational policy, championed primarily by Margot Honecker, was expressed clearly in the concluding communique of the education ministers conference. The conference, so says the communique, resolutely rebukes all attacks on the socialist school and its principles; it condemns any attempts to depart from Marxist-Leninist school policy and replace it by bourgeois pluralism.

A teacher in the socialist school should be deeply imbued with the consciousness that he himself was a coshaper of a piece of the revolution. The ideological function of the socialist school in the revolutionary struggle was growing constantly. A teacher should have to be a resolute propagandist for the cause of the workers class and an implacable contender for Marxist-Leninist ideology and socialist morality.

Education Ministers' Communique

East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 24-25 Oct 81 p 3

[Excerpt from final communique issued by the socialist countries' education ministers at their fourth conference, East Berlin, 20-23 Oct 81]

[Excerpt] It now was the turn of the GDR capital Berlin to hold the fourth conference of the socialist countries' education ministers, from 20 to 23 October 1981.

That new states attended the fourth conference of the socialist countries' education ministers was eloquent testimony to the development and consolidation of the forces of socialism in the world of today.

The centerpiece of the deliberations on the subject, "the teacher and the socialist school today," held in a fraternal, frank and constructive atmosphere, lay in the following unanimous standpoints, realizations and conclusions:

It can be stated with satisfaction that the school in all the states attending the conference has become a fundamental coshaper of the revolutionary development of society. In our time, when the ruling circles in the United States and other imperialist countries for the sake of an insane arms race increasingly constrict their peoples' educational opportunities and peoples in many countries in the world are still denied their right to education, in all the states attending the conference a truly democratic educational system is developing, accessible to all children--even if, for historic reasons, still on unequal levels.

Experiences confirm the correctness of the Marxist-Leninist realization that in the process of the socialist revolution educational matters become critically important and their role grows to the extent that society develops further.

The struggle against illiteracy and for an educational system that is open to all citizens is a decisive step in the transformation of all society, in eliminating the consequences of colonialism and in establishing the socialist society. In this, the obligatory elementary school with a high general education level is an indispensable prerequisite for preparing all pupils for life, work and more advanced education. The form and duration of this obligatory elementary school depend on the given social conditions in any one country.

The teachers in our countries are summoned to solving a task of truly historic importance: to preparing the young generation well for fulfilling its revolutionary [illegible]es, the construction of socialism and communism, the defense of the socialist achievements, and the struggle for the happiness of the people and for their right to live in peace and not to be exploited. A teacher of the socialist school must be deeply imbued with the consciousness that he is coshaping a piece of the revolution.

The conference participants underscore that the ideological function of the socialist school in the revolutionary struggle is growing constantly and that a teacher has to be a resolute propagandist for the cause of the workers class and an implacable contender for Marxist-Leninist ideology and socialist morality in all fields of life.

A successful solution of this task is possible only if a teacher of the socialist school himself has a thorough Marxist-Leninist knowledge and is full of rich ideas, the power of conviction and the sense of a high social responsibility for the fate of a generation that is constructing socialism.

The education of school youth in our countries is a task that demands high civic consciousness, technical expertise and pedagogical skill of a teacher. On the political education and the quality and level of teacher training the successful advances of the socialist school depend. For that reason has the study of the social sciences a special rank in the education and training process at the teacher training institutions. Through social science study the future pedagogues are equipped with the Marxist-Leninist ideology and enabled to approach the manifestations of public life on a scientific foundation. It is indispensable for a teacher to grasp Marxism-Leninism as a key to an understanding of the world and not shy away from openly advocating his standpoint and work actively for peace and social progress.

The consolidation and further development of the educational system on a Marxist-Leninist foundation demands of a teacher to fight aggressively against any theories and practices of bourgeois ideology, anticommunism, anti-Sovietism, revanchism, neocolonialism and revisionism. That is particularly necessary in view of the increased attempts imperialism is making in gaining an ideological influence on the young generation.

The socialist school cannot stand apart from politics. The conference resolutely rebuffs any attacks against the socialist school and its principles and condemns the attempts to depart from Marxist-Leninist school policy and to replace it with bourgeois pluralism. The conference participants express their fraternal support for the Polish communists in the struggle for the defense of the socialist achievements and the further consolidation of a school genuinely socialist in type.

The growing tasks the school has to solve place higher demands on the pedagogical, methodological and technical training of the teachers. Along with the social science disciplines, an important role in solving these tasks attaches to pedagogics, psychology and methods training. The concern by the public education organs for further improving the teachers' training and advanced training levels in Marxism-Leninism, the technical sciences, pedagogics and psychology is increasingly becoming a key issue for the further successful development of the educational system.

From the high social responsibility of the teacher for successful socialist construction, for forming the new man, for the consolidation of peace and the friendship among the peoples stems the special attention the conference participants paid to the everyday political and social work of the teacher and his active participation in the political events and class struggles of our time. A teacher has to educate his pupils in the spirit of patriotism, of the love for their homeland, and of the respect for all peoples and their contribution to the progress of mankind, in the spirit of the mutual understanding among the peoples.

NEW REGULATIONS ON SCHOLARSHIPS OUTLINED

Budapest IFJU KOMMUNISTA in Hungarian No 8, 1981 p 42

[Article by Imre Vegvari, deputy chief of the KISZ CC's Department of Universities and Colleges, "College Scholarship."]

[Text] Since the 10th KISZ Congress, many questions have been received regarding the planned increase of university and college scholarships. Most questions deal with the reasons for the increase of scholarships. Many asked how the available 150 million forints would be distributed. (This sum also includes the increase of scholarships for both Hungarian students studying abroad and foreign students studying in Hungary.) The basic principles of the still valid scholarship system for full-time students at institutions of higher learning were laid down in 1967 and was introduced during the academic year 1969-70. The essence of this is that the financial support of university and college students depends on two factors. Social support is determined by family circumstances, income of the family wage earners, and the size of the income per capital family member; its monthly rate is 100 to 600 forints. Academic scholarship, which is also 100 to 600 forints, is determined mainly by grade average, and its exact sum is recommended by student collectives. In making their recommendation, they look at the relationship between the student's grades and his ability and the degree to which the student has taken part in communal, public, scientific, professional and social activities which are integral part of socialist professional training.

For good measure, we must mention the other large field of support, the so-called benefits in kind, meaning reduced rates for room and board. The present measure does not include this, since state subsidies here were compensated at the time of price increases. Returning to monetary support, the amount available for this purpose has not changed since 1970, reducing that amount by the additional costs resulting from the larger number of students. Even so, while in 1970, 70 percent of the students received social support, now only 50 percent of them do. A study, which would yield similar results, could also be conducted in the case of scholarships.

These were some of the facts which recently have led to the situation where more and more students have assumed jobs during the academic year. Since this work is often temporary (unloading freight cars, delivering newspapers, construction work) and is not related to their area of study, it can in no way be considered desirable. In addition, because of the decrease in real value of the scholarships, the differentiation among the individual students was very small, the local KISZ basic were not very serious in doing this kind of comparison, striving for egalitarianism. (There was no possibility and thus sense for differentiating between various student accomplishments.)

The KISZ called the attention to the problems several times, also initiating various solutions. The present increase in scholarships was planned for the second half of the Sixth Five-Year Plan; it was because of the KISZ that the measure was moved up by one or one-and-a-half years.

Regarding distribution, let it suffice to say that practically every student may express his opinion on this topic at this year's youth parliaments; final regulation will be based on this extensive debate, and practical implementation will begin in February 1982. Through the involvement of university and college KISZ leaders, the KISZ's own position will be also worked out; of course, this will also be put to an extensive debate.

Warsaw GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI in Polish No 43, 26 Oct 80 pp 4-6

[Text] The Polish Teachers' Union, as a general, independent, autonomous and self governing professional organization of education and scientific employees, is a representative, spokesman and defender of professional, social and economic interests of teachers, university teachers and education and science employees as well as retirees and pensioners and their rights to a continual improvement of living, working and wage conditions.

In acknowledging the leading role of the Polish United Workers' Party (PZPR) in the nation, the Union participates in the planning and implementation of the development of national education, science and culture and acts on behalf of national unity, strengthening of a common educational front and a front for the development of social democracy.

The Union stands on the groundwork of unity of fundamental goals and tasks of the professional movement in Poland and recognizes the need for ideological-programmatic and organizational unity within it. It [the Union] will initiate and develop comprehensive cooperation with other unions and branches on issues concerning the working majority and will strive to create a platform of cooperation between independent and self-governing branch trade-unions. In continuing the praiseworthy traditions of its 75-year old history and on the basis of achievements made until now, the Union acts as an ideologically involved organization, serves the realization of goals and social-educational and moral tasks consistent with the ideals of socialism, law and order and democracy.

Concern over a high social standing of teachers and scientific employees and creating of conditions for them so that they will have the authority, recognition and respect to which they are entitled is the basic goal of the ZNP.

The Union will constantly stand up for:

--complete enforcement of legally guaranteed rights in terms or presenting opinions and the defense of wide ranging employees rights and intersts;
--the effective development and observance of intraorganizational democracy as the basic principle of activity;
--respect, in echelons and elements, for the principle of wide representation of professional and social-existence interests of all professional groups, retirees and pensioners;
--strengthening unified activity of education, higher schools and science employees;
--expanding the social character of the movement.

I. Working and Living Conditions of Education, and Science Employees and Retirees and Pensioners

1) Financial Situation

A problem of basic importance is structuring salaries on a level which would correspond to the status of education and science employees in the country. The Congress is demanding from the government the preparation and implementation of a new system of salaries starting 1 September 1981, which would take into account the following principles:

-- the average earnings in the field of education are equal to the average earnings nationally;
-- the average salary of teachers is equal to the average salary of the engineering-technical cadre;
-- the average salary of university teachers and scientific employees is equal to the average salary of the engineering-technical cadre and management in industry;
-- the average salary of engineering-technical, administrative and service employees in the field of education and the higher school system and science equals analogically the average remuneration of groups employed in other divisions of the national economy.

The Congress insists on:

-- the development during 1981 of a principle of compensating workers' salaries and retirement and pension benefits in proportion to the increase in the cost of living;
-- starting January 1981, the introduction of the practice of continual computation of pensions and retirement benefits of former employees parallel to the salary increase of education and science employees and in proportion to the cost of living increases;
-- starting January 1982, the inclusion of all education and science employees in the institutional remuneration fund with the introduction of its computation starting January 1981.
-- by the end of 1980, working out a schedule for the introduction of anniversary rewards and bonuses for service performed by teachers and university teachers,
-- development, by the end of August 1982, of a concept of reducing the waiting period, for teachers and university teachers, of obtaining a higher and the highest level of principle pay.
-- from September 1982, including all teachers with over 24 years of professional service in a system of additional advances until the attainment of retirement age;
-- introduction, by the end of June 1981 of a system of priorities and financial incentives for teachers working or assuming work in rural areas;
-- introduction, at the beginning of the 1981/82 academic year of discounts on travel by PKS [State Motor Transport] for teachers commuting to work.

The Congress obligates the Main Board to a decided enforcement of:

-- binding decisions concerning the number of children in classrooms and pre-school sections;
-- better principles of granting bonuses for work performed under difficult, strenuous or health hazardous conditions (by the end of 1982);
-- decisions regarding the shortening of teachers' working time and that of teacher-educators and other employees (by the end of 1981);
-- new policies for overtime payment including education upbringing institutions which constitute a base for instruction and training in the system of teacher education (by the end of March 1981); -- introduction of reimbursement for hours of overtime during vacation periods according to a 10-month averagee (starting July 1981);

-- a record of all additional work and activities performed by teachers which are assigned by the employer as well as determining which of these services and the amount which should be reimbursed (by the end of 1981);
--introducing into practice of regulations which would standardize the outfitting of teachers with programs of instruction, textbooks, dictionaries and encyclopedias, writing supplies, tea, protective clothing, articles of hygiene (by the end of June 1981);
--the legal regulation of the matter of outfitting new teachers with a so called send-off kit, which would include, among other things, a set of teaching programs, manuals and methods guides.

ZNP echelons should demand the use in practice of the policy of promoting long-time employees to the highest salary level of the position held and, in particular, employees of pre-retirement age.

2) Housing Situation

The housing situation for education and science employees as well as for retirees and pensioners, especially teachers in rural areas and young scientific workers, requires quick, integral solutions. For this reason, development by ministries and acceptance by the government of a plan of providing for housing needs for the years 1981-1985 is necessary as is its consistent and full implementation. ZNP echelons are obliged to make a commitment regarding their participation in the development of integral solutions in this area and to enforce the monitoring of their implementation.

By the end of June 1981, a policy should be introduced whereby teachers, university teachers and scientific employees will be recognized as specialists vital to the economy and culture.

ZNP echelons and elements should together with administrative authorities care for:

-- the full and proper implementation of housing construction plans within the realm of national investments and particular care should be assigned to ensuring such a number of dwelling accomodations, wherever new education-upbringing institutions are being built, that would provide for the housing needs of employees;
-- strict observance of the policy of allotting premises vacated by education and science employees only to employees of such branches waiting for the allocation of housing as well as regulating of housing management with premises belonging to ministries of education and science;
-- increasing financial interest in and assistance for employees, retirees and pensioners who are purchasing or undertaking the building of one-family houses, by enabling them to obtain building lots and construction materials in short supply and by granting long-term credits in the maximum amount;
-- giving assistance in obtaining cooperative apartments and also in transacting agreements with provincial housing cooperatives in regard to assuming cooperative construction in small towns and rural parishes;
-- undertaking activity for the purpose of reassessing the policies of high, bank credit rates granted to education and science employees, retirees and pensioners for housing construction;

-- extracting reserves found in the possibilities of adapting former school buildings, purchasing and renovating of other buildings for housing and increasing the number of rotational houses under construction and apartments for academic faculty members and scientific employees.

3) Social Services

The Congress recommends the increase and better management of the social fund resources and in accordance with the needs of particular working communities, those of retirees and pensioners and also in accordance with a social sense of justice, the Fund ought to be used for the most socially justified purposes and the extent of assistance dependent on, among other things, the income level of one person in a working family. In particular, aid to the lowest income families should be increased, to mothers raising their children alone, young married couples, retirees and pensioners and to members of families of deceased employees.

The Congress obligates union echelons to increase supervision over the management of the institutional social fund with concern for its fair and efficient use. It obliges the Main Board to induce the adoption of the policy of computing the social fund on the basis of not two but five percent of the earnings of employees, postgraduate students, royalties as well as retirement and pension benefits of former education and science employees, starting from January 1981.

The Congress resolves:

-- to acknowledge from 1 January 1981 the right of every ZNP member to statutory benefits regardless of a spouse's analogical right and to increase statuatory benefits;
-- to create a special centralized, fellowship intervention fund for assistance to Union members;
-- to increase the amount of the union membership fee remitted by plant councils to departmental councils;
-- to obligate the Main Board to continue the policy of creating permanent capital expenditure values through the joint efforts of all ZNP members, especially in the form of sanatoriums, relaxation centers, teachers' centers;
-- to maintain the capital expenditure fund portion of the membership fee at the current level.

In accordance with the needs of employees, appropriate resources from the social fund should be allocated for the development of various forms of relaxation and recreation, for the continued expansion of a permanent and seasonal vacation base, and to ensure the improvement of standards as well as modernized and better equipped vacation centers.

The Congress is demanding the functional organization of employees', retirees' and pensioners' forms of relaxation and the reduction of its costs by among other things, decreasing to a minimum, service charges of intermediating travel enterprises and recommends the making of efforts to grant union branches appropriate authority in this area.

The implementation of services and providing for the social needs of employees, retirees and pensioners should be the responsibility of employee services acting under the collective control of the Union. In the instance where there is a lack of these services, the Main Board is obligated to induce their appointment by the end of 1980. Among the responsibilities of employee services should be the assuming of efforts for the improvement in supplying teachers, retirees and pensioners, primarily in rural areas, with articles of primary importance, heating and formation of communal nourishment on the principle of employee dining halls.

The Congress obligates the Main Board to constantly analyze social conditions on the basis of research results from the Union Center for Research on the Structuring of the Pay Scale and Costs of Living and to present proposals to appropriate agencies of the PRL [Polish People's Republic] Sejm and also to government authorities.

4) Legal Status and Protection of Law and Order

The Congress obliges the Main Board to submit by the end of 1980, proposals of changes in the Charter of the Rights and Duties of the Teacher and also to participate in amendment work and to strive to make favorable legal decisions, from the point of view of employees' interests.

Union echelons and elements should make full use of their legal and statutory rights in the area of controlling the interpretation of rules and law and order in working relationships, to oppose the breaking of law and order and interpretation of rules which is harmful to employees.

The Congress recommends:

-- expansion of various forms of legal assistance to employees, retirees and pensioners as well as improvement--especially at the fundamental level--of the system of investigating grievances and proposals reported to union and administrative authorities;
-- conducting periodic analyses and evaluations of the observance of agreements and in the instance that they are not observed--taking decided counteraction until personal consequences against those guilty are obtained.

5) Industrial Safety and Hygiene

The Congress obliges ZNP echelons to:

-- take definite stands with employers on issues of industrial safety and hygiene and also on the elimination of accident and health hazards;
-- increase their concern over the technical state and accomodations of buildings;
-- induce that employees be fully provided with means of protection and hygiene and also that uniforms be provided for school custodians free of charge;
-- constantly enforce, in practice, the principle that the managerial staff as well as all employees are equally responsible for safety and hygiene in the place of employment;
-- develop the activity of branches and the people's labor inspectorate and expand the supervisory functions of plant councils in this field.

The Main Board's Work Inspectorate will offer effective assistance to councils and to the People's Labor Inspectorate and will also consistently use its rights with the aim of exacting binding regulations from the administration.

6) Health Protection

The Congress obligates ZNP echelons and elements to a decided dvelopment of cooperation with appropriate ministries in the area of health care improvement for employees, retirees and pensioners.

Union activity should concentrate itself on:

-- supervision over the implementation of rights in the area of medical services; granting of sick leave; preventive-therapeutic services and a policy of compulsory, periodic physical examinations of employees;
-- cooperation in planning and controlling the use of the fund, for health assistance to all education employees;
-- assistance in conducting tests of the state of health of teachers and determining from the results indications of occupational diseases;
-- cooperation with local authorities in the creation of provincial specialistic outpatient clinics for education and science employees, retirees and pensioners on the principles of institutional health services;
-- striving for a significant increase in the number of referrals for health resort treatment, improving social conditions in its own medical centers, improving work organization in medical establishments and improvement of the quality of services performed.

7) Care for Retirees, Pensioners and Children

The Congress obligates school administration elements and ZNP echelons to:

-- be constantly concerned about the living and health conditions of retired employees, pensioners and their families;
-- continue efforts for the construction of retirement homes as well as for social assistance in the case of the chronically ill;
-- make proper allowances for the needs of retirees and pensioners in the area of social services;
-- take up efforts for the awarding of government and union distinctions;
-- create conditions for continued professional and social activity of retirees and pensioners.

Ensuring of care and relaxation during holiday vacations for children of education and science employees and assistance in admission to schools of all kinds should be of constant interest to ZNP echelons and elements. The resolutions of the Charter of the Rights and Duties of the Teacher should be strictly adhered to in the matter of following the principle of admitting children of teachers to schools, boarding schools and dormitories. Union departments are given the responsibility of systematically organizing various forms of assistance for children of ZNP members who are preparing to take examinations.

II. Professional Problems of Education, Higher Schools and Scientific Employees

1) Improvement of the System of Education and Upbringing

The Congress is demanding the following from governmental authorities:

-- creation of optimum conditions for continuous, general raising of the level of knowledge, culture and education of society;

-- urgent description of planning-organizational premises of the national education system, corresonding to the present and prospective social, economic and cultural needs of the country and the educational aspirations of our society;
-- creation of a uniform educational system which would assure complete permeability between particular types and levels of education in close association with continuing education.

The Congress obliges ZNP members, echelons and elements to active and partnership-like participation in consultations and the working out of optimal solutions for the educational system corresponding to the needs of society and the convictions of teachers in our country.

Education concerns the entire nation as well as elements of a socialist society and for this reason the Congress is insisting that appropriate financial, personnel and organizational conditions be ensured along with the projected changes.

Along with continuing work on a model of national education, the Congress considers the following to be essential:

-- making high standard kindergartens common for all 6 year-olds in urban areas as well as in rural communities and considerably accelerating the construction of pre-school centers in order to lower the number of children in departments and to encompass all children with pre-school care in accordance with social needs;
-- rapid construction of schools in new, urban housing communities, continuation of the construction and expansion of collective rural parish schools and elimination of overcrowding in school departments;
-- solving the problem of transporting students to school by the end of 1981 and ensuring proper care for them;
-- ensuring highly qualified teachers for all institutions and especially for rural areas through, among other things, the introduction of appropriate financial and moral incentives;
-- increasing the number of awards of distinction and orders for education employees;
-- guaranteeing students and teachers sufficient amounts of textbooks and reading material as well as educational equipment;
-- the effective increase of means for the current functioning of schools and education-upbringing institutions;
-- considerable support and creation of conditions by education and union authorities for the effective development of innovation, expediency and pedagogical progress.

The Congress obliges the Main Board to organize a Teachers' Sejm [Parliament] in order to establish the Union's position on the issue of a national education system.

The Congress obliges ZNP echelons and elements to participate in the creation of the most favorable conditions for the functioning of education and science as well as ensuring optimal capital investment solutions, effective staff and funds management and conducting constant social supervision over them.

The Main Board is obligated to induce the carrying out by the Main School Inspectorate, of a study on the situation of collective rural parish schools in terms of the base, equipment and working conditions and present the obtained results to the Union.

2) Training Teachers and Improving Their Professional Skills

The Congress is demanding the urgent development, by the ministries of Education and Upbringing as well as Science, Higher Schools and Technology, through close cooperation with the Polish Teachers' Union, of the system of educating and perfecting teachers, which [system] will correspond in its form and substance to the needs of schools and teachers.

The Union is in favor of:

-- educating teachers in two specializations and making it [education] more practical;
-- increasing the proportions of enrollment in day studies, extension courses, evening courses in the field of beginning teaching and pre-school instruction;
-- developing a system of orientation and recruitment of youth into the field of teaching through, among other things, the proper guidance of liberal arts secondary schools;
-- an unequivocal definition of rights and benefits for teachers attending school (reduced working hours, paid vacations, rewards);
-- linking teacher enrichment with a system of moral and financial incentives (e.g., levels of qualification);
-- the rapid implementation of teachers' demands concerning changes in the substance, methods and forms of pedagogical counseling;
-- working out of objective criteria for the evaluation of teachers' work;
-- continuing cultural-educational Union activity conducive to the integration of districts, creating varied forms of developing teachers in their profession, their hobbies and artistic talents as well as satisfying their needs in the area of recreation, sports and tourism;
-- improvement of ideological-pedagogical union activity;
-- developing methods of adaptation for young teachers and scientific workers in their profession;
-- ensuring proper social conditions of colleges for teachers taking extension courses and providing them with sufficient textbooks, lecture material and educational material;
-- inclusion in the process of teacher education and improvement of the most valuable teaching staff in colleges and, particularly, outstanding teaching professionals and methods instructors of particular subject areas.

3) Science and the Higher School System

Science and the higher school system exert a vital influence on the development of the national economy and culture. Taking this into account, the Congress is demanding:

-- more complete adaptation of scientific research, higher school system activity and scientific-research institutes to the needs of socio-economic development of the country and, in particular, of industry, agriculture and culture;
-- systematic updating of the higher school system with consideration given to all conditions which determine its prospective structure;

-- modernization of teaching methods in higher schools based on the constant use of activating methods, entrusting pedagogical functions in colleges to exceptionally talented individuals, using a multifactorial system of evaluating university teachers, supporting research which improves teaching methods;
-- assigning high importance to the teaching functions of the university teacher;
-- increasing the educational role of the teaching process and self-educating work of students;
-- developing a system which would ensure candidates for scientific work of the obtainment of high essential and methodological qualifications;
-- raising the qualifications of adults on the basis of non-institutional, self-educational forms of this process;
-- making the use of higher school cadres and the scientific-technical base of industry, a common practice in teaching upbringing work;
-- popularizing new forms of academic instruction, tested in practice, which make it possible to join theory with practice;
-- working out through consultations with the Union of regulatons: in regard to the higher school system, the Polish Academy of Sciences and scientific research institutes, which would restore the proper rank and independence to higher schools and scientific institutions;
-- improving and updating higher school management, which expresses itself through, among other things, the referral of school matters to selected rectors and deans as well as giving back greater authority to school self-government.

4) Guidance of Education and Science

The Congress considers the following to be essential:

-- forming a system of coordination and management of the liberal arts, professional and higher school system;
-- reactivating and utilizing, in practice, the principle of autonomy of scholars, particularly, in terms of appointing, by way of election, rectors, deans and institute directors;
-- carrying out of an appropriate staff policy, especially when entrusting managerial positions in schools and scientific-research institutions to highly qualified persons with organizing capabilities, an involved civic attitude, high authority and respect in the community;
-- creating for the management of educational establishments, colleges and institutes, better conditions and opportunities for carrying out their basic functions by, among other things, counteracting excessive reportorial-administrative and other responsibilities not related to the process of education and organization of scientific research.

The Congress obliges the Main Board to urgently make its appearance before the chairman of the Council of Ministers with the proposal of eliminating the limit on full-time positions for teachers, engineering-technical workers, school workshops and administration in educational establishments as well as the adoption of a policy which would define the extent of employment in relation to the number of departments and compulsory amount of scheduled teaching hours.

III. Organizational Activity

1) Union Self-Government and Democracy

The basic obligation of echelons and elements is to strengthen independence and self-government of union organization as an indispensable condition for effective activity. The Union assumes an autonomous position, independent of administration and one which expresses the opinions and interests of members, in all professional and employee related matters.

The Union obliges all union echelons, as spokesmen and champions of employees' rights and interests, to decidedly make use of, in their work, the rights to which they are entitled and in justified cases to take advantage of the right of dissent towards decisions of administrative authorities in the form of a statute guaranteed by regulations regarding trade unions.

The Congress is in favor of:

-- expanding and strengthening the function of intraunion democracy;
-- observing the democratic process of electing trustees to fulfill union functions;
-- introducing a fixed rate of remuneration for social chairmen of plant councils;
-- evaluating the work of echelons by members;
-- creating organizational structures enabling particular groups to represent their opinions and defend their interests;
-- guaranteeing of proper representation with union authorities for all working groups and for retirees and pensioners as well;
-- expanding and strengthening consultative and advisory functions of union chapters and ensuring for them the opportunity of functioning in accordance with statutory rights;
-- strengthening the autonomy and responsibility of plant councils as comanagers of education and science in the region of their activity;
-- expanding the role of union echelons in making decisions on issues of education and upbringing, settling employee related matters, assigning of tasks, evaluating, distinguishing, awarding and distributing of services;
-- strengthening the program and organization of ZNP echelons and elements;
-- creating conditions conducive to the effective work of problem solving committees and professional chapters in union echelons;
-- expediting intraunion information as an indispensable element for the recognition of issues and problems pervading particular working environments and retirees and pensioners, an element for the proper formation of opinion and making optimal union and administrative decisions;
-- a more effective use of GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI, of union periodicals and publications in presenting the opinion of ZNP members;
-- futher continuation of favorable traditions of ZNP's cooperation with social organizations, the Polish People's Army [LWP] and institutions interested in matters of education, science and the teaching profession.

2) Finances and Management

Financial and management activity of ZNP echelons and branches should ensure financial conditions for the realization of goals and statutory tasks.

The Congress obliges:

-- efficient and economical management of union funds with particular consideration given to the needs of plant councils in rural parishes and smaller communities;

-- improving the activity of the ZNP Pedagogical and Social Services Center (by, among other things, calling together of management on the central level and improving local branch systems) as well as reinforcing its function of providing for professional and social needs of education and science employees and retirees and pensioners;
-- efficient management of assistance-loan funds and ZNP credit assistance funds, with particular consideration given to the needs of large families, young married couples, retirees, pensioners, teachers attending school and persons beginning professional work.

The Congress obliges ZNP echelons to:

-- protect and augment financial holdings and also to reclaim union possessions [objects] taking into account deadline dates determined by legal rules;
-- development of social investments, especially those intended for sanatorium and preventive treatment, relaxation after work, sports, tourism, pedagogical self-improvement and cultural-educational activity;
-- development of a long-range plan of investment activity and monitoring its implementation.

3) Research on the Teaching Profession and the Teachers' Union Movement

The Congress obliges the Main Board to assume initatives and definite action concerning the carrying out of research on crucial problems of the teaching profession, its needs, aspirations and social functions.

Research on the history of the teachers union movement should be continued and expanded, especially in terms of covert education and science and the martyrdom of teachers and education employees during the Nazi occupation and also Union activity during World War II. The bringing about and publication of a synthesis of ZNP events and history between 1905-1980 is indispensable.

ZNP echelons and their historical committees should inspire, support and propagate research work on the history of teachers and educational unions, development of science and education in Poland, participation of teachers in creating national culture in the past 75-year period, as well as encourage academic employees to take up this subject matter in students' Master's theses and doctoral as well as post-doctoral degree dissertations.

It is indispensable that extensive popularizing action be carried out, which presents to society the history of the struggles and work of teachers, of education and science employees and union activists on behalf of Polish schools and its [history's] progressive and democratic form.

4) International Activity

The Congress is in favor of active participation in the international teachers' and academic movement which should serve the exchange of information and experience and the strengthening of the solidarity of teachers and science employees.

It is the obligation of the Union to actively participate in the world peace movement, to support initiatives of eliminating tension and conflicts and strengthening peaceful coexistence.

The Congress obliges all union echelons and elements, on the basis of the above program and proposals submitted during the report-election campaign and the postualates of particular working communities, retirees and pensioners presented during the pre-Congress period, to develop a detailed plan for its [the program's] implementation.

The Congress concurs that this program is open in character, thus making it possible for ZNP echelons and elements to take into account initiatives and local proposals which enrich its substance and forms of implementation.

Warsaw October 1980

Resolution of XIII National ZNP Congress

Warsaw GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI in Polish No 43, 26 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] The XIII National Congress of ZNP Delegates is proceeding under conditions of intense renewal of our socio-political and economic life. It marks new meanings, forms and methods of Union work which lead to the strengthening of independence and self-government of echelons and elements, decided protection of the rights of employees, retirees and pensioners, their right to the continual improvement of working and wage conditions, supervision over the observance of law and order in working relationships, involved activity for the improvement of working conditions in schools, learning institutions and scientific-research establishments, raising the authority of teachers and scientific workers in society.

The XIII National Congress of ZNP Delegates concurs that teachers, despite severe shortages and neglect in the areas of education, upbringing and science, participated unselfishly in the realization of their professional and civic responsibilities.

The Congress extends words of deep appreciation to education and science employees who, in support of the just goals of the working class, kept vigil by workshops in the care of children and youth.

In acknowledging the constitutional role of the Polish United Workers' Party in the nation, the Polish Teachers' Union is decidedly in favor of continued consistent expansion of socialist democracy, development of irreversible guarantees of truly socialistic forms of democracy and preservation of ideological unity in the professional movement.

The Congress is turning to all ideological-upbringing organizations, to teachers' union organizations, ministries and institutions for the joining of efforts on behalf of improving the preparation of youth for life and work in service to the country.

After hearing a report-programmatic paper of the Main Board and following extensive discussions, the XIII National Congress of ZNP Delegates:

-- accepts the report and lecture paper of the Main Board and the Main Audit Commission on ZNP activity during the years 1976-1980;

-- approves the program of activity of the Polish Teachers' Union for the 1980-1983 period;

-- decides upon a temporary statute of the Polish Teachers' Union.

The Congress obliges the Presidium of the Main Board, on the basis of an approved program of activity, proposals submitted during the report-election campaign and also the demands of working communities, retirees and pensioners, presented during the pre-Congress period as well as proposals of echelons and members referred to the Congress, to work out a detailed plan of its [the program's] implementation and to present it for approval to the ZNP Main Board.

The XIII National Congress of Delegates resolves:

-- to hold another election of plant and departmental councils in accordance with the wishes of Union members and the ZNP statute;
-- to hold elections of delegates to district ZNP congresses and elect district ZNP boards;
-- to elect delegates to the next XIV ZNP National Congress which should be held in a matter of 6 months;
-- hold elections in chapters functioning alongside ZNP echelons;
-- organize and conduct a discussion on the provisional ZNP statute.

The ratified program may be reassessed by the XIV National Congress of ZNP Delegates.

The Congress is turning to all education and science employees, retirees and pensioners; to all union echelons, elements and branches; to members of the Polish Teachers' Union with the appeal that they not spare efforts for the implementation of the adopted program, in the name of the earnest implementation of vital social-existence and professional issues of all education and science employees, retirees and pensioners.

PLAN FOR FUTURE POLISH SCHOOL DESCRIBED

Warsaw AYCIE WARSZAWY in Polish 6 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Zbigniew Bubien: "The Wroclaw School of the Future"]

> [Text] Eight years ago, a group of young college graduates from Wroclaw led by the now, Docent Dr Habilitatus Ryszard Lukaszewicz, decided to develop a comprehensive plan or a school of the future--a school whose graduate would not be merely a passive "seeker of acceptance", a person accepting only that which is acceptable and accepting only those who are accepted. A graduate of the Wroclaw school of the future will be an individual raised in the spirit of cooperation, convinced of the personal effect on the course of events with an independent personality which is capable of thinking alternatively. It is cooperation and not competition which is one of the characteristics of the Wroclaw school of the future. The second guiding principle is to study to be educated and not to have an education.

The Wroclaw plan is one of the possible visions of a school of the future; a vision 15-20 years ahead of the recently planned reform whose "quiet burial" we witnessed several months ago. Research studies on the plan are being conducted by a 15 member interdisciplinary planning group in constant cooperation with approximately 60 representatives of many academic disciplines from the entire country.

How, then, will the school of the future differ from a "traditional school"? There will be many differences. I can assure those who perhaps will not agree with the "madness" of the plan, that its originators are not charlatans but scholars who have devoted eight years of volunteer work to this end, attracting many outstanding representatives of the Polish academic community. The fact that their plan was being met with minimal interest from former education dissidents is, I believe, related to its present state.

The plan envisages abandonment of the classroom-lesson system which implies abandoning the constant division of student work into units of lessons, stages, years; abandoning the division into similar in age classroom groups and the principle of teaching monodisciplinary subjects. Instead, they propose:

-- that the division of student work be flexible and the time norms varied depending on the assignment being worked on. A student taking on an assignment will know how much time he has to complete the assignment. The amount of time will not be rigorously enforced. As a result of such division, annual grade promotions will be eliminated and replaced by the concept of task [assignment] promotion; i.e., the crediting of assignments will determine academic progress;

-- in accordance with the assumptions of the plan, a student's workplace ought to be easily modified depending on the presented assignment;

-- the separation of students into groups should be based on the assignment being worked on at the given time. These groups will have a cooperative character. Those with a common interest will be united in the work of one group under the guidance of an instructor specializing in the given field of study.

The selection and structure of the teaching content is already in the final phase of realization; it will be based on two principles. The first is the system of main concept categories rather than the traditional ones. For example, the subject of transportation will contain elements from previous subjects such as physics, mathematics, chemistry, etc. Concepts of those academic disciplines which will integrate knowledge of this subject, will find a place in this subject category. Therefore, a system of concept networks will develop from which it will be possible to isolate in an, as if to say, recurring manner, a complex of information corresponding to, for example, a physics program up to and including the class of secondary school certificate candidates. The second principle: in the realization of each topic, students should be aware of the goals for which knowledge is acquired. Thus, the teaching program will be made up of assignment blocks which will integrate the essence of various academic disciplines.

Naturally, a situation may occur where, for one reason of another, a student will have to change schools. Therefore, a certain parellelism must be maintained with traditional schools in the work speed and teaching content.

According to the concept of the Wroclaw school of the future, children will commence studies in this school already at age 5. They will come to school on their birthday. This is not meant to be some sort of a ritual, although, it might be pleasant for the child to have this day marked by a celebration. Something else is of importance. A lot of attention needs to be devoted to 5 year-olds and it can be managed even when 40 children suddenly appear in school. Each child should be acknowledged, evaluated as to what he already knows, what he is like in terms of social contact, what his cultural shortcomings are. This is possible when a teacher has a group under his care of no more than 15 children. Why from age 5? This is psychologically substantiated. Approximately at this time, a new phase in the development of the child begins: in his thinking, actions, in social processes. During the sixth year of life, a certain regression takes place in the development of all children, a so called, bottomless pit of 6 year-olds.

This first period of time spent in school will have an adaptational character and will last approximately 2 years. The youngest students in the school will enjoy a certain autonomy expressed in such an arrangement of space so as to permit them to find their own place for playing and rest and which will guarantee them a feeling of security. These will be interior open spaces. During this first phase, creative activity is stressed around three concepts: sound, motion and word.

The second phase, called play-learning will last 3 years. The creators of the plan believe that the transition from play to studies must occur naturally. There will be no classroom but rather class management--the transitional form between kindergarten and school.

The third, lasting several years, and last phase of school will be a learning-productive period. Learning, based on solving presented tasks is a continuation of studies from the two previous periods. However, the term, productive, needs to be explained. The authors of the plan feel that young people should have the opportunity for longer or shorter trials of becoming familiar with or even of assuming work in various places: factories, hospitals, offices, etc. The point here is to avoid making a choice of specialization or work "in the dark".

The period of adaptation and play-learning will be based on the natural, so called, primitive bonds of students. In time, purely task groups will form as a result of the type of task performed.

A separate problem is the construction of a school whose architecture would correspond to the plan as a whole, to the methods and goals of upbringing and education in the school of the future. This is not a matter of something super modern, of the glass and aluminum type, but of a school which would be universal and not only meant for this project. Architects cooperating with the Wroclaw planning group have already developed such a plan. The school building will not be fenced in. In the school of the future, there will be an information-instruction center: library, reading-rooms, places for individual work, catalogs, thesauri of information, audio-visual aids, duplicating machines. Around the center, seminar rooms will be situated in various spots, which can be made smaller or enlarged by connecting with others. Each of these rooms can accomodate 10-15 persons. In place of the old assembly hall (locked in many schools and opened on "special occasions") a forum is proposed--a meeting place for the entire school and a place for the exchange of ideas. The school forum with back-up facilities and an amphitheatre will be a place for showing films and presentations of drama students.

As in some traditional schools, so in the school of the future, there will also be a series of laboratory-workshops: art, music, physics, etc. The school hall will be a place for the exposition of artistic work of not only students but also of guest artists. Members of school organizations will find a place for themselves in club rooms. A swimming pool, gym as well as a place for large construction of, for example, sailboats, complete the list of school accomodations. Around the school, there will be a "battle field", in other words, a playground with a difference however, in that it will not be cement or asphalt.

The preparation of teachers for work in this school is also a constituent element of the new vision of a school of the future. There will be about 50 of them [teachers] for approximately 420 students. Specialized subject teachers--mathematicians, Polish language and literature teachers, physicists, etc. will go through a 2-year program of post diploma studies after college graduation. At that time, they will learn work methods of this school and at the same time, they will participate, in a practical sense, in the entire series of plans which are already being implemented in part in some Wroclaw schools and kindergartens.

The second method of preparing teachers for the needs of this school would depend on isolating the experimental process of pedagogical studies and including a specially written plan of studies also containing information from the field of general pedagogics. If the first group of subject teachers fulfills the assumptions of the substance of teaching, then the fundamental task of the second group would be upbringing.

The third group of teachers are practitioners--persons for whom teaching in the school is really going well, who obtain excellent educational results. As a rule, these are teachers who are extremely popular with their students.

Is this in the near or distant future? Up to the present time, instructional and general educational assumptions have already been worked out for the Wroclaw plan of a school of the future. The detailed concept of teaching methods is in its final phase while the system of its contents [tresci] is half prepared.

Overlooking financial considerations, although these are also important, the practical implementation of this plan could already be started in 4 years under favorable conditions. During 8 years of work, not a single consultation to discuss the merits of the plan took place between the ministry representatives and the planning team. A lack of clear-cut decisions by the Ministry of Education and Upbringing in regard to the undertaking of this experiment hinders work on the school of the future. "Originally I had thought that"--remarks the planning group leader, Docent Dr Habilitatus Ryszard Lukaszewicz, "if the ministry is not saying no, then that already is significant and many things can be done." But in the moment which we are approaching, some sort of decision must be made because this structure which will be built in the area of Wroclaw, within the framework of a normal school network, requires approval for an individual plan as well as approval for the experimental implementation of the school plan.

Until December of last year, the education authorities referred to the plan of the Wroclaw school of the future with skepticism. According to the authors of the plan, the misgivings of the education authorities result from a fear of losing comprehensive control over the school system as well as from a reluctance to experiment.

Many persons interested in the problem of education have doubts whether the plan for the school of the future stands a chance of success. Several elements in this plan whose principles I have presented in a very general manner, can only be proven through their practical implementation--something that the authors themselves admit. In this sense, this will be a school-laboratory. Unfortunately, an answer to the question--to what extent this experiment will be successful, cannot be determined by any academic discussions.

SOCIOLOGY FACE TO FACE WITH SOCIO-HUMAN REALITIES

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 17, 5 Sep 81 pp 7-12

[Article by Petru Panzaru of the "Stefan Gheorghiu" Academy: "Sociology Face to Face With Socio-Human Realities;" written with regards to Achim Mihu's article in ERA SOCIALISTA No 12,1981 "Values and Limits in Current Romanian Sociology"]

[Text] We can finally say that "the ice has been broken." A serious and long-awaited and needed discussion about the status and current duties of Romanian sociology began with ERA SOCIALISTA's publication of the articles signed by Achim Mihu and Vasile Miftode.

Thus, we have taken the repeated advice of the party and comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, who said that "science can only develop through a free confrontation of opinions and ideas. Certainly, especially in the field of the social sciences, there are and there will inevitably appear theses and opinions that can be discussed and criticized. We should not be afraid of this; the main fear and main danger are in not carrying out research activities because of the fear of making a mistake, just copying what others do."

It is clear that a subject of research, reflection and discussion can be the status, level of development and the values and limits of a science itself, in this case with regards to sociology and psycho-sociology, with the discussion capable of bringing about a more adequate understanding of their place and mission in Romania's economic-social, political and cultural affairs. It can also bring about an increase in their contributions, together with all the other sciences about man and society, to the achievement of the truly complex objectives of the new stage of creating a multilaterally developed socialist society, as they were defined in the documents of the 12th Party Congress and in comrade Nicolae Ceausescu's speech at the Second Congress of the Workers Councils (June 1981). And, in the center of all economic-social activities during the current stage, which also requires the contributions of the social sciences, the party has placed the achievement of a new quality in work and life, the broad application of the advances of technical-scientific revolution, the powerful development of science and education - fundamental factors for creating the new order, and the raising of the professional and cultural levels of all the workers.

It is not risky or "pro domo" to say that, especially during the last decade, as a result of the decisions of the Ninth Party Congress regarding "the reinstatement" of sociology's natural rights and the resumption of the rich and original research from the pre-war era on a new level, sociology in Romania (regarded as having an inseparable and organic relationship with psycho-sociology) has had appreciable results which, when speaking of theoretical, methodological or purely didactic contributions, are still awaiting an intrinsic evaluation, and, when speaking of the conclusions of certain specific regional investigations or investigations in industrial economic units, agricultural units, cultural institutions and so forth, are still awaiting implementation. It is worth noting that in the last decade in the quasi-totality of the country's counties, under the guidance of the party organs and organizations or at the request of different economic-social and cultural units, specific sociological and psycho-sociological research was carried out on a greater or lesser scale that was partially or not at all given publicity and, thus, sufficiently unknown on a national scale.

It is truly the time to concentrate our attention and analysis, as Achim Mihu and Vasile Miftode did, on those elements and factors, be they "within" sociology and psycho-sociology or outside of them, which unjustifiably delay the full use of these possibilities, the growth of their contribution to the understanding and resolution of the problems facing our society and their employment in essential areas that have been avoided until now, such as, for example, the area of literary and artistic creative work, literary critique and the area of international relations.

In order to more clearly outline the need to discuss the "status" of sociology and psycho-sociology in Romania, as a condition for the proper flow of future research, I will paraphrase a statement of a renown literary critique: when sociologists argue, sociology moves ahead; when they are all in agreement, sociology stagnates.

Certainly, sociology cannot be constructively critical (one of the conditions for being a science) without being constructively self-critical (one of the conditions of being aware of the times).

Sociology "is carried out" in laboratories, research centers, in faculties, in the field among human collectives in industrial, agricultural, commercial, transportation, cultural-educational units and so forth, and there should no longer be any need "to discuss" sociology in the pages of magazines and books - a possible and probable objection implicitly and explicitly convincingly rejected by the preceding articles. The climate in which sociology lives and coexists with other sciences, the specific functions that it has to carry out in the family of social-political and humanist sciences and the chances for development and broader social use of its products, both the theoretical ones and those stemming from specific regional, local or microsocial investigations, are real subjects for discussion which themselves dispel any objections or frequently encountered reservations of certain institutionalized sociologists regarding a confrontation of open, broad, multilateral and specific opinions on the manner in which sociology "is carried out" today in Romania, regarding the stage that it has reached and regarding the mentalities, views and attitudes that nourish it, "undernourish" it, favor it or put it at a disadvantage.

In order to have a full validation of the functions of sociology and a scientific understanding and explanation of the new social phenomena on the national and international levels and of its tasks in contributing to the practical achievement of the programmatic objectives of the new stage that socialism has entered in our country, it seems of primary and maximum importance to me to exactly circumscribe its subject matter and its allied relationships with the other social and political sciences. This means, on one hand, not confusing or substituting, either in didactic activities or in actual scientific research activities, sociology with sociological theories and doctrines or with sociological investigative methods and techniques and, on the other hand, understanding and using them, not for the purpose of being intellectually "photogenic" or avoiding reality, but exclusively for the purpose of creating a theoretical-epistemological and methodological "arsenal" necessary for investigating national social realities at the global, regional and local levels within the context of current international relations.

To clearly distinguish the subject matter of sociology as a science of current social realities and as the subject matter of the history of sociological doctrines, systems and theories, means placing yourself on the path of directly studying social affairs and not the proposals of diverse authors regarding a radical social existence and accepting the synthetically-formulated just idea put forth by Achim Mihu that sociology "studies the social actions of people who constitute the existing society" and that the subject matter of sociology is "the analysis of the notional peculiarities of the social fabric." Vasile Miftode similarly presents the problem when he writes correctly that "the social evaluation of a science - and this fact is even more valid in the case of sociology - depends upon the manner in which it is involved and makes its presence known in the solution of certain problems stemming from the affairs and the practice of developing our society." Finally, with good reason Grigore Zanc asks our sociologists and the specialized sociological and politological magazine VIITORUL SOCIAL "to become more directly and efficiently involved in the solution of the problems facing socialist society and the contemporary world" (TRIBUNA, No 28, 9 Jul 81, p 5).

When sociology is predominantly presented as a succession of sociological theories (doctrines), then it appears as a "science" that summarizes that which is known and the sociologist appears as a "talking bibliogrpahic index." Clearly, contemporary sociology, as a science that wants to have the most complete view of social realities, cannot exist and cannot achieve its gnosiological, explicative, predictive and practical functions except under conditions where, to begin with, its professionals critically assimilate and selectively use the valuable earlier national and foreign theoretical findings. And, "to carry out" sociology means studying current social realities and not leaving yourself to merely present sociological theories and doctrines, as is frequently done in so-called "Introductions to Sociology." Therefore, we must have a resulting distinction between the research sociologist who carries out sociology and the sociologist who teaches sociology: the first gives priority to making statements about surrounding social events and realities; the latter normally composes statements about the pronoucements of other authors, quotes them, comments on them and so forth, spreading the knowledge of them or teaching them.

The purpose of a so-called sociological text is not to communicate to the reader how many books the author read or wrote, but how he presents and interprets, with the help of different authors, immediate social-human realities and the affairs of people, groups and society. "The review," or more precisely, the scientific analysis of life and not literature about social affairs must decisively be given first priority, and, I repeat, without creating an artificial opposition between the text and the context. The specialized bibliographies must be critically reviewed through and by the "bibliography" of real life.

We must firmly and explicitly reserve our consideration and public respect only for those sociologists who effectively broaden the limits of scientific knowledge about our society, offer valuable suggestions for the improvement of social activities, produce thorough, substantial books, studies and research papers containing original elements and having broad interdisciplinary openings in which the ideas and points of views of the authors in Romania are discussed with interest and on a priority basis, complete specific investigations in their own or collective works, communicating the most significant results in adequate and accessible forms, make efforts so that the majority of these works can be transformed from works "for internal use" into works "for foreign use" and participate in discussions and confrontations regarding ideas, being true agitators in the country's cultural and spiritual affairs, generally through their continuing presence in journalism.

There is an abuse of the terms science and scientific. Let us be clear: Is (it must be) scientific sociology or the science of sociology (as well as other socio-human sciences) anything else but a group of statements having a certain degree of coherent generality from a logical point of view referring to a specific historical social reality and especially having a high degree of truth and correspondence with the reflected realities and their essence? These statements cannot and must not be foreign to or removed from the review and checks of all the representatives of the social sciences and especially the reviews and checks on behalf of the daily social practices of millions of people.

The truth is the superordinate category of the sciences in general and, as a result, of the sociohuman sciences, including sociology and psycho-sociology. It would be a mistake to underestimate the particular nature and difficulties of discovering, formulating and socializing the sociological and psychological truth. The subjects of these sciences are human subjects and the activities and relationships between them under objective, specific historical social conditions. It is said that "the truths lies in deeds," but we must immediately add that "the truth lies in recognizing events," keeping in mind that it is basically the connection between statements and complex and contradictory social-human realities. On the path from objective (overall, bare) social events to the truth (statements) about them, many dangers crop up.

Today, the sociologist, as well as the persons who sincerely want to benefit from the results of his work in research and discovery regarding the social truth, must be warned that in the social-human sphere there are many types, degrees or "stages" of reality and events that directly or indirectly serve as subjects for scientific research (sociological research) and that cannot be confused without the risk of avoiding or falsifying the truth: 1) the existence of an objective, so-called social-human (and natural) reality in the strictest acceptance of the term, a primary, fundamental and essential factual reality, a reality of the "first degree;" it is social life itself as such with all its components and determining factors; 2) the existence, then, of a specific social reality, let us say of a "second degree," an objectively subjective reality (secondary) composed of words (statements) about the primary reality and about events; it is a cognitive reality created from the language at the level of social and individual awareness, scientific knowledge and common awareness, with its variable degrees of adequacy for objective reality; 3) finally, the existence of a socio-intellectual "reality" of the "third degree" ("tertiary") created from "words about words" (statements about statements, opinions about opinions, theories about theories and so forth). Not confusing (substituting) and not isolating these types and degrees of social-human "realities" allow us to see the skill and rigors of sociological and psychological investigations in their entirety and their values of truth.

In conclusion, I must state in a preemptory manner that the subject matter of scientific sociology, in general, is living, specific, current social-human REALITY itself viewed in all its dimensions and correlations in a systematic, integrated and dynamic manner. And, the subject matter of Romanian sociology represents the study of social realities (activities, relations, events, phenomena, processes, contradictions, institutions) in our country in the context of the contemporary era and the "in vivo" study of micro- and macrosocial interations and all the areas of our social affairs.

The problems of contemporary Romanian sociology are the problems of our socialist society on the way to multilateral development, under especially complex international conditions.

There are confusions and reductions that should be dispelled instead of being maintained. Not infrequently sociological and psycho-sociological research or investigations are identified and reduced to the elaboration, application and processing of certain questionnaires sprinkled with dozens of questions having hundreds of response variations. Between the researcher and his subjects thousands of words intervene, words that are recorded on standard mailbox forms, which frequently mortify or schematicize living, diverse, particular human reality, a reality that is difficult or impossible to reflect in the columns of the questionnaire.[1] Those persons who delve into or merely take advantage of this segment of sociological or psycho-sociological research are inclined to attribute scientific rigors and objectivity only to those investigations based upon this procedure and to eliminate from the realm of sociological research the analyses and reflections, even profound and truth-bearing ones, that are not accompanied by statistics, tables, percentages, correlations and so forth.

There are tendencies and phenomena that should displace the ruthless nature of polemics: "the theoretical delirium," as well as the narrow-minded empiricism; the documentary torrents, as well as factual anemia; the bland tone of supposedly objective findings, as well as the application of adjectives to realities; the accumulation of platitudes and ambiguities, produced in "specialized" terminology designed to encipher the banalities, as well as the academic "arrogance;" boring texts and works of a murky technical nature lacking the tensions of life and the gift of inspiration and imagination and lost in the desert of methodical mediocrity, to use the expressions in the exciting book (and for a sociologist) by Lucian Raicu ("Reflections Upon the Creative Spirit"). So as not to be removed from the truth of life, the investigative methods and techniques must "be subordinate to scientific theory" (V. Miftode), must be the expression of a view of man and of human nature and essence in their living actions in a social-historical space and time or, at least, it must be subjected to a control on the part of just such an authentic and consistent humanistic view.

Social investigative methods and techniques are not themselves sociology, as some practitioners of the discipline appear to understand, but rather its instruments, its working "tools" and the paths of access to the subject matter, which remains, again and again, social-human realities. In having a functional organic unity with sociological theory, epistemology, methodology and research techniques have as a unified purpose the knowledge and understanding of real social processes, the uncovering of latent tendencies and an opportunity to express technological skills.

A judicious evaluation regarding sociology and its mission has been formulated by Basil Bernstein in one of his studies entitled "The Sociology of Education - A Summary Report," in which he writes: "Contemporary sociology offers a poorly coordinated group of theories and practices, but it is extraordinarily prolific in its methods and analyses. Sociological imagination should make visible that which is made invisible by the institutional procedures of society and the daily practices of its members."[2]

It is not absolutely necessary for us to await the establishment of a "sociology of sociology" (and we already have a sufficient number of sociologies) in order to admit that sociology as a science is either (also) reflexive or it is neither sociology nor science. Only through the intermediary of the reflex can sociology and psychosociology achieve that "go-come" relationship between the macrosocial and the microsocial, between overall society, with its specific instutitions, laws, values and norms, and the microgroups that form it, and between social events and human stories.

Scientific reflection (why not also philosophical reflections?) saturated with significant events of life and reflexivity, in general, are strictly necessary to sociology not only to avoid sociography, factography and "flying at low altitudes," to avoid the tax paid to circumstances and to "cut" the tangled knot of prejudice and comfortable appearances, but also to fulfill one of its most important functions: that of the future, that of being predictive.

For sociology, there is no "better" way by virtue of being marginal, "provincial" or becoming subordinate, except by the arrogant break from philosophy and the other social sciences, especially from the economic, political, juridic sciences and the science of social management, except by limiting its functions to that of "an annex" or a technical-methodological "adjunct" to the other social sciences or to the disciplines of high education having a casual access to the specific research of economic-social realities.

The destiny of sociology "as a part of scientific and spiritual affairs of our society," as is well said by Achim Mihu, and the blending of its gnosiological and praxiological functions, as well as its political and cultural-educational ones, are directly tied to the preservation and improvement of the statute of a theoretical-applied discipline with its specific nature and appreciable contributions to the general effort of the social-political sciences for improving, rationalizing and humanizing social relations, organization and management in our society.

The logic itself of the specific subject matter of sociology (social reality in its entirety with all its dimensions: economic, political, juridic, institutional, cultural-artistic, religious and so forth) requires the sociologist and the psychosociologist to assimilate a multilateral philosophical and scientific culture, requires them to be open, receptive and informed regarding a great number of fields of knowledge and culture, and requires them to reject what Mircea Malita calls "the slavery of specialization" (narrow), mono-thematicism and living within the shell of a sub-branch. Certainly, especially today under the conditions of the proliferation of the family of sciences and "its members" and of the information "explosion," the sociologist, as well as the economist, to use a bit of Galbraith's wit, "cannot know everything, but he cannot omit anything" essential that is occurring in the society in which he lives, from demography, economics and ecology to the arts and literature. Only if the "intellectual fortress" of sociology keeps its doors and windows wide-open to all the other social sciences and only if it expresses an authentic interpluri- and trans-disciplinary spirit will it be able to "cover" the subject matter and make a specific contribution to the understanding and improvement of the macro- and microsocial conditions of man.

Like any other field of scientific knowledge, the field of sociology and psycho-sociology also requires competency and specialized, professional training. It is natural and necessary to plead in its favor and for us to be concerned about the new personnel. But, sociologists and psycho-sociologists should not isolate themselves from other specialists and professionals or from the broader public, within which they should be intensively active, including within the press, radio and television.[3]

No matter how paradoxical it might appear, sociology and the sociologists carry out their specific social mission not only to the degree in which they produce specialized studies and research, which are eventually read by their colleagues, but also to the degree in which the spirit, vision and methods of sociology and psycho-sociology are assimilated and applied by non-sociologists and are regarded as indispensable in the work carried out by economists (theoreticians and practitioners), engineers, managers in ministries and industrial centers, collective leaderships in units involved in industry, construction, transportation, trade, agriculture, in institutions of education, culture, press, radio, television, public health and so forth.

In a socialist society programmatically centered on man as an active, productive, creative, participative and consolidative factor and as a principal user of economic-social, technical-scientific and cultural progress, the triumph of the humanist view over the technocratic, productivist and narrow-economist view depends to a great degree upon the penetration of the sociological and psycho-sociological spirit in all the social-human sciences and in all the spheres of social leadership, organization and activity. This is even more true since, as is pointed out by the authors of the valuable work on applied sociology and psycho-sociology "The Human Development of the Industrial Enterprise" (Publishing House of the Academy of the Socialist Republic of Romania, 1981, coordinated by Catalin Zamfir): "The human factor becomes, under the new conditions, an ever more important source of efficiency for all activities that are organized and especially for work," with there existing "ever more powerful pressures in the direction of humanizing work as a component part of improving the quality of life" (p 502).

A separate importance for increasing the degree of sociology's functionality here in Romania on all three of the connected levels where it simultaneously carries out its efforts (theoretical-epistemological, technical-methodological and praxiological) is the understanding and correct treatment of the relationships between sociology and psycho-sociology, sister disciplines so closely bound that not infrequently they either continue to lose their specific nature and relative autonomy or to attempt to absorb and artificially subordinate one to the other. And, in this case, the solution to the dilemma and the conclusions to the uselessly extended dispute can be formulated by firmly beginning 1) with the data of social realities themselves, which are not either sociological (objective) or psycho- (socio-) logical, but a complex and integral structure (subjective), which are not merely macrosocial and impersonal, but also microsocial and interpersonal and so forth; 2) with the experiences and results shown in the collective and individual works published here in Romania and in other countries.

And, what do these works demonstrate? By virtue of the fact that social reality (life) is the dynamic unity between strictly objective factors and subjective ones and is the living interaction of social and individual existence and awareness, be it theoretical or applied, it is at the same time (and it cannot otherwise be) of a psycho-sociological nature. In according to the objective facets the essential and determining role and place that it has, the sociological explanation cannot ignore the components of a mental, psychic and psycho-social nature in social affairs and the motivational, primarily psycho-social, factors.[4] Similarly, by being concerned with the study of the social structures and the evolution of these structures, social institutions and organizations and their functionality (or, especially, their dysfunctionality) during a given historical period, the study of the influence and collisions of the values-norms systems that guide the human community and the study of the social classes, categories and strata that intercondition each other in a national society, sociology will necessarily associate itself with the views, methods and techniques of psychosociology and it will give equal attention to the social structure, the collective and the personality.[5] Only in this manner does it avoid the risk of making an "inaccurate reading" of the social-human realities that it subjects to investigation. In brief, metaphorically speaking, sociology without psycho-sociology is just like an organism, like a body without eyes, without arms, without legs...

Along this line of thinking, I cannot but express my surprise and, furthermore, my regret that both Vasile Miftode and Achim Mihu in the articles to which I have referred (but not in their works and research) ignore psycho-sociology "as if" it were not the twin sister of sociology, "as if" one could make a valid statement about social activities and relations and about a living, specific-historical society without the psycho-sociological categories. That is why, in filling in this - I am convinced involuntary - gap in the articles of these previous writers, I feel it is necessary to insist upon the correlation between sociology and psycho-sociology as an expression of the organic unity between the objective and the subjective and between social existence and social awareness.[6]

Why, in the current stage of both science and social practice, is it appropriate to give special attention to the psychological and psycho-social components of social activities and relations of all types and at all levels?

First, given the specific nature itself of these activities and relations (belonging to people, aware and active beings), because the psychological and psycho-social factors are socio- and omnipresent and, even if in society not everyting is of a psychological and psycho-social nature, in fact without them nothing is truly social and human. In a practical sense, the activities and relations in all the vital sectors of social affairs (from the economic and political to the scientific, technical, organizational, cultural, educational and so forth) cannot be carried out and achieved without the decisive participation of psychological (general-human) and psycho-social (specific-historical) factors which directly and indirectly reflect the objective conditions of the natural-social existence of people engaged in interactions (see the article "Social Responsibility and Action," published in ERA SOCIALISTA No 13/1980).

Second, because these factors, as constitutive elements of the social fabric and although important and significant, are normally ignored or placed on a secondary level and dealt with in a view inversely proportional to the role that they play in social dynamics, to the point of damaging social science and practice. Along this line of thinking, we should note the lack of consideration given to the psycho-social effects of certain insufficiently considered measures, certain abnormal states of affairs or certain styles of work and leadership that are opposite to the declared principles of socialist democracy.

Third, because the sociological, economic and politological analyses themselves find in most cases that in the current stage of our socialist construction, when objective conditions have been created (material, economic, institutional, juridic and organizational conditions) in accord with the essence of socialist society, the cause of certain difficulties, unequal performance (under equal objective conditions) or the repeated failure to achieve certain established objectives and tasks are frequently of a psycho-social nature (concepts, mentalities, behaviors, attitudes, opinions, morale, climate and so forth, and the lack of agreement with the requirements for certain socialist social relationships).

Fourth, but not last in importance, because the changes (we would even want mutations) in the so influential area of individual and social psychology (by group and collective) do not have their rate and depth in synchronization (even less instantaneously) with the radical and relatively rapid transformations in the sphere of economic-social and objective organizational realities. The changes in social and individual awareness, with awareness by definition being a psychological and psycho-social fact, are subjected to other laws, rates and procedures than those transformations in the objective social existence of people.

It is sufficient for us to give as an example the resistance to change and the repetitiveness of the private and individual psychology in order for us to understand how important and current is the task established in the Party's Program, and frequently repeated in comrade Nicolae Ceausescu's speeches, of not adopting a fatalist attitude regarding shortfalls in social, and psychological, awareness concerning the new socialist social existence, and of working so that the efforts with the people and their education will be one of the central concerns of the party organizations and an essential facet of their political-educational activities, as well as all their activities.

Certainly, the accent placed on the organic unity and lucrative cooperation (gnosiological, methodological and at the level of field research) between sociology and psycho-sociology should not lead to either the psychologization of sociology (and other social-human sciences) or the sociologization (in general) of social psychology. The problem was clearly settled by Miron Constantinescu in his "Introduction to Sociology" (1972), in which he wrote, among other things: "Social psychology in the general system of the social sciences and in a just correlation with sociology has its important role in scientific research. We will maintain the need for collaboration between sociology and psychology... Social psychology is a precious ally of sociology, a main component of the orchestra of social sciences; ...therefore, recognizing the legitimacy of this science, we cannot identify it either with sociology and, even less so, admit to an inter-changeability of positions, substituting social psychology for sociology" (pp 156-158).

Just as we cannot favor one of the methods and techniques available to us over another, sociology and psycho-sociology cannot refuse a single source of information, be it primary or secondary, regarding the social-human realities that they study. Above and beyond the statistics, numbers and percentages, they must find and see the people, their deeds, their motivations and their mentalities. To this end, not only can the mathematical methods and techniques serve them, but also, for example, the careful and reflexive study of the daily press and the annual collections of decisions by the Supreme Tribunal, real sociological and psycho-sociological "novels" for those who know how to read them, as well as the study, from a sociological and psycho-sociological perspective, of contemporary Romanian fiction in literature which, in its better aspects, has offered truths about our society and its people that the social sciences did not uncover, although they were and still are charged with doing just that.[7]

Certainly, fictional literature and scientific literature cannot be substituted one for the other, but with each serving in its own way the same purpose, they must remain joint communicators in the efforts to discover, state and socialize the truth and make us take the step ourselves in the society in which we live in the effort to improve and make more beautiful the daily life of all people. The writer and the sociologist who live in a space saturated by the specific and by events have a common creed and a similar restriction, as stated long ago by Ion Ghica: "I do not permit myself to write except when I can tell the truth."

And, the conclusion of the writer and the sociologist will also be the same: yes, life must be changed! Since not just life must have an effect upon sociology, but sociology together with psycho-sociology are called upon to have an effect upon the evolution of social affairs.

With good reason, the authors of the articles about sociology in ERA SOCIALISTA came out in favor of the priority formulation and research of certain priority themes and for their listing according to the importance that they have in relationship to the current and broader future concerns (therefore, the problems) of our socialist society. This value selection represents an antidote for the routine spirit of dealing with certain themes that, over time, become marginal in nature and importance, as pointed out by Achim Mihu, and for the tendency of grinding out research, as well as for the mirage of exhaustivity. With regards to this, the question can be clearly asked, one which also contains a straightforward answer: What should be of priority concern to the sociologist and the psycho-sociologist if not that which is of priority concern to our society itself, its living and real people, by the socio-professional, residential and age categories?

In the perspective of the furthering socialist workers' democracy, of broadening the channels of social communication from bottom to top and of the masses participating not only in the achievement, but also in the elaboration and adoption of decisions, there must be a continuous broadening of the idea of "social instructions" addressed to the sociologist and the psycho-sociologist in the sense suggested by Achim Mihu: "Sociological investigations should also be carried out at the suggestion of those "on the bottom," that is, those who directly carry out the activities in production."

In applying the sociological and psycho-sociological methods themselves, it would be appropriate to "inventory" not only that which is being studied more or less frequently and thoroughly in the specialized studies, research efforts and projects, but also (or especially) that which is not studied at all or is dealt with in an auxiliary and timid manner. Among these themes - of maximum importance keeping in mind both their incidence in life and behaviors in the concerns of the great human masses and especially in the physical time and psychic energies they consume in the non-duplicatable lives of human individuals - I would list: the degree of satisfying, under normal and rational conditions, the material (consumer) needs of the different categories in the population, as well as the needs of a spiritual and cultural nature that are subjected to criteria other than the first needs, necessitating a vast and permanent effort to stimulate, orientate and channel; the real means of improving the quality of life (of work, civic, family and leisure life) for the different categories of workers; the substantial improvement of interhuman and intersocial communications at the micro- and macrosocial levels and the establishment of true "communication groups" that will block or gradually decrease the current giant loss of social and personal time, time that is taken up by redundant communications in long meetings and other forms of material consumption of time and in reporting sessions having a bureaucratic or formal nature, as well as in ritual verbal behaviors and so forth (this is a case precisely for the sociologist and the psycho-sociologist to acutely state the problem that the efficiency and productivity of economic-social, political-ideological, educational and other activities depend not only on the level of technical-material equipment, but also to a decisive degree upon the "productivity" of communications, the conciseness and precise of these communications and their accuracy); the prevention of anti-social phenomena and negative behaviors, including relapses and tendencies of proliferating individualism and privatism (so rooted in the psychology of private property); the energetic and efficient combatting of bureaucratic mentalities and behaviors in their "classic" forms and also in their "renovated," modernized and cloaked forms of the language of "socialist" terminology; the means of educating and generalizing democratic trends and behaviors, knowing that the democratic forms and institutions created by our society do not become functional and do not achieve their purposes except under conditions of a psycho-social climate favorable to the free formulation and expression of opinions and constructive criticism from below and of respect in the daily life for the norms and precepts of participative, responsible and creative socialist democracy; the means of promoting the authentic values, creative initiatives and new things in the sharp struggle against the routine and the conservative, against imposition and incompetence.

Of major importance is the "alliance" between sociology, psycho-sociology and the science of managing the socialist society. This alliance alone is responsible for a greater sensitivity in the collective decisionmaking organs at all levels regarding the key problems of immediate, social-human consequences, as well as long-term consequences, for different measures and decisions and the rates and correctness with which the adopted measures are achieved or not, and upon the validity and opportuneness themselves of some of these measures. Sociological and psycho-sociological research carried out in advance or during activities, including public opinion polls, could offer the opportunity to prevent or to make anticipated corrects to certain draft decisions or measures who effects do not agree with the programmed purposes or intentions that motivated them. Thus, there could be a decrease in the number of resolvable, but unresolved problems that repeatedly end up on the daily agenda of the meetings of collective leadership organs, and there could be more rapid progress in all fields.

Sociologists could provide an immense, practical and effective service to our socialist society if they could get their sociological technique of content analysis to penetrate and become a current work method in the system of mass communications, as well as in those institutions that receive and must annually resolve thousands, tens or hundreds of thousands of letters from citizens. Through this, there would be a more precise and effective understanding of the concerns and opinions of the masses and the areas in which social problems and tensions appear in an incipient or latent manner, offering the competent organs the opportunity to provide a timely solution of these problems and to prevent the transformation of certain contradictions into disturbing conflicts.

No discipline of the spirit, and sociology belongs to the region of the spiritual, with its specific rigors, ever developed anywhere without discussions, and not occasional, sporadic ones of a "campaign," but rather permanent ones as a natural component part of the process itself of achieving the theoretical and practical objectives of science. That is why, in presenting several points of view in the discussion hosted by ERA SOCIALISTA, I expressed my hope that one of its specific valuable effects will be the establishment of a permanent critical discussion by sociologists and non-sociologists - in the different publications, including social-cultural and literary ones, but especially in VIITORUL SOCIAL - on the state of affairs and morale in the sphere of socio-human sciences, especially on those published and unpublished works, on research that has been completed, finalized and publically communicated and on the realities themselves that these investigations are trying to work to uncover the essence, dynamics, difficulties and contradictions and to formulate optimum solutions in all the fields of social affairs.

1. It should be no less ignored or minimized the evaluations and conclusions of certain sociologists having a vast experience in scientific research; H. H. Stahl recently wrote: "Direct contact with the tragedies and joys of the people as a man and not as a researcher frequently overshadows greatly theoretical efforts. For that reason, I feel sorry for those "researchers" who go about in a world that is broad and strange to them armed only with a miserable "questionnaire" drawn up at home that is dry and weak, with the empty illusion that they will obtain answers through a "yes" or a "no" to all their questions. In this manner, they think they have been very successful, when in reality all they have is a collection of dead items greatly removed from what life itself is" ("Reflections and Thoughts From the Old School of 'Sociological Monographs'", "Minerva" Publishing House, 1981, p 62).

2. B. Bernstein, "Studies on the Sociology of Education," the Didactic and Pedagogical Publishing House, 1978, p 37 and so forth.

3. It is good when the daily press reproduces (unfortunately it is sufficiently infrequent) through the writing of its reporters the results of certain socio-psychological research efforts in economic units, but it is not good that the sociologists and psycho-sociologists themselves cannot get permanent columns in all the types of publications that they could continually supply with the results of their investigations or their reflections under their own by-line. I believe that the staffs at the newspapers, magazines, radio and television would be receptive to such initiatives for a systematic, permanent cooperation with competent sociologists and psycho-sociologists having the experience and the writing ability.

4. A recent remarkable work dedicated to this central theme in the social sciences is from Catalin Mamali: "Motivational Balance and Co-evolution" appeared in "The Library of Sociology" from the Scientific and Encyclopedic Publishing House, which publishes in a salutary manner books that fortunately can be classified with difficulty as "pure" sociology or "pure" psycho-sociology. The title of the collection could even be expanded to: "The Library of Romanian Sociology and Psycho-sociology."

5. It is true, certainly, writes Gordon Allport in his classical work "The Structure and Development of the Personality" (1937, 1961, Romana Publishing House, 1981) that the personality is molded by the social environment and is itself expressed within the framework of this environment. Nonetheless, "it is a system in itself and deserves to be studied as such... Currently, we do not have the right to wall ourselves in and discourage any path for conducting an investigation into human nature. Narrow dogmatism is improper... Specific human life... represents the only manner in which human life is lived" (Didactic and Pedagogical Publishing House, 1981, pp 8, 9).

6. Directly considered together, sociology and psycho-sociology do not have, as V. Miftode unfortunately states, "principal" techniques (which involve "merely" the investigation of social existence) and "secondary" techniques (which involve "merely" the investigation of social awareness), but only techniques (and methods) that are adequate or inadequate to the subject matter being researched. How this subject matter is represented by the human subjects and the activities and relationships between them, and how the objective social existence is not social if it is not conscious, while awareness is not real and authentic either if it does not reflect the existence and active influence of the social fabric, produces the result that the segmentation and hierarchical listing (in principal and secondary ones) of investigative techniques into the affairs of the human collective (which is a dialectical unity between the objective and the subjective, and a natural-social existence and social-human awareness) are at least artificial and inoperative. All serious sociological and psycho-sociological research proves this, including the already-mentioned volume "The Human Development of Enterprises," whose first chapter is significantly entitled: "The Contribution of Sociology and Psycho-sociology to the Human Development of Enterprises;" or the book, "The Analysis and Prediction of Human Performances," by Ionel Dorofte, Scientific and Encyclopedic Publishing House, 1981.

7. In the article "Cedars Without Thorns" from the group that appeared under the title "Literature and the Politician" in STEAUA (No 5/1981), Achim Mihu presented pertinent findings and stated a significant question: "Under the conditions in which the socio-human sciences have remained behind the spirit of the politician, nearly suffocated by complex circumstances and bowing to dogmatism, literature became the most faithful expression of new policies. More than anything else the situation appeared where the representatives (it would be better to say the officials) of the socio-human sciences not only delighted in the rose-colored world, but also reacted nervously regarding the courage of literature... What will happened, however, with literature in the case when those in the socio-human sciences rid themselves of the mistakes of dogmatism and become daring to the degree of the essential meaning of Marxist ideology, presenting realities with a natural courage from over the recent decades, as well as the realities of today?" (p 17). And, other participant in the discussions noted with good reason: "Even for the historical periods that have just passed, the novels that made "discoveries" and conducted "discussions" can no longer forever replace objective historical-social studies, realistic reporting, documents and testimony, and deep philosophical analysis" (p 15).

TAPED WALESA STATEMENTS, WORKER REACTION

Rome LISTY in Czech No 5, Aug 81 pp 30-33

[Tape Recording of Lech Walesa's Remarks At the Warsaw Iron Works, 27 March 1981--Translated by Ela Ledererova]

[Text] It was Friday, 27 March 1981. From 0800 until 12.00, there was a warning strike throughout Poland, in response to the Bydgosc incident in which the Polish police seriously wounded three officials af the Solidarity trade union. The warning strike was intended to force the government to come to an agreement with Solidarity representatives. It had been decided that if such an agreement is not reached, Solidarity would on 31 March declare a general strike without any time limit.

These were the worst and most dangerous days since last August. Days full of general tension and impatient expectation. People were living from day to day, hour to hour. The threat of Soviet military intervention loomed over Poland.

During the hours of the general strike, Lech Walesa visited some of the large enterprises. Everywhere, he called for determination but also deliberation. His words were spontaneous without prior preparation.

Our recording is from the meeting in the Warsaw Iron Works which was Walesa's fourth stop that day. The tape can obviously not capture the atmosphere of tension and determination. Rather than a church-like silence, there was constant commotion. Only in moments of extraordinary seriousness when the workers' leader spoke of the principal problems of the day, did the crowd settle down, only to burst into laughter or applause soon thereafter.

The meeting ended exactly at noon, at the time when the 4-hour warning strike was coming to a close. As a last act, the assembled workers sang the Polish national anthem.

In order to illustrate the substance of the proceedings and the mood of the audience, we add three worker contributions. These were exciting words which attest to the basic stance of the Polish workers during these decisive moments in contemporary Polish history.

Lech Walesa:

"We did not say goodbye the last time I was here; therefore, we need no welcoming ceremonies now. We are still the same. We are meeting at a difficult time, in a precarious situation which must be well understood. You know that in 1970, without any special knowledge or training, I led the strike in a shipyard. Since then you and I have learned many things. In 1956, 1970, and 1976, we made mistakes which we must not repeat right now at this particular moment. If we gave in now, if we only continued to reform the old way, everything would be the same. Obviously, we must act with deliberation. We must not allow ourselves to be provoked, since provocation already exists. What's more, they are firing at our functionaries. Consequently, we must be very careful, very cautious, and not let ourselves be provoked. Naturally, the people who are being removed from office and will continue to be removed, will do everything possible to drag us into a fight which we do not want. You must demand that us, functionaries avoid endangering people, seek deliberate ways without retreating. The proposal we heard at the last all-state commission meeting was staggering, for it meant an immediate general strike. I did not agree with it, and someone may perhaps accuse me of being wrong. I believe we functionaries must not proceed in this manner. We were not ready for a frontal confrontation and the struggle cannot be waged without preparation. We do not want to subvert the government, the party, our alliances, or socialism. If we had driven the situation to the point of a knife, it would have been risky, and I don't know whether we would be meeting here today at all.

"Even the world has come to understand that we, in fact, do not desire to strike at all. We know that the strike hurts us most of all. Look, I go through the city, I observe what is happening, the waiting lines are longer and longer. The fact is, however, that today we cannot act differently. We have made mistakes in the past, especially in 1970, when we again trusted because they told us 'trust us and we will make improvements.' But we know that those plans of theirs for renovation can hardly bring nothing, at least not for 5 years--because from now on events will move faster, we will be in a very difficult situation, we will really be threatened by revolution, but the kind in which we will destroy each other. For in 5 years no one will trust anybody, not even the church which has joined in the events, or a crafty fellow like me and others. People will say 'they were too soft and what did it bring us, what have they accomplished.' We will smash heads, fight, and this is not what we are all about.

"We already have an almost complete victory. It is only a question of making secure that which we have achieved. Naturally, some say that this should have been done as early as last August, or on another occasion, or even during the first memorable strike. I believe that this would have been a mistake. We had to wait until everything was ripe. Look, at that time in August, no group, be it party, parliamentary, or municipal, was supporting us. And what is happening now? Entire regions, Gdansk, Bydgosc, entire organizations support us and claim that it was all a mistake, that there are violations of law in our country, and that this must be done away with.

"Thus, it was necessary to settle strikes and prevent actions which would have made us go too far. Even what has happened now was something I proposed should wait at least a month, but events showed otherwise.

"We must view the problems a bit differently and maintain a certain direction in basic policy. Obviously, we are not naive. You know that some time ago, I also said 'we will help.' Two years later I was without job, arrested, in jail, etc. This time, we denounced illegality, while not attacking any organization, not even the party, as a whole; not even the security forces as such, because every country needs security, even state security, and other officials. We have attacked illegality, violations of laws, and individuals who are guilty of such violations. This is what we are against and we must act accordingly.

"Naturally, many people don't like it and they will fight against us. They thought they could sign any number of agreements, that we would allow ourselves to be fooled, that our enthusiasm would ebb, and that we would return to their innovation, that everything would be as before. Now they see that this will not come about. So, we will catch one regional boss after another, just as we would catch rats. They will have to go, they will no longer steal from us, deceive us, they will no longer be allowed to call us antisocialists. They are the antisocialists, they are the ones who led this country into bankruptcy.

"For few people really knew how bad the situation was. Even parliamentary deputies and some highly placed people did not know what kind of morass we found ourselves in. By now they have found out, today they know that private farmers unions are necessary. They know by now that we do not need gradustes of 2-year courses, but rather really knowledgeable, openminded people.

"I don't want to digress. This is my fourth meeting today and I don't know if I have told you everything. I would like to tell you many things so that you can understand me. The struggle is hard, difficult, and under no circumstances must we allow ourselves to be divided. At the same time, we must remember that we need prudence. There are functionaries who think that everything can be had immediately, that all we have to do is to demand and the opponent will collapse. They are among you, I know some of those who would like to solve problems in this manner. Well, that will not do, we are responsible Poles, we must remember that this country is our Poland, we must not destroy anything, not a single broken window pane, because it is we who pay for the damage, not the minister, we do. I am also opposed to exchanging one thief for another. We should set up cells within our organization which would make sure that no one is enriching himself at our expense. Such cells must appear where there are cases of individuals living off other people and stealing from them. Even when such as individual leaves his position, we should find out what he owns, and if it is too much, tell him that he has a choice of either contributing to the union or to the poor. It is precisely in such a situation that a game of musical chairs begins. You remove one man from office, they then transfer him to us, while our villain goes elsewhere. What does this lead to? The problem is to eliminate the root causes of this process through which they deceive us and, after a time, return to the same old ways. This is what we have to think about.

"At the same time, we must remember that it is not certain how it will end. Judging by what has already been achieved, we can hope that it will end well. But let us not forget the provocations. Let us remember that we must avoid them and that we must stand together, against opinions demanding that we be tougher and others that we be more moderate. Despite this, let us stand together or else we will lose. And if we lose, we solve no problems and things will get tougher. If we can now describe the score as one all, it will then be two to one against us. They will watch us so that we cannot rise again. And even if we managed that, we would not trust one another. There are some countries where when two people talk and a third one approaches, the two speakers fall silent in fear of a witness, an informant, and such. We will not allow such a situation to arise here, but let us remember that if we must pay, we will pay with honor, for we have no other choice. I hope it will not come to that because things are beginning to shape up somewhat differently. Obviously, at this moment we will not achieve 100 percent, but we will not retreat on the most important issues, because retreat is out of question.

"So much for that. Perhaps there will be some questions, but I am tired, this is my fourth assembly, as I have already told you. Perhaps I repeated myself and did not speak well. I would like to explain certain urgent problems which concern my person. There are some who try to trip me up. I would like the opportunity to look in their eyes. I have nothing to hide and if you have doubts, that is your privilege. I will say only one thing, we functionaries have no right to place you people in jeopardy. We must seek ways which would be least costly to you. You gave us your trust and it is our duty to fight, but we must first inform you on the situation and let you decide. Let us consult together and choose the way together. We shall not retreat. That is the way I see the problems, others see them differently. There are different opinions. Now, please, the questions."

We selected from the discussions some of Lech Walesa's replies. He spoke of the attack of Solidarity officials in Pulawy, which is being investigated by the police. "We cannot be surprised, there are people who really have a lot on their conscience. They are not very comfortable at this time because all their dirty dealings are coming to the surface, and they are defending themselves. We must proceed step by step, bring down the pillars, make a small opening and enlarge it more and more. Up to a certain point, we have succeeded in this. The Bydgosc situation, however, has forced us to enter the worst, most difficult phase. August was not so terrible. Even those who signed were thinking 'All right, we will sign and tomorrow we will liquidate you.'"

L.W. speaks of his positions and addresses his critics: "Some thought that I have lost ground, that I estranged myself from the people. No, I have not done this, but you cannot break down a wall by banging your head against it. I do what I do in order not to endanger the people who trust me. For it is easy to shout 'let us march!' But what will happen then? We will lose our women and children. And why should we act like that when we can win without the slightest losses. So far, we are winning. And people agree with me, while others are achieving quite the opposite effect. For example, the first speech of Deputy Rakowski evoked the opposite effect. I told him afterwards: 'Mr Deputy, you read a prepared speech in which you attacked us. I am only a worker and was not prepared; therefore, it was not very polished.' But I had to react to the salient points of his speech. And apparently I replied well enough (applause) and I didn't wait until the following day as they do."

L.W. describes his cooperation with his advisers: "Some would like to drive a wedge between me and those who counsel me. Educated people have a lot to say but we cannot follow their advice in everything. However, I need them and their diverse opinions which help us. Obviously, they cannot rule us. Others are trying to drive a wedge between those who are advising the primate and who are honorable people and want nothing from us. We do not pay them anything. Advisors are useful but they cannot make the final decisions."

L.W. gives his views on workers self-government: "Let us remember that workers self-government, workers councils, are not the same as trade unions. As Poles and trade unionists we can, of course, send the best people into them. But as trade unionists we are not rushing blindly into responsible positions, into sharing in decisions and management. This is not our cause. In this respect, we would be making the same mistake as in 1956. We would again climb somebody's back and that somebody would pretend that we made the decisions and went against policy. Let self-government make sure that there is maximum production at minimum cost, but trade unions will continue voicing demands, albeit prudently. Naturally, if the plan is fulfilled 150 percent, we want 50 percent higher wages. It is in this manner that we will fight for what is ours. For example, a machine is delivered to the factory, we paid for it and it is already producing. It replaced three people, consequently, we want money for two. We will continue presenting demands, but when someone tells us that there are no resources left, we will take that into consideration. But trade unions are here exclusively for the protection of the workers, not sharing in decisionmaking and management. Let the workers bear responsibility through the self-management system, but not in the unions which are a different matter altogether. Let us not make the same miskake again! That mistake has cost us enough in the past. Therefore, let us this time preserve the independence of the trade union, independence from the church, as well as others. Let us keep our advisors, our hearts, and our conscience. We, ourselves know best what we should do. They can help us but no one will supervise us." (applause)

L.W. on the meeting between Premier Jaruszelski and Primate Wyszynski: "The situation is rather dramatic. We know that the antisocialists are pressing us at home and, in order to preserve their troughs, they would also like to invite someone. The conversation between the primier and the primate was private; therefore, it is difficult to say anything. You all know the communique. One must know how to read such communiques. They certainly talked about all sorts of things but one of these clearly emerges. We are capable of solving our problems ourselves, without help. We are not threatening anyone, not the party, not the system. We only wish to see slogans become reality. We want to live and work. The primate undoubtedly wished the same. As you surely know, I cooperate very closely with the primate, we know each other quite well; consequently, he knows what I think, what I want, what we want. He said he will always be with us. And he will be. After all, even the Holy Father is informed and watches over us. Therefore, we believe that we can avoid all pitfalls. The primate touched upon all the important questions, everything we can imagine. The conversation lasted 15 minutes less than 4 hours, that should be enough. So, we believe that there will be understanding, that we can avoid the tragedy with which they threaten us. They threaten us also to force us into retreat, so that they can do the same things again. For this reason, we will not retreat and we will win, but we must act prudently and we must not allow ourselves to be provoked. Even if there should be shooting, even if one of us dies, we must go on. We surely find that or another gangster. But we must not immediately go into the streets, into an open fight, because then we would be finished. We cannot attack the entire security apparat, not everyone in security is bad, there are voices even there saying they would like a Solidarity and other things. Even there we find people of different opinions."

L.W. on being awarded a foreign prize: "I don't want any prizes. You know well that the prize will be given to Solidarity. We will be richer. I did not come into the trade unions for prizes or anything else. Eleven thousand dollars, that is something. Maybe we will build something with it, or buy something, perhaps grain or bread. (applause) In some other country they also awarded a prize for a photograph of the year. We will be even richer, I hope we have time to spend it all. (applause) I came into the trade unions with nothing and I will leave the same way."

L.W. on the workers' strike : "Kuwaj sits here with us because we are close to the peasants. We are in one delegation. The peasants must have their trade union. If there is a strike, they will join us with a small group, We will be striking and they will be bringing us food, they will sow, harvest and husband resources so that we have something to live on."

L.W. on the question of whether Solidarity's work has a political character: "This is difficult to say. When we demand the replacement of a regional administrator or secretary who is a criminal, it is difficult to say whether this is a political matter. Obviously, when someone ignores the facts, he will say that it is indeed a political matter because Solidarity wants its own man in that position. But when we know that it is not a question of a secretary but of Mr X who is a criminal, then it is not a political matter but one of removing a criminal. Or it can be an individual who no longer enjoys the confidence of society and should not be occupying a certain position. We will not say that we are removing a secretary but a Mr X who has such and such things on his conscience. We are striking against the building of new police stations and they hold this against us. But we can say, look, we want the same amount or even more money for hospitals at the same time. Then they could not say that ours is an attack against police stations which started sprouting up like mushrooms at the cost of millions."

L.W. on a question of whether he had suffered moments of depression during the long negotiations with the government delegation: "No, I never collapsed, not even when I learned that my wife was in the hospital. I had made up my mind that I would not retreat no matter what, even if they decided to chop me up into little pieces. However, I was also determined to be prudent and not smash my head against a wall. But I would not retreat. (applause) Since I am a religious believer and have, for a long time, held firm convictions stemming from past experiences, that is my character. Perhaps it's a deviation, perhaps a disease, but such is my character."

L.W. replies to a question on what will happen with Gierek and Jaroszewicz, and others: "We shouted at them too much and they became sick. And sick people cannot ....(laughter, applause) If we rise up organizationally, we will tell these gentlemen 'you did not want to give us free Saturdays, so we will not give them to you either. We will give a sidewalk to each of you to take care of, you will work according to how much you have on your conscience. We will not feed you for free. Later, you will return to normal life but you will no longer be officials because you have not been rehabilitated.'" (applause, laughter)

L.W. responds to a question on whether it was not a mistake to announce the date of the general strike ahead of time: "It was not, it is a matter of psychology. Let someone's knees tremble in his pants. We are prepared in any case, even though some say that it is not precisely psychological, that we are destroying people, that such long preparations are not good. We are in principle for fair play, we are prepared to stop events, as well as set them in motion. We are prepared to wait. Even world public opinion lauds our prudence. We are giving them time--go ahead, get ready, talk it out among yourselves, collect competent people, and then sit down at a table. This method is logical and correct. We are guarantors. Because even after nonaggression pacts and similar things, we can still get a knife in the back. For this reason, it is essential that our stance, organization, its flexibility and solidarity be good. If they are, we will achieve everything. Whether it happens tomorrow or the day after is not important. The decisive thing is that we are not resigning, that we maintain prudence, and that we avoid tearing everything down and setting the torch to it. Obviously, we will continue replacing officials until such time as the right people occupy the right positions.

L.W. explains the position of Premier Jaruzelski and his views of Solidarity: "Based on a private conversation which I cannot publicize, I came to the conclusion --and you will too--that this is one man in uniform who can be trusted a little. Despite the fact that there is an overall lack of trust in this country, this type of soldier had it. Naturally, we cannot say 'We trust you 100 percent.' No, we are giving you a chance. We do not want to make you nervous, Mr Prime Minister, just go about your work, tell us who stands in the way and we will take care of it. You will not dirty your hands. (laughter) Of course, this is not an indication that we wish to help you remove the people who do not want to change, those who have reformed themselves four times already and always remained the same. Same as chameleons, once green, then red again. We want you to understand that we do not wish to subvert the party, nor do we want to become a party, we do not wish to be in the way or cause commotion. But we do want to pull of their seats those who hinder you and us. I believe that the premier will do it, he has already taken the first steps, however he lacks the strength, as I do. I know about those who try to trip me up and do things to spite me. These are people placed among us--perhaps not among you--but in the leadership of our unions, there are people who are paid provocateurs. I cannot get rid of them, they engage in popular politics, because he who shouts louder, appears bolder. In a struggle we need courage, but there is also a time for prudence when we cannot allow ourselves to be placed in jeopardy, when there is need for compromise and planning.

"We fear only God. If we lose, we will lose our heads in any event. But as long as we have them, let us use them to achieve the maximum. How often have they threatened me. I was to perish yesterday and I did not. In Gdansk they told me to get some protection, to be careful. We obeyed, but that is not the point. When I am in a crowd, any fanatic "volunteer" can stick a knife in me. They begged me to have at least minimum security, so we obeyed. I don't believe in it, I am a fatalist, but I obviously don't stick my head under a streetcar. I am not overly worried. The government did not intimidate me. I have no fear and I will march as I have marched before. They tried to intimidate me earlier but I did not retreat and will not do so because that is my only choice. If I should ever retreat, they would liquidate me immediately."

L.W. on the question of martial law: "This not an idle threat, it is possible. If the provocateours drag us into a fight, people will become angry, and well march on the police station, especially if someone is killed. Then we may have a situation when we will be against each other. Then it would be salvation if they pulled us apart. We will fight so fiercely that a third party could divide us. Therefore, should fighting ever break out, let us return to our plants. It is bad, one of us has already paid, and we will find them. But it is not possible to allow it to go to full confrontation because then we would lose. We would lose and pay dearly. Therefore, we need caution and prudence. Let us not retreat, but let us be the ones to chose the place of the battle. Not in the streets where they are stronger, not at the police stations where they are also stronger, but rather in our plants. There we will wait, wait even with those pipes in hand. (applause)

"Today is really the time for national reconciliation, for a common road. If we quarrel, if we seek conflict among ourselves, it will not be good and we will achieve nothing. Let us forgive each other today, really forgive. It is a historical landmark, a historic moment for us all. If we make good use of it, Poland will again be Poland. If we don't, we will be beaten cruelly, in a manner our children will not forgive because victory was within reach and we were unable to dot the 'i.' Consequently, let us make that dot and everything will go well. It must go well, because otherwise we will be running away from here as fast as we can."

Several workers at the meeting, men and women, presented their contributions. We have picked the following:

A woman worker: "The government is not one with the working class, if it were, they would tell us the truth. They say nothing. All along they have been deceiving us, so let them make a decision, let them stop threatening us with fratricidal war. They are the ones who declared war on us even before the strike."

Another woman worker: "First of all, why are they extending the Soyuz 81, the maneuvers? When the situation in Poland is so terribly tragic that we have nothing to eat, we are supposed to feed whole armies? For them there is food and for us there is none? And only the strikes are supposed to be the reason that there is nothing to eat, because there is a strike and was a strike, this is the reason that there is not even some miserable mustard in Warsaw? There is no soap, no detergent, there is nothing. This was caused by the strikes? More likely, the strikes saved us. If there hadn't been 1980, if the shipyard workers had not gone on strike, there would have been a horrible fratricidal war in January because there would have been nothing to eat. Only the strikes held the workers back from going in the streets and fighting each other. Let's assume there is no strike. The government punishes a few people but the food will still be stashed away. We all believe that this is all being done on purpose. It is impossible for Poland to be so poor. As late as July, they were shouting that we do not drink enough milk in Poland. When did the milk disappear? Now people get one liter of milk, small children have nothing to eat. The older children are given bread by the mother, maybe a little butter and sugar, because she has nothing else. And all this after 35 years of hard work by the people? They told us, comrades, help us, give to us! People worked, party meetings were held, there were brigades, voluntary and involuntary. Day after day, the men worked, the women never saw them, and now the wife says 'you lazy bum, you have worked for so many years, what exactly did you do?' So that we can go hungry? All this talk about the strikes leading us into brankruptcy is just a pretext, just silly prattling. No doubt, some percentage of loss is there. But we have only one weapon--strikes, because no one wants to listen to us. In the EXPRES WJECZORNY, they printed a beautiful conversation. Some professor was saying that for the government it was s surprise that the worker finally raised his head and, as we say, will never bow it again. And he will not, that is a fact. Let them murder 36 million people! We have nothing to lose and, at this moment, none of us will retreat. There is unity and strength in Solidarity. We will not allow ourselves to be humiliated. Everyone is supporting us and we will not retreat. I also have children, and when I was leaving home, I told them that no one knows what the government may come up with. I told them that I was going to work but that I may not come back if the tanks appear. And if I have to stay here a month, so I will stay, even without knowing what is happening at home. I will not retreat. Because if we retreat, they will start dragging us from our homes like rats and they will murder us. It started in Bydgosc and it will end up the same way in every town. If we retreat, it will mean our defeat because, at that moment, the Polish worker and Poland will cease to exist."

COMMUNISTS ETHICS, SOCIAL PRACTICE EXAMINED

Bucharest CONTEMPORANUL in Romanian 16 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Dr Constantin Raducu]

[Text] Man, as a creative subject who is active in the revolutionary transformation of society, thinks and acts in close connection with the laws of social-historical determinism. However, not being a mechanical product of the laws of determinism, man judges and evaluates critically, selectively the values, including moral ones, and makes his choices consciously and responsibly with the prospect of fulfilling certain interests, goals and ideals. At the same time, the real values of socialist morals are totally opposed to the specific manifestations of voluntarism, subjectivism and individualism. As Lenin wrote, "Morals serves human society in order to raise higher and to become liberated from the exploitation of work."

Integrated into the party program, the code of communist ethics promotes honesty, modesty, correctness, collaboration and mutual help, solidarity, friendship, humanism, courage, a spirit of initiative and constructive boldness and responsibility for the communist evolution of the country.

As Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu emphasizes, at the basis of educational activity are "the communist principles on life, considering that they are one of the basic duties of our party toward society. These principles mean social equity and justice, humanism, respect for and concern with man and with raising his material and spiritual well-being and, of course, they also mean combatting certain negative manifestations, certain mentalities which conceive of man as a means of exploitation." In conformity with the principles and standards of socialist ethics and equity, it is necessary consistently to promote a critical spirit in general and self-criticial in particular, intransigence toward shortcomings and to take decisive action against inertia, routine, conservatism, self-thanks, egoism and individualism, favoritism, negativism, self seeking, old mentalities of a bourgeois or petit bourgeois nature and customs and habits which bear the imprint of bourgeois life, of the tendencies of some to get rich illegally, without working, and to gain public goods, that is, against everything which in one way or another harms the principles of our society.

The organic assimilation of a revolutionary ideology and of scientific socialism at the level of our entire society, the growth in the contribution to its creative development are the constitutional and formational nucleus, the theoretical basis for a socialist moral-political awareness. The principles of communist morals are subject to a permanent renewal in accordance with each historical stage. As a phenomenon of awareness, morals involves, along with the emotional aspects, also the volitional and those depending on knowledge; there is an indissoluble link between the elements of morals and the scientific ones. For that reason, Marxism combats neopositivist theories which reduce morals to emotions or to an analysis of ethical concepts just as any theory which promotes hypocrisy and falseness, moral liberalism, bigotry or moral-religious fanaticism.

Mastering the principles and standards of socialist ethics and equity, their transformation into departments of life and work, however, is not done merely by simply knowing them, by isolated and formal actions, but by consistent, scientifically organized activity with specific methods and forms. Life shows that isolated, festive-like and circumstantial actions do not have the educational effectiveness desired; such effectiveness can only be achieved by ensuring a qualitatively superior content, a continuity and diversity in strict agreement with the specific nature of each area of activity and social life. In this work of shaping man in the spirit of communist morals, special value lies in promoting a positive example.

A condition sine qua non of the effectiveness of educational activity is the creation and consolidation of a healthy collective moral-political climate, a powerful public opinion which is intransigent toward any kind of violation of the standards of socialist morals. This intransigence in turn is formed in the common effort to build the new society and for that reason it characterizes the big working collectives, steadfastly promoting correctness and combatting any form of manifestation of backward concept. The effectiveness of educational activity also does not depend merely on knowledge of certain documents, principles and standards but on carrying out diversified activity with regard to having workers understand the need for respecting the standards of socialist morals and of formation of convictions and behavior which agree with the socialist model of life. I have mentioned all this since there still are acts violating the standards of social life which reflect an insufficient level of understanding of the exigencies of social progress in Romania. Clearly, the most difficult aspect in combatting manifestations of immorality, amorality, cupidity, self seeking, egoism and so forth is not simply publicizing them or even blaming them in public but prevention of them. For this very complex moral-political and civic activity is needed. The person carrying it out must himself be a model of work and life so that he can succeed in influencing his neighbors.

The basic value of ethics and equity must be evaluated both as a principle of human relations as well as as a value which carries out justice and equality. But for us equality and justice have a deeply political determination and are based on socialist ownership of the socialist resources, on day-to-day work to increase the treasury of material and spiritual values, on striving to continually raise the material and spiritual standard of living of all the people. Equity, as a value of socialist ethics, expresses in general the relationship between the personal and general interests and the necessary balance between rights and duties.

Application of the principles and standards of the communists' life and work and of socialist ethics and equity is a problem of high communist awareness, of dignity, of militant responsibility. But this awareness is not formed by itself but rather through a prolonged and winding process of education, through converging, daily efforts, through the ability of each communist and each worker to dedicate himself with passion and selflessness to the cause and ideals of the party, of society, of the people and to struggle with the difficulties still appearing in the effort at fulfillment and self-fulfillment.

The quality of life dedicated to moral education, this main demand for the stage we are going through represents a reference point and determining condition in carrying out the complicated process of the formation and development of socialist awareness. Clearly, in most locations and in the social-economic units and collectives a large number of actions are being organized with a pronouncedly moral character. But there still are many activities of this kind which are too general, abstract, stereotyped and lacking in preciseness and militant combativeness, which do not promote effective educational solutions. There also still are people who, by failing to understand the unity of socialist awareness, neglect or underestimate the implementation of standards of socialist ethics firmly; such attitudes permit the appearance of phenomena of deviating from the standards of socialist morals.

The recent Council of State decree on preventing and combatting acts which affect good supply for the population, received with total adherence by the workers as an important normative act, also has major significance at this level: respect for the principles of socialist ethics and equity is ensured with greater firmness by punishing certain attitudes which are in total disagreement with the civic spirit of our society.

Among all the initiatives whose central point are actually the promotion and application of the principles and standards of socialist ethics and equity, the model collectives in the highest way represent the basic features of communist morals. These progressive workers' collectives, which are carrying out an express task received from the local party and state organs, take unified action to fulfill the social-economic, political-educational, general cultural, spiritual and sports goals. The model collectives circumscribe their activity around the principles and standards of communist work and life and socialist ethics and equity, in the spirit of the docugram documents of the party, representing through their way of thinking and acting vital nuclei of the communist style of life and work.

Harmoniously combining production work with the activity of moral-political and cultural-scientific activity changes each social-economic unit into a laboratory where the new man is formed with a broad horizon of knowledge, with a moral-political behavior worthy of the person who has assumed consciously his responsibility to create the continually more humane society.

HISTORICAL SURVEY OF ALBANIAN SETTLEMENT IN YUGOSLAVIA

Frankfurt/Main FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 22 Oct 81 pp 10, 11

[Article by Viktor Meier: "A Dagger Poised To Stab Yugoslavia in the Back?--Albanians in Kosovo Want a Republic of Their Own"]

[Text] Representatives of the Yugoslav regime rightly regard the fact that 550,000 Montenegrins are entitled to form a republic of their own in socialist Yugoslavia as evidence of tolerance and respect for conditions that have developed in the course of history. However, when almost 1.5 million Albanians in Kosovo, or close to 2 million Albanians in Yugoslavia as a whole, likewise demand the status of a republic of their own, this is regarded as "counterrevolutionary," "hostile" or an "attack on Yugoslav territorial integrity." Youngsters who daub walls with the slogan "Kosovo Republic" at night, if apprehended, have to go to prison for 2 or 3 years. This contradiction shows the great extent to which Yugoslav nationality policy has come to flounder. The country's reputation of having found pragmatic solutions of complex nationality problems appears to be a matter of the past.

There are quite solid arguments against Kosovo--which, like Voivodina, has constituted an "autonomous region" within the Republic of Serbia since 1945--being turned into an independent Yugoslav republic. One of these is consideration for Serbia and the Serbs living in Kosovo. That area constituted the center of the medieval Serbian empire. Not far from Prizren lies the mausoleum of czar Dushan the Powerful (around 1350) devastated by the Turks. Pec is the seat of the old Serbian partriarchate with its multinave churches. And at Kosovo Polje near Pristina there occurred, in 1389, the battle against the Turks which meant the end of the medieval Serbian realm and the beginning of Turkish rule, which was to last for centuries. The Serbs who have been in Kosovo all along, still constituting about 20 percent of the population of the region and, under pressure of Albanian nationalism, showing a tendency to emigrate, would be pushed into a difficult position. And the second, just as valid, reason is that an Albanian republic within Yugoslavia, which after all according to its name constitutes a state of South Slavs, probably would want to maintain only loose ties with the overall Yugoslav state, which under the pressure of the interests of the various republics is losing cohesion as it is. Instead relations with Albania, and thus the question of the unity of all Albanians, would soon become a question of top priority. These are things that have nothing to do with "counterrevolution." It is difficult for the regime in Belgrade openly to give the real reasons. At least for the moment, the cheap labeling of "counter-revolutionary" is simpler; the only question is how long that will so.

Like it or not, one is confronted with the question of the unity of the Albanian nation. Among Yugoslav politicians and writers who have written about Kosovo in the past few months, so far only Croatian Minister of Education Stipe Suvar, in the Belgrade journal NIN, has admitted as much. He also warned against the present "differentiation campaign" creating, on the one side, many martyrs and, on the other side--among the security forces-- "popular heroes," as during the partisan war.

Today's Kosovo Region, divided by a mountain range into Kosovo proper in the east (with Pristina and Kosovska Mitrovica) and Metohija in the West (with Prizren, Djakovica and Pec) has not always been structured that way as far as its national character is concerned. Serbian and Albanian historians agree that in Metohija--toward the west and today's Albanian border--Albanians have lived together with Serbs since the early Middle Ages, and thus also at the time of the medieval Serbian empire. In Kosovo proper, however, a Turkish economic census which has been preserved, conducted soon after the conquest of the area in the early 15th century, shows that the villages were inhabited almost exclusively by Serbs, together with some Vlachs or Arumanians. Albanian names appear only sporadically. Most local chronicles then show that roughly toward the end of the 18th century or in the early 19th century Albanians migrated into the villages from the Albanian mountain areas--in many cases being settled there by the Turkish feudal lords. Of the Serbs, a certain number moved north, into Voivodina, after the Austrian-Turkish war of 1689-1690. The Albanian immigrants in some places assimilated to Serbian clans, particularly those who had converted to Islam. A countermovement became apparent when Kosovo became Serbian again after the First Balkan War of 1912. From then on and particularly after World War I, new Serbian settlers arrived in Kosovo. The authorities of the first Yugoslavia did everything possible to push the Albanians back. During World War II it was again Serbs and Montenegrins who had to pack their bags. Then, after 1945, came the repression of the Albanians under Minister of the Interior Rankovic, a Serb, about which the Belgrade papers are now maintaining such a stubborn silence when they ponder the causes of the revolt in Kosovo. After 1966 and particularly after the 1968 demonstrations, when a younger generation of Albanian communists assumed power in Kosovo not in name only but in actual fact, the rapid spreading of the Albanian element in public life, due both to a higher birth rate and to a strengthened nationalism, caused many Serbs and Montenegrins to emigrate. First it was those who had compromised themselves under Rankovic, then those who had been retired, and finally, to an ever-increasing extent, those who were evading hidden or open pressure. In the mixed Serbian villages the harvests of the Serbian farmers caught fire, their cattle died, or one morning an Albanian flag had been hoisted as a warning on the farm. While from 1971 to 1981 the number of Albanians in Kosovo increased by 311,000 to 1,227,000 people, that of the Serbs decreased by 18,000 to 210,000.

The origin of the Albanian people is not clear and therefore has given rise to mystifications. In his standard work "Geschichte Suedeuropas" [The History of Southeast Europe] (Vienna 1950), the German historian Georg Stadtmueller mysteriously mentions "proto-Albanian wandering shepherds" who in the Mati Mountains in today's northern Albania resisted Romanization and then, first in the 11th century, then a second time in the 13th century, and a third time in the 15th century, spread like an explosion over large parts of the Balkans. Modern Albanian historiography maintains that it can be shown that the Albanians are direct descendants of the ancient Illyrians.

Whereas a current piece put out by the TANJUG news agency directed against so-called "Albanian nationalism" makes fun of this, there are no solid grounds for rejecting this interpretation. Today's Albanian accordingly would be a language which succeeded ancient Illyrian, with Latin loan words, having bogged down in the process of Romanization, as it were. It also appears likely that the area of Albanian settlement originally was bigger than the Mati area, for it apparently has been shown that at least in part Metohija was included in it.

Later migrations, often voluntary and often the result of Turkish rule, took the Albanians not only into Kosovo but far into Greece, to islands and to the lower part of Italy. Some leaders of the Greek revolt--for example, Kondouriotis from Hydra--were Albanians as far as their language was concerned. In the central Balkans the borders of settlement were drawn by and large in the second half of the 18th century: In addition to today's Kosovo, in present Macedonia the areas of Struga, Debar, Gostivar and Tetovo were inhabited by Albanians, and in today's Montenegro the coastal town of Ulcinj and the mountain areas of Plav and Gusinj were populated by Albanians.

In the area they had settled in, the Albanians lived separated by mountains, split into clans, tribes and tribal groups and professing three religions. About 60 percent were Muslims, primarily residing in central Albania and in Kosovo. About 30 percent were Orthodox, primarily resident in south Albania and in Epirus. And 10 percent were Catholics, centered in Shkoder and in the Miridite Mountains. The Albanian language is divided into Gheg, north of the Shkumbi river, and Tosk, south of it. In the north the tribal constitution persisted, with its strict blood feud in its original form, while in the south and in today's Kosovo it melded with the Turkish feudal rule.

Under such circumstances it was hardly possible for an Albanian national consciousness to develop. In the Greek freedom struggle numerous tribes of Albanian tongue, such as the Himariotes in today's southern Albania and the Suliotes in today's Greek Epirus, fought on the side of the Greek rebels and, not least because they belonged to the Orthodox Church, felt at one with the Greek language. There also, however, existed Albanian traditions, such as the memory of the medieval hero Skenderbeg, who in the 15th century had resisted the Turks for 20 years from his fortress of Kruje north of Tirana.

In the early 19th century the Albanian area witnessed some special developments. One of them was the spreading of the Muslim Bektashi Order, and another was the evolution of semiautonomous dominions, such as that of Ali Pasha Tepelena in Ioannina or the Bushati family in Shkoder. One almost gets the impression that the togetherness of the Albanians manifested itself at that time in several parallel attempts to gain autonomy from the weakening Turkish central power, with individual tribes never having really been subjugated properly. This movement prevailed to a large extent in the decades following the success of the Greek insurrection (1827), with the Albanians' interests then apparently "saturated" for the time being.

Disruption came from outside, not from the Turks but from the Christian Balkan peoples which, as part of the development of modern nationalism, were striving to bring one piece of the Ottoman Empire after another under their control--the Greeks from the south, the Serbs and Montenegrins from the north. To this were added the aspirations of the European powers. These trends threatened to change the status quo. to restrict the area of settlement of the Albanians, to disrupt trade ties and to create new dependencies. The Muslim Albanians were threatened to be ruled by people of a different faith, while non-Muslim Albanians, at least, faced the danger of being incorporated into national states with which they could not identify. In the struggle against these trends there developed the beginnings of a joint Albanian interest--beginnings which, under the influence of western national ideas geared primarily to common language, evolved into the beginnings of an Albanian national consciousness.

This development manifested itself for the first time in concrete terms after the Russian-Turkish war of 1877-1878, when the Peace of San Stefano was to provide for a "Greater Bulgaria" comprising also Albanian territory in Macedonia. Thereupon the chiefs, feudal lords and other representatives of all Albanian areas assembled in Prizren in June 1878 to appeal jointly to the great powers and to prevent the ceding of Albanian territory to the new Balkan national states. This "League of Prizren" is regarded by Albanians as the beginning of their modern national movement. Today's Kosovo Region and the neighboring areas of Debar and Tetovo, which by virtue of their geographical position were most vulnerable to actions by the new Balkan states, also displayed the greatest interest in a joint Albanian policy. It logically followed from this that Kosovo became one of the most active centers of Albanian nationalism, and this in turn explained many of the future developments.

Immediately after the events of March and April 1981, one could read official statements by Serbian communist officials according to which the League of Prizren should be judged by the fact that during World War II there existed a kind of "Second League" of Prizren in which the "fascist" notables of Kosovo had joined to fight the communist partisans. The celebrations on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the League of Prizren, one could read further, had been organized from Albania. Over and above that, the above-mentioned TANJUG piece notes disparagingly that the League of Prizren had been of no use to the Albanians anyway. It did prevent the Montenegrins for years from taking possession of the territories awarded it by the Congress of Berlin, and they even needed the support of the powers to occupy Ulcinj. One of the main concerns of the Yogoslav officials who at present are responsible for exchanging schoolbooks for the Albanians in Yugoslavia appears to be to deprecate the significance of the League of Prizren in the new books.

Yugoslav historiography has reproached the Albanians, and thus also the League of Prizren, for having allied itself with the authorities of the Ottoman Empire and advocated the continuation of Turkish rule. What they actually wanted, however, was to maintain a status quo which had guaranteed cohesion of the area of Albanian settlement and freedom of movement for its inhabitants. In light of the dim prospects of their founding an Albanian national state of their own, there hardly existed another way under the circumstances.

In the Balkan wars, precisely what the Albanians had feared and tried to prevent did in fact occur. In 1912 Serbia and Montenegro divided Kosovo between themselves, and the small independent Albania, created in November 1912 more as a result of intervention by the powers than as a result of the Albanians' own efforts, incorporated only about half of all the Albanians. The Albanians of Kosovo suddenly found themselves under the harsh rule of young Balkan national states and cut off from their usual markets. They rebelled but were beaten by force of arms. It turned out that the Albanians, who had been the last of all the Balkan peoples to adopt the modern national area and the concept of a national state, had come off worst among all of them. From now on, in the course of their further national emancipation, the idea of a united Albanian nation, both in the cultural and in the political respect, was bound to move to the foreground of the Albanians' desires. While this was and is only natural, it just as naturally was bound to lead to conflicts with their environment.

Serbia and then, the Serbian-dominated first Yugoslavia took possession of Kosovo in the sense of retrieving the sacred places of the past which had to be purged again as much as possible of their undesirable ethnical changes. Albanian refugees from Kosovo thenceforth formed part of the picture of Tirana and other towns of independent Albania. Before long those foreign powers which aimed at expansion in the Balkans became aware of this configuration and looked on Kosovo as the second neuralgic point besides Croatia from which Yugoslavia could be unhinged. Primary among them was Fascist Italy, which first brought independent Albania under its influence and then occupied it militarily on 7 April 1939.

Only a few days after the occupation, Foreign Minister Ciano, the architect of this operation, wrote in his diary: "Talks with Stylla, our former ambassador in Belgrade. I discuss particularly the problems of the people of Kosovo--850,000 physically strong and morally staunch Albanians who view the idea of unification with their motherland with enthusiasm. It appears that the Serbs have a terrible fear of that. Today, however, one must forgo the impression that the problem is arousing our attention. On the contrary, the Yugoslavs must be lulled to sleep. But later one should embark on a policy of lively interest in Kosovo. That way an irredentist problem will be kept alive in the Balkans on which the Albanians themselves will concentrate their attention, and it will be a dagger poised to stab Yugoslavia in the back." (Diario, entry of 21 April 1939) And again, in connection with a plan to create a separate Croatia tied to Italy: "Mussolini is quite taken with the idea of smashing Yugoslavia and annexing Croatia. He considers this undertaking to be a fairly easy one, and in light of the situation I think he is right. In the meantime I propose to improve the organization of the Albanians in Kosovo, who may represent a dagger on Belgrade's flank."

The trap the Kingdom of Yugoslavia had set for itself with its treatment of its Albanians was shut in World War II. Whereas in Albania proper the resistance against the occupation increased steadily and nationalists, communists and tribal warriors alike resorted to arms, the majority of the Albanians in Kosovo and in western Macedonia felt the collapse of Yugoslavia as a liberation from foreign rule. After the defeat of Yugoslavia, Mussolini in April 1941 ordered the unification of these areas with Albania proper in a "Greater Albania," which had been the subject of such longing on the part of the Albanian nationalists. Not all Kosovo was part of it, however, and the Albanians certainly would have preferred to have attained their national goal under different circumstances. But even so the communists found it difficult to build up a partisans movement in the Albanian-populated areas.

Vukmanovic-Tempo, a former high Yugoslav communist leader, whom Tito charged with this task, wrote very candidly about this in his memoirs (Belgrade 1971). Reporting about his trip through western Macedonia in spring 1942, he says: "With the annexation of these areas to Albania, the position of the Albanian population had changed fundamentally. The power in villages and towns was in Albanian hands. In the schools, vis-a-vis the authorities and in the street, people freely spoke Albanian. True, the real power was in the hands of the Italian occupiers, but this was not that obvious to the masses. They only saw that a lot had changed compared with the old Yugoslavia; they used to have no rights there, but now they were in charge. It was difficult to enlist this people in the struggle for a change; they were afraid that the conditions in old Yugoslavia would then return. Nor do they accept a new Yugoslavia. They find it easier to support what the occupying power did when it annexed these areas to Albania." It appears worth mentioning that now, almost 40 years later--that is, on 2 September 1981 in Kicevo--four Albanians have been sentenced to 1 1/2 years' imprisonment because they allegedly had changed their names from Macedonian into Albanian.

After the surrender of Italy on 8 September 1943, Vukmanovic-Tempo, with predominantly Macedonian units, managed to take possession of large western Macedonian areas, such as Debar and Kicevo, but immediately got entangled in national questions. He writes: "The Germans managed to win the support of the Albanians forming the majority of the population in this area. There was a danger of a fight to expand the liberated territory in the direction of Gostivar and Struga taking on the character of an accounting between Albanians and Macedonians, all the more so because the Albanians who were fighting in our forces would not have turned against fellow Albanians who were exercising power in the name of the occupiers." Vukmanovic-Tempo reports similar things from Kosovo proper. Only gradually, he says, primarily under the influence of international developments, did part of the Albanians and elements of the intelligentsia join the communist side.

What Vukmanovic-Tempo fails to say explicitly is that Kosovo at that time virtually constituted the main base of the nationalist camp among the Albanians, together with the "Balli Kombetar" (National Front) movement, which had been founded by some notables from the area of Valona. This movement fought against the Italians and then against the communists, also trying as long as possible to keep its distance from the Germans. People from Kosovo played a big role in the politics of the nationalist camp in Albania. Their rule in Kosovo, like the revolt of today, displayed violence also against Serbian monuments as symbols of the Serbian claim to dominion. The monument commemorating the Battle of Kosovo Polje was destroyed, and the abbot of Decani was able to prevent the blowing up of his monastery by an Albanian squad only by secretly hurrying across the mountains to Pec and alerting the local Italian garrison. The fighting in Kosovo continued until long after the end of the war.

In Albania, in addition to international developments, it was primarily the support by the Yugoslav communists that was decisive for the victory of the communist partisans movement. But just as the Ustashe in Croatia had to buy their being installed in power by ceding Dalamatia to Italy, so Enver Hoxha was forced to abandon all claims to Kosovo as the price for Tito's support. Albanian communists who had different ideas in this matter--and there were quite a few of these--were rigorously deprived of any influence. Today the Yugoslav papers are full of bitter attacks against the regime of Enver Hoxha and against the conditions prevailing in Albania. There is no reason to doubt the truth of these Yugoslav reports, any more than there are grounds, however, to doubt the fact that these conditions probably would never have arisen if the Yugoslavs had not made their active contribution at the time. Actually, the Yugoslavs from the start strongly distrusted the intellectual Enver Hoxha and also told the Soviets so. Their man was the later Minister of the Interior Koce Dzodze, who after 1948 was executed as a "Titoite." He was not much better, however. The brutality with which the Albanian population was repressed in the postwar years was about the same on both sides of the border. On one side as well as the other, there was starvation as a result of the pressure against the farmers, and in both countries the authorities tried to force the Albanian population primarily to give up two things--arms and gold. Of the latter, there was quite a bit also on the Yugoslav side of the border. About Debar in Macedonia, they used to say that if the emperor's city of Istanbul were to be destroyed one day, Debar would be in a position to rebuild it.

The regime in Albania consistently continued on its course of self-isolation and repression. It has collectivized its agriculture, is keeping its standard of living low and is shutting off its population from the outside world. Through consistent mixing of the population, it is trying to destroy the old family and clan bonds, and some years ago it prohibited any religious practice. In Yugoslavia, and thus also in Kosovo, things have taken a different course. Since 1966 the Albanians in Kosovo have again been able fully to profess their Albanian nationality. The situation of the Albanians in western Macedonia has improved as well. The Autonomous Region of Kosovo has increasingly been treated as a republic of its own and has received ample development aid. Why, then, many people both in Yugoslavia and abroad wonder, did that revolt occur in spring 1981--a revolt which noncommunist Yugoslavs as well often interpret as ingratitude?

In Belgrade, people today tend to put a substantial part of the blame on alleged "subversion" by the Enver Hoxha regime in Tirana. Whoever does not embrace this thesis, in the eyes of certain Yugoslav propagandists, is a supporter of that regime and an enemy of Yugoslavia. This, however, would then also have to apply to member of the Yugoslav Presidium Stane Dolanc, who in early April before foreign correspondents stated explicitly that Tirana did not play the role of instigator. Dolanc was probably correct in saying so. Contacts between Albania and Kosovo are limited to a small intellectual segment. It was clearly the Albanians in Kosovo who took the initiative, while the regime in Tirana, with its extreme fear of contacts with abroad, went along only reluctantly. The Albanian professors who came to Pristina shut themselves off there, maintaining only slight contact with their colleagues. There is every indication that the regime in Tirana was surprised by the outbreak of the revolt in Kosovo, and it also showed itself poorly informed in the reports of its press. In the beginning Tirana clearly sought to dampen matters, and only after Belgrade had started its press campaign and after repression had begun in Kosovo, did Tirana sound a harsher tone and put out material with emphasis on national concerns. All this probably confirms again the fact Kosovo represents an independent center of an Albanian national idea and, secondly, the fact that in its self-isolation the regime in Tirana would hardly be able to take in hand such a risky business as the starting of irredentist revolts abroad which might also have repercussions at home.

Particularly vis-a-vis Western diplomats, Yugoslav circles in Belgrade try to suggest that pro-Soviet elements might assume power in Albania one day and that then Moscow as it were, would take up that "dagger poised to stab Yugoslavia in the back" which the communist partisans at the time wrested from Count Ciano's hand. Albania, these people say, "pro forma" continues to be a member of the Warsaw Pact (actually it has canceled its membership), and Bulgaria continues to adhere to a mutual assistance treaty with Albania. Apart from the fact that a great many developments are possible not only in Tirana but also in Belgrade, such microcosmic ways of looking at things can hardly be taken at face value. The fact that Albania militarily is a vacuum is also known to NATO. As the visit by the U.S. secretary of state to Belgrade showed recently, the balance in the southeastern European area in the final analysis is likely to depend on other factors.

In Albania, incidentally, all purges of the past few years have affected people who pleaded for a prudent opening up of the country toward the West, and this mood also seems to prevail among the younger part of the apparatus. For years nothing has been heard any longer of any activity by pro-Soviet elements in Albania. With Yugoslavia, however, the present regime in Tirana is hardly like ever to want to make friends; there are too many things from the early years that are still having their effect. This, however, is rather to Belgrade's advantage, for nothing could cause Yugoslavia a greater headache in the Kosovo question than a takeover in Tirana by a reasonable democratic-nationalist regime. In that case the Kosovo question would really become serious.

Being convinced that Yugoslavia at present is not exposed to any real enmity from abroad, the regime in Belgrade apparently relies in Kosovo primarily on police repression and even military repression without giving much thought to political solutions. Even in the confrontation with the Albanians, it is giving free rein to Serbian and Macedonian nationalism; never since the end of the war have such generalizing hostile notes been sounded officially in socialist Yugoslavia against an individual national entity or nationality of the country. True, some "mistakes" have been admitted, particularly economic ones, it being stated that instead of agriculture the heavy and basic-materials industries have been promoted and that a "bureaucratic-budgetary structure" was handed too many funds for free use, and the like. But even here limits are apparent. Despite the fact that 80 percent of the population is active in private agriculture and that there does not even exist a system for buying up its produce, it is not private agriculture but primarily the socialist sector that is now to be promoted. No thought whatever is being given to promoting private crafts and services, which are being neglected in Serbia as it is. Instead of new leaders who would enjoy the confidence of the Albanian population, one has called again on the old cadres from the "administrative" period, such as party Secretary Veli Deva.

Thus Yugoslavia since April has donated almost 300 martyrs to the Albanian national cause, and since there are almost 2 million Albanians in the country, there are still great reserves left on that route. Belgrade can also continue to revile Skanderbeg and the League of Prizren, thus allowing the whole conflict to become a normal conflict of nationalities in the best Balkan tradition. The authorities of the Serbian Republic can continue to try to limit the autonomy of the Kosovo Region again and to subject it both politically and economically to the Serbian dictate. There are officials in Belgrade who are downright proud of the fact that Yugoslavia, like the progressive Occident, now has a Northern Ireland or Basque problem of its own. After a few years, if not sooner, the fruits of such a policy will be reaped. Even now Serbians under the very nose of their own police, as it were, continue to migrate from Kosovo because they are afraid.

It would be better if Yugoslavia took the opposite road and tried to make it a point decisively to put across the advantages its system can offer to the Albanians in Kosovo compared with the system in Albania. That, however, would require again respect of the Albanian nationality and, in the economy, if only to create jobs, would call for a decisive, even radical, move away from socialist dogmas. It would also require a new leadership stratum. One could definitely conceive of an Albanian national movement which seeks to realize its aims in cooperation with the multinational Yugoslav state, but in light of the way the Yugoslav leadership thinks such ideas appear utopian.

MILOVAN DJILAS CITES EMIGRE THREATS AGAINST HIS SON

Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 2 Nov 81 p 3

[Report by Christine von Kohl: "Milovan Djilas Anxious About His Son--A Critic's Dramatic Appeal"]

[Text] Belgrade--Milovan Djilas is concerned about the life of his 28-year-old son, Alexa, who now resides in London after having concluded his studies in philosophy in Graz, Vienna and London. Djilas has received letters from the United States, which he regards as part of an intrigue of Yugoslav intelligence, containing threats to murder his son. Djilas thinks that the recent increase in public attacks against him in Yugoslavia also indicate that he is correct in his assessment. A short time ago, for instance, Vladimir Dedijer, official reporter of Tito and the partisan war, in connection with the publication of new historical materials, called Djilas a "fanatic murderer." And on Friday [30 October] Kolj Siroka, chairman of the Socialist League of the Working People, said it was necessary for Djilas to be "deprived of the right to make antistate declarations."

A total of 9 years' imprisonment notwithstanding--to which he was sentenced by Tito's judges after 1954--Djilas has been able to publish his political views in the West fairly freely during the past 15 years while Tito was alive. Djilas does not have a passport, however. It is known that today there are circles within the party leadership who advocate a public "dialogue" with critics such as Djilas in Yugoslavia but that other circles are downright livid about the "liberties" permitted to someone like Milvan Djilas, particularly since his biography of Tito published immediately after Tito's death. Below in slightly abridged form is a statement which Djilas has transmitted to representatives of the Western press:

"On 26 April 1981 Mr George Urban telephoned me from London to tell me that he has received a letter from Chicago containing a threat to murder my son Alexa. My son would be killed unless I was prepared to 'cooperate' and--in an interview with Mr Urban--reveal all 'secrets' about the murder of Serbs by the communist animals.' The deadline of 31 December of this year was given. The letter also contained a threat against Mr Urban--in the event the contents of the letter should become known to the Yugoslav secret police....

Mr Urban told me that he had sent me a copy of said letter 5 or 6 days earlier, but I did not receive the letter until the following day, despite the fact that airmail from Great Britain normally does not take that long.

The letter, postmarked Chicago, which Mr Urban had transmitted to me in fact contained what he had told me on the telephone. In addition (Mr Urban was so tactful as not to mention it on the phone) it contained the twaddle about my having 'participated' in crimes with which I was totally unfamiliar. In my public memoirs I reported all that I know about the good and the bad things I did in my revolutionary communist past.

Not for that reason, though, not to purge myself, but rather as a father, I find it appropriate, albeit reluctantly, to step before the public abroad.

Why, and why at this particular time, are such letters, such threats delivered? And why in particular against my son? I am not sure about everything, nor can I be, and therefore I cannot give a complete answer.

But the following facts are significant: The request addressed to me in the mentioned letter to cooperate with emigres and reveal 'communist crimes' would at least provide a pretense for preferring charges against me if I write what I think and what I know from my time.

I consider that to be of minor importance, however. It is not by chance that threats are being voiced against my son at this particular moment, because since last year he has critically analyzed the situation in Yugoslavia in political articles in London which have been published in a number of foreign journals.

It is not by chance that my son is being threatened immediately after top Yugoslav officials (Dolanc, Bilic) have attacked publicly him as a 'Chetnik' and 'emigre'- despite the fact that he is 28 years old, completed his military service in Yugoslavia about 1½ years ago and has a Yugoslav passport. Nor is it a coincidence that an article attacking terrorism (VJESNIK of 3 October) mentions my son--in order to make the public more amenable to a crime against my son!

The emigres, without any doubt at all, include murky and irresponsible figures. The critical writings by my son, however, assuredly are apt to disturb such people much less than the Yugoslav regime and its political offices.

I repeat: My son is not a member of any public or secret organization. He does not advocate any kind of extremist ideas or violent methods; my son professes democratic ideas and supports peaceful methods. Undemocratic discrimination and pressures he has experienced since he was a child have shown him the way to freedom--to critical analysis of undemocratic phenomena.

Any father could be proud of a son like mine, and that is one of the reasons why I want to inform the public about the threats against him--threats based on alleged guilt on his father's part!"

(Signed) Milovan Djilas, Belgrade, 17 October 1981.

SIK'S NEW ECONOMIC MODEL DESCRIBED

Bratislave NOVE SLOVO in Slovak No 40, 8 Oct 81 p 9

[Article by Doc Eng Jan Isa, CSc, Economic Institute of the Slovak Academy of Sciences: "From Revisionism to Utopia? New Forms of Sik's Anticommunism"]

[Text] Since departing for exile, Sik has been unusually active in the publishing field. He writes for various Western periodicals, gives interviews (among others, to PLAYBOY), makes television appearances, and publishes books. The evolution of his views, characterized by a shift from rightist revisionism to bourgeois ideology and anticommunism, may be clearly noted in his three main works: "The Third Way," "The Communist System of Power," and "Humane Economic Democracy."

In "The Third Way," he still employs Marxist terminology; explains his attitude toward Marx and Lenin; and, in the spirit of the revisionist "tradition," he strips them of any class content. The main "scientific" conclusion which Sik reached in "The Third Way" is, for example, the assertion that Marxist justification for the inevitability of socialism allegedly "cannot stand up to the scientific confrontation with reality." His "study" of Marxism after many years has led him to the "discovery" that Marx's main conclusion--justification for the inevitability of the rise of socialism--is incorrect. It is true that a similar conclusion, by a somewhat different route, also was reached by Löbl who also disputes the inevitability of the socialist revolution and considers Marx's exhortation to "expropriate the expropriators" a "great historic blunder." It is especially characteristic of Sik and Löbl that they are examining Marx's concept of ownership and trying to prove that the problem of ownership does not have the importance in political economy that Marx ascribes to it. However, they themselves contradict one another on this question because their practical proposals and recommendations refer precisely to social ownership of the means of production which should substantially weaken or completely lose its socialist character.

Even though it is impossible to pick out a single theoretical concept which would be common to the various representatives of modern revisionism, there are certain common features here. One of them is the transition to the concept of the so-called third way. Of course, this concept does not appear by accident, because the idea of a third way emerges in history as a rule whenever elements of social unrest accumulate. Its various interpretations always represented the oscillations of the middle classes between capitalism and socialism and served exclusively ideological defense purposes. The third way, in reality, does not represent the reform program of any genuine social form but is only a shield to defend modern capitalism and reject genuine socialism.

In their overall approaches toward true socialism, modern revisionists have in common the object of their criticism--directed planning, state ownership, or the economic role of the state in general. Although their points of departure differ, Sik and Löbl alike uncritically glorify the market mechanism. Naturally, we do not encounter here the concept of a developed socialism. They claim that, according to the definitions and criteria contained in the works of Marx, Engels, and Lenin, the present stage of development in socialist countries cannot be characterized as a socialist order at all. Their criticism and rejection of true socialism at the same time contain various, often mutually contradictory, "arguments." On the one hand, they claim that, in the Soviet Union and other countries of the world socialist system, when political power was seized by the working class conditions were not ripe for building socialism (and that these conditions also are not ripe even now in developed capitalist countries). On the other hand, they show that, in socialist countries, Marx's theory is being applied in a biased and distorted form, which allegedly should serve to "conceal the antisocialist essence of the system." Sik sees this bias and distortion in the fact that only those theses are selected from Marx, Engels, and Lenin that justify the dictatorship of the proletariat, collectivization of the means of production in the form of nationalization, and central national economic planning in the form of directed plans. After he had thus "defended" and "purged" Marx, he finally reached the surprising conclusion that neither Marx's, Engels's, nor Lenin's concept of socialism is actually correct.

From this it follows that, in the theoretical concepts of modern revisionists, the scientific conception of socialism is completely lost. Thus, they actually took up again the old revisionist "tradition" according to which socialism is something very remote, vague, and lacking any real features. But, then, that means the Czechoslovak revisionists are gradually beginning to abandon even the idea of various models of socialism which, in the past, was one of their chief tools in the struggle against true socialism and its universal legitimacy.

As far as the relationship of Czechoslovak and international revisionism goes, it can be said that, "thanks" to the Czechoslovak revisionists, there also is a temporary revival of revisionist tendencies on an international scale. Their specific "contribution," which is not original at all, refers chiefly to economic theory. For some time now, O. Sik in particular has tried to represent himself as the leading theoretician of Czechoslovak revisionism. He is wholly occupied with criticism of modern true socialism in his openly anticommunist work, "The Communist System of Power."

In addition to criticizing (or rather maligning) true socialism, he has developed his own model, reported in 1972 in his work, "The Third Way." This model (originally designated as a model of "humane democratic socialism") was supposed to be based on "a strong interest in collectivization of capital," which, however, is not to be implemented by "dogmatic attempts at nationalization." This naturally indicated that the prepared model dispenses with the basic feature of socialist economy--socialist ownership of the means of production.

The model advocated by Sik, which relegated to the background the question of ownership of the means of production, brings to mind the plans of rightist social democratic parties stemming from the need to reform at least some of the reactionary features of state monopolistic capitalism.

Sik finally carried out his promises in his recent work which he titled "Humane Economic Democracy" (subtitled "The Third Way"). In this work, Sik summarized and partially revised his conclusions from "The Third Way" and "The Communist System of Power." Although in "The Third Way" he still made formal acknowledgement of Marx, in "Humane Economic Democracy" we note a definite shift to bourgeois ideology. He examines the basic postulates of Marxist economic theory (especially the working theory of value and the theory of surplus value), employs bourgeois economic terminology, and he even dispenses with the concept of socialism. His "third way," that is, his model of the "new" society, he calls "humane economic democracy" which brings to mind Benes's concept of "humanitarian democracy." Of course, Sik's concept is much more utopian and reactionary. In this work, too, he "criticizes" capitalism (sometimes even with sharp words); but this "criticism" is always only a device leading to the criticism of true socialism. He admits that capitalism does not solve the economic problems of the present time; but, at the same time, he claims that genuine socialism leads to even worse consequences, retains exploitation, and intensifies misappropriation. That is why, he claims, a third "noncapitalist and noncommunist" way is needed, the development of which was inspired by "Czechoslovak reform ideas." He writes that the work for his plan was financed by the Swiss National Front for the Support of Scientific Research and the Swedish Arbetlivzentrum. In spite of the fact that he often represents his model as a universal one, that is, one designed for socialist as well as capitalist countries, his real objective is to effect a "reform" (i.e., in reality, elimination) of "the communist system."

By comparing his prior works, one can notice certain new ideas and approaches in Sik's latest work. It is, above all, his thesis that the critical problem "in all discussions on the further development of industrial societies is the future development of human needs." This thesis (which otherwise is very old in bourgeois economy) is new with Sik because, in the past, his ideas on market socialism were based on the conflict of interests. Another difference lies in the fact that he discounts his former idealization of the market mechanism and "discovers" the regulated market. A further "innovation" concerns ownership. Although in the past he inclined toward the ideal of "democratization" of capital, to be effected by means of a corporate form of undertaking, "humane economic democracy" is to rely on a so-called neutralization of capital. In Sik's "new" economic system, the interests of "capital and consumption" are to be united, classes disappear--a real contradiction--and ideal harmony reigns. From this point of view, it is a utopian plan of a "converging" society. Sik admits there are some "shortcomings" in the capitalist system--crises, inflation, mass unemployment, excessive personal consumption along with open poverty, inadequate satisfaction of needs, antagonism between the "South and the North," etc. The solution to the "capitalist dilemma" (which also should be a defensive measure against "communist development") is to be found in "democratization and humanization" of the economy, in overcoming the contradiction between the interests of wages and profit, in increasing economic responsibility by neutralizing capital, in linking plans with the marketplace, and "in establishing democratic, alternative planning of distribution with a regulated market mechanism."

Sik's model of a "new" economic system is supposed to be supported by three basic pillars: the "neutralization of capital," macroeconomic planning of distribution, and regulation of the market. The key element of the model is so-called neutralization of capital, which is supposed to represent a new, noncapitalist but also nonsocialist form of ownership of enterprises eliminating misappropriation. It emphasized that this form of ownership is developed without dispossession of the former owners. "Neutralization of capital" means transferring the constantly recreated financial and production capital into an indivisible fund of enterprise collectives, the administration of which is to be provided by elected directors. Conditions thus are created for genuine "democratization" and "humanization" of ownership but, also, that "miraculous" motive of profit is not lost since Sik also allows, in addition to compensation in the form of wages, acquisition of part of the profit by members of the enterprise collective. He designates the enterprises that operate on the basis of "neutralized capital" as cooperative companies. They are to develop gradually from large capitalist companies. Medium-sized capitalist enterprises, on the other hand, are to be converted into mixed companies which combine private and "neutralized" capital, while small enterprises remain in private hands.

It is difficult to consider this plan, which is not original at all, as other than naive, since it clearly embodies strong influences of the syndicalist concept of enterprise ownership which also is currently being propagated by revisionist and antisocialist forces in Poland. Moreover, Sik's model contradicts his own earlier promise that his theory of "the third way" would overcome the shortcomings of both contradictory systems. Meanwhile, however, we perceive that capitalistic ownership in his "humane economic democracy" does still persist, specifically in small and medium-sized enterprises. At the same time, he fails to say what kind of miracle in these capitalist (or part capitalist) enterprises manages to avoid misappropriation and exploitation and how the promised "humanization" is to be brought about. There is not a word referring to the fact that small-scale production begets capitalism and that concentration brings about a continuous shifting among individual groups of enterprises. According to his naive notion, a mysterious hybrid system should then evolve permeated with private and "neutralized" capital, but society as a whole would be noncapitalist. In his discussions of "neutralization of capital" (and generally in the whole utopian plan of "humane economic democracy") there appears--as in all his prior works--one basic "fault" and that is that he completely ignores one of the determining processes of this epoch--the scientific-technical revolution. Sik's ideas about "neutralization of capital" bring to mind the simplistic theory of effecting ownership by "direct producers" which was propagated here in various modifications in the years 1968 to 1969.

The utopian character of Sik's concept was fully recognized by bourgeois ideologists themselves who otherwise are not sparing of praise in evaluating the anticommunist qualities of similar "reformers." For example, A. Szöllösi, in an article published in 1978 in the SUDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG, characterized Sik's model as a "reformist utopia." This naturally greatly embittered Sik and he compained of the "mean attack" of the rightist dogmatist. He apparently at the same time "forgot" that, in capitalist countries, they do not need him to dream up "reforms" of the capitalist system. The real interest that anticommunist circles have in his "theory" issues from the fact that he attempts, as he himself openly writes in "Human Economic Democracy," to contribute to bringing about a counterrevolutionary revolt in socialist countries and to prevent other countries from taking the road to socialist development. That is the real class sense of Sik's "third way."

PASTORAL LETTERS BY CARDINAL TOMASEK

Praise of Pope John Paul II

Prague KATOLICKE NOVINY in Czech No 33, 16 Aug 81 p 3

[Article by Frantisek Cardinal Tomasek: "In the Light of Faith"]

[Text] Every era has its peculiar problems which address and challenge each one of us: "What will you do in this instance?" In particular, individuals in positions of leadership are expected to make their attitude unambiguously known. The Holy Father is very well aware of that and, therefore, he clearly, frankly and convincingly announces his position concerning every problem of our times, especially the crucial questions.

Naturally, that involves risks particularly in the current era of terrorism all over the world. The Holy Father recognizes that risk, as was dramatically demonstrated on 13 May of this year during his general audience in St Peter's Square. It is evident that the pope knows no respite and is always eager to go out in the world so that he may share with as many people as possible some of the dynamism that moves him in the sense of St Paul's words: "The love of Christ impels us" (2 Cor 5:14).

His long and certainly very exhausting transcontinental travels, his journeys across Italy, or even around his diocese of Rome, and his general audiences in St Peter's Square in a way resemble the journeys of Jesus in His native land. The pope's cultured expression, his modesty, his quiet approach, his readiness to profer his hand and to listen--all that offers a basis for establishment of beautiful interhuman relations. Yet this public activity which is quite manifest has nothing in common with obsequious greetings; it touches upon something trancendental. Once, in a country convulsed in violence, such as Ireland, he courageously rejects any use of violence, at another occasion, in countries with the most advanced consumer society, he pronounces his frank and clearly stated warning against consumerism, then in a country which is proud to call itself "always faithful" he calls for faith and devotion to our church, or, for example, in Brazil, he bluntly scores the injustice committed against the poorest and most helpless people.

Perhaps to emphasize his words even more, this supreme priest had to be literally cut down in one of the calamities rampant in this final period of the 20th century--by terrorism. Even when thus confronted with the world to which he had raised his hand in blessing, the pope accepted his fate with gratitude for this opportunity to face and experience this pain, suffering and finally, also humiliation. There is no pathos in this view of the Holy Father; these words express a simple fact.

We have to regard his pontificate of only 2 1/2 years as a historical event. The significance of such events affects us and challenges us to respond to them because they represent a part of our life as well. We often try to ignore them and would gladly forget most of them. Yet in every instance such events touch our lives and shape the history of each individual as well as the history of all mankind. There is no life outside history. Man simply cannot exist outside the framework of history; without it man can be neither loved nor judged nor saved. The Son of God Himself entered the history of this world and of mankind and sanctified it. Even in our days God exists in history, immersed in the course of events, and it is not always easy to discover His presence. Events are like the burning bush on Mt Horeb (Exodus 3:3) which is not consumed by fire. The phenomenon of the burning bush went on and on, until finally it climaxed in the greatest event, in Jesus Himself, in the event of His Incarnation, in the Word revealed as God's constant presence, in such sacraments as our Lord's Resurrection on Easter day, as a sign, as the word, as the revelation. In all those events, God speaks to us, sanctifies us and wants us to be sanctified by them.

We must view everything in the light of our faith. If our thoughts and contemplations often leave us depressed, resigned or only reconciled with the past, that certainly is not under the influence of the Holy Spirit. We must accept the mystery of the cross which pervades such a great part of humanity. It should never cease challenging us to wrestly with evil which Christ defeated on the same cross.

Need for Greater Morality

Prague KATOLICKE NOVINY in Czech No 38, 20 Sep 81 pp 2, 5

[Section "Christian Realism" from pastoral letter by Frantisek Cardinal Tomasek: "Appeal to Moral Superiority"]

[Text] Many people dislike being told what to do and what not to do not only in public but also by the commandments of God and of our church. Their defiance is often hypersensitive, even pathological. One cannot live without commands and restraints. Let us suppose that one day no orders and prohibitions would apply. We cannot even imagine what would happen on our highways under such circumstances. Let us think about the effect on people's lives--their marriages, family, school, occupation, social life--if everyone could do what they wished. From the same perspective we must look at God's commandments and prohibitions, at the Ten Commandments and particularly on the sixth and ninth commandments.

In His sixth commandment, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and in the ninth commandment, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife," God orders us to live a chaste life. A chaste person is not selfishly wrapped in himself but gives himself entirely in the service of love to God and also of love to one's fellow men.

A chaste person is aware that mutual love between man and woman has its place and can fully grow only in lawful marriage. Only then may this mutual relationship find its fulfillment in a proper atmosphere and to inner satisfaction. Only then can a child receive what is his due and what he needs for his wholesome spiritual and physical growth: a home where love and harmony between his parents offer the child an environment of affection and security, a haven for his future and an example of family life to emulate when the child grows up. Those who do not yet consider marriage or who do not marry at all must live a pure moral life and at the same time, be willing to serve with devotion those in need of help. Thus, motherly and fatherly feelings may be abundantly asserted and bring satisfaction in one's life. That is the spirit in which children should be taught love and care from their infancy. For that reason, we inspire in children interest in others at an early age and teach them to bring joy to others, to help others, to protect others and to serve others. This is the foundation on which pure relations of love will be based in the future. This is the foundation of happy marriages in the future. This is also the foundation of good relations elsewhere, in places of work and in the broader community.

Thus, moral purity has no negative or repressive implications; it is a positive expression of something in us that is truly humane and noble. The deepest moral foundation of moral purity rests on respect for man as God's image in us. That is neither taboo nor exhibitionism; thus both angelism and animalism are wrong and Christian realism is right. Not the dualism of soul and body contradicting each other but inner unity of the whole man correctly reflect the sixth and the ninth commandments of God. They are not restraining but supremely positive in their appeal for moral superiority. People who can understand this prove their spiritual maturity because they leave no room for egotistic consumerism, only for devoted service of love. Naturally, this required determination and self-discipline. Chastity means integration of the whole man, particularly of his love. It does not exploit, it is generous in a humane and noble way. Chastity is not the virtue of the weak but of the brave.

In His sixth and ninth commandments God urges us to have self-respect and noble dignity. It is therefore completely wrong if one says, "This is my own body and I can do with it whatever I wish." The Holy Cross made us members of the transcendental, mystical Body of Christ--our church, as St Paul emphasizes: "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?" (1 Cor 6:15). Moreover, in the holy communion we become a living temple of Jesus Christ. God is everywhere and thus, also in us. Therefore, we are like God's sanctuary always, everywhere, no matter what the place. Furthermore, the Holy Spirit sanctified us in an entirely special way when in our Holy Baptism we became participants in God's life by accepting the grace of the sacrament. Thus, we read in the Holy Scriptures: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are" (1 Cor 3:16-17). Those who are aware of this greatness cannot stoop so low as to defile their own body by themselves or with others and thus, to desecrate it.

Chastity is natural support of moral purity. To be chaste does not mean to be ashamed of one's body--that would be disrespectful of God because God created all that lives. He also created our whole human body with all its organs and functions. All organs and functions of our body are good in themselves if we do not defile them. A natural feeling of chastity is present in every human being so long as he or she develops properly. That feeling serves to protect man in relation to himself as well as in relation to others; it protects him against any attempt to violate his human dignity and rules also his conduct and his attire not only at home but particularly in public.

Regular prayers, holy confession with holy communion and great trust in our heavenly Mother, Virgin Mary, provide a transcendental support for chastity. Lord Jesus arges us: "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation" (Mat 25:41) [attribution should be Mat 26:41]. However, vigilance alone is not enough. We need aid and support from above and that is why Jesus tells us to pray. Our daily program should include regular prayer, particularly in the morning and in the evening. In our evening prayer we must search our conscience in repentance and prepare good resolutions for the next day. Yet even that is not enough: if possible, every month we must participate in the sacrament of reconciliation, in holy confession. Regular confession prepares us well for more frequent participation in the holy communion.

In the Old Testament we read the praise of Judith, a woman whose courage saved her people from the enemy and thus, she became national heroine. What was the secret of her strength? We read about it in the book of Judith 15:11 [attribution incorrect]: "Your heart was strengthened becuase you loved chastity." That is a challenge for all of us; "Love moral purity and you, too, will find the strength you so need in life." The most important, however, are the words of Jesus: "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God" (Mat 5:8).

Prague KATOLICKE NOVINY in Czech No 39, 27 Sep 81 p 3

[Article by Frantisek Cardinal Tomasek: "In the Service of Charity--the 60th Anniversary of the Episcopal Consecration of Archbishop Antonin Cyril Stojan"]

[Text] On 10 March 1921, Pope Benedict XV appointed Dr Antonin Cyril Stojan the 15th archbishop of Olomouc. Dr Stojan received his episcopal consecration on 3 April 1921. When Stojan was a young priest, Rudolf Talsky, priest in Silperk, said of him: "This fellow Stojan--he will set half of the world in motion." The truly humane and priestly Archbishop Stojan attracted and captivated everyone by his service of charity.

Charity is no theory--it is action, and Stojan was a man of action. He never weakened in his service of charity. He knew neither respite nor limit in the incessant bustle of his work. He exhausted himself working. His friends often feared for his health and warned him: "Take care of your health, rest a while." He would reply with a smile: "Sure, when I am in my grave!"

He literally consumed himself in the service of love to others because in his fellow men he saw Christ. Above all, he saw Christ as Christ of the poor. For that reason, as a priest, Stojan followed Christ, giving the needy his last possessions, and when he had nothing left, he would borrow because he could not bring himself to refuse a request. He would receive petitioners any time and any place--in the morning, at noon, and even late at night, weekdays and Sunday, often under the greatest pressures of his work, always with inexhaustible patience, kindness and often with humor. In an effort to expand this service as much as possible he founded the Union of Charitas. He would come to the aid of his opponents without a shade of bitterness. His motto was: "If people cast a stone at you, cast bread at them." He literally gave away all he owned, always and in all circumstances. He would say: "All I own is what I have given away for the love of God." He reached such depths of the highest commandment of charity that many people were incapable of understanding him.

The great heart of this priest could not remain indifferent to Christian disunity. In his love of Christ his brilliant intellect realized the timeless significance of the ideas promoted by St Cyril and St Methodius, ideas of unity in faith and love, particularly among the Slavic nations. To implement the ideas of saints Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs Stojan founded the Apostolate of Saints Cyril and Methodius, a mighty organization for prayer and devotion, which served as the basis for other meaningful programs and, as an example, encouraging the pioneering ecumenical movement long before the Second Vatican Council. His love was extended even to our countrymen overseas where he organized spiritual care for Czech emigrants.

Certain deeply expressive traits of the Moravian character in his personality gave him his captivating charm and made him near and dear to the hearts of the people. He loved simplicity, openness and sincerity. He was innocent of hypocrisy and falsehood. Empty formalism was alien to him. His unobtrusively convincing words never failed to inspire us. We shall never forget his unannounced visits in our seminary chapel where he would address us. On numerous occasions he also celebrated the Holy Mass in the chapel for us. As was his custom, before the holy communion he would say to us a few words full of his vital faith, humility and longing for our Holy Savior. Like a master he prepared our hearts for unity with our Lord. In 1922 he consecrated all 22 of us. His paternal glance rested on each of us with confidence and from his lips we heard the words of St Methodius, the great archbishop, addressing us.

The years of Archbishop Stojan's administration in the diocese of Olomouc were extremely complicated for our church. Stojan, by then with only fragments of his strength left to him and broken down in his service to others, exerted almost supernatural efforts to be, in the words of the Holy Scripture, "like a burning flame and like an incense burning in the fire" for all of us. You can read his testament engraved on his tombstone in the royal chapel of the basilica in Velehrad: "I have showed you all things, how that so laboring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20:35). Christ blessed our whole church with Pope John and the church in our country with Archbishop Stojan.

The process of Archbishop Stojan's beautification in the Olomouc diocese has reached its final stage and soon will be transferred to Rome for further deliberations.

TRADE UNION'S INTERNATIONAL AID--During the first semester of 1981, the ROH (Revolutionary Trade Union Movement) International Solidarity Fund has collected from ROH members Kcs 33,672,547. This amounts to a contribution of Kcs 5.54 per member. The Solidarity Stamp contributions produced Kcs 33,249,735 and direct contributions Kcs 422,182. During this period Kcs 14.4 million were spent from this fund. Of this over Kcs 800,000 went for medical treatment and recreation of trade union functionaries from Syria, People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, Algeria, Lebanon, Jordan, the Palestine Trade Union Center in Damascus and other countries. Pioneer camps for children from foreign countries cost over Kcs 2.9 million. Seminars held for foreign trade union functionaries from Syria, Lebanon, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Malaysia, Philippines and other countries cost about Kcs 500,000. Material help worth more than Kcs 10 million was sent to Vietnam, Cambodia, Afghanistan, Chile, Uruguay, Nicaragua, Zimbabwe, Mali, Guinea, Nambia, Angola, Mozambique, Congo, Madagascar, Algeria, Iraq, Syria, Jordan, Portugal, Italy and other countries. Although the contributions are to be voluntary, some ROH members have complained that they are forced by some district trade union councils to purchase set quotas and only certain stamp denominations. Some ROH plant committees also tell their members how many Solidarity Stamps to purchase. ROH functionaries have been told not to resort to these methods since it harms the ROH politically and discredits the idea of international solidarity. Instead, functionaries should increase their power of political persuasion. [Bratislava PRACA in Slovak 11 Nov 81 p 4]

On the basis of article 10, paragraph 1 of the law of 31 July 1981 on controlling publications and entertainment (Dz.U.No 20, pos.99) the Council of State enacts as follows:

1. The regulation for performing the control of publications and entertainment, which is the attachment to this resolution, is introduced.

2. The resolution is placed in force on the day of 1 October 1981.

Chairman of the Council of State H. Jablonski

Attachment to Resolution of Council of State of 17 September 1981
(pos. 126)

REGULATION
for performing the control of publications and entertainment

§ 1. Whenever in this regulation an expression is used:

(1) Main Office--it is to be understood as the Main Office for Controlling Publications and Spectacles;

(2) District Office--it is to be understood as the district office for controlling publications and spectacles;

(3) Law--it is to be understood as the law of 31 July 1981 on the controlling of publications and spectacles (Dz.U. No.20, pos.99).

§ 2. The regulation defines the detailed procedure for presenting for controlling and performing the preliminary control of newspapers, magazines, non-periodical publications, emoluments prints, entertainment, radio and television programs, films, exhibitions and other means of communication.

§ 3. Whoever applies for permission to:

(1) publish a printed text subject to preliminary control, presents two or, at the request of the district office, three copies of the text, in the form of a finished proof-reader's copy, or two typed copies with all the graphic elements of editor's notations, on which he receives permission to proceed, and presents six ready copies in order to check their conformity with the previously approved text of the corrector's copy or of the typewritten copy, one copy of which is to be returned with a note that it has been controlled.

(2) publish posters, prospectuses, or postcards that partly contain cartographic material, presents for preliminary control one copy of the draft;

(3) perform in public, before making rehearsals, presents for preliminary control two copies of the text and, with the permission of the district office--a scenario of the entertainment; then informs the district office of the time and place of the general rehearsal or of the show's premier, if it is not preceded by a general rehearsal;

(4) publish information that is not daily news nor works for radio and television, presents for preliminary control one, or at the request of the district office, two copies of the script of the radio or television program, and then, before broadcast, makes accessible the text of the program by reproducing it from a tape that has been recorded or filmed;

(5) disseminate information and productions by means of other arrangements that serve to fix and reproduce the sound and picture, presents for preliminary control the recorded text and afterwards the final recordings in the quantity defined in paragraph 14, passage 1;

(6) publish films and other pictures, presents for preliminary control the working copy of the film or picture with the text of the dialogue.

(7) display exhibits gathered for exhibition--presents for the preliminary control the scenario of the exhibition and makes accessible the final shape of the exhibition before its opening.

§ 4.1 To obtain permission for publication, application is made by:

(1) in case of newspapers, magazines, bulletins, radio and television programs--the editor's office;

(2) in the case of other publications and recordings--the publisher;

(3) in the case of shows (exhibits)--the organizer of the show (exhibition).

2. The publisher presents for control non-periodical publications with a letter in which he gives the title, name of the author (if translated, name of translator, and language of the original), volume, format, issue, technique used, name of the printing institution, and he enumerates enclosures with the text.

3. The organizer of the show (exhibition) presents the controlling text of the show (exhibition) with a letter, in which he gives the name of the author and title of the text, type of show (exhibition), time and place of the show (exhibition).

4. The editor of a radio and television program presents to the controlling text of the program (recorded on tape), together with the document of emission, in which he gives the name of the author and title of the program data and hour of emission and the number of the program, on which the broadcast will be made.

§ 5.1 If the text that is subject to control is written in a foreign language, it is necessary to enclose a Polish translation in two copies, with a note from the editor that it is in conformity with the original.

2. The district office can exempt the editor from the obligation of enclosing a Polish translation of the text.

§ 6. In the case of presenting for preliminary control newspapers and magazines, among them dailies, a valid permit for publishing such a periodic should be presented, in order to establish the conformity between the facts contained in the permit and in the publication presented.

§ 7. 1. In the case of non-periodical publications being presented for preliminary control, and of the miscellaneous-printed matter to give the number of the position on the current editorial plan, approved by the Minister of Culture and Art, or the date and number of the permit given by the Minister of Culture and Art for publishing the position number;

2. It is not necessary to present the permit of the Minister of Culture and Art in the case of publications issued in less than 1,000 copies and whose volume does not surpass 16 pages of the format A-5 or B-5; with the exception of every kind of calendar and postcard, the publication of which each time requires the permission of the Minister of Culture and Art.

§ 8. When shows are being presented for control, the organizer of such a show presents simultaneously the permit for conducting an artistic activity, given by proper orgbody of the state administration on culture affairs, or confirmation of the earlier presentation of the show to that body.

§ 9. 1. Texts designed for printing and subject to preliminary control, should be presented to the district office in the geographical area of the editor's office or of the printing plant.

2. Shows should be presented for preliminary control to the district office --in the geographical area where that show will be performed.

3. Radio and television programs should be presented for preliminary control according to geographical definitions established in a separate resolution by the chairman of the Main Office for Publications and Entertainment and by the Chairman of the Committee for Radio and Television Affairs "Polish Radio and Television."

§ 10. 1. The district office granting permission for dissemination stamps the verified text with the notation: "permitted for publication," with the date and signature of the permitting official.

2. If the character of the texts or technical conditions presented do not make it possible to make the notation mentioned in point 1, the district office gives its permit on a separate piece of paper.

§ 11. The district office will refuse to accept publications and entertainment for control if they are not subject to preliminary control on the basis of article 4 of the law, or if the conditions defined in this regulation have not been fulfilled.

§ 12. 1. Publications that are not subject to preliminary control are transferred by the editor to the printing plant with a letter in which he refers to the rule of art. 4 of the law.

2. The printing plant will refuse to run off any publication that is not subject to preliminary control, if the publication was submitted by the editor without the letter, mentioned in point 1.

3. The printing plant will refuse to run off any publication subject to preliminary control, if the editor does not present the permit mentioned in paragraph 10.

4. Art. 3 is not applied in the cases mentioned in art. 13 of law 4.

5. In each publication designed for dissemination, the following must be written on the first or last pages the editorial data: editor and publisher, the size of the issue, year of publication. If the publication is subject to preliminary control, besides the above mentioned data, a symbol of official permit should be included.

§ 13. In order to mark an interposition in the printed text, in the line from which the cancellation of the text begins, a graphic mark should be put down /..../ and immediately after it, in identical square brackets, a passage should be written containing information about the legal basis of that interposition, as indicated in the decision of the controlling body. The above shown graphic marks and text of the information about the law on which the interposition was based should be printed in the same type face with which the text of the whole publication, in which the interposition was made, was printed.

§ 14. 1. The publisher, editor's office, or printing plant provides the district office, immediately after having made first copies, with:

(1) six copies of the publication, mentioned in paragraph 3 point 1, with the exception of miscellaneous printed matter and others, records and cassettes, which should be delivered in two copies;

(2) six copies of publication mentioned in art.4, passage 1, points 7, 8, 13 and 14.

2. In the case of publications (records) made abroad at the order of a Polish editor, he is charged with the duty mentioned in point 1.

§ 15. The organizer of the theater, caberet, circus spectacles, stage performances carried out in accordance with paragraph 13 of point 6 of the law delivers to the proper district office free entrance tickets for 2 persons for each spectacle of the given enterprise.

HIGHER SCHOOL CRISIS DISCUSSED

Warsaw ZYCIE WARSZAWY in Polish 29 Sep 81 pp 1, 3

[Interview with Professor Dr Jan Kluczynski, director of the Institute of Political Science, Technological Advancement and Higher Education, by Andrzej Swiecki: "Higher School in Time of Crisis"; date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] Much is being said about reform of the higher school; about changing the law which regulates its functioning; about the education of students and employment of graduates; about an over-abundance of cadres being educated; and finally--about model changes in the system of higher education. How are these and other matters viewed by the Institute employees during a time of general crisis and what suggestions are they presenting in this regard to the ministry for consideration?

[Answer] We are faced with a general dilemma: what will be the effects of economic reform on the higher school system; secondly--what will happen to the academic and cadre potential of this school system in the event of reducing higher school admissions and third--how should this school system develop in the future. This is a difficult matter. The higher school has, indeed, found itself amid a period of crisis. Everything should be done, therefore, to help it get through this crisis as painlessly as possible in every segment of school operations.

We have considerable experience, for example, in respect to the national economy's demand for qualified cadres and using them, briefly speaking, in the area of that problem which we commonly call methodology of higher school system planning. We have prepared a report, entitled, "Evaluation of Conditions of Development of the Higher School System in Poland." The results of the research were used in the work of the Government Commission which is involved with the problems of cadre planning; we have begun issuing a publication series, entitled, "Cadre Planning." Work in this area will constitute one of the fundamental research problems until 1985. A greater, than until now, development is projected of studies on the prospects and tendencies of the development of the higher school system in Poland and in certain countries of the world, in the light of international comparisons.

We have amassed a substantial wealth of research studies on the modernization of the educational system. They [studies] include various types of qualifications for college admission, systems of selection and recruitment, research on individual university study programs, as well as issues pertaining to the education of talented youth and research on systems of education, which combine studies with work. A considerable portion of the research work is devoted to the modernization of methods and technical means of educating as a result of which technical solutions have become patented.

We are systematically conducting empirical studies regarding the attitudes and behavior of students of higher schools in Poland. As a result of these studies, a report, entitled, "Student 77" has come into being. They [the studies] will be repeated every 4 years, alternately with studies of the academic cadre.

On an international scale, we have undertaken empirical studies of higher school graduates. These will have a significant influence on the work of modernizing the education process and, particularly, on the teaching content and the future profile of graduates, in terms of their preparedness to fulfill professional and social roles...

All these studies are available to those who are interested and, I am glad to say, their use is increasing.

[Question] Let us go on to specifics. Is using cadres with a higher education right?

[Answer] No. This is confirmed by the graduates themselves as well as by their employers. Often these qualifications are wasted with detriment to the economy. And yet, as compared with other countries, we do not have an overabundance of this cadre. For example, in our country only one-third of the age-group of the demographic population completes secondary school and nearly 10 percent--higher education; but among those working for the State-controlled economy, there is 25.5 percent of secondary school graduates and 7.4 percent are higher school graduates. Therefore, these are not the highest of indexes and it would be in the interest of all of us to make the best possible use of these cadres. However, one hundred and one reasons make it so that this matter is not given the proper attention.

I would like to emphasize here that the present crisis and views concerning, for example, the surplus of educated cadres have nothing in common with prognoses. Years ago, we elaborated profound prognostic studies. This is the only and one of a kind material which to date, no one has been able to improve upon. Furthermore, the methodology of these studies was frequently used in other countries, through UNESCO, often in cooperation with us. Thus, our workers have the moral right to claim that they are experts of a high order in this field. As for the fact that these materials were not always utilized, that they created much controversy, particularly, in discussions with the Planning Commission--that is another matter.

I also believe that the subject cannot be analyzed separately because it is also linked to the organization of higher school system management, didactics, use of the scientific-research cadre and also to the problems of upbringing. All of this has a bearing on the preparation of a graduate for work.

On the basis of our studies, conducted for example, under the name of "Student 77," a not too optimistic outline is sketched of the graduate; and this not so much a question of his [the graduate's] preparedness for professional work, which is not as bad as generally presented, but rather of his views on the work itself and his place in life--views, which were acquired, after all during his years at college. The accumulated knowledge about life does not always predispose feelings of optimism towards this work. The initial enthusiasm disappears. Skepticism begins to dominate these views. I believe that the aspirations of young people have not changed but that the outlook on life has become realistic. Even those, who would like to do field work realize that they will not have the proper conditions for it, if only housing conditions, special benefits, incentives and additional opportunities. This will concern, above all but not only, teachers, physicians.

[Question] You are a well-known scholar, author of numerous studies on the various conditions of development of the higher school system in Poland. I am interested in your personal opinion on these most vital of matters for the future of the higher school...

[Answer] I shall begin with a seemingly banal assertion that educational policy must take into account many perspective conditions: social, economic, academic, cultural and others. Educational planning should be strictly interrelated with it [educational policy] and based on verified prognoses. I believe, for example, that in the future as well, the human factor will decide about the success of the Polish economy's development or will be a considerable hindrance to it. Let us then, put our odds on qualifications. Proposal--the work market should be filled with qualified cadres despite immediate difficulties and implications because only such a market guarantees their [cadres] proper distribution, full competitiveness of qualifications and talents (and not of diplomas held), creates conditions for initiatives and new fields in the process of the development of national specializations.

Politicians and planners should also bear in mind, the fact that about the year 2000, the next demographic boom wave of the 19-year-old age-group may be expected, which will be equal to or even greater than the demographic boom wave of the 1975 period. Acceptance of this wave requires considerably earlier preparations in the higher school system; and the following question should already be answered now: is there perhaps not a need to make corrections in the structure of professional education? Such a need does, indeed, exist.

As for my opinion on the model of the higher school system--it is quite critical. It was formed during the period of the country's industrialization and did not succumb to changes for many years. Economic reform, I believe will result in a considerably greater economy in the management of cadres. Administrative excesses will be eliminated. At the same time, we will have to employ new age-groups of graduates. We know that their qualifications are not adequately utilized. On the other hand, it is generally known that the distribution of the qualified cadre in the country is not uniform.

In connection with this, a subsequent question arises: what should be done about the limiting of college applicants? I believe that a median should be found between the population's needs, in terms of education and at the same time, to teach over but within moderation of the so-called, planned demand because, after all, as I had mentioned earlier, the pressure put on the work market by qualified cadres, in a way, compels stimulation of innovations and replacing worse with better. Society should be told, however, that a diploma does not signify a managerial position but presents an opportunity before a young person who must monitor himself throughout his entire active professional life. If we would depart from the privileges which to date have been associated with this formal certificate, then, I believe the higher school system would begin to play an unusually important culture-creating role: raising awareness and social standards.

It should also be admitted that a school cannot achieve this by itself without the assistance of the national economy. The economy should create cadre-receptive positions which would ensure the full utilization of potentially creative talents of higher school graduates. I believe that the economic reform will, to a certain extent, force enterprises to look upon the matter in that way. On the other hand, a school should educate with flexibility, adapting the teaching process to the present capacities and needs of the economy. The independence conferred upon schools should promote not only the creation of, so to speak, self-adaptive mechanisms within them but also constant self-improvement of the higher school. In this, I see a great opportunity to be used by every self-governing school body.

I also feel that during the period of transitional tensions and economic misfortunes, the intellectual capacity of working people may and should be a commodity used in foreign trade and international cooperation. Therefore, the possibility of the organized export of scholarly thought and work of the highest qualified people ought to be considered.

It should also be said that the country's industrial development caused, and this still continues to be the case, the educating of a surplus of technical cadres while devoting less attention to the area of education in the humanities. We are also noting a too slow passage of cadres with a higher education from the production area to, a so-called, service area. Undoubtedly, the maintenance in our country of a homongeneous system of college studies has a bearing on this. This is unjustified. The needs of the economy and the intellectual capacities of people are varied. They should be met half-way. This has a particular significance in our country. We are not, after all, planning for a period of a dozen or so years. We often make hasty plans. I am, therefore, in favor of short cycles of education in the higher school since, for example, must we offer a Master's degree in the area of hotel management and tourism? That is nonsense. However, an additional responsibility also presents itself here to the employer: he should see to it that workers' qualifications conform to current needs simply by making it easier for them to receive proper supplementary education through post-degree studies. It would be a good idea if the new law concerning the higher school system took into account all these problems of close contact between school and practice.

[Question] What sort of changes may be expected in the higher school system in the near future?

[Answer] That depends on the Ministry and in large part on the schools themselves. Higher schools have gained more independence. The role and significance of school self-government is growing. The schools' present depends, therefore, on the initiatives of those directly concerned. I would wish that the basic change would be in the process of awareness, that this school should be a little different from that which we have had until now and to finally pass from the mood of euphoria in the discussion about legislation, about school organization and its democratization--to a discussion of how to work better, how to adapt this work to the changing reality. The higher school should, after all, in large part initiate changes in the national economy...

[Question] Thank you for the conversation.

ROLE OF MILITARY BALANCE IN INTERNATIONAL PEACE, SECURITY

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 17, 5 Sep 81 pp 13-16

/Article by Corneliu Bogdan: "Military Balance and the Interests of International Peace and Security"/

/Text/ Nicolae Ceausescu, in a speech at the festive gathering devoted to the 50th anniversary of SCINTEIA and the celebration of Press Day: "We firmly support disarmament, and particularly nuclear disarmament. We understand the concern for maintaining a balance of power and we are for disarmament, under suitable control, that would provide this balance, that would not endanger anyone's security. But security and balance must be achieved not by stimulating the arms race but by continually reducing arms. This is in the interest of all the peoples, in the interest of the Europeans! We, the European states, must do everything to obtain real disarmament!"

The necessity of maintaining or restoring the military balance in Europe and in the world represents today the main justification for a number of new programs of military preparations that are going to trigger an extremely dangerous spiral of the arms race. Therefore, an examination of the concept of military balance and the way in which it is applied has a not only theoretical but also practical significance, directly connected with the possibility of identifying the concrete ways and means to stop the arms race and achieve disarmament, to provide lasting peace in the world. Certainly, both time and power, and particularly military power, will continue to play a role in international relations, and military balance will represent a condition for international peace, security and stability. However, what cannot be understood and accepted at all is the tendency of some political and military circles to provide this balance by continually increasing arms, by raising them to higher and higher levels in terms of value. As Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu said in the speech at the Second Congress of Working People's Councils, "Nothing, no kind of theories about military balance can justify the growth of arms! It is understandable that in achieving disarmament it is necessary to provide a certain suitable balance that does not affect the security of any party. But this must be achieved not by increasing arms but by reducing them, by continually and systematically reducing military expenditures and troops, by turning to the definitive elimination of nuclear armament under suitable international control."

A Chief Source of the Arms Race

As far back as in the most ancient times, from the beginnings of the existence of the states and the relations between them, the balance of power has asserted itself as one of the "classic models" for organizing these relations. Under the conditions in which, on the one hand, there was not--and there cannot be--an international central authority capable of organizing and administering the relations between states and, on the other hand, the states were based on social and/or national exploitation, on inequality--which, on the plane of foreign policy, found its expression in tendencies to extend the exploitation to other peoples too--the chief criterion for organizing interstate relations could only be that of relative military strength. Under these conditions, two main "models" of organization of international relations appeared. The first, in the situation in which there is a state or a group of states with a dominant military force: hegemony. The second, in the situation in which the international configuration includes states or groups of states that have equal or, in any case, comparable military forces: balance of power, and particularly military balance.

Military balance can appear as the result of an express understanding between states, but it asserts itself--even in the absence of such an understanding and in the absence of a power or a group of powers capable of imposing its hegemony--as a "natural state" of the interstate relations in an international system based on force, as a chief criterion for organizing these relations. From the very outset, however, the balance of power is affected by an objective reality: there is no objective criterion or no supranational authority that--on the basis of such criteria--can proclaim the existence of military parity and thus the necessity of stopping the arms race. The decision regarding the definition of balance and then regarding its existence or absence is made by each particular state, in conformity with its own strategic views and interests, on the basis of its own interpretations and perceptions of the military policy and preparations undertaken by other states.

There have been attempts at times--especially of late, through negotiations--to reach an agreement about a more objective, generally acceptable definition of military balance or parity. But the negotiations have not yielded results, and this failure is due especially to the international system within which the achievement of military balance is being sought. In a system based on force, as a chief factor in world politics, military balance becomes more and more a source and a justification for a policy of military blocs and alliances, a policy of spheres of influence and zones of domination. On the other hand, for the most part, military balance acquires a political and ideological dimension, pursuing the maintenance of not only the international military status quo but also the political and social status quo in the world.

In this context, the diplomacy of military balance becomes a diplomacy of soundproof doors, of secret talks, of agreements made behind the backs and to the detriment of the peoples, a diplomacy which not only does not create conditions favorable to the achievement of equitable agreements but which, in fact, nourishes and stimulates distrust. In this framework, the search for military balance means, in fact, the search for military superiority. The states--American Prof Inis Claude said--"give evidence, usually, of the desire to possess forces superior to those of their rivals or potential enemies, whether for the purpose of attacking the status quo or out of the desire to increase their feeling of security against attack. In view of the difficulty of precisely making accurate appraisals of the relative strength, the statesmen rarely feel themselves to be in a comfortable state of security without having an additional reserve of forces. The system (military balance--our note) breeds competition; it is pervaded by a spirit of rivalry."*

The search for military balance has thus become--within the framework of the policy of force and dictation, of redivision of the spheres of influence and domination--a chief source of the arms race.

The Lessons of the Past

As a result of the tragic experience of the two world wars, attempts have been made to create a new system of security, in which the role of military balance would be reduced and gradually eliminated. For a certain time, the concept of collective security was the basis for these attempts. This concept started from the thesis of the indivisibility of peace, from the fact that an act of aggression against any country represents a threat to the general peace and, therefore, all the states must unite to prevent or put an end to aggression, using for this purpose even the collective military power of the international community.

The creation of an international organization seemed necessary for organizing this collective joint effort of all the countries. As is known, the first attempt of this kind--the League of Nations--failed in the catastrophe of World War II. The United Nations represents the second, and still active, major scheme for organizing the collective security. Cordell Hull, the U.S. secretary of state, who participated actively in the preparation of the Charter of the United Nations, asserted that, with the creation of the United Nations, "there will be no need for spheres of influence for alliances, for a /balance of power/ [in italics] (our italics) or for any other special arrangement by means of which, in the unhappy past, the nations tried to safeguard their interests." To what extent have the expectations of Cordell Hull, and of many others, been fulfilled?

The United Nations has undoubtedly made notable progress in world politics. Learning from the experience of the League of Nations, whose official documents did not illegalize war as a means of regulating disputes between states, the Charter of the United Nations, through the outlawing of war, through its basic principles--full equality in rights for the states, respect for national independence and sovereignty, noninterference in the internal affairs of other states, and cooperation between states regardless of their social system--has made a significant contribution to the creation of the indispensable legal base for a stable structure of peace and security in the world. The United Nations has made a positive contribution to the promotion of international understanding, to the avoidance or regulation of conflicts, to the hastening of the elimination of colonial domination. The system of specialized agencies of the United Nations has become an indispensable instrument for organizing international cooperation in essential fields of human activity: economic and industrial development, agriculture and food, health, environment and so on.

* Inis L. Claude, "Power and International Relations," Random House, New York, pp 88-89.

However, the United Nations is far from having become that instrument meant, according to the charter, to save the future generations from the scourge of war. Despite the progress that it is making, the charter and the practical activity of the United Nations still bear the stamp of the realities, of the relative strength in the years of its creation, 1944-1945. At the same time, in the "cold war" years, the distortion of the very concept of security occurred, with the military blocs and alliances arising after World War II--the main element of the policy of force and of spheres of influence in these days--being presented as "embodiments of security."

On the other hand, when the position of the developing countries and the small and middle-sized countries in the United Nations became considerably stronger, there arose the tendency, present even now, to exclude the basic international problems from discussion in the organization. Naturally, the struggle to strengthen the United Nations, as an effective instrument for international peace, security and cooperation, is continuing, and even within the UN Charter there are in this regard countless possibilities still unexplored and unutilized.

But it is no less true that the postwar attempts to organize interstate relations have not managed to eliminate the shortcomings, in fact now widely recognized, of the policy of providing military balance by continually increasing arms, have not managed to provide this balance by the only rational means--that of continually reducing the level of arms and armed forces.

The reason for this situation must be sought not in the military-balance concept in itself but in the inability or the lack of desire, even of the critics of military balance, to break the umbilical cord that, in their view, connects this balance to the policy of force. As long as the balance of power is considered the pivot of an international system based on inequality and inequity, supported by force, and particularly military force, the search for this balance will serve only as a cover for a continual and accelerated arms race, with all the grave consequences that this has for the peace, security and progress of mankind.

The situation would be completely different if military balance were approached within the framework of a new view, a new conception regarding security, that would replace, in the relations between states, the primacy of force with the force of right. Defining the essence of the Romanian view regarding security in Europe, Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu said: "European security requires, in our conviction, a system of firm pledges by all the states and of concrete measures of a nature to lead to the exclusion of force and of the threat of the use of force in interstate relations, to offer to all countries full guarantees that they are safe from any act of aggression. Such a system will have to provide for the peaceful, unimpeded development of each nation, in conformity with its own will, in a climate of mutual respect for national independence and sovereignty, noninterference in internal affairs, and full equality in rights for all states and peoples."*

All these principles are completely valid and must be extended to the scale of the whole planet. They represent the foundation of a new view regarding international security on the whole. This is, in fact, the sense of the new international economic and political order that socialist Romania is consistently promoting. In the center of the Romanian view regarding the new world economic and political order there stands the thesis according to which force is not an immutable trait of international relations, but a result of the system of relations based on inequality and inequity between nations, a system that cannot be maintained, in the final analysis, except by force. Of course, we have in mind not those inequalities that find their explanation in objective situations (differences between states from the viewpoint of size, population and natural resources), but those which, using these inherent differences, create privileged situations for the stronger states from an economic or military viewpoint at the expense of the vital interests of the small states, the economically less developed ones or those with fewer resources.

In order to truly embark upon the path of achieving the new international economic and political order, it is necessary to start by attacking the main sources that nourish the above-mentioned inequalities and generate force as the ultima ratio of world politics. In particular, it is a question of stopping the arms race, which has become the main source of nourishment for the international system based on military force, a system that, in the final analysis, is a system of war.

The place and role of military balance within the process of achieving the new international economic and political order will change radically. It is clear that the transition from the old international system to the new one is a lengthy process that can advance only gradually, through the joint efforts of all the states. In the transitional period, when, inevitably, elements of the old system will coexist with the first structures of the new one, military force will continue to play a role and, therefore, the problem of controlling this force--but in order to continually reduce its role--remains an important concern.

The only rational, practical way to achieve such control, without creating feelings of suspicion and insecurity in any country, is the maintenance of military balance, but at a lower and lower level.

The very process of achieving the new international economic and political order creates favorable conditions for achieving an agreement regarding military balance at lower and lower levels of armed forces and arms. Indeed, the achievement and functioning of the new world economic and political order presuppose a continual process of negotiations between all the states, based on equality and mutual respect, in which generally acceptable solutions may be found to the more and more complex problems that the relations between them pose. Such a democratic framework of negotiation could reduce considerably the subjective elements of suspicion and distrust, which--as I stated above--have thus far weakened the discussions on military balance and have been one of the main reasons for the failure of the disarmament talks.

In this context, it ought to be pointed out that the concern for achieving military balance in Europe should be an argument for convening as soon as possible a conference for measures of trust and disarmament in Europe, within the framework of the process initiated by the Helsinki Conference, with the participation of all the states involved, and /not/ [in italics] an argument for a new race to install nuclear missiles on the continent.

In general, the development of the general process of restructuring interstate relations on new bases, ones of equity and justice, would create and consolidate continually both the political framework and the atmosphere of trust needed for progress in the efforts in the direction of reducing the role of force and, ultimately, eliminating it from world politics.

The strategy of gradually eliminating force from interstate relations and achieving new international relations is not a product of abstract thought but is anchored in contemporary realities. Under the pressure of the scientific and technical revolution and of the social and national revolution, war is losing more and more its significance as a means of "solving" international problems. Today, in a global war with mass-destruction weapons, there can no longer be a winner.

"Limited" military interventions are, in their turn, more and more inefficient and dangerous even for their initiators. Even noted theoreticians of the old order, promoters of the revival of the policy of force, like American Prof Robert Tucker, warn that "it would be irresponsible to assume that interventions in the future will prove less costly (and risky) than those in the past. The Third World (which is usually the object of the "limited" interventions--our note) has not become more passive since 1960 on. On the contrary, it has become almost everywhere more resistant to the attempts of the great powers to exercise the control or the influence that was once part of the old order of things."* In these days, there have appeared immense social forces that are capable of completely eliminating the imperialist policy of redivision of the world into zones of influence and domination, of bringing about the cessation of the arms race and the resolution of economic, social and political anomalies that maintain and deepen the crisis, of imposing the promotion of a new, democratic policy in the world, based on social justice and equity, of providing peace on our planet.

The Imperative of a New Approach

The necessity of a new approach to the problems of military balance is imposed--beyond any considerations of an ideological, political or philosophical order--by the objective data that define the influence of the scientific and technical revolution on modern arms and the arms race.

The objective limits of the destructive capacity of the weapons have been practically eliminated, while it is becoming harder and harder to measure with a reasonable degree of accuracy the forces of the states. The differences between strategic and tactical weapons and between offensive weapons and defensive ones are being gradually erased and the possibility of a wide proliferation of mass-destruction weapons is being created through the involvement of not only a greater and greater number of states but also of nongovernmental entities in this arms race.

The probability of an accidental conflict increases in proportion to the improvement of the weapons, and if steps are not taken in time, the probability can become an inevitability. Indeed, the danger of an accidental nuclear conflict follows from, among other things, the growing, objective necessity of controlling by means of computers with more and more complex programs the huge stocks of arms accumulated. A computer can do in an astonishingly short time calculations that, done by hand, would take scores or hundreds of years, but the checking, the complete testing of a complex computer program would take an even longer time. As a result, complex programs are in fact--and it could not be otherwise--introduced into the control and military-warning systems without complete testing. For the most part, false alarms are thus an inevitable consequence of the way in which the complex computer programs are composed and operate. In proportion to the improvement of the weapons and the shortening of the time for transporting these weapons to the target, the decisionmaking factor's possibility of dealing with these false alarms falls dramatically, and decisions regarding the launching of a nuclear counterstrike should be made in a few minutes. The danger that accidental war represents increases with the improvement of the weapons.*

Although these problems have been discussed very little in specialized publications and although, naturally, some official circles prefer to be discreet about them, confirmations of the above conclusions occasionally come even from official documents. In a report drawn up by the investigative agencies of the American Congress and published on 26 May 1981, it is stated, for example, that the computerized system for warning in the case of a nuclear attack against the American continent (NORAD) had caused five false alarms in the previous 18 months "due to errors of procedure, management and technical design." Although it states that all five false alarms did not go beyond the first warning phase, and three of them could have been prevented, the report nevertheless concludes, according to the UPI agency, that "erroneous indications could appear again, because /it is not possible to build a system/ [in italics] (our italics) that would cover all the exceptions."

Undoubtedly, this new situation in military technology requires--regardless of any other considerations--a new approach to military balance. The search for military balance by increasing the military preparations is becoming a blind race toward an imbalance and a catastrophe that threatens the life, the very future of mankind. What can come from, for instance, the decision of the United States regarding the production and stocking of the neutron weapon? Clearly, far from contributing to the military balance, the implementation of this decision will give a new impetus to the arms race, will create a new source of tension in international life, will introduce a new destabilizing factor into a situation already so highly complicated. The only way to provide military balance at all worthy of the name, capable of playing a positive role in international life, of helping to safeguard peace and human civilization, is that of stopping the arms race and reducing arms and armed forces.

In a speech given on 19 May 1981, in Washington, on the occasion of receiving the Albert Einstein Peace Prize, American historian and diplomat George Kennan said, among other things: "Anyone who does not understand that when it comes to nuclear weapons the whole concept of relative advantage becomes illusory, anyone who does not understand that when we talk of absurd and insane quantities, capable of killing many times over, the ratio between arsenals (of the states) does not have much significance, anyone who does not understand that the danger lies not in the possibility that someone else may have more missiles and warheads than we have, but in the very existence of these uncontrollable quantities of very deadly explosives and, in particular, in their existence in the weak hands...of human beings--anyone who does not understand all these things will not be able to get us out of this darker and darker and more and more menacing forest of contradictions in which we have gotten lost." To get out of this impasse, there must be--according to Kennan--"a bold action" that "cuts with a scapel into the exaggerated anxieties, into the nightmares that we have created for ourselves, into the refined mathematics of destruction," and in this spirit, he suggests, as a first step, the immediate and general reduction of the nuclear arsenal of the main powers by 50 percent, with the application of this measure being verified by the national means of the respective countries.

In the same spirit, Republican Senator Mark O. Hatfield, the chairman of the Allocations Committee of the Senate, after judging that the SALT process (the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks) was not capable of braking the speedup of the arms race, states that the main nuclear powers have never been so equal from a strategic viewpoint as they are today. "The statements made by military experts speak of general parity.... Moreover, this general parity is occurring under the conditions of a nuclear ratio in which neither of the parties has gained the effective capacity of a first strike. The new arms race will shatter this balance. Consequently, now is a time that offers us a historical occasion to avoid moving through a precarious and unfamiliar minefield" and "to lay the foundations for our survival."* Hatfield also proposes a nuclear moratorium that would include the testing of missiles in the air, all types of nuclear explosions, and the placement of missiles or bombers beyond the number existing at the time of entering into the moratorium.

Of course, the above-mentioned viewpoints and proposals are still far from having become official or dominant positions in public opinion in the countries of their authors. But their appearance in circles that had and still have influence over the official policy, and the wide movement in western Europe and in other countries on other continents against the neutron bomb and nuclear weapons in general, point up the possibility of creating a wide and effective front of action for stopping the arms race and turning to real disarmament measures.

However, this possibility is not transformed into a reality automatically but only as a result of the continual activity and contribution of all the countries and peoples, of all the progressive, democratic forces throughout the world, of the responsible factors in all the states. Our country, too, is acting in precisely this spirit, starting from the consideration that today, in order to safeguard the peace and future of mankind, there is no task more important and more urgent than stopping the arms race and achieving disarmament.

The many and repeated proposals of socialist Romania and Chairman Nicolae Ceausescu in this regard are, in general, well known, including the reduction of arms expenditures (in an initial stage, the reduction of military budgets by at least 10 percent), the reduction of the number of troops and the stocks of arms under strict international control, the banning of military maneuvers and and of demonstrations of force on the borders of other states, the achievement of an agreement regarding the establishment of zones of 10-20 km within each state in which arms and armament would not be placed, except for those needed for guarding the borders, and other measures of a nature to contribute to strengthening the trust between states, to braking and reversing the trend of continual growth in military arsenals.

Constructive, Realistic Proposals

In preparing its proposals, Romania has taken and takes into account consistently the necessity of maintaining the military balance and respecting the security interests of each state.

It can be said that this concern passes like a red thread through all the Romanian proposals. Not only the proposals regarding the substance of the disarmament measures but also the Romanian proposals regarding the democratization of the framework for negotiation of disarmament serve this goal. Indeed, such a democratic framework, based on the participation of all the states under conditions of full equality in rights, provides favorable conditions for formulating as objective judgments as possible for determining the parameters of a generally acceptable definition of military balance.

Naturally, while promoting its own proposals, our country welcomes and examines attentively the constructive disarmament proposals of other states. As is well known, Romania welcomed the recent proposals of the USSR regarding ballistic missiles with a medium range of action in Europe or the expansion of the zone of applicability of the measures that would come to be adopted by the conference for measures of trust and disarmament in Europe. These proposals are of a nature to contribute to the beginning of constructive negotiations for adopting generally acceptable measures for stopping the arms race on our continent, which would have salutary effects not only in Europe but also throughout the world. In the same spirit, our country and public opinion in Romania will welcome and support any other concrete proposal for disarmament, military disengagement, or growth of trust, wherever it may appear.

Unfortunately, the efforts of the peace-loving states and of world public opinion are still encountering much opposition. It is certainly not possible to understand at all the lack of action and interest, the passiveness regarding the imperative of disarmament and, in particular, the fact that the new arms plans are drawn up in the name of the necessity of maintaining or restoring the military balance. Such an attitude demonstrates a dangerous misunderstanding of the fact that in reality, in this field, we are in a race against time. The more the cessation of the arms race and the beginning of the arms-reduction process are delayed, the more precarious the military balance becomes and the more real the danger of military confrontation and destabilization becomes, with unforeseeable consequences for the future of mankind.

In these days, the struggle for a righter and better world, for an international climate of security and peace, in which each nation and each people can possess fully the right to a free and fruitful life, is inseparably connected with the struggle to stop the arms race and achieve disarmament, particularly nuclear disarmament--a vital desire of all mankind.

PROBLEMS OF PROVIDING MEDICAL CARE IN WAR ZONES

Bucharest REVISTA SANITARA MILITARA in Romanian No 3, Jul-Aug-Sep pp 259-266

[Article by professor doctor Major General Dr Alexandru Gr. Popescu, doctor emeritus and a corresponding member of the Academy of Medical Sciences, and doctor Colonel Dr Constantin Stanculescu: "Aspects Regarding Medical Care During a War for the Defense of the Country by All the People"]

[Text] The military doctrine of the Socialist Republic of Romania, drawn up and substantiated by comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, establishes the statutues for the defense of the country's independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity as a task and cause for all the people. The leadership of the entire defense effort by the Romanian Communist Party, the vital center of our socialist nation, ensures the implementation of our military doctrine in all its basic facets and components.

In the overall group of constitutive elements of the national defense system, an important role in applying the requirements of our military doctrine in the area of medical care for the troops belongs to the medical-health formations and units. The organization and leadership of these units are achieved according to a unified plan, the result of collaboration with the central medical organs and the organs of the local defense councils. In this regard, even during peacetime they establish the possibilities of providing hospital care for the army and the national health network, the supply resources for all categories of health materials, measures for anti-epidemic care, the supply of evacuation materials and so forth.

Medicine in the Field

The military doctrine of the Socialist Republic of Romania, substantiated and drawn up by comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, our supreme commander, reflects to the fullest degree the policy of our party and state regarding the participation of all the people in the defense of the country and in the armed struggle to preserve national sovereignty and independence.

Essentially, from a structural point of view, the general national defense system involves the organs and forms of political-military leadership for defense, the combat forces and equipment and the organs and means of providing medical care to the forces participating in combat actions, as well as the organs and means of providing technical-material assistance. Each component represents a subsystem in itself with its own elements and structure, falling within the overall integrated national defense system.

The dissimilar characteristics of preparing for and starting armed conflicts, as well as the later waging of military actions, attest to the need for the timely organization of a group of activities and measures in the area of medical care. These are designed to attenuate the effects of such armed actions by an aggressor having frequently disastrous consequences upon the state of health of the troops and the populace, as well as upon the national health network, by limiting the opportunity to give specialized medical care and the opportune evacuation of the wounded.

The considerable destructive effects of modern armed conflict on people, as well as the complex conditions under which combat actions are carried out, conditions that are especially difficult, cause us to estimate that, in our view, the health losses in a confrontation involving all the people could exceed the percentages known to date. This evaluation is backed up by the documents regarding the armed conflicts of the last 3 decades, in which the declared losses of the belligerents were proportionally greater than in the past, if we consider them in relation to the number of participants and the length of the wars.

Similarly, the recent conflagrations have demonstrated the major importance played by promptly beginning the treatment and hospitalization of the wounded and taking the entire group of preventative measures in the shortest possible time, both for maintaining the troops' combat capabilities and their morale and for creating the opportunities for filling out the units with personnel who have recovered from their wounds and illnesses.

The organizational principles and the specific forms and methods of carrying out medical care activities are adequate for the requirements of our military doctrine.

The provisions of our military doctrine, the experiences accumulated to date and the studies conducted regarding the judicious use of the country's human resources both in combat and in the economy outline the participation of the army's medical forces and means in medical care activities, together with those of the country's health network and other existing reserves in the country that can be used for medical purposes, as one of the basic principles of the concept of providing medical care in the all people's war to defend the country.

Similarly, we can identify as basic principles of providing medical care the permanent collaboration in a unified manner of all the medical forces and resources that our country has, as well as the organization and carrying out of medical activities in accordance with the structure, purpose and scope of operations, the participating forces, the positions adopted and the weapons and equipment used by the aggressor, keeping in mind the characteristics and conditions under which the combat actions are carried out.

We can mention that the efficiency of the medical care measures is directly influenced by the medical-military training during peacetime of all medical-health personnel, having as its final goal the achievement in a short period of time, in the event of aggression, of the positioning of medical forces and equipment and the prompt fulfillment of their tasks.

From the study of the multiple situations and conditions under which combat actions can be carried out within the framework of the all people's war and keeping in mind that the premises of the strategic deployment of forces can be achievement on a timely basis, it is necessary for medical care measures to be appropriately correlated with these factors and to include the medical forces and resources within the armed forces, the patriotic guards, civil defense formations, youth formations and the Red Cross.

Medical care measures must be staggered over time. have an adequate scope, be successively carried out in accordance with the role and place of the forces within the general disposition of strategic cover and, continuing, the disposition of strategic defense, respond to the requirements of counterattacking the enemy's offensive actions and repelling its assaults, and, finally, be capable of satisfying the medical demands under the situation of gaining and developing the strategic initiative until the aggressor is driven from the national territory.

All these considerations with regards to medical care can be achieved with a maximum of efficiency in cases where the measures are initiated, prepared in detail and carried out during peacetime by all the military and civilian medical forces, both at the central level and the local one, in accordance with the probable situations for the deployment of the armed forces and patriotic combat formations, as well as the potential enemy's means of launching its attack. We must also keep in mind that the defender can prepare its medical care measures either completely before the attack or concomitantly with the attack or partially prior to the attack and the rest during the attack.

Under modern conditions it is difficult to presume that all the preparatory measures for providing medical care to the forces participating in a war to defend the country can be achieved just prior to an attack and, as a result, we have the principle of needing to foresee and organize this care during peacetime. To this end, adequate measures are necessary regarding preparing the country for defense, which also include numerous activities and measures designed to resolve major problems of medical care and hospitalization for the wounded and sick and of supplying health and pharmaceutical materials both to the armed forces and the people's combat formations and to the populace.

In addition to the previously mentioned measures, included in this context are the health training for the populace and especially those persons serving in mass organizations and Red Cross organizations so they can directly contribute to providing first aid to the wounded, the evacuation of the wounded and the correct implementation of certain measures to prevent and combat epidemic illnesses.

Similarly, the construction and the most judicious national distribution of hospitals, sanatoriums and rest complexes, in general, and those facilities slated for the needs of the army, in particular, as well as the achievement and convenient dispersal of certain stocks of health and pharmaceutical materials and biological products and raw materials necessary to the production of certain medicines that are indispensible to the granting of medical aid, are also premises that ensure the optimum establishment of medical care measures. Among these, we must also mention those that refer to the design and construction of vehicles used in the economy, as well as means of rail, air and ship transportation, that can be used, with a minimum of modifications, in the evacuation of the wounded during the period of setting up the army's specialized formations and during the carrying out of combat operations.

The dominant features of medical care activities within the framework of a war to defend the country are the complexity, diversity, independence and resolution of the treatment and evacuation of the wounded and sick, sometimes using improvised means.

We note that these features do not assume the coincidental carrying out of medical care activities, but their organization within a unified concept under the direct leadership of the military medical organs in cooperation with the appropriate organs of the Ministry of Health and the local defense councils.

The complexity and diversity of the medical care activities are determined by the diversity of the forces participating in the combat operations: divisions or brigades and units of the army, security troops, partriotic guard units, youth detachments, civil defense formations and so forth. The heterogeneous nature of the forces participating in the war to defend the country determines the appropriate measures for providing medical care, depending upon the role and place of these forces in combat.

A special role is played by the national health network established to assist the armed forces during the period of raising combat capabilities and during the time of preparing and partially or generally mobilizing the troops and the medical field formations. In cases where the attack is imminent, upon receiving orders the national civilian hospitals identified to receive and treat the wounded and sick from the units of the army will carry out preparatory activities according to the provisions outlined in plans for this purpose.

Further, we will also look at the organizational problems regarding medical care during the initial period of an all people's war to defend the country, considering these problems important in the later carrying out of activities to evacuate, treat and hospitalize the wounded and sick.

From the study of the manner of starting recent military conflicts, it is known that they can be initiated with surprise attacks by using certain air strikes, motorized infantry and airborne and naval assaults at the vital points of the defender even during the period that precedes the mobilization of medical field formations. In order to provide the medical care to the forces that absorb the weight of the first strikes carried out by a superior enemy force in all its aspects, it is necessary to plan special measures that can be gradually achieved and implemented as need be. Thus, formations (subunits) must be organized to evacuate the wounded using the specialized and non-specialized means of transportation available at the local level and, at the same time, establishing different national military and civilian hospitals to support the armed forces, as well as patriotic guard units and the other defense formations that carry out combat actions within the deployment of the troops.

Special attention must be given to providing medical care to the ground forces divisions and brigades, units and subunits, patriotic guards and youth detachments, as well as national air defense, air force and navy in the border regions, especially those forces deployed in the directions that channel operations toward vital objectives. For this, it is necessary to plan a differentiated staffing and equipping and the organization of direct support to the national health formations through the collaboration between the military medical organs and those of the local defense councils. The possibility of a mass attack, especially by air on important political-economic centers and even other locations in the main direction of the offensive, without previously having made too many preparations, influences the amount of support requested from the national health network since the network's opportunities to provide treatment and hospitalization can be diminished by the effect of an air attack and by the need to provide medical care to victims in the civilian population.

To the degree that there are gradual changes in the general deployment of strategic cover within the strategic defense disposition, medical care is organized for the divisions and brigades and units concomitantly with the arrival of new forces from the rear and regrouping of forces.

Medical care will be organized in relationship to the place, role, value and structure of the forces involved in defense and in relation to the concept for carrying out operations. Under these conditions, the measures for providing medical care will be carried out on a priority basis along the main direction of counterattacking the enemy's ground operations and in those regions where combat operations are being carried out to destroy an airborne (airmobile troops) assault, where it is estimated heavy losses will occur.

In order to provide specialized medical care, hospital bases (sections) will be available and will operate that have the role of receiving the wounded from the troops' medical formations, of providing specialized medical care and of providing health-pharmaceutical materials to the medical formations.

For the purpose of hospitalizing and treating the wounded and sick, which requires a long period of time until recovery, hospitals will be organized in certain region, preferably in baleno-climatic stations where the existence of certain developed hotel facilities will permit taking care of them.

As a basic principle of providing medical care in an all people's war to defend the country, we note that the patriotic combat units (subunits) will be provided with medical care in accordance with the place, roles and missions that they carry out. Thus, the patriotic guards and the other patriotic combat formations that carry out combat operations within the framework of troop deployments will be taken care of medically by the medical formations in the divisions, brigades and units of the army while those that operate independently throughout the country will be taken care of medically by the appropriate organs of the local defense councils.

The organization and carrying out of activities to evacuate the wounded constitute a major concern of the medical leadership organs at all levels, which, in cooperation with the local defense councils and the county health network, are required at an opportune time to evacuate the wounded from the hospital bases and move them to hospitals in the interior regions or in other regions established for the convalescence and retraining of those who can recover.

Keeping in mind that the patriotic combat formations are organized both on a nationwide principle and by place of work, we feel that the evacuation and hospitalization of the wounded and sick from these formations should be done as much as possible at the closest local hospital, which will make it easier to get them back to their own units and resume their activities in the economy in a shorter period of time. In cases where these formations are contained within the combat deployment of divisions, brigades and units of the army, the wounded will follow the evacuation procedures established for the troops.

Since combat operations in an all people's war to defend the country are carried out both on the front and behind the front, we could say throughout the entire country, the medical formations of civil defense, the patriotic guards and Red Cross groups, as well as the youth detachments, are in a position to carry out upon the request for assitance from the medical formations in the armed forces a series of activities of a medical-health nature, such as: removing the wounded from enemy fire, especially in combat in towns; loading and unloading the wounded into vehicles and trains and, if need be, trasferring them; organizing and serving in first aid stations at railroad stations, along evacaution routes and at required crossing points; setting up schools, houses, halls, hotels and villas that are to be used as hospitals for the wounded; sorting, packing and loading health-pharmaceutical materials onto transport vehicles; carrying out certain hygiene measures; participating in anti-epidemic actions, immunizing the populace and so forth.

The leadership of all activities is the responsibility of the medical organs of the army, which will organize and guide them in cooperation with the operations groups of the patriotic guards, civil defense and appropriate organs of the local defense councils.

Because of the additional demands on the national health network, as well as the disruption of operations of certain hospitals, blood collection and storage centers, medicine storage facilities and so forth, medical activities will be faced with certain clear problems, such as the parsimonious use of health-pharmaceutical material resources, the timely production of certain consistent, conveniently dispersed reserves, the judicious, successive use of medical field formations and the creation of certain medical formation reserves at the disposal of the supreme commander.

It is known that under the conditions of an all people's war to defend the country there are situations when the troops and the patriotic guards carry out combat operations while encircled in order to retain certain regions or localities of special importance or in free zones controlled by their own forces behind the aggressor's troops. For these forces, special medical care activities are organized and carried out that refer to the airborne delivery of health-pharmaceutical supplies, blood, analgesics, anesthetics or even medical-health personnel if the situation requires it. Certainly, under these conditions we will put to use all existing resources at the local level in order to provide medical care, frequently drawing upon other resources that are improvised and substituted for certain bandaging materials, disinfectants, sterilizers and so forth. Similarly, after the liberation of the regions (or localities) and until the reorganization of the local health network, it will be necessary for the medical formations of the armed forces to directly contribute to providing medical care to the forces that carried out combat operations behind the enemy lines, as well as to the populace. This measure is justified keeping in mind the scarcity of medical-health personnel and health-pharmaceutical materials and the uncertain epidemiological situation in the liberated region.

Within the framework of providing medical care, there is special importance in anti-epidemic activities brought about by the unsatisfactory sanitary-hygiene conditions inherent during wartime. The principal anti-epidemic measures will have a more complete nature and be extended to the entire population as a stringent requirement of preserving the state of health of the people and of correlating the medical formations of the armed forces with those in the national health network. They are especially necessary under conditions where the activities of enemy reconnaissance-diversionary groups can infect water sources, food supplies, the land and the flora and fauna, creating the premises favorable to the outbreak of certain epidemics or epizootics. In the context of anti-epidemic measures, there are also those regarding ensuring supplies of potable water and protecting water sources whose infection and pollution could negatively influence the carrying out of combat operations and prejudice the populace's state of health by producing waterborne epidemics.

With regards to providing health-pharmaceutical materials, we are of the opinion that this should involve decentralization and diversification brought about by the frequently changing and unforeseeable combat conditions and situations. Thus, the divisions and brigades within the army (operations groups) will be supplied in a combined fashion, both from the existing peacetime military health storage facilities and from the existing sources throughout the country, while under special circumstances directly from the medicines factories or chemical products enterprises. This same procedure will also be used to supply blood, oxygen and biological products in the amounts established by joint agreement with the appropriate organs of the local defense councils.

The success of providing medical care in an all people's war to defend the country is influenced by the permanent correlation of measures regarding the provision of medical aid, evacuation, treatment and hospitalization of the wounded and by the cooperation and support between the leadership organs and medical formations of the army and those of the national health network.

In concluding the discussion on the problems regarding the provision of medical care during an all people's war to defend the country, we feel it is necessary to point out certain more important aspects:

- the organization and leadership of medical care activities according to a unified plan drawn up on the basis of a detailed knowledge of the armed forces' medical forces and resources and the possibilities of the national health network regarding the capacities of hospitals according to medical apecialties, the amount of resources and reserves of health-pharmaceutical materials, oxygen, blood and so forth, the quality and quantity of means of evacuation, and the work capacity of anti-epidemic formations, as well as of the medical formations of the civil defense command;

- the collaboration with the central medical organs and those of the local defense councils for the purpose of drawing up the plan to provide medical care and implementing it in stages, through the establishment of specific missions for these organs and councils in certain regions or along certain evacuation routes, through the use of hospital bases and hospitals in interior regions and through the assignment of medical-health personnel and the definition of the tasks of the health formations of civil defense and the Red Cross;

- the inclusion in the plan for providing medical care of measures for the evacuation and treatment of the wounded coming from the ranks of the security troops and patriotic guards during the period when these forces are subordinate to the divisions and brigades or units with which they are carrying out joint combat missions;

- the organization of anti-epidemic care through the assignment of army anti-epidemic formations and those formations of the national anti-epidemic network to areas of actions and with the establishment of precise missions regarding the epidemiological supervision of the country, mass vaccinations, intervention into areas of contagious diseases, disinfecting and so forth;

- the supply of health-pharmaceutical materials through the establishment of sources of national supply (pharmaceutical offices, storage areas and so forth) in stages during the period of deployment of forces to carry out missions to counterattack the aggressor's operations, during the time of defensive operations and after our own forces take the initiative to drive the aggressor out of our country.

MEDICAL CARE FOR SOLDIERS IN BROAD FRONT DEFENSE OPERATIONS

Bucharest REVISTA SANITARA MILITARA in Romanian No 3, Jul-Aug-Sep pp 277-281

[Article by doctor Colonel Dr Eugen Spataru: "Competent Medical Care in Broad Front Defense Operations"]

[Text] The author stresses the importance of ensuring certain good conditions for treatment during the stages of medical evacuation, especially during the stage of competent medical care in a broad front defense operation.

Keeping in mind the possibility of having a concentration of a large number of wounded and sick at the level of a division or brigade, where for the first time treatment is given to the wounded and sick by medical specialists in a hospital environment, the importance of this stage is stressed in the recovery of these people.

This stage must be in the mind of the chief of the medical service, who is required to keep in mind the creation of certain good conditions for medical and surgical treatment, using for this purpose, in addition to the first line hospitals, the surgical hospitals, medical first aid detachments and even local hospitals.

Field Medicine

The medical-military literature in recent years has pointed out the concerns of military doctors in many countries for improving the system of medical care during wartime and especially the desire to have certain mobile and effective medical formations that can correspond to the current requirements of the battlefield.

The nature of combat operations, the improvements to military technology and the destructive capacity of weapons in the military units have brought about a considerable growth in health losses and essential changes in the structure of these losses, with a higher percentage of serious wounds and illnesses and even a new pathology specific to the weapons used.

The organization of treatment and evacuation under wartime conditions has in mind the fact that the results obtained after medical-surgical treatment are even better if this treatment is given more promptly, in the shortest possible time after being wounded, and that evacuation is a measure dictated by the situation on the battlefield, which is negatively reflected in the status of the wounded or sick.

The need to organize medical care in the shortest possible time after a person is wounded requires the placement of specialized medical formations as close as possible to the area of combat operations. Combat operations do not permit, however, bringing these formations close and carrying out medical care activities, a fact that has led to the adoption of a system of providing treatment gradually in a number of phases.

The system of phased treatment, also applied during World War II and the wars conducted in recent decades, is evaluated as a system capable of also resolving the complex problems of medical care under conditions of the appearance of a large number of wounded and sick in certain zones of military operations as a result of using weapons of mass destruction.

The system of phased treatment has in mind completing the entire amount of medical care necessary for the wounded and sick in a unified concept, but in a number of locations, called phases of medical evacuation.

Each of these phases is important in the status and recovery of the wounded:

1. The phase of first aid that is given on the battlefield using materials carried on the individual, in the form of self-aid or mutual aid. Its purpose is to apply elementary measures to save the life of the wounded party.

2. The phase of premedical care that is given at the battalion medical point or on the battlefield by average medical personnel; it consists of completing the measures of the previous phase, prophylactic measures and even a first sorting of the wounded and sick and their preparation for evacuation.

3. The first medical care is given by doctors of general medicine in the units, usually within the regimental medical point or the battalion medical point. In this phase, medical care is given to both the wounded and the sick, a presumptive diagnosis is established and medical priorities are set, establishing the urgency of evacuations.

4. The phase of competent medical care constitutes in fact the first hospital that the wounded and sick encounter along the evacuation route. At this level, medical-surgical care is given by specialized doctors of general surgery, internal medicine, toxicology and so forth. This phase is represented by the division hospital equipped with the instrumentation and devices necessary to general surgery employing intensive anesthesia therapy and having an internal medicine section and a laboratory. At the level, the diagnosis and prognosis of the injury is established, surgery is performed, shock is treated, complications are prevented and conditions are primarily created for the evacuation of the wounded and sick to the specialized hospitals at mobile hospital bases or in interior regions. The period of stay at this hospital is estimated to be 2 to 3 days and sometimes even more.

5. Specialized medical care constitutes in fact the last phase of treatment, which is given in the specialized hospitals in the mobile hospital bases or in interior regions, hospitals having a broad range of specialists principally in the following specialties: neurosurgery, plastic and reparatory surgery, maxilo-facial surgery, thoracic surgery, orthopedics and traumatology, abdominal surgery, urology, cardio-vascular surgery, internal medicine, hematology, toxicology, contagious diseases and so forth.

Certainly, under the conditions of a broad front defense with the participation of a large number of patriotic guard units and other patriotic combat formations in military operations, the organization of medical care is more complicated since the medical formations of operational units and divisions and brigades are not sufficient in some situations even for their own troops, making it more difficult to deal with the greater personnel losses that can occur in some combat sectors. In this situation, we must also keep in mind the fact that the wounded and sick will not be able to systematically and obligatorily move through all the phases of evacuation, missing some of them.

One of the phases of medical evacuation, the phase of competent medical care, takes on a special importance in the action of returning as large a number as possible of the wounded and sick to the broad front defense operations, and it requires increased attention within the framework of the plan of organizing the medical care of the operation.

The medical formations slated to provide the competent medical care are: the first-line division hospitals, the first-line hospitals of the branches of services located in the area of the divisions and brigades, the detachments of medical-surgical first aid that are mobile surgical hospitals and other local or mobile hospital-like formations that can accept the mission of temporarily being in the phase of competent medical care.

These formations must be placed close to the evacuation route in the rear of the defense, in the areas of the divisions and brigades up to 20 kilometers from the forward edge of the contact with the enemy in order to be able to provide for the reception of the wounded several hours after they are wounded. The majority of the wounded and sick from the combat units and formations converge on these formations. This is why there is need for more formations of this type to be set up in the area of the divisions and brigades.

The large personnel losses, both among the operational troops and the patriotic guard formations and youth detachments subordinate to the divisions and brigades or which fight in the area of the divisions and brigades, require the provision of a capacity for giving competent medical care for all fighting personnel.

Under the conditions of a broad front defense, the competent medical care can be the first and last phase for a significant number of wounded and sick, especially along the secondary lanes of the enemy's attack or in free zones where evacuation measures are difficult.

This phase can concentrate at its level the entire amount of medical care necessary to treat the wounded and sick and with some reinforcement during situations where it remains in one place for a longer period of time, can also provide specialized medical care. The difficulty of organizing competent medical care lies in the fact that the first-line hospital-type medical formations employed in this activity are insufficient, with the local hospitals being normally evacuated from the defense zone to a depth of 50 kilometeres, and that maneuvering with medical formations is also made difficult in defensive operations because of the possible interruptions in communications. In addition to this, we can add the fact that the large losses and the very large flow of wounded into the hospital-like formations from the areas of the divisions and brigades result in this phase being a maximum point of convergence for the wounded and sick. In addition to an uninterrupted medical-surgical activity and a very great volume of work to care for, feed and transport the wounded in these hospitals, it is necessary to have activities that require a large number of personnel for the cleaning of beds and clothing, sterilization, heating, providing water and light, and loading and unloading the wounded for evacuation.

The proper organization of the phase of competent medical care must have the following in mind:

- the placement of an appropriate number of first-line hospitals in the area of the divisions' and brigades' defensive deployment against the path of the enemy's principal attacks so that all the routes of evacuation for the divisions and brigades and for the columns of ambulances will encounter a surgical hospital during the phase of competent medical care;

- in order to augment the necessary number, the mobile surgical hospitals within the hospital bases will be used as formations for providing competent medical care by placing them along the evacuation routes, at the location of the first-line hospitals;

- the supplying of hospitals with medicines, bandages and consumable health materials at levels above the norm so they can operate for many days without making contact with higher levels or supply sources;

- at a point 20 to 30 kilometers from the forward edge of the defense local hospitals will be organized and maintained within the defensive disposition and staffed with medical personnel and surgeons, especially along the secondary points of attack in order to give competent medical care to patriotic guard personnel;

- within each county, in addition to the medical-surgery first aid detachments, mobile surgical teams will be organized having an adequate supply of equipment that can be set up in towns or in shelters so they can give competent medical care;

- in regions that are slated to be temporarily encircled by the enemy and transformed into free zones during defensive operations, medical formations will be maintained with personnel who can give competent medical care and with the necessary medical materials;

- all medical formations in the defense region, in accordance with the type of region they are in, will be assisted by the local defense councils in each county in order to be supplied with materials and manpower for the purpose of caring for the wounded and sick and providing services, food, water, equipment, fuel, heating, clothes washing, field operators, sterilization, transportation for the wounded, care and loading of the wounded into ambulances and trains and so forth. If we keep in mind the large number of wounded and sick that can be found daily in these formations (300-500 in 24 hours), we can appreciate the volume of work necessary to provide a continuing activity for the surgical teams, to which can be added formations from the Red Cross, youth detachments and so forth.

The proper organization of the phase of competent medical care must keep in mind the working conditions for these hospitals - the closest ones to the forward edge of contact with the enemy - by building shelters, first of all for the surgery sections, intensive therapy and hospitalization.

Similarly, the medical chiefs of the armies or operational detachments must give greater attention to ensuring the evacuation of the wounded and sick from these formations. We are talking about providing the transportation and stretchers necessary for loading the wounded and establishing the destination of the evacuation.

After they have received the medical-surgical care in the first-line hospitals, the wounded and sick are evacuated usually to the specialized hospitals in the hospital bases in the interior regions or to balneo-climatic stations for recovery. The destination of the wounded after the phase of competent medical care can also be, however, within the civilian population where they can be cared for both in the free zones and throughout the entire theater of operations.

Competent medical care is a very important phase in the system of medical care which categorizes, medically-surgically intervenes and treats the wounded and sick from the areas of the operational divisions and brigades. The proper organization of this phase clearly influences the recuperation of the largest possible number of wounded and sick.

SYMPOSIUM ON MEDICAL ASSISTANCE TO TROOPS IN PEOPLE'S WAR

Bucharest REVISTA SANITARA MILITARA in Romanian No 3, Jul-Aug-Sep p 369

[Article by Dr P. Chertic regarding the symposium "Medical Assistance to Troops Under Wartime Conditions in the Defense of the Country by All the People," held in Bucharest, 18 Apr 1981]

[Text] Within the framework of the events celebrating the 60th anniversary of the founding of the Romanian Communist Party, a symposium was held on the theme "Medical Assistance to Troops Under Wartime Conditions in the Defense of the Country by All the People" and was organized by the Medical Directorate and the Department of Military Medicine.

Military doctors and pharmacists from the leadership of certain medical institutions in the army and from army commands, branches of service and military units participated in the proceedings of this event.

Problems of an urgent current nature were dealt with in the 36 reports and papers that were presented. An especially important place went to showing the concerns and actions of the military doctors and pharmacists to further study the content of the national military doctrine, whose author is comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, and the medical-health corps's directions for action in carrying out their duties at a high qualitative level along the lines of improving medical care in the army, both during peacetime and during military campaigns.

The proposed theme covered the following fields of more important concerns:

- The concept of medical assistance in an all people's war, with important contributions being made on this subject by: doctor Major General Dr Alexandru Gr. Popescu, doctor professor Major General Dr Iuliu Suteu, doctor Colonel Dr Eugen Spataru, doctor Colonel Dr Mircea Burmaz, doctor Colonel Dr Constantin Stanculescu and doctor Colonel Dr Petrea Naghirneac.

- Medical assistance to an army of combined services, the role of reinforcement medical groups and medical assistance to a mechanized division, with reports and papers on these subjects being presented by: doctor Colonel Dr Alexandru Calin, doctor Colonel Dr Mircea Botez, doctor Colonel Dr Constantin Ilie, doctor Colonel Dr Carol Varga and doctor Colonel Dr Grigore Mereantu.

- Medical assistance within the framework of the different specialties, which was covered by: doctor Major General Dr Traian Oancea, doctor Major General Dr Gheorghe Niculescu, doctor Colonel Dr Traian Bandila and doctor Colonel Dr Florian Ionescu.

Through the problems that were discussed, the symposium brought to light the positive experiences and concerns of the military doctors for the purpose of implementing the principles of national military doctrine with maximum efficiency in the area of medical assistance to the troops in the different forms of a defensive war and in the work to ensure the state of health of military personnel.

At the same time, it outlined the need to draw up certain methodologies based on the valuable experiences acquired with regards to medical assistance to the troops, in accordance with the place and role of the medical service within the framework of the national defense system.

MATERIAL, PROFESSIONAL NEEDS OF WRITERS DISCUSSED

Bucharest ROMANIA LITERARA in Romanian 5 Nov 81 p 2

["Session of the Bureau of the Writers Union"]

[Excerpts] On 30 October 1981, a work session of the Bureau of the Writers Union was held in Bucharest. Secretaries of the writers associations and secretaries of the section bureaus who are not members of the Bureau also participated. The following items were on the agenda: a report on the activity of the Writers Union during the July-October 1981 period and on the current financial situation of the Union and the Literary Fund; the plan of action of the Writers Union for the 4th quarter of 1981; proposals for the membership of work commissions of the Bureau of the Union; the Literary Fund Committee, the 2-3 percent committee, the pension commission, the nationalities commission; the approval of the regulations for awarding the prizes of the Union and of the Writers Associations for 1980, the grand prize and the special prizes for 1980 and 1981, and the prizes for translations of Romanian literature abroad.

Also, concrete solutions for a number of problems which are in the center of attention of the new leadership of the Union were brought before the Bureau. These included: the continuation of the publication of the "Critics' Notebooks" feature in the review VIATA ROMANEASCA, the establishment of coordinates for the utilization of the literary heritage by means of "critics' editions", the resolution of some of the most pressing needs for housing for writers, with the assistance of the Bucharest Municipality People's Council; the facilitation of the participation of writers in various events on the international level.

Deputy chairmen Laurentiu Fulga and Alexandru Balaci informed the Bureau about the activities of the Writers in the domestic and foreign spheres during the period from July to October 1981 and administrative director Traian Iancu gave an account of the current financial situation of the Union and of the Literary Fund.

The speakers praised the realistic nature of the current work program which the leadership of the Writers Union has set and the efficiency with which the leadership is trying to resolve the problems of the writers' community. It was proposed that the most important issues, from among the problems raised at the National Writers Conference, be stressed. These are: the condition of the literary work, from manuscript to published work, with all which this process involves; the conditions under which the young writer makes his debut and asserts himself, in the journalists and editorial spheres; the methods of penetration of the literary work in the world today as well as the contacts of writers in the international sphere; the status of the Romanian language and Romanian literature in the schools; measures to give jobs to writers, especially young writers, in accordance with their specific training; the most varied means of supporting the financial and economic effort of the Union and aiding the living conditions of the writer; the establishment of work commissions which will study each one of these problems and suggest solutions.

The proceedings of the Bureau were led by Dumitru Radu Popescu, chairman of the Writers Union.

COMMENTARIES, PETITIONS ON DJOGO TRIAL, SENTENCE

Stress on Poetic Ambiguity

Belgrade KNJIZEVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian 16 Jul 81 pp 14-15

[Article by Nada Popovic Perisic, editor of KNJIZEVNE NOVINE]

[Text] Note From the Editors

The trial of the poet Gojko Djogo and his collection of poems "Vunena vremena" are the immediate occasion for the article "The Ambiguity of Poetry" by our editor Nada Popovic Peresic, in which she elucidates certain disputed poems in that book in the context of theoretical criticism. Controversial opinions concerning the "Vunena vremena" were heard in Gojko Djogo's trial: the book was proclaimed to be a piece of political pamphleteering, and poetry led into jeopardy by "erroneous reading." In publishing our editor's article, which is one of the possible interpretations of Djogo's poetry, the editors feel that in this case there is a need to hear the opinion of the literary critics, which ought to be more relevant than the views of judicial institutions. The editors are also of the opinion that literary cases like this ought to be investigated and resolved in an open debate in the context of social criticism, within the framework of our democratic, self-managing practice, and that the participation of administrative entities in issues of art and creativity is the last thing we need at this stage of our social development.

"The darkest place is always under the lamp"--Chinese proverb.

It is not easy today to be authentic. We no longer know how to play, we have forgotten how to fight conformity, the generally prevailing mode of thought, how to preserve that minimum degree of privacy as the sole realm of freedom to withstand the arrogance of the truth, public opinion and science. The speech which menaces us the most today is Doxa, that is, public opinion, the spirit of the majority, consensus, the voice of Nature, the ferocity of prejudices, and the "truth-loving and orthodox" intellectual as a type.

It is this type of intellectual we will be talking about. They are, first of all, those intellectuals whose purpose is not to understand the world, who are satisfied with ready-made formulas, who reduce a world of infinitely diverse possibilities to equations which make it all clear. Since for them the world is full of suspicious and unreliable alibies, reflection should not be developed excessively. One should turn to divine simplicity: the tautology. The truth is the truth. They set out on the paths of knowledge without accepting any of the risks which any positivistic search for the truth inevitably presupposes. That is how poetry becomes pamphleteering without any sort of evidentiary procedure beforehand.

This is that type of intellectual who reduces everything unusual to the familiar equations, to symbols, who attribute a definite meaning to every situation, even though it be a situation of language, since then it is easier to keep an eye on. Most probably this is a specific defensive reflex in response to the uncertainty of new experiences. How otherwise would many of them have seen even what isn't there.

In essence we are talking about a mentality for which every differentness is alien and which therefore regards the other as a thing to be described, that is, to be furnished with attributes and at the same time condemned. His principal line of argument is to cast doubt on the subject as soon as possible. The "guilty party" must be dishonorable, immoral, perverted. How otherwise could a good poet become in a short time a "swindler," "black marketeer," "unprincipled political intriguer," "swine that slaughters, skins, and grinds up everything it encounters with its hog's teeth."

And finally, these intellectuals also have certain characteristics of true artists; they also use the procedures which we recognize in a true artistic text. We are referring to the distortion of meaning, to the reshaping of the material which in the text creates that surplus value of form which we recognize as an element of the artistic. Assembling a collage of incompatible passages, reading words and lines out of context (outside the text, that is), and erroneous quotations. A universal reading key which is equally valid for ordinary language and for poetic language.

Thus things appear at the level of description. But what has interpretation to say? All those concerned with the problem of interpretation of a literary text know how numerous have been the attempts to determine the nature of the relationship between the poetic language (subject language) and the language of interpretation (the metalanguage).

Interpretation Cannot Be Scientific

In his book "Sta je strukturalizam?" [What Is Structuralism?] Cvetan Todorov, speaking about the relationship between literature and criticism, says: "Nevertheless, the very process of reading itself is not without consequences: two readings of one and the same book are never identical. Our reading is accompanied by a passive type of writing; we add what we wish to find in the text, or we suppress what is in it that we wish to avoid.... From the moment when he ceases only to read, but also writes something down, the critic is saying something which the work he is studying does not contain, even though he asserts that it says the same thing."

In practice this means that interpretation lacks epistemological consistency, and therefore cannot be scientific. After all, a literary text, and poetry in particular, necessarily enters into confrontation with the ambivalence of language, which is at one and the same time representational and nonrepresentational. As a semantic subject the text or poem is characterized, as indeed are all rhetorical discourses, by a tendency toward polysemy. The purpose of the poem as a work of art is totality of meaning, that is, a reduced model of the world. Every modern theory will hold that there is no poem in which an erotic relation between the reader and the poem has not been achieved. That accounts for the importance of the interpretation code. Today this is one of the fundamental epistemological questions: that is, one of those places of stress where ideology and semiology meet. The issue: how or by whom are our reading patterns, or, in a more general way, our perception patterns, created? Every reading tends to restrict the potential ambiguity of the poem. The reader selects hypotheses as he reads depending on the associations that exist, which have been quoted by the culture, by personal obsession, and by literary use. He chooses, then, his own textual strategy. That is why in the interpretation of poetry we can speak only of reading models which are operative for a certain cultural tradition.

Yet the disagreements that have occurred in the history of literature and that were aroused by this "interpretation code" we have mentioned, have not been minor. Let us not enumerate all the examples. We will cite one. A recent one. A collection of poems entitled "Vunena vremena" by the poet Gojko Djogo, that is, a poem from that collection entitled "Ovid at Tomi." We know how this poem has been read in our daily newspapers and in the indictment which was returned against the poet. We will quote the passage of the indictment which concerns this poem: "... in the poem 'Ovid at Tomi' also makes allusion to the cherishing of a symbol of our revolution, and says that everyone is celebrating 'his' birthday, that this was 'his' time, that the reader has been waiting for 'his' end, and then observes: 'And better you hadn't lived at all than to have lived in his time,' then asserting that those who lived and were happy in 'his' time were mutes and toadies, mouthpieces and primitives, ticks and nits, and he foretells: 'one day his star will also fall.'"

We will not comment on the "slip" presented in this context by the use of the word "reader"; we will leave that to psychoanalysis. Before passing on to an analysis of the poem, we will go back once more to theory. We have said that a poem represents a definite semantic field, that is, a lexical network which has been organized around a basic concept. That is why certain theoreticians, Levin for example, are inclined to say that "the text is its own code." That would mean that certain semantic units in the poem nevertheless restrict the text's possible polysemy. As for the poem we have mentioned, the basic concept around which the semantic field is constructed has been given in the title. The reference is to Ovid--the banished poet. This procedure is quite familiar to modern poetry--the title or subtitle guides the reading of the poem. The importance of the title itself has been altogether neglected in the interpretations of this poem made so far. The direction of the poem's reading is determined not only by the title, but also by its form. There is reference in the poem to the relationship which the poetic speaker establishes with the banished poet Ovid: he addresses him using the pronoun /you/ [in boldface]. The poetic speaker, then, is not addressing the /reader/ [in boldface], but the poet Ovid. That the interpretation of this poem cannot be as arbitrary as many would like it is also proven by the poem's last lines:

> But what do you get out of it?
> Those who come after won't know > that Caesar was shoed
> by a smithy.

The last line defines the context unambiguously. The time of the Caesars. Only with the last line is a coherent system of connotations established, so that only then every motif already mentioned in the poem takes on its meaning, this time determined by a time context (era).

Purely Literary Sources of Images

We would detract from the value of Gojko Djogo's poetic expression if we did not say that his expression also has that necessary degree of universality which every valuable poetry must have. The "theme" is perceived here only as a narrative structure (or archetype); the description of typical experiences whose repetition creates a true continuity of literary experience says something about universal destiny--in this case of the poet. Translated into expressions of poetic diction, this means that his method of constructing the poem fits into that part of the experience of modern poetry which uses the symbol and the allegory; images may represent objects from nature, but actually they have been taken from a purely literary source.

Since we are arguing for multiple meanings, that is, for polysemy, we will not assert that there are no other possible readings, since our interpretation codes differ. But it is certain that there are not infinitely many of them. Only those readings are valid which are not contradictory, that is, which possess homogeneity at the level of the connotations, in other words, semantic coherence. And all readings of this poem must inevitably "trip over" Ovid and Caesar.

We will give still another example. The poem "First Among the Beasts." Here is how it was interpreted in the indictment: "A 'beast, a big bear,' a self-styled emperor with his iron teeth and army, slaughters by the law of his bestial nature everything which gets in his way, strangles his best comrades in the dark and eats his own children, but is now lying dead, while his paws are being licked by frantic animals who do not believe that he has died, but that he has only become silent and who are afraid lest the beast revive and again sit on the 'throne,' which in turn represents a clear allusion to the late President Tito, is a crude offense to his personality and to the sentiments of our peoples toward him, accompanied by the assertion that the respect for Tito was falsely extorted by terror."

We have already mentioned that interpretations of poetic language require a context so that the poetic value of every element can be discovered by the best possible approach. The perception of the poem as a whole requires that the elements not be evaluated solely as a function of their local value, but in their relationship to the elements which precede them or which follow. The context of this poem is defined by the subtitle: "... my dwelling, my own, is not the den of a bear" and by the citation of its source: "Slovo o medvedu" [About the Bear] by "The Physiologist."

In using the quotation as a guide to the source of the symbol, the poet has also determined its allegorical value. The bestiary mentioned states that the bear is a symbol of the peoples of the Caucasus. The interpretation code, then, should be sought at that level of connotation. With this in mind it is not difficult to recognize the allusions to Stalin. On the other hand, the use of definite symbols--in this case an animal--presupposes one meaning which is different from that which a particular word might have in ordinary language. Any dictionary of symbols will reveal to us that the bear is a symbol of bellicose aggressiveness, that it symbolizes the death of the cosmos, a voracious evil. So, then, its function should be sought at that symbolic level, and not at the level of ordinary speech.

Let us return to the indictment. An indictment is also a text. The indictment speaks about "clear allusions," about an "assertion." The indictment takes poems as discursive denotative language in which the meaning of the term and the symbol is clearly determined by uniform use. Certainly the initial and every subsequent disagreement derives its source from this. The indictment presupposes something which has never been competently proven anywhere. It takes the point of departure that in this case it is dealing with a "piece of pamphleteering." However, it is dealing with a book of poems. And the same criteria cannot be applied to a "piece of political pamphleteering," that is, something which belongs to the unambiguous and transparent language, and also to poetry--an ambivalent, nontransparent, dense language crammed with meanings.

But this we shall leave to the interpretations which we assume are yet to come. After all, this collection deserves interpretations, first of all because of the new manner in which it speaks of human destiny. In using folklore and mythology as a source of subject matter, as an arsenal of poetic imagery, it points to man's basic situation of peril in today's world, to his fears, to his powerlessness to resist the world, to the archetypal nature of his imaginary world.

Open Letter

> "Special Commission of the Workers' Council commissioned to destroy all examples of the book 'Vunena vremena,' which was published in a printing of 1,000 copies" (POLITIKA, 21 May 1981).

We have not been able to read the collection of poetry "Vunena vremena" of Gojko Djogo, which was issued by Prosveta, so that we cannot express any literary or conceptual judgment concerning it. Access to this book has been prevented by Prosveta in that it has withdrawn all available copies from sale and adopted a decision to destroy it. Since we feel that our rights as readers have thereby been drastically injured, we want to put the following questions publicly.

First, on what grounds did Prosveta consider that a book already printed and not banned by the courts dare not be submitted to the scrutiny of the professional literary and reading public? Are we to believe that that public is not mature enough or responsible enough to render a competent judgment, while the decision-makers in Prosveta and outside it are?

Second, what justification can be given for a self-managing decision to destroy the book, and how are the associations with the destruction of books of the same kind at other places and other times to be avoided? Is Prosveta, setting aside the author and the readers, the exclusive owner of the book, or can it still be regarded as a kind of public property? Finally, has the assumed goal truly been achieved by this act--eliminating the traces left in time by a book of poems!

We expect that Prosveta will offer us and the public clear and persuasive answers to these questions, which are not ours alone, nor is their importance merely momentary. In any case, this is in its own interest as well.

Author Kis to Stambolic

[Text] Belgrade, 28 June 1981

Honorable Ivan Stambolic,

As the author of the book "Grobnica za Borisa Davidovica" [A Tomb for Boris Davidovic] (which is concerned with the mechanism of spiritual oppression) and as a man who has felt on his own hide, in publishing that very book, one of the perfidious forms of that same oppression and tragic loneliness of a banished and helpless creator--I feel it my duty to call upon you to stake all your prestige as chairman of the Executive Council of SR [Socialist Republic] Serbia to avoid the court conviction of the poet Gojko Djogo. Destruction of his work has in and of itself been a harsh penalty.

With sincere respect,

[Text] To Comrade Venjamin Pejovic, judge of the Belgrade District Court

Belgrade, 30 June 1981

Honored Comrade Judge,

I have delivered copies of this appeal to your panel, which will try the poet Gojko Djogo, to the newspapers KNJIZEVNE NOVINE and POLITIKA, since the text is written as an open appeal to you and is therefore public.

Respectfully,

To the Editors of POLITIKA, Belgrade

Belgrade, 30 June 1981

Respected Editor,

I am sending you a text addressed to the judges of the District Court in Belgrade, which this Thursday, 2 July, will try the poet Gojko Djogo. As an open appeal, this text is a public appeal to the representatives of a public service like jurisprudence, and I believe that only good can be served if the enclosed pages were published in POLITIKA. Good because it is more than necessary right at this point that differing opinions on a poet's arrest may be heard in public in this community.

When at one time they arrested Osip Mandel'shtam, there were only unanimous opinions about the persecutions of poets in his country. And the time was to come, here with us in fact, when a book by the poet's wife, "Strah i nada" [Fear and Hope], would go through several editions and would offer to the reader here one of the most shocking eyewitness stories about the fate not only of that poet, but also of the conspiracy of silence that was not confined to that troubled time in our century. Whereas Vaclav Havel in turn is today serving his third year in prison, in a country similar to Mandel'shtam's with which Yugoslavia indeed has quite proper ideological relations, we have taken upon ourselves to exercise the cherished right to distinguish us from Havel's homeland by the very fact that our theaters at the moment are performing his plays. "The Audience" and "The Opening of the Exhibition," for example, are being performed to an overflowing theater, and the author behind bars is receiving the kind of applause he would receive making a curtain call.

You will understand, then, dear editor, why I feel it urgent that at least one such difference from the comments published to date concerning the arrest of our poet appear in POLITIKA, our newspaper with the largest readership here at home and abroad, friendly and hostile.

Respectfully,

Zivorad Stojkovic

Open Letter of Appeal to the Poet's Judges

A book of poems has been burned for the first time that books have been printed in this language. By a duly appointed commission, more conscientiously than it was published, with an official record and official report by the publisher, the book has been turned into ash to the last copy of its small printing to placate the public. But since the notorious year 1929, when Jovan Popovic and Novak Simic were taken into custody because of "red collection" of social literature entitled "Knjiga drugova" [The Comrades' Book] (and soon released from prison by an acquittal!)--this is now the first case of arrest of a poet, and that because of a book which was published legally by the largest publishing house in the country. Were we only readers, and not as well people of all kinds who work with books and on the literary task, we would have to write such letters to the editors and to ask: What is this that is happening to us today, how far have we gone when the slaughtering of books and the persecution of poets is not only imaginable, but even possible in our time? For days, then, one has simply not known where to look or how to support his lack of words, his disbelief that anything can help the indicted poet; still less himself, the shamed contemporary. If the poet is such a dangerous criminal that he must await his trial in pretrial custody, then the rest of us who have been left to look after our own affairs could end up being suspects.

Last year proposals based on the constitution were written and signed to the effect that persons convicted of "verbal offenses" would be exempted from punishment, while a personal opinion, whatever it might be, could not in and of itself be regarded as a crime in our system. The responses, envisaged by that same constitution, did not come from the places where the proposals were sent. By way of response came only a political outcry in italicized editorials about there being citizens who dared to carefully read the laws of their country and who felt that the freedom of speech in public is not just a right of man, but indeed a human duty in a society.

But dialogue with the anathema was cut off, just like that, before in fact it had begun, and there is no persistence capable of writing and disputing with the things which are incomprehensible in its time, unless that becomes its sole job. But a poet has been in the Central Prison for more than a month now, and that is more noxious than anything that might be suspected in our literary troubles. And anyway, how many others there are.... So, the only thing that remains is for us to appeal for something, in this case to adjure, if necessary! So, having had past experience with right addresses, the undersigned is sending this petition to those most responsible for the letter and spirit of the law--to you, the judges of Gojko Djogo's book.

You will be judging, then, a literary work rather than a criminal act; a poet who is "fulfilling his destiny," not the citizen who is otherwise irreproachably discharging his work and civic duties. That is why this petition in fact does not apply so much to Gojko Djogo himself; he, for that matter, is not a guilty party whose punishment needs to be pardoned. Like many others of his stamp, his guilt lies only in the fact that he is truly a poet. And such poets are apt to be both contrary and explosive; they are always suspect, and one never knows what they might get into, what they might dare, when they are led on by inspiration and they shout their verses out loud. At their highest moment, poets become removed even from their very selves, and the poems are not only their "alter ego," but something altogether their own, following their own will. No one can ever have the last word with poets, believe me! Understand if you can that poetry falls in the devil's work, but that the poem is "outside any evil," however it might appear to you as you look at the line of verse or turn what it says against it. Be suspicious, be suspicious of the poet Djogo, why not; anything might be found in the ash of his collection of poems, anything at all, but not something. But be suspicious, please, much more of those who as experts or witnesses will be interpreting "Vunena vremena." Pay close attention to them, since many interpreters of poetry cut the poet's world to their own measure and their motives. There are even those who customarily when they get out of their depth falsely accuse poets for this.

There is no need, as you see, to issue an appeal for the poet Djogo, but for your cautiousness, which must even be extreme, for your suspicion of everything and everyone, and not just the poetry which has been accused, but that you do not take that suspicion as something which has in any way been justified and confirmed; there is a need to appeal for your patience given your inexperience with the writing of poetry; for your vigilance in not rejecting something you do not understand, in which you are not alone. However, the basic reason for addressing these lines to you is an appeal to release people who have become anxious these past weeks from a fear and a shame: a fear, to be brief, that poets' books of poems, can it really be, are the greatest danger to this country at its present moment; a shame, to be still briefer, that books of poems are to be tried by criminal courts, and not by public criticism and a public accounting with the lies of poets, if they do lie, or with the self-deceptions of the time, if it is deceiving itself.

Finally, there is a special reason for this petition. The Serbo-Croatian language and the Yugoslav literatures are being taught today at many universities in the world. In just one of the European countries there are departments of Yugoslav studies at exactly 14 universities. All the newspapers of that country have carried news on several occasions and quite prominently concerning the arrest and upcoming trial of the poet Gojko Djogo. All foreign Yugoslavicists are aware of this case, and they are all, I am certain, expecting that it will end differently than in other places, since for them Yugoslavia always represents "something else." Please do not allow their teachers, among whom I have counted myself for years, to avoid the questions of their students when they begin classes in the fall. Make it possible for teachers to give answers that will reinforce belief in the country whose languages and subject matters we learn best if we first learn to love that country. I have no right not to believe in the conscientiousness of your verdict, which will be liberating--not only for the poet who has been arrested! In any case, I would adjure you: do not shame the country, do not confuse its friends, do not bear its enemies out. The damage that could be done if justice is not vigilant cannot be made up by decades of patient and persistent work on the learning of the languages, the literatures and the history of this country, on its reputation and on its place in the cultural world.

The only other thing I beg of you is that you do not let your verdict go down as one of the examples in the history of the literature of this language, of which there have not been many in its legacy and history, not even from its black times, but they augur the worst.

Comparison With Mandel'shtam's Fate

Belgrade KNJIZEVNA REC in Serbo-Croatian 10 Sep 81 pp 10-11

[Article by Jovica Acin: "Who Is Afraid of Poetry"]

[Text] At the beginning of the thirties various informers began to stop by the Mandel'shtams' more and more frequently. Knowing the whole body of Mandel'shtam's poems by heart, they recited them to the inexpressible rapture of Osip Emil'yevich, asking him out of feigned curiosity and conspiratorially what a particular line or a particular poem meant: Did it not refer to the failure of the 5-year plan which was then under way and whose successes the leadership was extolling in the name of the people, and so on. Mandel'shtam would shrug his shoulders in a laugh at these discoveries of the informers and at the meanings which were attributed to the various passages in his poetic opus. After one such meeting, Osip Emil'yevich's wife, Nadezhda, asked: "What will we do if they find a hidden meaning in everything?" "We will be amazed," the poet answered.

Impulsive and open, Osip Mandel'shtam never had even the least gift for diplomacy, and his answer--far from any sort of cleverness--cuts precisely into the very essence of a certain approach to poetry from the other side. In an instant he sketches for us the entire one-sidedness of the approach which begins and ends in meaning, sketches out for us the limitations and absurdities which the demand that poetry be totally understood stumbles over. And truly one can only be amazed at an understanding which betrays poetry in at least two ways. On the one hand, the poetic is not built up on meaning, while on the other the meaning one can speak of concerning poetry not only does not determine it, but cannot be understood in the sense one usually attributes to that term in speaking of everyday speech or some other form of speech whose purpose is communication. The poet is amazed by an understanding which he knows to betray the truth of the writing of poetry, he is all the more amazed when the victim is his own work, but he is not always aware that the motives of this understanding are in most cases ideological or pathological in nature, which in turn only augments the tragic nature of the amazement, the tragic nature of the poet's destiny and the destiny of his work.

The Childhood of Language

The recent incidents with and around the book of poems "Vunena vremena" which seem to indicate that even today there is room for the relevance of Mandel'-shtam's reply. Even in those attempts of some seriousness which we will suppose there must have been to interpret certain poems and lines in the book and which were supposed to furnish arguments for so-called social criticism of the work, there is not even the palest trace of awareness that an understanding of a poetic text is only determinable as a possibility or an allusion. In a manner which violates both literary and hermeneutical principles, the self-assured interpreters have simply, without hesitation or reserve, substituted their own understanding as an equivalent for the poetic text, as though they were sitting on a divine throne and held all the meanings of this world and all the threads of poetry in their hands. The meaning they have decided upon is for them that "same"--and by no means could it be different--meaning which supposedly exists before every reading, objectively, in the poems contained in "Vunena vremena." It is unfortunate for these interpreters, when it comes to poetry, that there are no two texts which say "the same," the supposed equivalence does not exist between the poetic text and the text of the comprehension, looking at least to all the interpretive strategies that have been constructed up to the present time.

A poem does not consist of ideas and meanings, but of words, Mallarme said. Between the word and its sense, the poet's choice has been clear from time immemorial. Only by giving preference to the immediate material aspect of language does poetry come into being, live and survive the centuries. Poems written even hundreds of years ago are close to us, even quite up-to-date, but not because the meaning we might discover in them, because of statements which may be unimportant or even without any sort of significance, but solely because of the expression itself, because of the particular movement of the verbal material which arouses our satisfaction. You yourselves remember children's games with words utterly incoherent to parents, which instantly collapse, losing their charm, when an attempt is made at interpretation with some meaning. Just like those games, in the range from unending repetition of a single word to impossible combinations according to some unknown pattern, like sacred speech, mythical speech, the speech of ritual, poetry affirms precisely those poetic capabilities of the language which are suppressed in everyday communication, its material process, which has no connection whatsoever with understanding. What is more, understanding expends, tears down, that on which the poetic is built; with "parental concern" it bans the use of language as signs which mean nothing. If by interpretation we do not draw poetry out of the protection of the materiality of language, which in the case of the book "Vunena vremena" has been done in the harshest and most ruthless way, if we do not withdraw it from the protection which every work builds according to its own syntax, rhythm, its lexicon, its figures, then we would be able to say, recalling a suspicion of Marx', that poetry preserves in itself the childhood of language, that it uses verbal potentialities in a way similar to that in which singing, music or dance uses vocal or sound potentialities or the potentialities of body movements, not concerned with their meaning.

The Promised Meaning

Nevertheless, if it does not play the essential role, it cannot be said that meaning does not play any sort of role in a poetic text. The only form of meaning which can be recognized in poetry is not based, however, on that concept of ready-made meaning which has been appealed to or has been only assumed by the mass-media interpreters of the poems of Gojko Djogo.

Let us take, for example, a few lines from one of Vasko Popa's early poems.

> It's a game of hide and seek
> You peer into yourself in every nook
> And search for any nails, for any thieves
> For any cuckoo eggs.

For what I want to briefly demonstrate, I could have taken verses of Oskar Davico, especially from his more recent poems, instead of Popa's. In so doing I would have made my job altogether easier, since the matter is obvious in Davico. Yet I took Popa as an example because often in his poems there is so much of the "storyteller" that meaning seems unquestionable. Yet, when it comes down to it, who could be so bold as to staunchly affirm that he absolutely knows what these lines mean. They do, of course, imitate a description of preparation for a child's game in which there are also connotations of some self-examination. Yet that is not enough. That means nothing, or very little. We can only have suspicions, since the meaning remains incomplete, and at the same time, the poet's "mode of statement" cannot be replaced by any other mode of statement without betraying the sense of the lines. You or I might complete the meaning, even many meanings, might give ultimate shape to the meaning. But this would not be the meaning or meanings which the poet was "thinking of"; it would not for the simple reason that the poet was not thinking of any particular meaning at all, not of any ready-made and accomplished meaning. Had he been so thinking and had he so written, then this no longer would have been a poem, just as a riddle that has been solved is no longer a riddle. (It is interesting to mention that in the fifties precisely the group of poems from which these lines were taken were fiercely attacked by the dogmatic "traditionalists" as a hotbed of meaninglessness. Quite logically, though they did not know how close to the truth they were!) What the poet did on the other hand "think of" is visible and incontestably audible in the lines. The materiality, the music of the language (which does not mean that the language is melodic or harmonic), which is manifested in the phonemic and lexical repetitions, in the turns of phrase, in the rhythm, in the evocation of pleasure in the game. On the other hand we come upon meaning in an unrealized form. The reader's attention is attracted and then left in uncertainty at the end. This is inherent in the play of poetic language in which there are no final solutions, but only an interweaving of the music of the word and the promise of meaning. In promising meaning, in seducing the readers, poetry never keeps its promise. That is why it is impossible to truly arrive at understanding in everyday life, in science or in politics using poetic language. Its medium is a mystery behind which, for all its human craziness, there isn't anything, darkness, opaqueness, or only what we ourselves impart, seeking what we have already found, but then for us the poem no longer exists. Then we ourselves are to blame for destroying the poem, because we wanted to fill it with our own understanding, according to our own associations, according to a key which we have studied consciously or unconsciously, a promise which we felt as a danger aside from the poet's will, aside from the nature of poetic language. When finally the poem refuses to impart meaning, then let us give the meaning to it, let us find its "hidden meaning"; that, unfortunately, is the way one might state the decision of the interpreters of Djogo's poems.

Allusions and Associations

In spite of everything, you will perhaps ask whether I dispute that there are certain allusions in "Vunena vremena." Not by any means. Though as a rhetorical technique it does not belong solely to the art of poetry, allusion does exist in Djogo's book, as it does in every other poetic work. In the context of what we have said, its origin is quite definite: it is one of the effects of the promise of meaning. Depending on the place and moment, depending on the segment of the prevailing symbolic production to which the reader belongs, understanding does articulate an allusion and ascribes content to its subjective associations in an effort to realize and establish the meaning, thereby resolving unambiguously once and for all and terminating the metaphor on which the promise of meaning is based. Whereas on the border of the promise of meaning ambiguity of an allusion is part of the gesture of indefiniteness of the poetic text, its unambiguity and insistence on unambiguity can originate only with the violence of interpretive speech. For example, in the poem "Ovid at Tomi" the exile of the Latin poet by Caesar's order to the deserted shores of the Black Sea is reenacted. Using the heterogeneous lexicon which is today predominant in modern poetry, and by virtue of the point of view which the speaker of the poem takes, the author allows us to suspect a certain updating of the question of the poet's exile and--nothing more. If thanks to a possible allusion, one that is only possible, in that the title of the poem coincides with the title of a poem by another poet, we see in Ovid Osip Mandel'shtam, and in Caesar Dzhugashvili nicknamed Stalin, that is a question of our willingness, but it is neither possible nor necessary to go farther with the associations on the basis of the poem's text. The other poems in "Vunena vremena" also remain essentially open in that same way, not fully stated in their meaning, but complete as creations of poetic language.

The same line of verse may evoke differing associations in different readers. Our associations always spring up in such a way as to connect to one another, thus indicating what pains us in one way or another, what we perhaps would rather not speak about, either consciously or unconsciously. How is it, then, that practically all the interpreters have discovered the same meaning? The promised meaning of "Vunena vremena" is the relationship between the writing of poetry and everything that can symbolize authority and might. That relationship is not localized in the book; its register is univeralized on the horizon of the promised meaning. One unfortunate moment made it possible to evoke associations which led by the shortest route to what was experienced in that moment as a memory of a certain collective grief, and thus with the help of fear of the opaqueness and "hidden meanings" of poetic language it led the interpreters to attribute to the book a political meaning related to Yugoslavia. Sacrificing the poetry, the critics--as though caught up by an epidemic--made of a book of poems a symptom of their own anxiety. Their undertaking in defense against poetry can be understood, though often its consequences to the culture and creativity of a society cannot even be examined. In any case, the politically undesirable meanings which they discovered have no equivalent in the book itself and cannot be arguments against its author. Otherwise, if it is possible that they are to become even legal evidence, all we can do is to be amazed.

Against Trial in Principle

Belgrade KNJIZEVNA REC in Serbo-Croatian 25 Sep 81 p 3

[Article by Milorad Vucelic: "In Favor of a Judgment, Against a Court Verdict"]

> [Text] ... No one has struck out at the progressive writers, and he who has erred has to state in the press that what he has been doing is incorrect, since that writer is not well-intentioned.... He (Branko Copic--M. V.) has taken the entire society and portrayed it, from top to bottom, as negative, which means that it should be done away with entirely. We are not going to allow that kind of satire and let it pass without a response. There should be no fear that we will attempt to arrest him for this. No, he should be answered in public.... (Passage of Marshal Tito's speech at the Third Congress of the Antifascist Front of Women concerning Branko Copic's satirical story "A Heretical Story." The quote is taken from BORBA, 30 October 1950.)
> A penalty of 2 years in prison was pronounced yesterday in the Belgrade District Court against the poet Gojko Djogo, author of the collection of poems "Vunena vremena," which was published by the Belgrade publishing house Prosveta. The panel of three judges, with Judge Venijamin Pejovic presiding, found him guilty of hostile propaganda under Article 133 of the SFRY Criminal Code. The verbal statement of the grounds of the verdict said among other things that the allegations of the indictment against Gojko Djogo for untruthful and malicious portrayal of sociopolitical conditions in our country had been confirmed. (POLITIKA, Friday, 18 September 1981)

In speaking about the verdict against Gojko Djogo, we must, as in a number of similar cases earlier ("Arguments Against the Neutral," IIC SO Serbia [(?) Information Publishing Center of the Serbian Youth League], 1980) one must emphasize again that we regard a socialist court to be absolutely incompetent and out of its jurisdiction in matters of literature and artistic creativity.

Great dangers to the freedom of creativity are undoubtedly concealed in the tendency to bring artistic content under the scope of legal formulations and the tendency to interpret it arbitrarily and extensively. One of them is the danger that multiple levels, multiple meanings and multidimensionality of the work of art and other forms of creativity (in this case of poetry) will be utterly reduced to mere information, agitation, the dissemination of rumors, "malicious and untruthful portrayal of conditions." These tendencies, which, consciously or not, do not retain overmuch of their relations to the humanistic projection of the future, are directed toward "bringing the public matter of opinion under the jurisdiction of the courts." That particular kind of legal reductionism would like to "formalize public discourse," to establish the rules of language and thought whose violation leads to the defendant's box and to prison. The public language of thought and speech would in that context be sanctioned by the standards of the cynical-manipulative spirit, baneful to any public activity and to the possibility of arriving at a critical grounding.

We cannot look upon the sphere of law and legal norms as something separate from the strategic goals of the socialist movement and the real socialist content of justice. Complete social power and social optimality is not and cannot be dissolved in a legal order which only needs to be precisely applied. The laws and the legal order are actually established as guarantees of freedom, and as guarantees of the freedom of artistic creativity, which is a basic and key achievement and value of any society which claims to be a humanistic community and which is struggling for socialist values. The socialist social forces which pass the laws are exactly mindful not only of satisfying current and momentary daily needs, but also of constant expansion of the possibility of freedom on the basis of uninterrupted critical scrutiny of the overall social situation and its emancipative potential.

To that extent all the decisions made by government bodies and agencies must also be subject to the letter of the law and the dominant conception of social justice and social optimality. "The solar trajectory of justice," as Marx would put it, must be the guide concerning actual enforcement of general legal norms and articles of laws to individual cases. In this case of the judgment of the poetry and of the poet Gojko Djogo we believe that the court in rendering its decision fell beneath the level of the letter of the law and beneath the level of the socialist idea of justice.

So that we might avoid the objection that we are defining or assessing in an extremely arbitrary way the idea of justice and the fundamental commitments of our society, we will cite, quite specifically, one of the fundamental contributions to formulation of the most general social goals and the means of achieving them.

I am referring to the Program of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia.

The LCY Program, which denotes the "essential characteristics of the development of creative cultural abilities of the people," defines them as follows: "freeing of educational, scientific, artistic and cultural life from administrative interference by state organs and from state-absolutist and pragmatist conceptions of cultural creativeness, through building and perfecting a system of social self-management in educational, scientific and other cultural institutions and organizations."

We might enumerate a number of other examples (aside from the LCY Program, we have already mentioned the speeches of Comrade Tito related to a specific case) which patently and convincingly support the assertion that there have not been and there are no grounds whatsoever for the arbitrary interpretation of a work of art by a public prosecutor to be given the force and legality of a court verdict.

For the sake of truth and democracy, it should be said that the responsibility for the disproportionate sentence in this unnecessary trial is borne not only by the prosecutor's office and the court, but also by the witnesses. Is it really necessary for the public prosecutor in a culture which embraces the poet who wrote: "Let me be struck dead by a word that is too strong," to admonish the writers in a superior tone, because testimony was changed, "that it is each man's business to what extent he keeps his word"? Thus even the behavior of the writer-witnesses, aside from writing inglorious and Herostratic pages in the history of literature and culture on our soil, is indicative of the possible reasons why everything of ours that is democratic is still so brittle. The responsibility for democracy is not borne by politics alone, however democratically inspired and conducted, nor can the hotbed of undemocratic activity be solely in "politics."

Perhaps someone, who may even be right, will object to us that had they behaved differently, nothing essential would have changed, but for the sake of some supposedly weightier reasons we cannot neglect the elementary human and democratic norms by which everyone must bear a portion of his responsibility, at the behest of his own conscience and commitment.

We are not talking here about any sort of charity toward the poet and poetry. The domain of artistic and creative freedoms is by no means a detached and isolated space set off by someone's benevolence and goodness, which can accordingly be given or taken away. It is a question of the basic constitutive elements of socialism, which here are bound up with the very sense of survival.

But do the various interpretations of the government authorities in the domain of artistic creativity indicate something else as well?

Without questioning the actual formal and legal dignity nor intention of the court, we get the impression that through various administrative and court decisions, which are disproportionate to say the least, there is manifested a certain arbitrary, dogmatic, publicly unrecognized and bureaucratic interest which is being realized outside the domain of public formulation of the goals of society and outside the process of establishing social optimality. It is, of course, recognizable in all spheres of life, but as such, regardless of the strength with which and the places where it imposes itself, is historically and communistically illegitimate.

The emergence of this interest, if for no other reason because the conditions under which it usually appears are exceptional to some extent, leads as a rule to a clouding over of the real problem. Every topic is spoken about as something unimportant. The meaning of artistic creativity is spoken about in the eclipse of a court trial; in spite of the urgent need for us to talk about essential and vital issues (and they also include the freedom of creativity and the freedom of criticism of that same free creativity--which is only a clarification that is almost pedagogic), we speak, we "rack our brains," we squander our energies on staged problems whose retrograde nature is visible even to the naked eye. Instead of concerning ourselves with a staircase that is broken down and damaged, we are calling poets to account.

An ongoing process is taking place, one that is now altogether visible, of a constant minimalization of our historical program, a constant despoiling of the already scanty basis of civilization on which we concern ourselves with problems, which is accompanied by a strenuous battle that is always the same for the very premises of their intelligent resolution. The lowering of the level of our political tasks is taking place in such a way that we are carrying out an ongoing reduction of all the problems to their ideological and political aspect, often involving a very drastic breaking of a cane over the head of cultural and public criticism. The Marxist view--public criticism--is vacated even when it seems that various repressive interventions are furthering it. The handicap of repressiveness should not forever be placed on the back of the view which rightly understands itself to be Marxist. Much more trust must be shown in the creative intellectual forces of this society and in their power of critical discrimination and activity.

In one consequence, if we stop and think a bit more about the whole series of irrational and immoderate actions and solutions, this question seemed logical to us: Is someone unwittingly or deliberately going to compromise and humiliate us, above all before our own selves, and then before the world as well?

I know already that someone will perhaps say that appealing to the LCY Program, to stated principles and premises, to Tito and to communism is demagogy, rhetoric, concealment behind authority, cleverness in a specific situation, a muffled insistence on sacred principles--but that is really not the case at all. Let me, then, be forgiven and allowed this degree of responsibility (intoned perhaps with too much pathos and uttered without any sort of discipline necessary for what is called good writing): It is a question of conviction, of belief in the productive historical power of socialist and communist principles, of the struggle for their authentic realization and of criticism of everything which would vacate or degrade those premises and those high revolutionary principles, be it intentional or not. It is a question of a struggle for that socialism which we can equate with a free community of free people. There is absolutely no reason whatsoever why we should restrict the freedom of artistic creativity in this society in any manner whatsoever, and there is no reason whatsoever for us to critically recognize those who do so--critically recognize that as well--and oppose it with arguments. [sic]

We must speak about this openly and publicly, and that without amazement. After all, we cannot go on forever being amazed at the social mistakes (How did that happen? How was that possible? Who?), since at some point it may be by that amazement that the social reality in which we live will become recognizable or it will come to seem to us Kafkaesque with all the possible consequences.

This article is a small contribution to identification of a social situation and establishment of the reasons why a disproportionate verdict is intolerable. Since we must in the democratic spirit acknowledge the court the right to err, we have grounds for hoping that the higher courts will set aside the decision of the district court and free the poet Gojko Djogo of all guilt. And we hope that lessons will be drawn from all this and that the courts truly will not have occasion to meddle in the matters of public artistic expression, though they have no jurisdiction there. Let them leave literature to the judgment of criticism and to the test of time.

Analogies With Earlier Conflicts

Belgrade KNJIZEVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian 1 Oct 81 pp 9-10

[Article by Ratko Petkovic: "Against Short Memories"]

[Text] The disagreements which arose this summer over the "issue" of Gojko Djogo's new book of poems and which have taken dramatic turns, have given a particular topicality to the inevitable need to evaluate a kind of criticism which is usually based on the ideological question of poetry and which finds its point of support in the utilitarian conception of art. This need is imposed all the more irresistibly because of the paradoxical situation in which certain writers have found themselves, writers who were once ardent opponents of the utilitarian conception of literature and who themselves were once victims of dogmatic criticism, accepting at one point the possibility of readings of poetry which would not fit their declared poetics or theoretical commitments.

It is not the purpose of this article to define that type of criticism and assign it to its place in theory, but to show with examples from our recent past a model of it and its social scope when applied in practice.

Literary critics and historians have long ago established that during the period of the well-known conflict in 1948 our literary theory was in a delicate situation. It seems that it had been very easy for interpreters of literature up to that time. Art was placed at the service of ideology, it was the "teacher of life," and writers were the "engineers of souls." Literature was an integral part of party propaganda, and from it the "master--the people" demanded that it be a means of raising militant consciousness. According to the omnipotent recipe of socialist realism, as the official artistic direction, writers were instructed how to write, and on behalf of that recipe "fundamental judgments" were also issued, in which the following were the most frequent grade given: incorrect, devoid of ideas, decadent, subjectivism, formalism, pessimism, and so on.

To write decadent verse objectively meant committing oneself to the "expropriated traitors" and to being "tendentious in the negative sense." That is why the young writers were "guided" by their older colleagues, who benevolently "called their attention," "pointed out errors," in a word, protected them from their own selves, since almost as a rule many gifted writers, especially the poets, were inclined toward "formalism" and toward "views hostile to the people."

The literary authorities, backed up with ideological assessments and political power, allowed no one to stray outside the prescribed boundaries. Nevertheless, the political "heresy" of the Yugoslav communists, the new conceptions of socialist democracy, of freedom and morality, inspired creators to move beyond those boundaries. Young critics discovered that without the two basic values--without certain criteria and without morality--there is no criticism, and they wrote: "Where there is no freedom of creation (and we are referring to socialist freedom), there is no work of art either, there is no morality, nor is there any surge!"

But the poet, an old rebel and explorer, had been waiting for the moment which would allow him his surge. He proclaimed his conception of poetry and issued a challenge which included this passage: "Poets are the border guards of infinity, always one step beyond the stone marking what is allowed and everything that is possible. (...) Poetry is a picture of the impossible associated with the living past, a heresy associated with that past, the progress denounced by tomorrows which are still not dawning to unaccustomed eyes. A contemporary does not recognize himself in the portrait which the author offers him, is horrified by it, and this astounded nonrecognition is no wonder, the wonder is the art which has shaped the face...."

Publishing his manifesto in the name of the future, in the name of poetry, the poet, it seemed, had committed an unforgivable sin. For ideologist-critics every word of his smacked of intolerable heresy, of rebellion, after all, these critics, in their dogmatic consciousness, thought they knew everything. Thanks to their all-seeing logic, whatever was yet to be "examined, seen, shown, and yet to be proven" was clear--they had a scale which weighs absolute values, not to mention ideological templates! The latter are already sketched into spiritual creations, one needs only to fit things to them. But the poet confused them very much: What is this opening up the borders to infinity?! After all, all questions occur to them in their "full clarity"; in this they were forgetting Mayakovski's well-known witticism to the effect that the man who is "absolutely clear" is "absolutely stupid."

The Art of Adaptation

The democratization of social relations (and also of literary policy), the proclaimed freedom of creativity, the official rejection of the theory of art as a handmaid of ideology and of the practice of ideological-political arbitration within the domains of poetry, the victory of the conception of art as an autochthonous reality--confused them only for a moment. The dogmatists were waiting ready in ambush for their moment. Deprived of political power and of the opportunity to convict without being called upon, they involuntarily adapted to the new conditions, and have therefore been listening and waiting. At one time all powerful bureaucrats, prosecutors and judges at the same time, may now become wakeful eyes and judges on duty for literary offenses, issuing a message to those who do not agree with them: "... A struggle between us is inevitable, and that a struggle without the administrative role of government prosecutors and lawyers, but on the basis of ideological arguments."

From time to time they issue admonitions that because of a lack of vigilance, under the new conditions, "ideological forces of the past" had revived and that those to whom the destiny of socialism had been entrusted were retreating step by step.

They obviously were not in the least naive; they were prepared for the situation to change in a moment: from the ideological front they sped to the esthetic front, forgetting all the while that it is no longer a question of differences in the style of writing, but in the manner of thought. For them art is still "the subjective reflection of objective reality." (And therefore a check has to be made as to how that reality is being portrayed.)

As is usually the case, the greatest troubles came from the poets. After all, these "border guards of the infinite" erase the differences "between the possible and impossible." The danger arises where it is difficult to discover a meaning cloaked in poetic language. Is this not perhaps an introduction to "nonsense and hopelessness"?! (After all, the flood of that nonsense appears "systematic and deliberate.") It becomes increasingly difficult to discover meaning when issues have become sensational, the metaphors obviously become the firearms of the ideological enemies of our reality. The poet, then, has fallen into a trap devised in time-tested workshops.

Artistic content is equated with objective reality, and the speaker of the poem with the author's I. A fetish is made of ideology, and characteristics are attributed to objects which they lack. (Thus poems in which there is mention of a dark night is nothing other than an expression of "decadent hopelessness" and "a protest against our socialist reality.")

The once powerful and protected investigatory agencies, prosecutors, judges and critics, who are at the same time dogmatists and ideologists, are not satisfied with firing single shots after small game. Their social appetites are much greater, and the results could also be much more spectacular.

A strategy exists, the opponents have been marked, but the detailed plan of the struggle has not been worked out. After all, as is their old habit, the critic-ideologists have a template sketched out in advance by which they have won all similar battles--only this template has to be applied at the right moment. The great teacher and the strategist, the victor in all battles, has already foreseen everything.

The Model Has Been Given

The trap is set, only the moment is awaited. And the restless poet (who has already printed several books which have been both praised and disputed) has crossed the border toward that "infinity," has naively and hastily "fled into it."

The anticipated moment has come--a very unfortunate one for the poet! It happens to be a delicate moment in politics: there is a conflict with advocates of unacceptable ideological conceptions and of a "new ideology." And precisely at that moment, unfortunately, the poet has published his book. The "border guard of infinity," the explorer of language, the creator of new metaphors, the extreme "modernist," the "heretic," the "bone stuck in the throat" of the critic-dogmatists has been writing a new kind of poetry--his book represents an imaginary dialogue with a comrade who died in the war, a revolutionary.

In his incomprehensibility and nonsensicalness the poet has nevertheless been clear to the members of the ideologized critical community: the poems in the book are about realizing the young people's ideal of freedom, about our reality. Polemically oriented, it sets forth "hostile views" in "an unusually strong subjective form," so that they are "completely identified with the author's I."

The poet is sketched in the well-known and time-tested pattern: Is his book not an expression of that "new ideology"?! Not quite as yet! The critics are not so incautious and hasty: the prey is not to be let slip easily, it is only necessary to apply the given template. They have learned in past literary battles that the methods of a priori ideological discrediting have been superseded and that there is a need to "dissolve the formation" on the ideological front and reform it on the esthetic front (at least at the outset). On the basis of the esthetic analysis, the poet is an innovator in language, overloaded with new metaphors; the book is "a flood of words which has no beginning or end, an eruption of verbal...." The conclusion inexorably imposes itself, then, that the book has no artistic value! But what does it represent? Once again the template is known: the spite of the pamphleteer and (as though by the way) an anarchistic frame of mind resound in it. What has then happened to the poet? Again a tried and true conclusion: the poet has retreated in the face of the "politician," "ideologist" and "standardbearer" of a--to give it a provisional name just for now--new "ideology."

Very clever: "a provisional name just for now"! After all, the charge has yet to be supported. There, of course, follows the rule from the set diagram: the day will be saved by a collage of quotations and translations of poetry into the language of journalism:

"The basic thesis, clouded over at the beginning of the book by the rather confused reminiscences of prewar and wartime reality, events and people, as well as by the condemnation of the Cominform, given in certain sentences of the author's introduction--is exhibited as gradually and certainly as an accurately and precisely fixed attitude toward everything and every kind of thing, toward the entire socialist reality of our country."

The poet's coherent system and his "premeditation" to discredit all values and sacred things is "discovered" by measuring the lines of verse and reassembling them. One poem is judged to be the "worst poetic piece of pamphleteering ever written anywhere," and that is quite enough for an indictment. The poet "cries out" (to use his own expression) his "anarchoid truths." "Everything falls under the poet's feet, and all is within range of his spittle."

Poetry as a Crime

The esthetic analysis, then, coexists together with ideological analysis, and the speaker of the poem is consistently equated with the author's I. The template leads to one and only one logical conclusion: "a twisted conscience and a twisted view of the world" speak out of these lines of verse; the poet has passed "to the other shore--into the realm of anarchistic nonsense and anarchistic fury."

The charge is drawn up cautiously, but surely, and the associations are (only now) imposed: where else can a poet (who has crossed "to the other shore") be put except--in the camp of bearers of the "new ideology." The goal has been achieved: the poet has been driven into a tight place offering him no way out! After the objective esthetic analysis came the ideological "expert evaluation" and the logical (according to the template) conclusion: he is an enemy of this society who in his verses has falsely and maliciously been portraying our reality.

If this judgment is also to take on the dimension of an actual social crime (in any case so as to meet the democratic principle as well), the scheme envisages additional efforts. There is a need to furnish the voice of the public and an answer to the question how the book could have been published. Of course, after the disqualification has been pronounced, everything goes much more easily. The readers confirm the words of the prosecutor in a large-circulation newspaper, and another newspaper publishes a statement by a reputable critic that the poet's book of poems, like indeed his previous novel, were published "without any sort of reader's report and discussion in the literary council."

The scheme has demonstrated its infallibility (for the umpteenth time). The dangerous poet and opponent of society has been beaten. All takes place according to a well-designed scenario.

Yet there is still that saving (or proverbial)--but! Though the critic-ideologists foresaw all the details and closed the circle, and though they knew everything in advance, they forgot certain elements which were not essential at all. One of them is called: time. In their ossified and dogmatic all-seeingness they (as a rule) forgot that time, inexorably and irrecoverably, had deposited their superseded conceptions in the lumber room of antiquities and that in the altered social circumstances their methods of intimidation and discrediting were like revivals of a superseded ideology that had been imported and was by no means glorious.

Enter the Spirit of Suspicion

To their surprise, in this hybrid marriage between ideology and esthetics, a third element emerged! No one other than--the "evil spirit" who suspects and puts questions, referring all the while to the sacred principle of equal, professionally competent, free and democratic dialogue. Deprived long since of their monopoly over public expression, the dogmatist-critics were involuntarily compelled to enter into the conversation. Whether this was an attempt at a new adaptation is not essential--it is just that they had to publish the words of the "evil spirit," along with their own comment:

"We are of the opinion that a free conversation of free people is the basic condition and pledge for fuller development of literary and artistic life and for more proper resolution of all issues." This preamble was followed by the reaction of the "evil spirit" (dissident-critic) who was clever enough to throw up in the face of the prosecutors their own words, asserting that the charge against the poet is a "piece of political pamphleteering of a very poor variety: the Zhdanovites were better at writing them." He protested "against a mystification, against an unprincipled attempt to distort, to twist into its opposite the meaning of a book," and he protested "that one of our greatest living poets is being indicted as a traitor and opponent of this country."

But the "evil spirit" also showed his good side. After he had discredited his teachers, he benevolently declared that it seemed to him that this verdict against the poet had nevertheless "been written in haste far more by revulsion than analysis," adding: "I would prefer to believe that an ordinary misunderstanding is involved, so that I do not have to think of any great baseness." Nevertheless, this "evil spirit" was a bit old fashioned and patriarchal: he did not miss the chance to say propedeutically how this attack on the poet was "in any case a cultural disgrace."

Realizing that the prey was no longer certain at all, the prosecutor (in accordance with the time-tested model) resorted to his last argument: he replied to the "evil spirit" that a bad opinion of this book is also held by "a whole number of intellectuals, and that very high-level intellectuals, literary figures, public figures, cultural figures and political figures."

Nevertheless, the poet, the "border guard of infinity" (whose name should finally be mentioned)--we have been talking about Oskar Davico and his book "Covekov Covek" [A Man's Man], published in 1953--managed to have his "offense" dismissed before his party organization; he was even offered the chance to prepare the publication of the new journal in which together with those of like mind he would publish his conceptions of poetry. To the criticism that his books had been published without meeting the legal regulations he offhandedly replied that a writer's books are not examined in detail when the publisher has already published four books by him. And to the critic who obstinately argued that the poet was leaning with his right wing on the left wing of the bourgeosie, he replied in few words: "I am not a bird. And even birds don't fly that way."

Some 15 years later (now a classic who, under the influence of the inexorable laws of biology, has been able at times to repeat the errors of his own prosecutors) he published his collected works in which the transcribed words of his defense stand as a warning against a short memory:

"No one has ever anywhere, here or in the world, in writing about books, used such esthetic descriptions, but, yes, Vyshinsky in his closing speech in one of the Stalinist trials. Except that Vyshinsky did not write literary criticism, but was looking for heads in his role as a bloodthirsty public prosecutor."

P.S. The various quotations, data and views in this article illustrating the particular theoretical conceptions were taken from the writings of Marin Franicevic, Radomir Konstantinovic, Zoran Misic, Oskar Davico, Dusan Matic, Boro Drenovac, Voja Rehar, Purisa Perovic, Tanasije Mladenovic and Eli Finc, published in the period between 1948 and 1954. Some of these authors have altogether or considerably changed their literary convictions in their later writings.

Earlier Attacker Regrets Outcome

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1605, 4 Oct 81 p 40

[Article by Stevan Stanic: "One Bitter Taste After Another"]

[Text] Quite a bit of time has passed since the trial of the poet Gojko Djogo, and 2 weeks since the verdict was announced in the District Court in Belgrade which proclaimed the author of "Vunena vremena" guilty of the hostile act of propaganda under Article 133 of the SFRY Criminal Code and sentenced him to 2 years in prison. By the established newsman's rules concerning freshness and topicality, this late comment ought not to appear. It ought not to have except for the certain taste of wormwood which lasts much longer, even in the author of these lines, who himself very fiercely condemned that book in the pages of this journal.

This was a hasty revulsion which the collection "Vunena vremena" evoked at once. A revulsion which in perhaps its initial ferocity drove many people to alter their inherent and natural style, and drove the author of these lines to be surprised himself when a few days ago he again read that he had written that the poet Djogo "with poisonous canine teeth rends everything, uses everything to scratch himself by rubbing against it, shakes everything, tears everything...," hoping to represent to Djogo himself what his style, in which he writes about others, looks like when the writing is about him. One bitter taste after another! Probably nothing more painful at this point.

But now everything is becoming quite different, when a young man, a poet, whom we have awarded and supported, is going off to serve his 2-year sentence, to be separated from his wife and children for 2 years, with all the other consequences.... That is stronger than anything. One always remembers the epilogue, the rest is forgotten.

But, couldn't we say--sorry, that was not the way we worked it out. At the moment when many very fierce and embittered lines appeared in the pages of many newspapers, including those which this author wrote for NIN, none of the authors of those articles probably had the intention nor supposition that it would end up in a court trial and prison. Hadn't an atmosphere more difficult for the young poet to bear than any conviction been created in the public without "mutual agreement"?

Why, then, did the official court make its appearance? In confirming by its own means what the public had already done, did it not express its lack of confidence in that public, did it not discredit that public in some manner? We see no other reasons it might have had. There was no need to ban the book, the publisher himself had immediately withdrawn it from sale, and certain editors had been discharged over the case. It could not have disturbed the public, since only some 30 copies or so had reached it.

Thus, instead of a possible polemics "about the possible polysemy of poetry" (if there was anyone left who doubted his first emotional condemnations of the collection) continuing in the public, the polemics began before the court and here it inevitably appeared in its distorted form. Isn't that why certain well-known editors, poets and reviewers, who in the trial gave different testimony from what they had previously given to newsmen and the investigators, risking even the outcome of their own hypocrisy and vacillation, began to withdraw and to openly contradict themselves, apparently without regret. Did they not do this out of a resistance to having their statements uttered for the public used now as evidence in court?

But if none of us can doubt the good intentions of the court even when the trial has already begun to influence the outcome, especially in order to mitigate that wormwood which we ourselves tasted--we must nevertheless say that it seems to us that we all unfortunately let slip what we might call a great opportunity to bring the case to an end in a democratic way, without participation of the court. Is there not a threat after this missed occasion that in some similar "case" to come we will only sit on as observers in the quiet: and all else is silence?

University Paper's Satiric View

Belgrade STUDENT in Serbo-Croatian 7 Oct 81 p 11

[Article by Pavle Grubjesic: "Having No Siberia"]

[Text] Our daily newspapers often have a feature called the "black chronicle." These words are printed at the top of those pages where brave correspondents report on the inexhaustible wealth of everyday wonders, such as: rapes, patricides, infanticides, excesses of passionate jealousy, robberies of post offices and banks (though it is not altogether clear to us what there is in our banks to take), traffic accidents, and, of course, those few wayward, but "dangerous" enemies of the state. In warning the readers beforehand, it is the custom for the correspondents to express horror and put the age-old questions about the limits of human amorality.

We are persuaded that culture has for a long time been thirsting for a "black chronicle" feature, and in starting one, we have only a coincidence to thank for the fact that its first report, in the spirit of the tradition, deals with material from a meeting, shamefacedly takes a "case" which has already been dealt with in the annals of the "black chronicles" of the daily press.

The poet Gojko Djogo was recently sentenced to 2 years in prison for "hostile propaganda." In rendering that decision the court stated in concrete terms the opinion of the workingman, specifically and above all the opinion of that workingman in the Prosveta warehouse who "reported" the book "Vunena vremena" as suspicious. It is interesting that those "public figures" who were so touchingly horrified at the "cuckoo eggs" at the commencement of the affair did not react to this decision. Modestly concluding, we suppose, that we have no Siberia, that Deliblatska Pescara is small, that Perucica is tame, and Ivanjica fairly well developed; it appears that they are quite satisfied by those two miserable years.

Since we have not read the book, nor did we attend the trial, and we do not have the honor to know either the poet Gojko or the judge Venjamin, we do not feel an inclination to quote from Marx, Engels, Lenin or Tito: we are forced to put a few layman's questions on the basis of what we have learned from the mass media.

a) Is it a hostile act and an act of propaganda to offer a book of poems to a publisher? (From the standpoint of the government, and this Plato himself knew, all poems are hostile; from the standpoint of our constitution, it seems to me, no one can be called to account for verses which he has written in his notebook). Let us remember that the collection "Vunena vremena" was not published by Gojko Djogo, but by Prosveta, who, then, was responsible for printing and disseminating this "hostile propaganda material."

b) Did the indictment have a single witness who would confirm the charges it contained?

c) Would a court trial be instituted against, say, Miljkovic (on the basis of my report), who wrote that Yugoslavia is the Cape of Good Hope and in that line jeopardized our traditionally good relations with the African countries and cast under suspicion our policy of peaceful coexistence by an obvious claim to the territory of the cape that was mentioned?

d) Does the court share the opinion that freedom is a perceived necessity?

ADVOCACY OF 'STRONG FEDERAL CABINET' RESEARCHED

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1605, 4 Oct 81 pp 9-11

[Article by Aleksandar Novacic]

[Text] The idea of "a strong executive council" generates a number of other important questions on the functioning of the Yugoslav system.

Mitja Ribicic, in an interview with VJESNIK a few days ago, again appealed for a strong government in Yugoslavia: "If today we were to ask self-management officials whether they favored a strong federal government, they probably would answer yes. But a condition would then have to be placed to that affirmation. A government would have to be created that would correspond to the interests of the Yugoslav economy's associated labor system, and not to those of individual republics, regions or narrow interests."

This is not the first time that Ribicic has raised this question, just as he is not alone in the initiatives that from time to time come out in public, particularly in situations such as the present. Most often they refer to one of the ideas that authors think will contribute to a more effective system, and that will make it possible to emerge from economic and other difficulties.

The thesis about a strong government was a direct opportunity for a conversation that we conducted about that and other questions with the presidents of the Executive Council of the Yugoslav Assembly, Stana Tomesevic-Arnesen, and of the Council of Republics and Provinces, Zoran Polic.

The Republics' Influence is Too Pronounced

"What does a strong government mean?" Stana Tomasevic-Arnesen asked herself. "To me, a strong government is one that performs its functions in a competent way. The areas of competency of the Federal Executive Council are determined by the Constitution, and there no changes are to be made. When I say a strong government, then, I mean a capable, qualified team, and I must state that, besides the majority of Federal Executive Council members who work capably, there are a number who do not measure up to these high demands. In quality, the Federal Executive Council must be on a higher level, but as far as competence and duties are concerned, there is nothing to be changed."

In the opinion of the president of the Federal Council, the Federal Executive Council as a whole must to the highest degree reflect the status of Yugoslav needs. The influence of the republics and provinces is still too pronounced, "but this is a period of maturing. This is perhaps the first time that such heavy responsibilities have fallen upon the Federal Executive Council, and as soon as it has to make the decisions, it will be able to make them."

Zoran Polic, the president of the Council of Republics and Provinces, agrees that "we need a strong government," but he immediately adds "and a strong assembly." To be specific, if it were demanded that the government be more authoritative, and the assembly were to stay as it is today, then the Federal Executive Council would somehow "be left hanging in the air."

Polic said: "It is now happening that the federal government is at times indecisive in approving certain regulations and measures, and comes to the assembly late or infrequently. Concerning the delegate assembly, it is not aggressive enough in approving the overall policy that is essential at the present time."

Question: It is not easy to answer as to what the causes are, for probably there is no single, exclusive cause, but rather a whole chain of factors. But where do you see the main problem?

Stana Tomasevic-Arnesen: "There are some objective factors, some faults. Why is workers' self-management in stagnation, and since it is in stagnation, does that mean that it is going backwards? What has led to the situation where now the delegate system in the opstina and the local community is not making itself felt? That is not from a lack of legal regulations; there are enough of them. I think that the basic hindrance is in slow and inconsistent implementation of resolutions. This is a sort of national malady, and the Federal Executive Council cannot be exempted from blame. As a society, we are weak in concentrating on implementation, in sticking to the contract, in insisting on it....

"It is essential that we eliminate parcelization. Every separate entity has its own bit of power, - the labor organization, the opstina, the region and the republic, the province. Two dangers emerge from this. The first is that every republic decides its problems without regard to the situation in Yugoslavia as a whole."

Polic: "It happens here that a republic exports raw materials to foreign countries while another republic buys those same raw materials abroad, at a higher price. This is because the materials are produced in one republic, while the processors are in another republic, and every one looks out for himself. The other danger is that parcelization spawns a terrible centralism. We can confirm that by looking at the list of measures that the Federal Executive Council has already approved, or which it will be considering. The republics and provinces should resolve all these issues among themselves. Instead of that, bit by bit agreements are being replaced by measures of the Federal Executive Council. Governmental agencies are becoming stronger and stronger."

Polic considers that the system for making agreements is not functioning effectively because "agreements are being sought about things that are not the subjects for agreements. For example, agreements are made on the distribution of foreign exchange, but one cannot distribute foreign exchange without first earning foreign exchange income. In Yugoslavia we seek agreements about foreign exchange, but not about Yugoslavia's priorities."

In recent assembly debates, the delegates were much sharper in criticizing that, but now could they do otherwise: the data was presented that of 45 essential agreements, that should be put into the third part of the Yugoslav social plan, only two had been concluded. The fate of the rest is unknown.

A Long Journey Into Uncertainty

In the assembly debate Zvone Dragan, vice-president of the Federal Executive Council, suggested several chief reasons for the failure of the agreement system to function. He said:

"When we are dealing with general policy, the system of reaching agreements still seems to work somehow, but when we come to concrete details such as who will produce everything and with what raw materials, with what money, an insufficient readiness to put obligations into concrete form emerges...."

It now appears that there is a long and complicated path from an idea to a social agreement. That path is also very uncertain, for often the original idea has very little similarity to its final form as a joint proposal. The winds that are blowing along the way stations of that route are at times so strong that the entire composition is knocked off the basic pathway. What is the path to an agreement? First, ideas are taken by specialists in federal, republic and province administrations. They process and formulate them. Since they are directly influenced by republic and province interests, they strive at this initial phase to put in as many of their own positions as possible in the future joint agreement. A remark that is often heard is that the proposal at this level are colored by technocratic interests, and the base has no influence on them.

In the second phase, inter-republic committees of the Federal Executive Council come onto the scene. Here the political interests of the republics and provinces are markedly more pronounced, but the group of people involved in the discussions is somewhat broader; it is dominated by politicians. Many ideas are stopped right here. Current practice has shown that this is the most difficult stage at which to reach an agreement. The work of these inter-republic committees is not only distant from the public, but also distant from the assembly delegates. Thus, Mustafa Sabic recently asserted: "I do not remember ever receiving any report from those inter-republic committees, and therefore I do not know anything concrete and I cannot affect an agreement in any way."

If the initial idea somehow manages to pass through this labyrinth (and often in the process it takes on the form of a compromise that everyone rejects), the negotiations continue in the so-called coordination committee of the Federal Executive Council. Here political appeals and persuasion are used to attempt to find a common language for details on which agreement has not yet been reached.

Finally, the formulated proposal reaches the Federal Executive Council. Although the greatest part of the route has been traveled, sometimes this is precisely where the idea gets stuck. True, the atmosphere should be different, for the Federal

Executive Council is supposed to be a unified team, but so far results of negotiations support those critics who, in pointing out the ineffectiveness of this body, assert somewhat ironically that the Federal Executive Council operates more as some committee for the economy of "some imaginary government."

Assuming the now thoroughly hypothetical notion that this obstacle as well has been surmounted, the proposal reaches the Yugoslav Assembly, where in task forces, committees and finally, in the Council of Republics and Provinces, a decision is made. Since the interests of the delegate base are more directly present in the Assembly, one can imagine the sort of debates that take place. But practice shows that a proposal for a social agreement seldom makes it as far as the Assembly. Usually, it is rejected before that step.

The fact that the system of seeking agreements is long and complicated under normal circumstances should not be regarded as a matter of particular interest. In the final analysis, it is a question of one of the essential characteristics of self-management and social property. Kardelj once warned that it is better not to reach an agreement than to accept it under pressure and hurriedly.

Unfortunately, the current situation in the Yugoslav economy can hardly be called normal. When we are sailing at full sail toward general insolvency, it is essential that agreements be reached about at least those things that constitute the material foundation of the Yugoslav community. Incidentally, so that the federation not be paralyzed precisely by that sort of disagreement between the republics and provinces, the Constitution provides for the Federal Executive Council, with the approval of the Presidium, to adopt temporary measures. Kardelj saw that as an expression of a political crisis, but today, under the pressure of accumulated difficulties, he regards that somewhat more loosely.

[Inset, p 10] Delegations and Republic Leadership

Zoran Polic: We do not have a strong Assembly.

At first glance, the delegations now seem quite independent. Nevertheless, they do not venture to oppose the political leadership in their republic or province, to take a stand that contradicts the political leadership's position. As long as the delegations are under the direct influence of the day-to-day current policy decisions of that leadership, and not guided by the long-term interests of their constituencies, it will be difficult to eliminate factionalism and affirm the role of the Council of republics and provinces.

[Main text] Should There be Temporary Measures or Not

Stana Tomasevic-Arnesen: "We have shunned temporary measures twice. Somehow they overburden us. But if the problems are not resolved, if active involvement is not maintained, then I will support temporary measures.

On the question as to whether we are presently about to approve temporary measures, she responded that that is probably the case, and that to do so would not be any tragedy. "If according to the Constitution the Federal Executive Council has that right, why not?"

Polic told us, "I fear that by constantly seeking temporary measures, we will strengthen the anti-self-management mechanism." He believes that precisely for that reason, the negotiation system should have one more possibility in the form of an arbitration body in the Assembly that, prior to the approval of temporary measures, would try once more to find an acceptable common solution.

At the comment that since 1974 temporary measures have been used only once, the president of the Council of Republics and Provinces waved his hand and said, "We have approved some regulations under the threat of those measures."

Polic continued, "I think it is a weakness that the Federal Executive Council works that way. I am opposed to those inter-republic committees. They should be held closely within the limits of their responsibilities, and those include implementing laws or other Assembly documents and acts, and functioning as an advisory body to the Federal Executive Council. The inter-republic committees should never be the body that has the obligation of examining agreements or documents that are going to the Assembly for final reconciliation and approval. That is the greatest mistake that has been made in recent years. The only body that should perform such reconciliation is the Assembly, and the Federal Executive Council proposals should go to the Assembly immediately. Then let the delegates negotiate over them there, in public view. Then the needs for temporary measures will really be reduced to the minimum. That is the only way to firm up the self-management policy line, and to restrict government to the functions and tasks given it by the Constitution."

Polic further stated: "The problem, however, is not only with agreements 'at the top.' There are thousands of agreements among labor organizations that should be eliminated. The public defender for self-management should oppose all those agreements that are fictitious, that cause confusion, and yet do not resolve the fundamental problems of our society. He must seek to have them annulled. It is impossible to have labor organizations making agreements on prices, on foreign exchange and directly connected trade, for such agreements are made to the harm of the basic principles of the Yugoslav system."

[Inset, column 1, p 11] The Djuranovic Example

Stana Tomasevic-Arnesen: "Those members of the Federal Executive Council remind me of--Christ. We are constantly crucifying them. Yet they are people of flesh and blood, who have their families, their hopes and ambitions. Let me see the genius whom you can divide in two and who will then say: 'Well, now I will sacrifice myself and my republic?' Apparently that could only happen during a war. "I agree with the idea that we should struggle for the positions of Federal Executive Council members that have their starting point in Yugoslav interests. But we should do that in the republics, and we should dispose of the notion that if someone in the government fights for the interests of his republic, he is bad and should be replaced. Objectively, such pressures do exist, and we cannot run away from them. We have enough of that as it is. There are few like Djuranovic for example, who came out openly against Montenegrin interests in the discussion on assessing the damages of the earthquake. But he has the support, he could do that."

A System or a Policy

Stana Tomasevic-Arnesen: "Things really are not going as we foresaw. 'We have driven the czar to the wall.' In that, however, there is a positive factor. The process of coming to our senses has begun. A positive social climate is being created in which it is apparent that we no longer have resources to throw away, we cannot continue to do as we did before, we can no longer contract limitless debts, and there have been enough slogans....

"Imagine a family with six children. It knows how much income it will receive, how much it needs for food, how much a pair of shoes costs, and how many coats will have to be bought. But it also knows how deep the pocket is, and who will have to do without a coat this winter, and who will get none next winter. That is how a family does it, but as a society we are far from being a family, even though that sort of money management is precisely what is needed.

"The economists can argue this simple example in a thousand ways. Yugoslavia's indebtedness gets ever greater, and the payments deficit increases while exports fall and demand on domestic markets goes up, productivity declines and much money is spent outside the regular economy."

Under the pressure of these difficulties, we hear more and more often the question: "Is the system to blame, and how much, and how much is the implementation of the system at fault?"

Stana Tomasevic-Arnesen replied: "I am not among those who say that we live in the best of all possible worlds." She added, "I am deeply convinced that the system is not to blame. The present system needs some corrections. They are necessary, first of all, because of changing realities, and secondly, because of our new perceptions and better vision."

In her opinion, we are now in a transition period, although it has come rather late. "Now everything is pressing on us, including domestic difficulties and the international situation. We must keep our nerves under control and turn to accomplish our tasks. Not because I am some sort of romantic, but from long experience, I know what this people is prepared for and what it can be capable of doing. We are truly in a terribly difficult situation, but for me it is more significant not to talk about our difficulties, but to resolve them. The time of the 'easy does it' society is, I believe, gone forever."

Polic agrees with her opinion. He said: "The system is not to blame, the culprits are poor organization, inadequate measures and lack of responsibility, and poor policies. When I speak about the system, I think about the essence, and I do not swear by every paragraph or every word. For example, I think that the Law on Associated Labor has many complex facets, and it should be simplified."

It is characteristic that both discussants believed that the Yugosla public is not sufficiently aware of the gravity of the economic situation. They believe that data should be brought out into the open. Thinking of informing the public, Polic said, "Here in Yugoslavia everything is either all rosy or all black."

There is no clear conception about what should be done, and at this time, that is the crucial question, for people see new warnings practically every day, with criticism of large investments, overindebtedness, and expenditures. They do not, however, see who will stop it, who will say "enough."

Polic stated: "For me it is essential to conduct a decisive, political battle to create a unified perception of our prospects, a joint basis for a so-called stabilization policy. If we really want such stabilization, we must reach an agreement on the political structure. We must accommodate the social plan to it, and the republics will have to change their plans accordingly. We will have to expect certain material sacrifices."

We asked Polic about the type of political structure he had in mind.

Polic: "I see both presidia, the League of Communists, and the coming party congress as being needed. The political unity that is needed has not been fully achieved, and it will be required to determine the direction in which a stabilization policy should be sought. There the Assembly will also have its role as the constitutionally designated axis for social agreement. The task forces of the Assembly should contain representatives of the SAWPY, the Central Committee, the chambers and the trade unions.

[Question] Do they come?

[Answer] Very seldom, very seldom. I have been here for 8 years, and I could count the number of times they have come to the Council on my fingers. They come even more rarely to the committee meetings.

[Inset, column 3, p 11] How I See "A Strong Government"

Zoran Polic: "I see it in decisive implementation of the tasks that are entrusted to it by the Constitution and systematic laws. Without any vacillation, without long discussions, it should implement the acts for which it is responsible and for which possibilities exist.

"Further, a strong government should represent the collective, and here the special interests of the republic should not be seen at all. Naturally, their interests in a negative sense, i.e., I as a member of the Federal Executive Council should not propose only that which accommodates my own republic.

"Is that realistic? Yes, absolutely. I am speaking from experience, I have been a member of the Federal Executive Council. It never entered my mind in that position to do something extraordinary for Slovenia, to favor it. A person can join that collective, the government, only to the extent that he is sufficiently conscious of the meaning of the community and community spirit, to be capable of distancing himself from everything that is not in the interests of the entire community, of Yugoslavia.

"To create a strong government means to be decisive in the duty, as president of the Federal Executive Council, of telling a person who cannot behave in this way that his services are no longer required, thank you. I am firmly convinced that the republics and provinces have a key role in the Federal Executive Council, but also, the president of the government or of the Assembly has the right to insist that individuals who do not respect and further the interests of the whole community, but represent their own republic or narrower political unit, should leave the Federal Executive Council. So far, we have not come to that, because the government has not been strong. That is its basic weakness, and the reason why it has been indecisive in approving certain measures."

PRE-CONGRESS DISCUSSION OF LCY STATUTE CHANGES

Belgrade KOMUNIST in Serbo-Croatian 9 Oct 81 p 8

[Article by Milivoje Tomasevic: "A Look at the Party Summit"]

[Text] It is already quite apparent that the Statute of the LCY will undergo a number of changes in the forthcoming party congress. These changes are connected in a most basic way to Comrade Tito. One was brought about by Tito's death, because the office of President of the LCY no longer exists. In addition, a suitable solution which will provide for the implementation of Tito's initiative concerning collective labor and decisionmaking must be entered into the Statute.

Atticles 72, 73, and 74 of the LCY Statute, which refer to the historic role of Comrade Tito and to his election as President of the LCY without a limitation on the duration of his mandate, will, consequently, be omitted. The powers and duties of the LCY President will be transferred to the authority of the LCY. One of the most important innovations is the proposal to point out the historic role of Josip Broz Tito in the introduction, the preamble of the LCY Statute.

Judging by the proposals and discussions which have taken place up to now, in addition to the changes just cited, which will necessarily require the alteration of a number of articles (initiatives on collective labor should be interwoven into the majority of statutory regulations), one must also expect there to be several dozen more small changes.

More essential changes in the future organization of the forums and organs of the LCY are not expected. Namely, there will not be great changes in normative regulation (prescription), but the necessity of advancing and further developing the methods and the substance of the work of the organs of the LCY should be emphasized. The Central Committee, the Presidium, and all other organs and organizations, especially the basic organizations of the LC, must perform with greater efficiency; it is necessary to strengthen the active connection between the organs of the LC, to develop democratic relations and ties with the masses.

The Conference of the League of Communists Cannot Be a Permanent Form of Organization

However, let us take things in order. It has been proposed that the congress remain the highest organ of the LCY, that it be convened every 4 years, and that it be composed, as it has been up to now, of delegates chosen proportionate to the number of LC members, and a certain number of delegates chosen in congresses, or in LCY republic and regional conferences, and in those of the League of Communists in the Yugoslav People's Army.

Since the LCY congress is preceded by LC congresses of the republics and by conferences of the LC in regions and in the LC organizations of the Yugoslav People's Army, it is not considered necessary to select a large number of delegates for the LCY congress, especially since it must have more of a working that a festive character.

The initiative concerning the possibility of convening LCY conferences between two congresses in order to deal with especially important problems was settled in the Statutory Commission of the LCY, as the Central Committee can no organize any form of communist meeting also, which means that it can convene LCY conferences as well. Therefore, as has been said, it is not particulary necessary to provide for conferences in the Statutes, especially considering that conferences should not be a permanent form of organization.

The Central Committee must continue to remain the "highest organ of the LCY between the two congresses." The number of members of the Central Committee (165) and the manner of their composition (20 from each republic and 15 from each province and organization of the LC in the Yugoslav People's Army) need not be changed. Meetings of the Central Committee of the LCY would be convened by the Presidium, and a working predisium consisting of five members, including the president and the secretary of the Presidium of the LCY Central Committee, would preside over them.

A More Significant Role for the Central Committee of the LCY

In past discussions, it has been especially emphasized that one must strengthen the role and responsibility of the Central Committee of the LCY for the implementation of policy adopted in the congress because, in the present Statutes and operating procedures, more is said and greater detail is given about the duties and the role of the Presidium and less is said about the role of the Central Committee of the LCY.

Naturally, everything cannot be standardized, but the spirit of new changes demands that, in the future, the Central Committee consider current ideo-political and socio-economic problems more frequently; all members of the Central Committee must be more occupied with preparation for meetings; there must be more dialogue at meetings, and the Central Committee must take positions at the appropriate time concerning all problems important to the fate of the country, it must establish policy and initiate actions, and it must (and this is extremely important) oversee the implementation of policy.

It has been proposed that the role and duties of the LCY Central Committee members be determined more precisely. Although chosen in a republic congress, a provincial conference, or in a League of Communist organization in the Yugoslav People's Army, a member of the Central Committee first of all should be a member of the highest organ of the LCY, with rights and responsibilities to the entire LCY. He must be independent in his activities and decisions, and he must bear responsibility for his work.

Against Federalism in the LCY

It is noted in the LCY Statutes that members of the Central Commiteee of the LCY are responsible to the Central Committee and to the LCY congress for their work. There are, however, proposals to include an additional formulation which would, in essence, mean that members of the LCY Central Committee be responsible to the forums which elected them and that they be obliged to consult with them on the occassion of taking positions and making decisions. This would, as evaluated in the Statutory Commission of the LCY, signify the introduction of the principle of delegate decisionmaking in the LCY, which would not be in accord with the principle of democratic centralism, which the League of Commnists does not intend to abandon.

After the role of the Central Committee becomes stronger, it would be normal to demand from its members a more active relationship toward problems of mutual interest and importance for the working class and for Yugoslavia. It is necessary, therefore, to affirm the right of members of the Central Committee of the LCY to come forward in the entire LCY, to seek information, and to attend meetings of the basic organizations and organs of the LC in all republics and regions.

It also has been proposed that a member of the Central Committee of the LCY should be given the right to set in motion an initiative for convening a meeting of the LCY Central Committee. Such an initiative and its justification might be considered by the Presidium; and, if it were not accepted, the reason would have to be given in a meeting of the LCY Central Committee.

The Central Committee of the LCY, at the proposal of a commission selected especially for this, chooses from its members its executive and political organ, that is, the Presidium. The number of members of the Presidium and its basic structure (three members from each republic, two from each province, and one from the Yugoslav People's Army) should be left as it is.

The dilemna as to whether the Presidium should be exclusively a political and executive organ of the Central Committee of the LCY or an organ of the LCY will probably be decided so that preference is given to the first proposal. It also has been proposed that the Presidium not "direct the work of the LCY Central Committee" (which was the duty of the president of the LCY) but "organize the work of the Central Committee of the LCY."

The authority of the president of the LCY to initiate discussions of current problems with the most responsible officials and to coordinate their work will probably be formulated so that the Presidium of the Central Committee of the LCY can allow the idea of discussing certain current problems together with other organs. The political coordination of the activity of socio-political organizations should be carried out in the Presidium of the federal conference of the SAWPY instead of in the Presidium of the Central Committee of the LCY, and all of the most responsible officials of the Federation should participate in the work of that organ. It is understood that the coordination and the taking of positions concerning open ido-political questions be carried out in the Presidium of the Central Committee of the LCY, and questions concerning state policy in the Presidium of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yogoslavia.

The Role of the Executive Secretaries

Impelmentation of the established policy and of decisions is one of the weakest points in the work of all organs in the LC. In past discussions, it has been stressed that the Presidium of the Central Committee of the LCY in the future ought to be occupied to a greater extent with carrying out the positions and policies of the LCY. This, however, also depends upon the composition of the Presidium because, if enough members there also are, at the same time, officials in other organs, then they, objectively, cannot be completely occupied with the duties of the Presidium.

That is why, on order to accomplish the goal of increasing the effectiveness of implementing adopted positions, it has been proposed that the Presidium have a certain number of people who will be engaged in the operative implementation of the duties and resolutions of the Presidium, who will oversee the activity of the LC in carrying out those resolutions, and who will make certain observations from the base of the LC and the institutions of the system.

Consequently, it is considered necessary to preserve the function of the executive secretaries, along with the fact that there should be some changes made in the nature of their work because there are many divisional separations and exclusive operations and, here and there, also are overlaps in their work.

The question also has been raised as to whether it would be possible to proceed into an institutional organization of the Executive Secretariat of the Presidium. This would mean, however, the creation of two executive organs, so it has been considered that it is better to stabilize the working agreements of the executive secretaries (which ought to be organized more often by the secretary of the Presidium) in which their work will be directed and coordinated, to agree to and to coordinate the activities especially in carrying out positions which have been adopted. It is especially important that the executive secretaries use the communist aktivs to a greater extent and that they discuss the forumlation and implementation of LC policy there, which presents a real possibility to engage more personnel in the creation of this policy.

BIOGRAPHIC PROFILE OF SCIENTIST AZARYA POLIKAROV

Sofia OTECHESTVEN FRONT in Bulgarian 13 Oct 81 p 4

[Text] In a reality where antifascism was not a matter of speculation, but of vital conviction, Azarya Polikarov became a member of the RMS [Workers Youth Union] as early as 1935. In 1944 this youthful life naturally led him to the ranks of the Bulgarian Communist Party.

His scientific interests developed side-by-side with his sociopolitical maturing. When he was only 19 years old, he published his first book: "Introduction to the Theory of Relativity." An interesting fact from his scientific correspondence is the letter he wrote in 1939 to Albert Einstein, to which the great physicist replied:

Before graduating in physics from Moscow State University, Azarya Polikarov wrote the books "From Copernicus to Einstein," "In Defense of Science," and the two volumes of "The Atom and the Universe," after that, his work "Dialectical Materialism and Contemporary Physics" was published. As a scientific collaborator in the BAN [Bulgarian Academy of Sciences] and an instructor in the University of Sofia, he prepared "Matter and Cognition," and later as a professor in the BAN (1962), his well-known monograph "Relativity and Quanta" was published and he defended his doctor's dissertation at the Academy of Sciences in the USSR.

In 1972-1973, Azarya Polikarov published the two volumes of his "Methodology of Scientific Cognition." It was this fundamental monograph that brought him a great recognition--the Dimitrov Prize.

The international scientific community knows him not only as a member of the International Institute of Philosophy, but also as a participant in numerous congresses and symposia as well as an author, translated and published in other languages: "Relativity and Quanta," "Problems of Scientific Cognition," "Science and Philosophy." He is on the editorial boards of several specialized scientific magazines: PHILOSOPHICAL THOUGHT (Bulgaria), EPISTEMOLOGY (Italy), NATURE AND SYSTEM (United States). He has delivered lectures in the USSR, the GDR, Cuba, Belgium, and Denmark. For 10 years now he has been in charge of the Center for Scientific Information at BAN.

Together with his two new books "Science and the Contemporary World," and "Essays on Methodology of Science," 1981 brought to him a great scientific and civic distinction--the title of People's Scientist.

The creative, scientific quests and achievements of Azarya Polikarov are predominantly in the field of the philosophical problems of the natural sciences and mainly in physics, methodology of scientific cognition and its heuristics (Specific mechanisms of the discoverer's thinking and the creative process). The reader could find more detailed information about the jubilee's scientific interests and research on the pages of the magazine PHILOSOPHICAL THOUGHT, Issue 8, 1981. There, among the other things, it is said, "To his friends, Polikarov is a man with a subtle sense of humor, but this special feature of his character often finds expression in his handling of methodological problems."

Einstein considered the sense of humor as a part of genius, and according to many researchers, it is one of the qualities related to the creative process. I would add only that the sense of humor seems to be heuristic of longevity too if we consider the fact that the "laughing philosopher" Democritus was a centenarian and maybe the longest lived of the great ancient thinkers. Let us wish Azarya Polikarov a true Democritus' longevitiy.

FRG WRITERS INVITED TO ATTEND EAST BERLIN 'PEACE CONGRESS'

Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German Vol 35 No 44, 26 Oct 81 pp 23-24

/Unattributed 'Disarmament' feature article: "Overriding Interests--Writers from GDR and FRG Intend to Get Together in Mid-November at the East Berlin Peace Congress"/

/Text/ The West German signers of the "peace appeal of European writers" got some mail from East Berlin in early October. Their GDR colleague, Stephan Hermlin, invited them to a peace congress of European authors in the GDR on 17 and 18 November.

Those invited are still trying to play down the political significance of the letter. "It is a private invitation," said the secretary-general of the West German PEN center, Martin Gregor-Dellin and Guenter Grass, too, maintains it is "a private letter."

But it is not only the locale of the meeting --the arts academy in East Berlin, a government building-- that speaks for the fact that Hermlin's peace initiative enjoys the backing of the GDR leadership.

The SED is also breaking a taboo. To be sure, there have been contacts between East and West German writers in the past; but these were restricted to the "private sphere," as the chairman of the West German writers' league puts it. Official gatherings involving the two associations have been forestalled by the East Berlin functionaries up to now.

Over the past few weeks, there had been a number of signs indicating a growing interest on the part of the GDR in literary contacts between the two Germanys.

All members of the presidium of the East Berlin writers' league, for example, signed the peace appeal of European writers.

And in late September, Hermann Kant, the president of the GDR writers' league, took part in the delegates' conference of the West German writers' league for the first time. Until then, the East German officials had turned down any such contacts by pointing to the absence of a formal cultural agreement.

When anxious colleagues at home asked Kant whether his participation was in the best interests of the GDR, he told them unequivocally: "There are such things as superior interests."

And as for these, GDR chief Erich Honecker made clear exactly what they were in a speech to graduates of the military academy last week. The GDR, he said, has nothing but respect and sympathy for "the citizens of the imperialist countries" who are protesting "against the planned stationing of new American medium-range missiles and neutron warheads in Western Europe."

It also appears that the GDR stands ready to make far-reaching concessions in order to strengthen the West European peace movement. Jurek Becker, the GDR writer who lives in West Berlin, puts it this way: "Things are being discussed that have not been discussed in this way in the GDR before."

Nor will the GDR leadership be able to avoid making concessions in the issuance of visas. Because the East Berlin authorities were miffed about the close contacts between Frank-Wolf Matthies, the young GDR writer whom they expelled early this year, and Guenter Grass, they have since refused to admit Grass into the GDR.

One thing in particular that speaks for the GDR leadership's interest in having the conference take place is the fact that the GDR writers' league does not figure as its organizer. The league's president, Hermann Kant, is not only heartily disliked by many GDR authors for toeing the party line; he also is considered to be one of those responsible for the expulsion of many writers critical of the regime from the organization.

But Hermlin, who was jointly responsible for the Biermann petition in 1976 in which GDR authors protested against the expulsion of the songwriter, enjoys the confidence of writers in both East and West Germany.

In deciding to accept Hermlin as the organizer of the conference, the SED leadership not only managed to avoid confrontation beforehand but has also left itself a way out. "If there is an awful lot of criticism," one GDR observer says, "they can still call the whole thing off."

CURRENT AVANT-GARDE ART PHENOMENA EXAMINED

Cologne DEUTSCHLAND ARCHIV in German Vol 14 No 8, Aug 81 signed to press 24 Jul 81 pp 804-807

['Commentaries and Current Topics' feature article by Karin Thomas, consultant, DuMont publishing house, Cologne, author of work on avant-garde art: "In Search of an Avant-Garde Art in Today's GDR"]

[Text] In the spring of 1981, I had an opportunity to take a lengthy trip to the GDR to look at art and which was to provide me with information about the existence and the development of avant-garde tendencies in the present-day GDR art.

It seemed to make the most sense to me to start my trip in Leipzig, since that city had acquired the reputation of an art metropolis in the seventies while the celebrated art instructors Werner Tuebke, Bernhard Heisig and Wolfgang Mattheuer were active there. In recognition of the pioneer role the three Leipzig painters had played in modernizing the East German view of realitynot only in their work but also in the academic field, I first concentrated on the students of Tuebke, Heisig and Mattheuer to see whether there were any signs of painting in the GDR developing further along progressive lines. But, what I was looking for I did not find in the immediate sphere of the academy for graphics and typography.

The most striking thing about the work of the students at the Leipzig academy for a West German visitor is that they are reminiscent of Dadaist photo collages and abstract expressionism. A student of Hartwig Ebersbach's, an assistant professor for photography who rather likes to experiment and who just received permission to attend the Basel art show, expressed avid interest in the different directions in which Western photography is headed. As we were talking, it became clear that photographers in the GDR must forego many experiments into the various aspects of the medium for lack of the proper materials.

Beyond that, I was disappointed to discover that there is very little avant-garde activity among the younger generation of Leipzig professors. They are too much dependent on Tuebke, Mattheuer and Heisig to escape the danger of being mere imitators of theirs. As long as the contents of Leipzig realism had concentrated on everyday problems specific to the GDR by employing stylistic and thematic materials of traditional art, this style of painting could be looked upon as an indigenous and serious expression of the avant-garde despite or perhaps because of the fact that it was imitating traditional art. But ever since these painters began to succumb to the aesthetics of genre painting by resorting to still lives and historical subjects, yesterday's avant-garde takes on an air of academic tedium which by now only rarely permits a spark of refreshing originality to emerge. I have had the impression that official painting in the GDR today does not look for the controversial aspects of everyday life in the GDR as it did in years past but instead takes refuge in traditional figural art. This was confirmed for me by the young Leipzig painter, Doris Ziegler, who I asked what kind of reception her 1975 painting "The Rosa Luxemburg Brigade" had had. It is a five-panel painting—one showing the brigade at work and the four others showing individual workers—which consciously tries to establish a link to the programmatic 1920's image of the working man. The reaction was positive at first; but later the women's brigade concerned turned thumbs down on Doris Ziegler's painting when their friends and acquaintances constantly told them that they were represented as being ugly and that that was not the true meaning of art.

This particular case made it crystal clear to me that there is a much stronger tradition among people in the GDR to look to art to fulfill aesthetic, decorative functions than that it should play a social role, although this latter position is the one officially upheld by GDR art policy. I find this assumption of mine unexpectedly corroborated right then and there during the busy preparations for the 3rd Leipzig art auction at the Sachsenplatz gallery. As I look around in the state-owned gallery for GDR art of today and yesterday, a veritable deluge of offers —oral, written and by telephone— is made to acquire the goodly number of turn-of-the-century art objects that are on sale. At the first two Leipzig auctions, the most desirable items for East German collectors were examples of critical realism and expressionism. But this year, people were crowding the decadent beauties of Franz von Stuck or Georges Minne and were ready to pay lots of money for examples of Western art which we would consider high-class wall decorations or would expect to find in the show windows of design-oriented interior decorating establishments.

There was little that was new in Halle; instead there was a good deal of stagnation there as well. Here in Halle, Uwe Pfeifer still is the outstanding representative of the younger generation of painters as he continues to portray life in the monotonous apartment blocks of Halle-Neustadt.

I received an unexpected shock of recognition when I viewed the Sitte retrospective at the Moritzburg state gallery here which documented the early works of this painter of the so-called "difficult" fifties in great detail. I was surprised to note that Sitte, who is the chairman of the artists' association today, undertook a large number of artistic experiments then which ranged from straight imitations of Picasso to formal experiments in the style of Miro, Max Ernst and Baumeister. By adopting this course, Sitte became enmeshed in the "formalism dispute" the upshot of which was that the artists were forced to adhere to the Soviet model of dogmatic socialist realism and were prevented from sharing in Western artistic experimentation for many years.

In Dresden, out in the rural suburbs, I met Willy Wolff, one of the undisputed godfathers of the GDR avant-garde, in his flower-covered retreat. Along with his 91 year-old former ASSO colleague, Hermann Gloeckner, Willy Wolff is the only artist in the GDR who paid any attention at all to the formal experimentation in painting employing abstract structures and graphic elements of English Pop Art in the early sixties while staying clear of all art policy constraints, thereby becoming a model to emulate for the younger generation of Dresden painters.

On Willy Wolff's advice, I went to the Mitte gallery in Dresden to continue my search for the present-day GDR avant-garde and found that he had sent me to the right place. The small, but unusually active gallery on Fetscherplatz has a set of high principles both in looking "for the meaning of art in a socialist society" and in art itself. Taking a page from Kurt Weill, it expects the committed artist to be "as topical in his means of expression as in the content of his art." I looked through the catalogues of the most recent exhibits and found what I was searching for in the graphic series of photographs by Lutz Dammbeck which achieved a symbiosis of form and content. But I was impressed most of all by the works of Juergen Boettcher, whose exhibit was just being taken down and whom I knew to have been the most creative member of the unconventional, frequently disparaged Dresden avant-garde for a number of years. During his brief time as an instructor at the Dresden adult education center, Boettcher and Penck, who now lives in Cologne, as well as Peter Herrmann and Peter Graf, laid the foundation for an avant-garde outsiders' style that was at sharp variance from the view of reality of other schools of GDR painters in that it turned purely personal experience into a kind of psychogram-like art. For a number of years, Boettcher worked on film documentaries exclusively; but then, in 1978, he returned to the graphic arts, painting over photographs and using this synthesis of two media to develop a fresh and individual style which corresponds directly to the explosive ciphers of today's West European avant-garde.

The director of the gallery showed me a number of works she was assembling for a group exhibit entitled: "phantastic landscapes". Common to all the works was the formal play with surreal configurations and ambivalent meanings. Included among the artists was Peter Sylvester, a painter I already knew, whose landscapes are exhibited at Leipzig university. These paintings which are an expression both of paradisiac dreams and apocalyptic visions are among the high points of creativity on the Leipzig scene. Then there were the delicate collages of the pediatrician-turned-painter who signs his work "Dottore." I found them fascinating in their formal dynamics which attain to a symbiosis of the concrete and the abstract. I met the two other painters —Herzog and Ranft— who were represented in the exhibit a day later at the tiny Clara-Mosch gallery in the suburbs of Karl-Marx-Stadt. To my surprise, this gallery had assembled a crowd of almost 100 art connoisseurs from all parts of the GDR for the opening of an exhibit by Horst Bartnig, the only concrete painter in the GDR aside from Hermann Gloeckner who stuck to geometric forms in the fifties and whom the officials like to cite as living evidence for the existence of an avant-garde in the GDR during those dark ages.

As it turned out, this Clara-Mosch gallery in Adelsberg, which is being run by painters Carlfriedrich Claus, Thomas Ranft, Michael Morgner and Dagmar Ranft-Schinke, is a genuine focal point of the GDR avant-garde. To be sure, the four artists do share a common pictorial language in following the lead of Claus' calligraphic code style of painting; but in their exhibit program they are open to a wide range of styles. Thus, the gallery does not devote itself to purist aesthetics only such as adheres to the works of these four. In 1980, for example, the gallery exhibited a large structural composition by Gregor Torsten Schulz, portraying psychic experiences with a distressing immediacy that was reminiscent of someone like Kienholz.

Let us hope that the jurors of the 9th Dresden Art Show due to take place next year will not refuse to include the works of the Dresden and Karl-Marx-Stadt avant-garde that operates outside the pale at present and that those responsible for cultural policy will let these nonconformists do travel to the West in order to confront themselves with Western art and to have their own works and their stylistic repertoire subjected to a quality test on the international plane.

That those responsible do tend to think along these lines was evidenced by a speech by Bernhard Heisig at a meeting of the central presidium of the League of Graphic Artists last February in which he dealt with the work of young artists in the GDR. He stressed the right of young people to "unreason" and thereby emphatically gave preference to creative non-conformism instead of "well-adjusted mediocrity".

ZNP POSITION ON DRAFT OF SELF-GOVERNMENT LAWS EXPRESSED

Warsaw GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI in Polish 30 Aug 81 p 9

[Text] The Enterprise and the Workers' Self-government

On 17 and 18 August 1981, the Sejm subcommittee for drafting of laws on enterprises and self-government in the enterprise met.

In the sessions presided over by Professor Adam Lopatka, Colleague Michal Sewerynski and Colleague Konrad Firlej participated as representatives of the ZNP /Polish Teachers' Union/. The ZNP representatives were critical of the government's draft of laws on enterprises and self-government in the enterprise, above all of the authority of work forces in management. They expressed concern that the government draft does not fundamentally alter the concept of one-man administration of an enterprise--by the director--with the role of the work force reduced to participation.

The ZNP view is that only genuine self-government of the enterprises by the work force answers current social aspirations and needs. Implementation of this concept entails profound transformations, consisting of the introduction of democratic management of the economy in place of an autocratic-bureaucratic system.

The economic consequences of self-government are likewise beneficial because, in assuring the influence of the workers on the operation of the enterprise, self-government integrates them with the goals of the enterprise. That is a fundamental premise for optimal economic results.

By basing the operation of enterprises on the principle of self-government, we attain a significant social objective, the creative participation of the workers in the affairs of the workplace, which permits full use of the workers' knowledge and experience. In such a situation, work conditions undergo profound humanization, as a person performs as an agent of economic operations and not as a servant of these operations, a particle in a technico-organizational force. Moreover, under complete self-government, the classic opposition of workers and employers disappears, its role being performed by self-government.

The multitude and complexity of problems connected with workers' self-government are an indication, however, that solutions must be flexible with respect to time, place and form of the implementation of self-government, suited to the different enterprises, their economic situation and the conditions of their operation. Where suitable conditions for its operation exist, the total self-government of an enterprise by the work force can and should be established. In enterprises where the introduction of total self-government would be too risky, a choice should be possible from the weaker forms: various combinations of consultation, joint management and complete self-government. Then, as the situation develops, the scope of authority of the work force in these enterprises should widen, finally transformed into complete self-government. At the other extreme should be enterprises in which self-government has no logical place at all, because of their close connection with national defense or other vital needs of the nation. The appropriate determinations, regarding both the right model of self-government for a given enterprise including those enterprises excluded from self-government, should be made by societal agreements.

Particulars

In the operation of each enterprise, the following fundamental concerns may be distinguished:

--the structure of an enterprise and the order of work;
--the spheres of activity of the enterprise;
--the distribution of funds of an enterprise and of its profit;
--cadre policy, particularly considering top managerial positions (the director and his assistants).

In each of these areas, it is possible to isolate underlying decisions, establishing a basis and norms for executive decisions pertaining to the current management of an enterprise. The former have a rough and strategic character; the latter are derivative and concretize the current activity of the plant. The essence of the management of an enterprise is making underlying decisions, because the decision maker is assured of his authority for them. On the other hand, decisions made in the context of the operative management of a plant must meet strategic decisions, since they are subordinate to them.

Workers' self-government in the strict sense guarantees the workers complete authority to make underlying decisions in the key matters of the enterprise. What absolutely completes such authority is the exercise by the self-government body of total supervision over the execution of its resolutions and of control over decisions made to this end by the director, in conjunction with a veto power over his decisions.

On the other hand, operative management of an enterprise, or the exercise of ongoing direction in matters of organization, production and personnel, based on the binding law and resolutions of self-government, should belong to the director of the enterprise. In this sphere, the work force may have, however, a consultative authority and the right to make recommendations.

2. The principles of our structure are not an obstacle to according authority to the work forces in the form of complete self-government. Since the state is the the proprietor of the enterprises, it can confer complete self-government to an actual social group. That is exactly what the 1956 law did, granting management of the enterprises to the workers' councils in the name of the work forces. The granting of self-government in itself does not lead to the establishment of group ownership, because the state continues to be proprietor of the enterprise, exercising supervision over the decisions of the work forces in the interest of society in general.

The assurance by the state of harmony between the decisions of self-government of the work force and the interests of society in general should be accomplished through economic mechanisms (for example, credits, taxes, duties). Similarly, in the face of tendencies toward the monopoly of production and the market by large enterprises or their associations, these means of economic reaction should be complemented by law (for example, antitrust legislation or the determination by the state of ceiling prices on basic necessities, especially those significantly influencing the cost of living).

The management of enterprises by the work forces strictly determined by market mechanisms will certainly cause a wide differentiation of income for workers in the various enterprises in proportion to profit. Consequently, some mechanisms are required to correct overly large differences in income--especially a state guarantee of a minimum income for workers in plants experiencing economic difficulties.

3. Workers cannot participate in self-government as an indeterminate mass but rather as a recognizable entity. Consequently, it is necessary to express this entity in appropriate legal and organizational form. The concept best corresponding to this goal is one making the work force of an enterprise an entity of self-governing powers. This formula guarantees the fullest participation in management to the workers themselves regardless of their affiliation with plant political and social organizations. The interests of these organizations may surface and be implemented indirectly in management through the activity of their members in the self-government. On the other hand, the possibility of subordinating the management of an enterprise to the interests of a single organization is excluded. Thanks to the uncontrolled encounter of various opinions and views in the self-government body, the management of the enterprise becomes more democratic and fosters the integration of the work force.

4. From the viewpoint of the exigencies of democracy, it would be best to ensure the work force of the enterprise direct participation in its management. Practical considerations, however, stand in the way of self-government exercised in this manner (considerations such as problems linked with assembling all employees and enabling them to participate in discussions, especially in larger enterprises). For this reason, the direct exercise of self-government must be limited to small enterprises, and in the others, to the undertaking of decisions of particular importance to the enterprise, involving a general meeting of the work force or a referendum.

The most convenient solution is the participation of the work force in self-government through its special organs (the work force council, workers' council). In conjunction with this, the way these come about is especially important. The democratic context of self-government speaks for democratic elections of the organs of self-government (elections that are universal, equal, direct and secret) The designation of council members by individual plant organizations should be rejected; moreover, the interests of these organizations will not be threatened if they are guaranteed real participation in the electoral campaign for self-government.

The internal organizational structure of workers' self-government is of essential significance, particularly the level of organization of the enterprise where self-government organs should be created. Many arguments favor the maximum interaction of self-government among the rank and file, enabling conditions for the direct participation of workers in management and making self-government effective. This is particularly the case when matters are well-known to the workers and affect them closely, and on the course of which the workers can thus have a real, creative effect on their course, by using their qualifications and experience. Consequently, the legal regulations should allow maximum freedom for the statutory regulation of the internal structure of the self-government body and of the scope of powers of its particular organs, according to the organization and the needs of the enterprise.

A condition for the proper functioning of self-government is ensuring that the workers elected to its organs have special legal protection against dismissal from work, similar to the protection afforded members of plant union organs. On the other hand, the work force's guarantee of control over the activities of those elected to these organs is the limitation of the number of successive terms in these organs.

5. The cadre management, comprising the top managerial positions of an enterprises belongs to the essential scope of its functioning. Past management criteria applied in the past--i.e., the dominance of one's political views as criteria (the so-called nomenclature)--evoked society's disapproval. These criteria led to the violation of the principle of the equal treatment of workers for promotion, nor did they guarantee that persons selected in this manner would function properly. Thus, the cadre management must be based on principles of expertise and honesty. The guarantee of the proper application of these criteria is the appointment of directorial positions by the cadres of enterprises. This is one of the major driving forces in the workers' circles, motivating the tendency to introduce complete self-government, because on this basis the work force must have the right to appoint and dismiss the director of the enterprise, who should be responsible only to the work force.

6. The proper functioning of the self-government body demands that it have veto power over the illegal or unsound decisions of the director, and that the director have veto power to block similar resolutions of the self-government body. In conjunction with this is the problem of creating the necessary procedure for settling conflicts from the veto. It seems appropriate to eliminate such quarrels primarily through a mediated arbitration procedure, consisting of the proposal of a suitable solution by a neutral arbitrator, selected by both sides. Following the arbitration procedure, phases of the final settlement of the quarrel should occur. If the subject of the quarrel is the legality of the resolutions of the self-governing body or decisions of the director, the quarrel may and should be settled by the court.

Neither the court nor--to an even greater extent--the arbitration commission may, however, be considered the most competent organ to determine the social or economic feasibility of resolutions of the self-governing body or directorial decisions. In this case, the possibility of resolving this type of conflict in a second phase should be considered; i.e., through its elimination by the organ of the local self-government (where local enterprises are concerned), by the people's council or by the Sejm, or rather by a chamber created in the Sejm for this purpose--e.g., a self-government chamber (to work with those enterprises of key economic significance to the country). In this way, socioeconomic conflicts in enterprises would be resolved by the most competent representative bodies, and the workers' self-government would be incorporated into the system on the basis of democracy.

7. Theoretically, it is possible to entrust to the self-government body those functions normally fulfilled by the plant union organization. However, it is also possible for the self-government body and trade unions to coexist in an enterprise. Their work does not need to be mutually exclusive but can and should complement one another. A condition of such coexistence is the clear delimitation of the spheres of operation and functions of the union and the self-government body.

Whatever the model of self-government selected, its goal is to ensure the work force influence over the management of the enterprise. The domain of the trade unions, on the other hand, should be individual work relations or, to be more precise, control over the application of the law in this sphere. Decisions on labor law and plant norms with regard to individual employees are made in the course of ongoing enterprise management. Thus, they are not made by the self-government body but by the director; for this reason the trade union would deal only with him in matters of intervention and claims. This makes it possible to prevent conflict between trade unions and the self-government body.

On the other hand, varying positions may arise due to the interest of unions in the decisions of the self-government body concerning underlying resolutions. While they affect the enterprise only indirectly, they directly influence the legal and social situation of workers, for this reason the trade unions cannot be deprived of the right to see that they are correct. To this end, they may use the presence of their members in the organs of self-government; when this means fails, they may exert pressure through typical union actions, excluding a strike. Such a protest action would signify the workers' rising against themselves. Thus, under conditions of total self-government, the ultimate method of rectifying the decisions of its organs should be the resolution of the general assemblage of the work force or the referendum.

Formal Considerations.

1. Matters of the enterprise and the self-government body should be regulated by one law, a "law on the self-governing state enterprise."

2. The current drafts of the two laws have proposed many exceptions (article 60 and 61 of the law on the enterprise and article 49 of the law on self-government) that severely limit the scope of the workers' self-government and the sense of the entire economic reform. The criteria of these exceptions are not clear nor precisely defined.

3. Both laws are accompanied by too many executory regulations that have not yet been appended to the basic drafts. This reduces the value of the legal regulation of problems of the enterprise and makes it impossible to cope with the correctness of the executory regulations.

ZNP SCIENCE SECTION CONFERENCE REPORTED

VII National Conference of Science, ZNP

Warsaw GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI in Polish No 43 26 Oct 80 p 9

[Article by K. Rog]

[Text] The statement that the VII National Conference of Science Section, ZNP, which took place on the eve of the XIII Congress of Delegates, had a historic meaning, is not an imposed journalistic exxageration. Its character was not decided only by the fact that it took place at the turning point of our post-war history. Likewise, the zeal of the deliberations, their temperament, degree of commitment by the participants and freedom to discuss extreme views and opinions have not been seen for a long time. Of particular significance in the conference was also the fact that, during the course of the deliberations, tendencies and demands that have been growing for some time in the academic union community, and aim toward transforming the organizational structure and making it a true spokesman for the professional group and an instrument for participation by the citizen in joint governing of the country, were crystalized and finalized.

The need to call one's own union representation, a representation better oriented toward the essential problems of the community and capable of quicker and more adequate action in order to achieve expectations, has been felt more strongly among employees of schools and institutions of higher learning and signalled more frequently by their representatives. As has been emphasized and found expression in granting a vote of confidence to the outgoing administration, the Section Administration has done everything possible under existing conditions. Nevertheless, it could neither attain realization or place itself into the hiterto existing structure of ZNP or the union movement directed by the Central Council of Trade Unions (CRZZ).

In the situation in which our country finds itself and especially as regards the riddance of CRZZ demands, the necessity of crossing over from those demands to decisonmaking has become unavoidable. This was obvious to everyone, which does not mean that everyone held the same view as to the organization's future shape. One must admit that the concept (the concept of two equal unions federated into one organization), whose ultimate expression was found in proposals presented to the XIII Congress of Delegates, was born not without opposition.

Many participants at the conference were of the view that a separate, autonomous union should be created (R. Mroczkowski, Lublin; T. Krzoska, Gliwice; R. Galecki, Poznan; G. Urbanczyk, Lodz; and others). In their opinion, arguments for this concept were convincing in that they were afraid that, in a federated structure, after a certain time, the problems of academic employees would be dominated by educational workers, who constitute the overwhelming majority; and, after the passing of several years, the new union's situation would not return to the ante quo state; i.e., to the situation existing under the former Academic Section. Opponents of a federation also expressed the fear that the enormous union machine is too large to function properly. In arguments against, disappointment and discouragement also have played a certain fair-sized role in relation to the union's activities experienced by the union membership. A lack of faith in the "old" trade unions has succeeded in inspiring a new spirit. Pessimism exists, which is not difficult to understand, but it is something on which it is difficult to build.

However, the majority of participants at the deliberations, quoting decisions made by the representative communities, declared itself (120 out of 162 voting) to be for retention of the organizational unit ZNP under the condition, however, of acceptance of such structural dissolutions that would make possible the complete independence of a union of employees at universities and educational institutions; i.e., the concept of two federated unions having equal rights in one organization (S. Koperski, Krakow; M. Nawrocki, Warsaw; J. Madrala, Bydgoszcz; J. Krakowski, Katowice; Z. Wiatrowski, Bydgoszcz; S. Erbel, Warsaw; W. Rozwadowski, Poznan; J. Staszewski, Torun; J. Chrobaczynski, Krakow).

However, it was emphasized unanimously that the union's work must undergo significant radicalization, that the necessity exists for greater than hitherto existing perception and regard for the needs of all working groups (and not only teachers and professors), and that a more complete flow of information both from the bottom to the top and the top to the bottom is indispensable, since only good discernment of the situation makes possible joint decisionmaking by the organization's membership and administration as regards the union's activities; i.e., quick reactions to needs in the field.

Great pressure also has postulated the complete publicness of union life and the radical breaking with cases of the "internal" distribution of attractive vacations, places for trips abroad, places in sanatoria, and other similar situations.

Above all, however, changes in the style of cooperation by the union organization with the government and administration at all levels has been demanded. This cooperation finally must become authentic. The union has the right and obligation to participate actively in the formation of academic and educational policy, to demand the respect for workers' authority, to defend the members' interests, and also to guard the purity and high level of Polish education.

There is seemingly nothing new in these demands; everything already has been formally stipulated both in the organization's statute and in a wide variety of resolutions adopted during the past few years. However, the fundamental difference between previously raised postulates, postulates having a clearly declarative character, and currently formulated demands relies on the impetuous transformations that have appeared in the social consciousness. As J. Maziarski has written in KULTURA, "life demonstrates every day with painful tangibility that an atmosphere for honest democratization is the elementary prerequisite for good work." He also has stated, "attempts at introducing a nondemocratic model for relationships has had in Poland lamentable results, ending invariably with economic and political crises." It is already not possible to erase this truth that has taken shape in the social consciousness. It stands as the most valuable guarantee that postulates and demands put forward by workers' representatives can no longer avoid being "heard."

The guarantee for implementing the workers' demands for better social and living conditions also should be inferred in the resolution calling for a permanent center for researching working conditions, pay scales, and the workers' social situation, a center designed to formulate the union's tasks. The union authorities are obligated to introduce understandings signed with the Government Commission, which define the mode and the deadline to implement the workers' demands.

But problems concerning living conditions do not exhaust the letters dealing with the academic community's deeply affected concerns. Academic employees consider it their obligation and right as citizens to participate not only in the shaping of academic and educational policy but also to participate in the working out of reforms in the national economy and the system or orders and functioning of the state (S. Waltos, Krakow; S. Kaleta, Wroclaw; J. Zalewski, Gdansk; A. Lopata, Krakow).

This has found expression in the resolution in which the following, among others, is demanded: "reactivation of the economic council composed of representatives from the economic and social sciences, who are known for their achievements in research, courage and activity." (The resolution is printed below.)

Authentic achievements, courage, activity, straightforwardness and academic honesty (i.e., those elemental values that should be distinguished in teaching and by those persons employed in it, and which recently have been debased) have constituted to some extent the motivation for discussion, in which the dominant portion has been devoted to the issue of academics and national education.

It is thus obvious that management of a sensible policy without the participation of people in academia, working out of an educational system, and also of a system to guarantee the assurance of a high level of and honesty in academic life, is not generally possible. Confirmation of this simple truth is the situation existing in our education and culture.

Questions dealing with these problems also were addressed at the conferences to the present Undersecretary of State for Science, Higher Education and Technology, Tomasz Biernacki. Many questions dealt with difficult issues, irregularities and complaints, which have arisen in academic life.

These included the shallowness of academic criticism, the lack of publicness and clarity in decisions made by the Central Qualification Commission (CKK) and mechanisms making possible unjustifiable academic careers, such as granting professorial titles to some prominent members of our political and economic life. This was discussed point-blank, citing concrete examples and specific persons. Also discussed was the influence these factors exert on the level of academic life and the establishment of "structures and dependencies" that halt not only the development of academic thought but decide not infrequently about ruining the most talented academic career and most valuable personnel.

Above all, however, the need for freedom in academic life, a freedom expressed both in the selection of subjects and directions for research and the autonomy of schools and academic institutions, was discussed.

The element that hamstrings this freedom is undoubtedly the too rigorously and dictatorially centralized guidance of research. Coupled with this is the definitive, financial policy that facilitates the conduction of research in unpreferred areas, which causes various types of manipulations having nothing to do with the authentic development of science. Not denying the need to conduct a definitive policy and aiming toward a better utilization of science's achievements in national life, the community demands a resolute increase in the influence of scholarly directions for selecting research issues and preferences.

At the same time, the restoration of autonomy for schools and academic institutions, and at least restoration of the pre-1968 law and complete application of the principle of eligibility for collective bodies, and also--as was formulated in the sections' resolution--"in every qualifying organ, including CKK" also was demanded.

The system proposed by the ministry for appointing rectors after consultation with the senate is--in the opinion of the conference participants--not acceptable.

Also emphasized was the necessity to revise the system for giving out academic degrees and professorial titles and to eliminate rotational mechanisms and, in their place, to install honest criteria for evaluating academic employees (W. Mackiewicz, Warsaw).

The conference acknowledged as extremely necessary the naming of the Founding Committee of the Academic Employees' Society to serve as the society for organizing academic employees at all schools and institutions of higher learning, no matter what their union affiliation.

Resolutions of VIII ZNP Science Section Conference

Warsaw GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI in Polish No 43 26 Oct 80 pp 9-10

[Text]

VIII National Conference of the Science Section of the Polish Teachers' Association adopted on 13 December 1980 recognized as the program of action by ZNP Employees at Universities and Academic Institutions

The social shock that has passed through our country during the past months was an unavoidable consequence of the growing crisis. This is, to a large degree, the result of deformation in the government's conduct and way of treating society as its object. It has not counted society's fundamental needs and aspirations. The deserving posture of the working class along the Baltic coast and in other areas of the country, which gave birth to admiration and respect during the days of the crisis by proving political maturity, has shown how deeply incorrect were the policies practiced by this country's authorities. The fact must be acknowledged that the authorities have tried to become once again the government of society, and not above it. The VIII National Conference of the ZNP Science Section, which was brought about by the moral order to participate actively in restoring the country, wishes to point out the fundamental problems requiring immediate solutions. Their solution will depend on the state of learning, education and national culture; thus, the shape of society.

It is impossible to carry out effective reforms of social life and the national economy without restructuring simultaneously the government system, changing the manner of discharging governmental functions, and creating conditions for society's authentic influence on state operations.

We feel in particular that:

1) the need for immediate work on reforming the national economic system must take place, the result of which the following should occur:

a) conferment to economic law of the role of responsible regulator of economic processes;

b) conferment to state enterprises of independence and assurance as to the possibilities for creating an authentic partnership between personnel and management at the work place;

c) change in the manner of administration through decentralization of the economy by eliminating or consolidating branch ministries and significantly reducing the number of economic associations.

We declare ourselves in support of reactivation of the economic council composed of representatives from the economic and social sciences, administration, and other groups, who are known for their achievements in research, courage, and activity.

We ally ourselves with the opinions and demands put forward by workers and other active working groups demanding structural reforms of the state and economy, which are designed to avert future degenerations and abuses that cause collective anxiety among working people and incalcuable harm to the country, society, and system.

2) Science stands as an integral part of the national economy and is an inseparable element of national culture. Reform of the country's socio-economic structure therefore must embrace science and the national educational system.

3) The hitherto existing system of academic advisement was defective. Reliance on both decisions regulating the country's socio-economic system and complex, optimal variants for decisionmaking prepared by interdisciplinary academic groups is necessary.

4) The influence that academic employees have on shaping the country's socio-economic structure depends on their skill and moral posture. One of the Association's primary tasks is, therefore, the systematic attentiveness to constant compliance with ethical norms in the academic community.

5) The system of planning, administration, and financing of academic research requires a thorough rebuilding. The concept of governmental programs, crucial problems, and others has been distorted. In many cases, priorities for academic research have been established incorrectly, and a costly bureaucracy causes the waste of human effort and financial resources.

6) Society has the right to honest and complete political, socio-economic, and academic information. A law on censorship, in which the scope of jurisdiction is expressed uniformly, excluding an expanding interpretation of its authority, should be included. Decisions made by censorship organs should be prosecuted in court. The academic community should take part in drafting the law.

7) The alarming state of printing and publishing constitutes an immediate threat to national culture and academic development. The situation requires prompt, remedial action.

8) The quality of learning and higher education depends on the fulfillment of three conditions: self-government, publicness of academic life, and mechanisms for the protection of academic criticism.

Fulfillment of the condition for self-government demands at least the restoration of the tone of the pre-1968 law on higher education, expression within the Polish Academy of Sciences (PAN) of the eligibility principle for turning over administrative functions (including the Academy's academic secretaries, divisions, and PAN's presiding academic committees and other collective academic organs), and also the absolute use of the eligibility principle in every qualification organ, including the Central Qualification Commission.

Unacceptable are partial solutions, for example, to the minister's discussing candidates for rector with the faculty senate. Also unacceptable is delaying work on the project to amend the code concerning higher education and the Polish Academy of Sciences. The Conference declares its assistance in the work on the amendment and, following that, on the entire project, in order to make possible the sending of the recodification project to Sejm before the end of 1980.

Fulfillment of the condition of publicness in academic life denotes the publicness of every opinion in procedures for granting degrees, academic titles, and appointments to academic positions.

9) There is a need for an immediate examination and correction of all wrongs perpetrated on employees and students as a result of events in 1968, 1978, and 1976. The issue of suspending the professional advancement of academic employees for activities conducted outside the academic arena require urgent explanation.

10) The recruiting system for university studies requires essential reform. Antiquated point preferences and so-called rectorial pools should be eliminated.

Admission to university studies without an entrance examination should be guaranteed only to the winners of national competitions.

The size and proportion of students from higher society cause serious concern. The issue of an "open university" requires urgent investigation.

11) Institutions of higher learning should secure broad authority to formulate the concepts of shaping and composing teaching programs. Ministerial programs should have only a structural character.

12) Despite the "Report on the State of Education" and the many discussions and opinions from numerous specialists up to now, the model for elementary and high schools has not been worked out.

13) In the vital interest of Polish culture, it is necessary to raise the standing of persons employed in state archives, libraries, and informational services. We support the fundamental themes stated in the "Report on the State of Libraries in Poland" and the "Program for Development of Polish Library Science through 1990," and we demand the implementation of their stated demands for increasing the standard of equipment at libraries and the development of book collections.

14) Society's socio-economic and cultural development requires raising the standing and defense of the interests of academic employees. Facilities for the development of young academic employees through the creation of suitable living conditions are indispensable. Also necessary is opposition to the practice of granting degrees and academic titles beyond the normal mode of conduct guaranteeing the candidates' proper meritorious level.

15) Society's cultural and intellectual levels depend to a large degree on teachers. For this reason, raising the dignity and prestige of the teaching profession is one of the first planned tasks. Therefore, one of the conditions required to attract the best candidates to this profession is the creation of a reasonable existence for teachers.

16) The VII National Conference of ZNP's Science Section supports the federated structure of ZNP, which contains two independent unions composed of employees in education and upbringing, as well as of employees at universities and institutions of higher learning.

17) The birth and development of independent trade unions is in the interest of the entire society. This fact does not negate, however, the need for the existance also of branch trade unions, authentically independent and being professional representatives. The strength of the union movement does not consist of the exclusion of one of the branches but rather on the creation of a dialogue and cooperation.

18) The VIII National Conference of the ZNP Science Section declares itself for finding a formula for cooperation and joint action with every union organization and, especially, with the independent trade union (NSZZ) "Solidarity," for the good of the union movement among science teachers, science and research employees, and employees at libraries and archives, as well as administrative, technical, and service-oriented academic institutions.

19) The VIII National Conference of the ZNP Science Section demands the formation of the Academic Employees' Society to serve as the society for organizing academic employees without regard to place of employment or union affiliation.

20) The Science Section's VIII National Conference supports the demand for the calling of an exceptional, revisory commission to conduct a detailed investigation into the manner of administering ZNP funds employed by the Main Board, Secretariat, and Presidium, as well as by ZNP's Science Section Board during the last two terms in office (i.e., 1972-80), and to present the eventual conclusions regarding the legal responsibilities of the organs' members. Results of the commission's work should be printed in GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI for public knowledge. We demand the appearance before the Supreme Chamber of Control (NIK) of the responsible functionaries from the Central Council of Trade Unions (CRZZ) for the purpose of auditing the administration of the Association's funds.

21) On the basis of numerous conclusions made regarding working conditions, salaries, and social problems, the VIII National Conference of the ZNP Science Section demands the calling of the Permanent Research Center that will have the right to formulate tasks for ZNP. This obligates the Association's elected officials to bring about the signing of an understanding with the Government Commission, in which the methods and deadlines for implementing the workers' demands should be specified. The hitherto existing policy of salaries based upon the division of workers into production and nonproduction sectors provokes serious reservations. The Association stands behind the position embraced in the Teacher's Charter and collective agreements among all workers in educational and preparatory institutions, universities and institutions of higher learning, library services, and others hitherto not included.

22) The VIII National Conference of the ZNP Science Section feels that the above resolution should constitute the program for activity by the Association of Employees at Universities and Academic Institutions. We propose a penetrating examination of each individual conclusion to determine the enclosure to the resolution for the purpose of adding it to the Association's program of activity.

23) The Science Section's VIII National Conference obligates the Provisional Board selected today to present during the course of the XIII ZNP National Congress the project of the provisional ZNP statute that was resolved in support of conclusions made by delegates representing individual academic communities from throughout the country.

PZPR PUBLICATION REVIEWS, COMMENT ON CURRENT ISSUES

Facts of the Week

Warsaw FAKTY I KOMENTARZE in Polish, No 29, 31 Jul 81 pp 3-4

For the internal use of the Party

[Text] At the session of the Council of Ministers, the socio-economic situation of the country in the first half of the year was assessed and most urgent operational directions for the nearest future were discussed.

A quick and consistent implementation of economic reform measures was considered the most urgent action needed to diminish the crisis. The main task is to secure the productive possibilities of those plants and branches that play a key role in supplying the market and in producing for agriculture and export.

The strike of the PLL (Polish Airlines) LOT, proclaimed for July 24, was suspended after Prime Minister W. Jaruzelski accepted the soundness of determining the financial-economic independence of the LOT in the sphere of air transport. LOT economic-financial independence will be determined by a separate bill that will also regulate other activities of that institution.

The PLL LOT Aircraft AN-21 making its scheduled flight from Katowice to Gdansk was hijacked to West Berlin. The hijacker appeared to be Bernard Pientka. resident of Piotrowice, Silesia. After the hijacker's arrest by American police, the plane with all its passengers returned to Gdnask. Polish authorities entered a claim with the American authorities, demanding the hijacker's extradition.

In the period from 1 August to 31 December 1981 early retirement may be taken by workers who do not have more than 5 years left to full retirement and who have been employed for the necessary periods of time, i.e., men for 25 years, women for 20 years. More details are in the daily press.

The Prime Minister nominated Gen. Div. Czeslaw Kiszaczak the undersectetary in the Ministry of the Interior and made him the head of the office.

After an interval of several days, on 28 July 1981, hearings were resumed in the District Court in Warsaw against the members of the leadership of the Confederation for an Independent Poland (KPN).

The Skierniewice District MO (Police) Headquarters detected those responsible for desecrating the monument to Soviet soldiers in the Catholic cemetery in Sochaczew, and for the demolishing the PZPR Municipal Committee headquarters. The acts were perpetrated by two 16-year-old boys--students of the high school and agriculture technical school, who live near Sochaczew. During the nights of 11, 18 and 30 April they painted over the inscriptions on the monument built to honor Soviet soldiers who lost their lives liberating Sochaczew in 1945. Moreover, the boys wrote anti-Soviet slogans on the monument. Twice they also attempted to demolish the building of the Municipal Committee of the PZPR and ZSMP (Association of Polish Socialist Yourth) in Sochaczew.

An attempt to set on fire the building of the Municipal Committee of the PZPR in Swinoujscie was investigated. On 22 July 1981, at 4:53 a.m., a curling cloud of smoke was observed coming out of the windows of the PZPR Municipal Committee building in Swinoujscie, Bohaterow Stalingradu Street. Friemen extinguished the fire in half an hour: damage was small. The investigation determined that arson had caused the fire. The perpetrator entered the building through the window in the toilet on the mezzanine and poured out several pints of crude oil that had been brought in bottles. After the fire was set, he left the building.

On 26 July a 3-day plenary meeting of the NSZZ "Solidarity" National Consultative Commission (KKP) ended in Gdansk. Within the framework of the Presidium, a permanent six-person Decision-Making body was appointed in Gdansk. The group consists of: Lech Walesa, Janusz Onyszkiewicz, Andrzej Celinski, Andrzej Gwiazda, Bogdan Lis, and Ryszard Kalinowski. A decision was made that Solidarity in Lodz would supervise economic reforms, and Solidarity in Bydgoszcz would deal with food distribution problems. KKP NSZZ Solidarity took a negative view of bills proposed by the government regarding censorship, labor unions, and workers' self-government. The union would support price increases only as one of the elements of the economic reform.

On 25 July 1981, in Kutno, a march of the citizenry took place protesting the inefficiency of the distribution apparatus. Solidarity in the District of Lodz also protested against the shortage of food supplies, against food ration coupons without full coverage and against the announced reduction of meat rations in the August rationing system. In the afternoon of 27 July 1981 buses decorated with flags and posters and with lights on and horns blowing drove along Piotrkowska Street in Lodz, stopping for a moment in front of the town office building. The same action was repeated on 28 and 29 July. And a "women's march" was announced for 30 July.

Economic Situation After First Half-Year

Warsaw FAKTY I KOMENTARZE in Polish No 29, 31 Jul 81 pp 11-13

[Text] Non-fulfillment of the economic production plan in the first half of the year 1981 was the main cause of further detoriation in the country's economic situation. This increased the imbalance of the internal market and resulted in a reduction of exports, which slowed down the influx of foreign currency. Decreased production and deliveries of merchandise to the market and resulted in a reduction of exports, which slowed down the influx of foreign currency. Decreased production and deliveries of merchandise to the market here at the same time followed by considerable increases in wages and incomes, exacerbates the market in balance and causes long lines in front of the shops.

This state of affairs has been caused by many factors. The decline of industrial production in previous months was mainly the result of inadequate cooperation in supplying the market and raw materials shortages as well as a shortage of imported and domestically manufactured goods.

The second important reason for the decline in production has been the energy difficulties, such as lack of fuel, especially coal, and the poor technology of electric power stations, the repair of which requires too much time. All these conditions, so difficult to overcoming quickly, bring a continuous decrease in industrial output. In June 1981 the value of production was 48 billion zlotys, i.e., 16.9 percent lower than last year and in the whole first half of the year it decreased by over 211 billion zlotys, i.e., by 12.5 percent in comparison with the same period last year. It was accompanied by a decrease in employment of only 0.3 percent, when at the same time the increase in personal wages was 41 billion zlotys, i.e. 24 percent.

Almost every basic industrial branch showed a decline in production in June. At the same time further increases in wage costs took place.

In the first half of the year a serious decline in production of basic raw materials and other products took place, in comparison with 1980. And so:

production of coal declined by 22.6 million tons, i.e., by 21.8 percent; production of zinc by 24,600 tons, i.e., by 21.8 percent; lead by 8,000 tons, i.e., by 19.4 percent; aluminum by 9,700 tons, i.e. by 20.5 percent; copper by 20,100 tons, i.e., by 11 percent; tires by 1,154,000 pieces, i.e., by 24.1 percent.

In a similar way production of many other products declined, including market products.

Lost production time in industry has increased by 36 percent as compared to the period in 1980. Among the factors here are unexcused absences which have increased by almost 30 percent, paid but unproductive presence has increased by 24 percent and excused absences by over 6 percent. On the other hand, the number of overtime hours (beyond continuous regular working time) has decreased by 4.4 hours per worker, i.e., by 20.5 percent.)

Some improvement has appeared in implementing investments. In the first half of the year industrial construction tasks designated for exploitation under the plan for that period were implemented at the rate of 64.9 percent, whereas in the same period in 1980 the projected tasks were carried out at a rate of 51.1 percent.

Deterioration, however, took place in implementing housing construction. In the first half of the year, 82,100 apartments were constructed, about 30 percent less than in the first half of 1980. The present implementation of housing construction shows that goals will not be reached, and this means people will have to wait still longer for apartments.

In foreign trade, a difficult situation still continues. On one side exports were limited by the low level of production and by increased demand on the part of the domestic market, and on the other side, the low payments possibilities limited imports. Under these difficult conditions in the first half of 1981 there was a 17.4 percent drop in exports and a 7.4 percent drop in imports. In trade with the first payment area (socialist countries), exports were 13.5 percent lower and imports were 6 percent higher. The increase in imports from this area, especially of raw and other materials, contributed to some easing of the supply situation. But in trade with the second payment area (capitalist countries) exports dropped by 21.7 percent and imports by 21 percent.

The situation in agriculture has various aspects. On the whole, plant cultivation developed favorably. Estimates at the end of June 1981 showed that the condition of grain as a whole was better than in 1980. Among the grains in some regions, however, especially wheat and barley, there was more disease, and plantings of rye, mostly in the lights soils, were remarkably thin. The state of the root crops at the end of June was judged to be better than in 1980. On the whole weather has been good for growing potatoes, but frequent showers have made it difficult to cultivate them properly. In the second half of the June reports were coming in about massive appearances of the potato bug, mainly in the south-western and central regions.

A serious deterioration of the situation in contracting for slaughter animals took place. The number of swine contracted for delivery during the period of July-August 1980 as compared to last year was around 26 percent lower, and 24 percent lower for slaughter cattle.

Procurement of the slaughter livestock in June was 30 percent lower, and 18.4 percent lower for the entire first half of the year. Procurement of milk in June dropped by nearly 10 percent, and in the first half of the year by 15.4 percent; procurement of eggs in June was 5 percent lower, and 2.5 percent lower for the first half of the year.

In June shortages of spare parts in agriculture continued, particular shortages of rubber parts, batteries, spare parts for tractors and Leyland engines, wedge-shaped belts, belts for sheaf binders, string for collecting presses and many other elements.

According to CZSR 'Samopomoc Chlopska" (Central Agricultural Union of "Peasant Self-Aid" Cooperation) estimates, private farmers, will particularly feel the lack of mowers, tractor sheaf binders and rakes during harvesting and threshing this year. That is why, now more than before, especially during the harvest, much help is needed in agriculture from the youth and employees of institutions and enterprises. It is indispensable also that a larger effort takes place in industry to produce small tools and particularly, of most-sought-after spare parts for agriculture.

The money market situation in June was characterized by the further deepening of the internal market's lack of balance. This was caused, first of all, by the remarkable increase in monetary incomes and by the low supply of goods for the market, deviating from the social needs.

The population's total monetary income in June 1981 was 162.8 billion zlotyz; In comparison to June 1980 they increased by 28.4 percent, and in the first half of 1981 they amounted to 960.7 billion zlotys, i.e., an increase of over 29 percent; the average wage was 6,780 zlotys, i.e., up 26 percent. But the value (in retail prices of merchandise, both domestic and imported, delivered to the market in June 1981 was 114.3 billion zlotys, i.e., almost 3 percent lower than in June 1980; and in the first half of 1981 the value was 704.8 billion zlotys, 0.5 percent lower in relation to 1980.

Comparing only these two indexes gives the whole picture of the market. Besides, however, present difficulties are aggrevated by the low quality of many products and by the fact that people are buying out some products and storing them up. One must also remember that the monetary resources of the people continue to increase, not only because of appropriate savings, but by lack of commodities to buy as well. According to data obtained frum GUS (Central Bureau of Statistics Statistics), monetary resources of the population at the end of July 1981 were 893.1 billion zlotys, of which savings deposits were 596 billion and cash 297.2 billion zlotys.

All that results in the fact that every bit of merchandise delivered to the market is immediately bought up.

The drop in industrial production and in slaughter livestock procurement caused decreases in market supplies. Supplies of meat and meat products in April were 153,800 tons, in May 146,000 tons, and in June 144,600 tons. Supplies of meat, meat products and poultry, compared to the corresponding periods in 1980, were lower in June by 14,700 tons, i.e., by 9.3 percent, and in the first half of the year by 129,900 tons, i.e., by 12.4 percent. In a majority of districts supplies of meat, meat products and poultry were insufficient to fully cover ration coupons.

In June 1981, the quantity of fats delivered to the market was 6 percent lower than in June 1980. Though supplies of butter were 14.6 percent higher, margarine by 4.9 percent, oil by 6.3 percent, demand for fats was not satisfied in full.

The situation with dairy products was a little better. In comparison to June 1980, milk deliveries were up 11 percent, aged cheeses by nearly 14 percent, cottage cheese by over 28 percent, and sour cream by 7 percent. In larger population centers, however, large shortages of all diary products still continued.

In the majority of districts, in the third part of June, eggs were not being delivered regularly, though in June as a whole, deliveries were 14.4 percent more than in June 1980. There was endless disruption in bread deliveries. In many districts vinegar was lacking, as were canned fruits and vegetables.

Supplies of regular and quality vodka were lower compared with the same period last year--in June 25.4 percent power and 15.3 percent in the first half of the year. Supplies of wine were 19.5 percent lower in the first half of the year.

Sharp deficiencies continued in cigarettes, matches, laundry and other detergents, shampoos, toilet soap, toothpaste. Supplies of light industry products did not meet demands of the market. Most notable were shortages of stockings, women's and men's underwear, cotton clothing, and footwear.

--There were shortages of many articles in the industrial branches producing domestic appliances as in the previous periods.

The lower market supplies of commodities and the increased sale prices caused reduction of stocks. On 30 June 1981 value (in current retail prices) of merchandise stocks in market trade was, in the food group, lower by over 43 percent and in the non-food group, by 15.9 percent.

At the end of June 1981, pit coal stocks in the commercial system were 316,000 tons lower, i.e., 63 percent, than at the end of June 1980.

That is why the economic crisis became so severe in the first half of 1981.

Animal Production

Warsaw FAKTY I KOMENTARZE in Polish No 29, 31 Jul 81 pp 11-13

[Question] What is current situation in animal production?

[Answer] First, some facts and figures. The cattle population at present is 11.8 million head, which is 850,000 head (6.8 percent) less than in 1980. The number of cows fell to 200,000, i.e., by 3.3 percent, calves by 350,000, i.e., by 14.3 percent. The number of cattle decreased in all districts except Kalisz and Siedlce where 0.3 percent increase was noted. The steepest decrease (by over 10 percent) was in the districts of Chelm, Krosno, Przemysl, Zamosc, Bydgoszcz, Torun, Koszalin, Gorzow, Rzeszow and Zielona Gora.

In cattle breeding the following tendencies are observed:

The number of cattle dropped in the socialized farms (by 14.6 percent); this can be explained by the fact that those farms are in the course of adapting to a new system of management. In the past, in many PGR (state) farms production was thrust and forced upon them without taking costs into consideration. As a result, farms for 5,000 bulls were set up in areas where the land could yield fodder for only 1,000 heads. However, as long as imported fodder was abundant and the costs did not matter, one could manage. Today the situation is different, and cattle-raising can be developed only in the places with favorable conditions.

The number of calves dropped sharply on most private farms because of first high procurement prices of milk with complete lack of milk substitutes and fodder mixtures, and, second, because of the high prices of meat on the free market.

At present there are 18.5 million head of swine on private farms, which is as much as 2.8 million head lower (13.3 percent) than in 1980. It is the largest decrease in the history of our agriculture. This present situation in swine stocks takes us back to the level of 1972 whereas there is a much higher human population today.

Decreases in the number of swine occurred in all districts, but the steepest (over 30 percent) was in the districts of Krosno, Rzeszow, Przemysl, and Zamosc. This situation was caused by: large decreases in the number of swine on socialized farms (19.2 percent). This tendency is continually growing.

There was a smaller than expected decrease on the private farms (by 11 percent), when in April 1981 the index still showed 16.2 percent. This indicates that the declining tendency has been curbed in this sector of the economy;

In the makeup of the swine population there was a large drop in the number of sucklings and piglets (by 10.2 and 18 percent, respectively) There was good news, however, regarding the number of sows, 2.2 million head, which creates the possibility of the reproduction, and the information about the increased number of inseminated young sows which reached almost 1 million on private farms. This shows that there is a tendency to maintain and increase the breeding of swine.

At present, there are only 3.9 million head of sheep, down 300,000 head (7.4 percent). This is mainly the result of limited husbandry on the socialized farms.

What conclusion can be deduced from the situation described here, regarding both the prospects of developing husbandry and the possibilities of improving meat supplies which becomes more and more difficult?

A further decline in pork production during the second half of 1981 and in the first quarter of 1982 is to be expected. The decrease in slaughter cattle procurement will continue for about 2 years. All this will influence market supplies and offers no hope for rapid recovery. The first signs of improvement in pork supplies can be expected no sooner than the end of 1982, as for beef supplies improvement can possibly be expected by 1984. This is because of the animal production cycle which cannot be shortened.

In order to keep the supply at the same level as it was in the first months of 1981 for the present and for near future it would be necessary to import 120,000 tons of meat. But due to the lack of foreign currency and of means of transport, this idea seems very unrealistic.

So it is necessary to increase animal production and rebuild the stocks to its indispensable level. Only when all productive possibilities are applied and good, or at least, average crops are obtained, can measurable progress in the production of meat and meat products be expected. This, however, cannot take place until 1984-1985, at the earliest.

It is imperative that action be taken to prevent the slaughter of calves. This can be achieved by improving the supply of milk substitutes, fodder mixtures, coal, to agriculture and by increasing the procurement of calves for breeding.

It is very important also to reestablish small pigsties on [household] plots on the fringers of small cities and towns and to help people to maintain them. In the past, small breeders of swine used to deliver to us at least 2 million head of fattened pigs every year; as fodder they used their own leftovers and, to their great advantage, used natural fertilizers on their plots.

Meaning of 'Anarchosyndicalism'

Warsaw FAKTY I KOMENTARZE in Polish No 29, 31 Jul 81 pp 13-15

[Text] [Question] The definition of anarchosyndicalism was given long ago in the 1950s by the famous Polish economist, Oscar Lange. He wrote:

> "Two extremities can threaten the socialist capacity of an enterprise; one is the lack of trust in general social benefits. In this case, the ownership of the means of production, whatever its formal and legal character, ceases to be socialist ownership and becomes purely group ownership, void of any responsibility towards society. The second extremity which I call degeneration of bureaucracy lies in the absence of effectively operating workers' self-government."

The first part of this statement contains the evaluation of anarchosyndicalism. The second contains evaluation of the centrally governed system, so well known to us from its worst sides, which nonetheless still is in force.

It is known that preparation are being made to create a legal foundation for changing the existing economic system. Among others, in the Sejm (legislature) enactment of draft laws is pending concerning enterprises and on self-government of the state enterprise work force.

Those laws will initiate the introduction of the economic reform. In accordance with the assumptions of the reform, enterprises will operate on the principle of independence, self-rule and self-financing.

NSZZ Solidarity recently presented its own draft laws on "socialist enterprise," worked out by the NSZZ Solidarity Network of Plant Organizations. These drafts are convergent with, or close to the government's drafts in some points.

The Network's draft goes a little further in regard to the way the director is to be nominated, because it assumes that the exclusive right to nominate the director lies in the workers self-ruling body. This subject can be discussed, especially in relation to the small and some of the medium-size enterprises. But certainly, in the case of multiplant conglomerates and so on, a supervising unit must have its say in filling that post. This problem, however, has nothing to do with the political structure of the state and can be subject to negotiations and compromise.

On the other hand, the fundamental question concerning the principles of the political structure of the socialist state is involved in the way in which the draft of Network treats the property of the enterprise. They consider it not as national, but as group property. The draft says that the work force is the only manager of the enterprise's possessions. Such a statement agrees with the assumptions of anarcho-syndicalism, which says that only the work force determines the general directions of the activity and development of the enterprise, makes decisions about its size and production structure, wages, cooperative ties and so on, and at the same time uses the market mechanism to its own advantage. This conception assumes that, in fact, the work force is to play the same role as a capitalist proprietor and--as he does--tries to achieve as much profit as possible regardless of whether in a situation such methods serve the national interest or not.

The group property cannot be considered as a cooperative, because there are no membership contributions, so there is no possible distribution of revenue in proportion to paid contributions.

The national economy according to the theory of anachrosyndicalism consists of federations of self-governing enterprises, and the only tie between them is merchandise and monetary relations formed on the basis of the market mechanism and of the law of value. Under these conditions the socialist state has very limited possibilities of influencing the formation of merchandise and monetary relations.

Implementation of the system proposed by the Network would mean a shift from one extremity into the other mentioned by G. Lange, that is into a pure group possession void of any responsibility toward society. It would be the proverbial jumping from the frying pan into the fire.

In connection with the NSZZ Solidarity Network several questions come to mind:

First--Why should society as a whole, which contributed to the building and equipping of an enterprise, renounce this national property and lose all control over the enterprise's activity?

Second--How can the work force pay off the loans with which many enterprises like Polcolor, Ursus, Katowice Steel Foundry are burdened if their payment often surpasses the income possiblities of the enterprise itself?

Third--To what extent can social goals be implemented that arise from the principles of the socialist state--especially full employment, family care, and various forms of collective nourishment?

Fourth--How can enterprises be made to produce what is needed by the society, rather than what pays them the most?

Fifth--Will it be possible to curb some of the enterprises' tendencies to jack up prices, because the amount of profit would determine the wages of the work force? How in such a situation could inflation be prevented and prevent low-income people from getting poorer? What would happen in the case of poor enterprise management? Who would be charged with responsibility and who, for instance, would pay the enterprise's debts that might surpass the value of its total assets?

Sixth--How could there be any implementation of the socialist principle of remuneration in proportion to the quantity and quality of work in conditions of large differences in the levels of technical equipment and of degree of modernity between individual plants?

Some answers to these questions are given by the Yugoslavian experiment. The principles proposed by the Network to some extent were put in force in Yugoslavia in 1950 after withdrawal from the so-called Kominform, which then held all European socialist countries together. But after negative experiences arising from too much independence of the enterprises--successive reforms of self-governing system were carried out in the years 1958, 1965, 1974 and 1976. Just for the sake of the social interests, a succession of modifications were introduced that increased the scope and power of the central government to influence the activities of enterprises. In the Yugoslavian system, enterprises must now conclude obligatory agreements with the state.

Knowing of those experiments do we want to repeat other people's errors (as though we did not have our own)? And, finally, the fundamental question: do we want to have a socialist state that implements society-wide goals?

The answer seems to suggest itself easily and it is a positive answer. We must go further to expand productive democracy. This road, however, is not supposed to bring about changes in the property relationship that decide the form of the socialist structure.

Remarks for Readers

Warsaw FAKTY I KOMENTARZE in Polish No 29, 31 Jul 81 p 2

Beginning September 1981 the weekly FAKTY I KOMENTARZE will be received only by those subscribers who make their subscription payments for the months September-December by August 15, 1981 at the latest. A single subscription costs 16 zlotys and should be paid in RSW Prasa-Ksiazka-Ruch section.

We remind you at the same time that Ruch will accept subscriptions only if they are confirmed by the District Ideological Training Center of the PZPR District Committee (WOKI). For that purpose, you should apply for fiK at the proper regional WOKI. Not until your application has been approved should you make the subscription payment.

From 1 September 1981 the price of one copy of FAKTY I KOMENTARZE will be one zloty and a single annual subscription for the year 1981 - 50 zlotys (half of the year - 25 zlotys)

AUTHOR ACCUSED OF 'SLANDER AGAINST ROMANIAN GENIUS'

Bucharest FLACARA in Romanian 3 Sep 81 p 8

/Article by Eng Ioan Eremia Albescu, editor-in-chief of STIINTA SI TEHNICA and TEHNIUM, and Dr Eng Stefan Ispas, specialized contributor of STIINTA SI TEHNICA: "An Unspeakable Libel on the Romanian Genius"/

/Text/ Our journal has made it a regular procedure to encourage exchange of opinions and has consequently wished to support only those views that were open to interpretation and discussion even if they were in opposition. That is not true of the book about which the following article was written, a book that is nothing but a libelous attempt to misrepresent reality and to grossly distort the facts, doing great harm to the history of Romanian science and the creative genius of the people of this land. Therefore we do not feel we are violating our own conception of a press in publishing this article received by the editors that strongly criticizes a work published in haste. There can be a dialogue between one position and another. But no communication is possible between truth and falsehood, and with that in mind we wonder if the malodorous bouquet of lies in the book described below is of any use to anyone.

We have read with surprise Matei I. Oroveanu's recently published book "Beginnings of Romanian Aeronautic Invention: 1880-1918," Military Publishing House, 1981. As far as the author is concerned matters seem clear. In his desire to be original at any price, he adopts a formula from a deplorable tradition: The recognized values are attacked and contested (That is the author's "definitive" contribution) while the unfamiliar ones are paraded and possibly exaggerated. In this regrettable but consistent effort the author includes ordinary, but not scientific, terminology with some shocking and sometimes even bizarre terms like "prespeech" (p 13), "preliminary note" (p 272), "the human society of our planet" (p 269), "quite different, sometimes unique level" (p 270) etc. To be correct we should say from the start that this work actually contains some authentic and original scientific research findings with which it develops the meritorious creative work of some predecessors like G. Gramatescu, or it presents further original documentation on some well-known inventors. But these in no way justify the serious charges concerning particularly the activity of three brilliant representatives of Romanian aeronautics, namely Traian Vuia, Aurel Vlaicu and Henri Coanda.

The author's otherwise sufficiently explicit intentions of, let us say, a late proletcultist variety are more clearly revealed in the summary in French at the end of the book (because unfortunately the book is accompanied by a summary in French to make it "effective" internationally on the eve of this World Congress on History of Science), where we can read on p 278: "We must acknowledge that the history of air locomotion has not been strictly scientifically treated in Romania. Therefore it is our purpose to attempt a methodological reconsideration of the beginnings of the Romanians' aeronautic efforts." Therefore all previous Romanian efforts in this field appearing in internationally reknowned works by such authors as E. Carafoli, I. Gudju, St. Ispas, Constantin Teodorescu-Tintea, Ovidiu Ionescu, Gh. Iacobescu, G. Lipovan, Const. C. Gheorghiu, R. Stoica, I. N. Iacovachi, Florin Zaganescu, D. Moroianu et al. are not only questioned but even nullified for their lack of scientific methodology. A beautiful sentence for the defamers of the Romanian people, presented directly in French probably to save them any further effort!

But let us see what the author thinks is the reason or one of the reasons for the lack of scientific precision on the part of those engaged in this field. We find it, again explicitly enough, in the case of Aurel Vlaicu: "As I said, Vlaicu had more biographers than the other Romanian pioneers of air locomotion. Without exception they proved to be devoid either of the historical, methodological component or of the component of aeronautical knowledge, or so devoted to the subject that they came to disregard reality, sometimes unintentionally but sometimes plainly intentionally. Therefore neither Vlaicu's memory nor the higher interests of his people were rightly served (to say nothing of the interests of aviation" (p 118). And finally, if all of Aurel Vlaicu's biographers sinned for lack of patriotism "without exception" and if "the higher interests of the people" were not rightly served because of that, in the name of those "higher" interests it is natural for the author's main merits to consist of a "reappraisal of Aurel Vlaicu's contribution..." (p 118).

Parenthetically, we will quote another key sentence also about Aurel Vlaicu in order to bring out a certain attitude that permeates the book but is more striking at some points. In speaking of Vlaicu's contribution to the efforts to achieve Romanian national unity, the author says on p 118, "But the national unity of the Romanian people was to be accomplished both with and without Vlaicu, since there were infinitely better reasons and developments." Not only does the author nullify Aurel Vlaicu's contribution to the achievement of Romanian national unity but he insidiously opens the way to more serious interpretations because, by a simple extrapolation, if national unity was possible both with and without Vlaicu, it is clear that it could have been accomplished both with and without the contribution of the men of the people and the entire people. Therefore we can only ask of what the "infinitely better reasons and developments" consist! In other words, if some, others and all of those who helped Romanian national unity from within are eliminated we can think only of the international situation, the benevolence of some superpowers, and accordinly live with the feeling of an unfulfilled obligation.

To return, if we have explained as far as possible the reason and purpose of this procedure, which applies to more persons than we have mentioned, let us reflect a little on the means and arguments employed. At the very start the author professes to be faithful to maximum scientific precision when he states the necessity of "placing the Romanians' aeronautic history on a really scientific basis..." (p 22), but he flagrantly reneges on that promise in the course of the book. What can be more convincing in this respect than the incompatibility of strictly scientific methodology with his quotations from memory? "In the spring of 1960 or 1961 (lapsus calami!), at the request of an engineer doing research on the 'Coanda effect,' the author of this work had the opportunity to consult a portfolio of Eng H. Coanda's unpublished memoirs at the Prof Eng D. Leonida Technical Museum. The portfolio had just arrived at the museum and included a text typed in small type (a portable typewriter) in French on 'pelure' paper." The wealth of rather exotic details cannot hide the awkwardness of a footnote to p 128: "Upon returning to the Leonida Museum in 1972 I asked for the portfolio of H. Coanda's memoirs again, but it was no longer in that museum's collection. No other explanations could be obtained." This "working procedure" could be passed over in silence if the information brought against the great scholar Coanda, based on the vague and perhaps imaginary portfolio, had not been very serious. It is stated, and restated on other pages in the same context, that "What Coanda had done by mistake could not be called a 'flight,' and the assembly did not correspond to the engine despite the special provisions of the design. It was not only unwieldy and had limited aerodynamic characteristics but particularly it could have caught fire at any time on the ground or in flight" (p 209). We do not know how the author came to these conclusions, but we can say that if he was referring to the present aerodynamic standards of the most modern planes of today, Coanda's plane quite rightly did not correspond to the aerodynamic formulas represented today by a Tupolev, a Boeing or a Concorde. But at that time Coanda's 1910 plane (the first jet plane in the world) was considered an aerodynamic achievement accomplished by use of slotted trailing-edge flaps on the wings, first introduced by Coanda and widely applied later, placement of the fuel and lubricant tanks on the wings for the first time, and the first use of a landing gear with elastic suspension with possibilities of partial retraction in the air [escamtare [sic] partiala in aripa] and many other features. As for the "mistake" whereby Coanda the Romanian flew for the first time in a jet plane, the interview published by Henri Coanda in the journal FLYING in May 1956 is illuminating:

"I climbed into the cockpit of the plane, accelerated the engine and immediately felt the powerful current push the machine foreward. I signaled for the chocks to be withdrawn from the wheels and slowly the plane began to move. At first I had intended not to make any attempts at flight that day but only a few runs on the small airfield. But the plane controls seemed responsive and I injected more fuel into the turbine... The test had been made. I had flown the first jet plane." Moreover the reknowned scholar Elie Carafoli attested in his work "Aurel Vlaicu, Pioneer of Romanian Aviation," Bucharest 1960, p 16 that "In 1956 he (Coanda) was feted in New York for the first flight in the world of a plane propelled by a jet engine," a statement repeated in the volume "Centum ani [sic] Academiae Republicae Socialiste Romaniae" (Bucharest 1966) in addition to those of many other worthy scholars, whom the author of "Beginnings of Romanian Aeronautic Invention" probably accuses of too much patriotism. Furthermore the author questions Coanda's professional qualifications. "In the said yearbook we find that Henri Coanda became a pilot officer* 'on the basis of his studies in school in Germany.' But we may quite rightly wonder when and how" (p 101).

Obviously the author is trying to convince us that all this reconsideration is to correct an error that "in now way serves Coanda's memory nor the history of Romanian aeronautics" (p 128)!

The "reappraisal" of Traian Vuia's achievements is somewhat similar. It is quite gratuitously stated that "It is entirely illogical to connect the trip with the lack of resources to make the machine" (p 110). It is a matter of the trip from the Banat to Paris when Vuia actually was without resources, and Paris was considered the capital of aeronautics at that time. The fact is also disputed that Vuia's plane was designed essentially in the Banat before the trip to Paris, with the insinuation that Vuia was inspired by foreigners (p 111). But as Vuia's biographer, G. Lipovan, says in a text revised by Vuia himself, the situation was quite different. Vuia, with his plane clearly in mind and even having sketches of it, went to Paris to carry out his design counting on more material support and greater understanding.

In Vuia's case too the author makes an ostentatious effort to collect conflicting statements about the length of the first flight in the world, statements published by by various authors and eventually corrected by the discovery of new documents, so that the uninformed reader may very well wonder what the true situation is. When we add to all this the author's insistence upon repeating the fact that "The Wright brothers' machine was the first one that flew" (p 120) without specifying the essential difference between a catapulted flight and a flight by independent means, the intention becomes clear to upset the worldwide priorities that we Romanians succeeded in establishing. It is significant that the author, in conclusion, places Traian Vuia "and through him the Romanian aeronautic genius in the first stage, that of the precursors, in the universal history of air locomotion" (p 117). Consequently, if Vuia is a "precursor," it remains for us to find out who is the pioneer and the founder of aviation.

But Aurel Vlaicu is the most abused of our predecessors. For reasons that I gave in the beginning, which are more political and ideological than scientific, the author applies the same scientific and technical nihilism. The author's original "contribution" is the discovery that Vlaicu "not knowing any other language except Hungarian (slightly)"erred in stating that the machine (or his machines) built by Vlaicu was mainly the result of "personal studies and experiments," and he draws the conclusion that "There are necessary corrections" (p 119), and the "corrections" are not slow in coming.

On the assumption that "Not one of the heavier than air airships with fixed wings can be considered an 'invention,'" the author wants to assert the idea that "A. Vlaicu's plane is to be analyzed in the spirit of this interpretation," whereby "It seems indicated to reconsider the error that has been made in applying the terms 'inventor' and 'invention' to the person and to the machines he built" (p 120).

He also takes pride in stating that Vlaicu had no degree in engineering ("Vlaicu did not become a certified engineer and never was one officially" (p 98)), although there are no archival documents to that effect, and on the other hand his contemporaries recognized that quality in him. Not even Vlaicu's plane is exempt. "The first inaccurate statement concerning Vlaicu's technical procedures is to be found in the very title of the documents wherein he requests an invention patent for his first machine" (p 121).

The author is not conversant with the terminology of the time, and in applying it to today's standards of aerodynamics he tries to ridicule the machine that brought us Romanians so much glory.

For example it is stated on p 121 that Vlaicu's only original ideas about the construction of his planes "the component of the landing gear" and "the direction and altitude controls." This statement flagrantly contradicts the conclusions of Academician Elie Carafoli who, in his work "Aurel Vlaicu, Pioneer of Romanian Aviation" Bucharest, 1960), lists far more innovations, such as the small aluminum pipe supporting all the other elements, the reducing gear between the engine and the propeller, the brakes on the wheels, the two counter-rotating propellers, the cross-shaped tail unit at the tail of the plane, etc.

Space does not permit us to take up other authors similarly disparaged in this book, such as Alexandru Ciurcu (pp 60-61, 205-208), Rodrig Goliescu, (p 191), Mihail Braneanu (pp 62-63), et al.

Not even freedom of research can justify such harm done to Romanian scientific and technical propaganda. Clearly a researcher has not only freedom but also the obligation to investigate without dogmas and preconceived ideas, bringing out the scientific truth. But in our opinion, and we believe all readers agree with us, the procedure we see in this work has nothing to do with the freedom of scientific research. A system of scientific review of every book has been created in socialist Romania to protect the reader from subjective abuses. It is regrettable that this system failed to function in the case of this book, and our intellectual atmosphere has been polluted. In preparation for the Second Congress on Political Education and Socialist Culture it is a moral obligation to make every effort to prevent any repetition of these malfunctions. And not to leave matters in suspense, we take this occasion to suggest that the responsible elements take steps to publish the "History of Romanian Aviation," enlisting for the purpose all specialists in this field and exploiting all documentary sources in Romania and abroad, an undertaking that is now a necessity for the beautiful Romanian traditions and for the great achievements and prospects characterizing the Romanian airspace industry.

ORIGIN OF HUNGARIANS LIVING IN MOLDAVIA

Bucharest FLACARA in Romanian 3 Sep 81 p 11

/Article by V. M. Ungureanu, native of Sagna in Neamt County: "More About the Csangos in Moldavia"/

/Text/ Constantin Beloiu recently published an article, prefaced by Victor Nita, in FLACĂRA (No 27, 2 July 1981) concerning the origin of the so-called Csangos (Hungarians in Moldavia), in which he presents a manuscript study of the late Prof Dumitru Martinas'.

We have been drafting a letter to the editors about this interesting article, with some comments from which we quote as follows:

1. The Romanian Catholic communities in Moldavia (Whatever they are called, they are known and regard themselves as Romanians and have no concern for more or less fantastic theories of their origin) are vestiges of the original Romanian Christendom, which was Latin, and they descend from the Catholic Vlachs mentioned in the papal documents of the 13th-14th centuries who, along with the Orthodox Romanian population, first absorbed some of the Cumans and later some of the old Szekler and Saxon colonists.

2. These communities grew considerably in the 18th century, after the wave of emigration from Transylvania, when the term Csango appeared. It was subsequently popularized by Hungarian authors and passed into Romanian scientific terminology despite the fact that most of those so called did not know of it, and after it spread further it became a real pejorative for them. (I myself in early childhood used to recite with much feeling, "I am a Romanian and a peasant's son/ I wear sandals and I wear a peasant's coat." It was only in the history textbooks in high school that I found I was a Csango. Horrors!)

3. Religious discrimination of sad memory and a certain attitude also helped to implant the erroneous opinion about the foreign origin of the Catholic inhabitants of Moldavia. Of course that opinion was also furthered by the fact that a minority of them are bilingual, speaking a separate Hungarian dialect.

4. The erroneous assertion about our origin, making no distinction between those who speak Romanian only and the bilinguals, was always very staunchly supported by a certain propaganda, primarily for political purposes, culminating in the tragic year of 1940 when the Horthyite territorial claims extended over a part of Stefan the Great's Moldavia (To their credit and ours, the high-ranking clergy among us were foremost among those who strongly protested against these absurd claims).

5. If we are to be objective we must mention that in the 19th century especially such propaganda was also disseminated among us by some Hungarian missionaries from Transylvania, whom Rome finally recalled for that reason, and also by the teachers (cantors) educated in the Szekler country, to whom we are partly indebted for our rather colorful name.

6. Our history stained over the centuries with the blood abundantly shed in our country's defense, our ancestors' bravery (in 1888 the Hungarian scholar Aladar Ballagi, who visited our country from Budapest, told how the Csango mayor of Cleja, in Bacau County, "heatedly related his deeds at Plevna" to him), our traditions and customs, our old songs, tales and games, the Romanian dialect characteristic of most of us which has not yet been thoroughly studied, our dress, which Nicolae Iorga considered the most beautiful Romanian costume (In connection with the old men's dress, I remember my father, whom my mother addressed as "You Romanian" and whom I regarded as if he had come down from Trajan's Column), our folk art, our way of life and our consciousness of our Romanian nationality all clearly bear out our Romanian origin.

7. Regarding the term Csango, with special reference to us, that pseudoethic designation should be permanently removed from scientific terminology along with its derivatives because it represents no ethnic reality as far as we are concerned. Whoever wishes to is free to accept and take pride in that name. But we who do not recognize it and consider ourselves Romanians and only Romanians want to be exempted from it at least from now on, and we insist that dictionaries, encyclopedias, geographies and all reference works make the proper distinction for the sake of scientific objectivity. Let us have done at once with the blatant falsehood that being a Catholic Moldavian is synonymous with being a Csango!

When I was about to conclude these comments on the problem that directly concerns us, to my astonishment and to the indignation of all of us the already vast bibliography includes a new name, Peter Eross Osz, who signs some uninspired "Thoughts About an Article," also published in FLACARA (No 32, 6 August 1981).

The author, who acknowledges that he is neither a linguist nor a historian but has always been interested in both disciplines, states that he is a native of a village in Bacau County (He does not say which village so that we would know with whom we have to deal because we know of no such name in our parts), where he says he still comes when he has time to see his "friends and the cemetery."

Among the autobiographical details he should also have told us in what school he was educated and then we might have understood why he felt hurt, along "with many others" (what others?) "in his self-awareness" about belonging to a nationality. Then we would have understood why he feels bound "by unbreakable sentimental ties" not to his native Moldavia but to something quite different, just as "the travelers, writers driven by curiosity, historians, folklorists, ethnographers, journalists, poets etc." mentioned by the uprooted Bacauan also disturb us while we live in the peace of our minds and lives, which are perfectly integrated in the life of the Romanian people.

Peter Eross Osz and any of those with such an education are perfectly free to regard themselves as direct desendents of the Huns, Cabarids [cabarizilor] and I know whom or as the oldest and most authentic Magyars on the face of the earth. It is a purely personal matter and we respect it as such. But on the other hand he should allow us, about 200,000 of us who consider ourselves Romanians and only Romanians, to express ourselves as we feel and to live our lives according to our nature and our Romanian awareness and not insult us with "thoughts" like those published.

Like Prof Dumitru Martinas (See the admirable intellectual and moral portrait of him by Prof Dr Docent J. Spielman in the July number of VATRA, Tirgu Mures) we are not xenophobes. Belonging body and soul to the Romanian people and having our own spiritual values that we cherish like the light of our eyes, we love and respect all national minorities, among whom the Hungarian minority has a place apart. We have a distinct historical and cultural symbiosis with them and we sincerely prize their spiritual values. But let one thing be known once and for all: Even if all kinds of writings about us were printed that would fill a library not like the one the offended author mentions but one of the size of the library in Alexandria, we would always remain an integral part of the Romanian nation and would never allow anyone to disturb what we hold more dear and more sacred, namely our Romanian consciousness formed in the eternal light of Rome.

As to the author's "scientific" figments, reading them like his previous "thoughts" reminds one of the traditional saying about the philosophy of silence. Let us consider the following points:

1. Prof Dumitru Martinas' study concerns the Romanian dialect of his parents and most of the so-called Csangos, which is regarded as a gap in Romanian linguistics and has not been studied before. But Osz misunderstands the situation, constantly referring to the "Csango" Hungarian dialect and accusing Martinas of no knowing Hungarian.

2. Osz, who was born among the Csangos, not only has friends among them but has taken a serious interest in the Csango problem for more than 30 years in order to satisfy his curiosity. Osz, who "cannot be called entirely uninformed," considers the explanations given of the term Csango "unscientific." But he omitted one detail: the explanations are not Martinas' but those of some Hungarian authors who are certainly better informed in this matter than he. Here is a quotation from BULETINUL SOCIETATII GEOGRAFICE UNGARE, Budapest, 1888, unknown to Martinas in the original: "Ce peuple s'appelle csango, nom qui tire son origine du verbe csangai et veut dire hongrois degenere."

3. Dumitru Martinas makes no particular point about the "Csango" Hungarian dialect because it is not the subject of his study. Here as above the saying is appropriate: "Good day, uncle Istrat!" "Two ducklings, brother!"

4. Even though it was studied by Wichmann and Weigand (not Wiegand, as Osz calls him. Let it be said in passing that the German linguist's studies of us are cursory and superficial) the sibilant pronunciation cannot represent "a surviving form of Hungarian linguistic archaism which was formerly generalized (under the Cabarids' influence) and which has survived until our time only in the northern Csango dialect" because it also occurs in the Romanian dialects of our part of Moldavia, the Banat and Oltenia, where history tells us no Cabarid set foot.

The value of his historical-linguistic assertions will be clearly and immediately apparent to the reader from all the current misinformation at the end of the article in question, which we correct as follows: (1) The only publication of the Catholic Presa

Buna Publishing House in Iasi wherein any articles on this subject appeared is the "Presa Buna Almanac" for 1941. (2) There was no Catholic publishing house in Iasi called Sf Bonaventura. That was the name of the reading society of the former Franciscan theological seminary at Luizi-Calugara, Bacau County, which published religious books only. (3) There were no authors named Petru Lucaciu or P. Ferent (confused with Dumitru Lucaciu and Ioan or perhaps Iacob Ferent?). (4) Nor was there any author named Petru Mihai. (5) There was no Iosif Pal either. Iosif Petru M. Pal (without an acute, and the M. is for Maria) was the father superior of the Romanian Franciscans. (6) The writings of the Catholic priests disliked by the latest Csangologist were not published "more precisely in the 1930's" as he quite ignorantly says, but very precisely in 1940 and thereafter under the above-mentioned circumstances and as a duty of conscience born of their enlightened patriotism.

ORIGINS OF KOSOVO TROUBLES TRACED IN MILITARY JOURNAL

Lessons Drawn From Events

Belgrade VOJNO DELO in Serbo-Croatian No 3, May-Jun 81 pp 92-97

[Article by Dr Muhamed Kesetovic: "Counterrevolution in Kosovo, Lessons and Implications"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in italics]

[Text] The premeditated counterrevolutionary action by well-organized and well-prepared hostile forces under the slogan "Kosovo a Republic" raised the question which was put in the introduction to this many-sided topic: How was it possible for the events in Kosovo to take a counterrevolutionary turn and to follow an irrational course that won the support of a portion [of the population], especially the young generation, university students and the intelligentsia?

Without undertaking to elaborate the historical past and to analyze the factors in that complex, which certainly are not primary factors, the most correct methodological procedure of analysis would seem to be to go right to the heart of the problem, in media res. This procedure is all the more justified because there has been and there still is more or less skillful manipulation of the history and the historical facts. As we know, the past has an influence on the present and future, but not a decisive impact, nor as much of an influence as the factors which are currently operative. Among them three are the most important.

First, socialist self-management in Yugoslavia has meant a change of direction in the development of our nationalities and relations among them generally, and in Kosovo specifically. It necessarily required decentralization and destatization as a necessary prerequisite to expansion of the framework of worker control of the conditions and results of their work, i.e., as a necessary prerequisite for the development of socialist self-management. It also signified a qualitatively new step in the policy of equality of the nationalities and ethnic minorities. However, socialist self-management has not been developing according to needs or the changes which have been made, especially in its essence, i.e., in the qualitative alteration of production relations. In and of itself this opened up the possibility of an insufficient harmony of relations, no longer directly between the socialist republics and socialist autonomous provinces in the Federation, but at the socioeconomic base, between self-management and statism in the socialist republics and socialist autonomous provinces. This contradiction on the surface of things was transformed to take on a nationality dimension, i.e., an interrepublic-province dimension, in the Federation and in relations within it.

The carapace of the state was thrown off more slowly at the republic and province level. This favored the invigoration and strengthening of ethnic egoism and aspirations to statehood on the part of the nationalities, which at the outset was manifested first in the more advanced republics and the Province of Vojvodina. When the ideological forces which were the vehicle of this course received a decisive blow in those republics and SAP [Socialist Autonomous Province] Vojvodina, in Kosovo and elsewhere those same forces began to behave and take their bearings according to the logic of a negative example having become a model. This was manifested, first, in economic exclusiveness, and then in a weakening of other mutual ties and influences as well. The difference is that those currents, in this case in Kosovo, had more time to sow the poison seed and that, in their linkage with irredentism, they grew relatively rapidly into counterrevolution. For that reason the showdown with those forces must be more thoroughgoing and lengthy, but it undoubtedly must also yield another result--an airing out of the entire society to rid it of this kind of staleness where it has persisted. This only confirms that the destiny of all the nationalities and ethnic minorities in Yugoslavia is indissolubly bound up with socialist management, with the working class and its interests, and not with the national states and alienated political powers which express themselves in an outdated national romanticism and an aspiration for statehood which has not yet run its course.

Second, the tendencies toward economic and social exclusiveness, borne along by ethnic and republic-provincial egoism, on foundations of statist production relations which have not been overcome in the socioeconomic sphere and of political rule in the sphere of the social superstructure, have collided seriously with the policy of and commitment to reduction of differences in level of development between the advanced and underdeveloped socialist republics and the Socialist Autonomous Province of Kosovo. The emergence of this confinement to regional limits has left no space or opportunity for free pooling of labor and income through self-management or for optimum division of labor in the undivided economic and social space of Yugoslavia. This was conducive to an uncontrolled retention of elements of the worker's wage relation in production relations as well as of the basis of ethnic alienation. If differences between the economically advanced and underdeveloped were to be mitigated in such a situation, the state had to remain on the scene with its set of instruments to stimulate and assist the more rapid development of the underdeveloped SR's [socialist republic] and SAP Kosovo.

The material resources gathered in this way and committed to projects in Kosovo, especially over the last 10 years, have been very large and have yielded large results. At the same time they indicate a high level of solidarity and confirm that solidarity. However, precisely because even this sphere of policy has remained in the statist framework, both with respect to the collection and manner of placement of the resources and also with respect to their use, this policy has not only failed to yield the optimum results, but in part and unwittingly it became implicated in furthering the conditions which resulted in the hostile and counterrevolutionary explosion in Kosovo. /What does this apparent contradiction involve./

The financial resources of the federal fund for stimulating the more rapid development of the underdeveloped SR's and SAP Kosovo, which were built up administratively, were administratively committed and spent in Kosovo. /Instead of performing the function of bringing the Kosovo economy more rapidly into the Yugoslav division of labor, they stimulated and strengthened autarkic structures./

The national romanticism of a portion of the Albanian nationality in Kosovo was manifested in the fact that these resources were uncritically and disproportionately committed to consumption and to reproduction of structures which were highly subject to national romanticism and nationalism. History has countless times confirmed that this is dangerous in any nationality and especially in a nationality which has had such a difficult historical past as the Albanian nationality in Kosovo.

The development programs in Kosovo did not take as their point of departure the shortest way of ensuring formation of a large-scale industrial working class as the social foundation and pillar of socialist self-management and an integrating force in the pooling of labor and self-management integration of Yugoslav society and the system. Moreover, the outsizing of higher education (in a very short time the university in Pristina had the third largest student body in Yugoslavia, larger than the university in Ljubljana) created and aggravated the problem of finding jobs. Other forms of nonproduction consumption also manifested a tendency of national romanticism.

The absence of inputs from the other communities as self-managers, from the other SR's, which would have stood in the way of Kosovo's closing itself off, was conducive to the formation of real relations and a consciousness whereby the pressures--to get more, the attitude that what was received was never enough--fitted perfectly into the national romanticism which was objectively becoming an ally of the counterrevolution.

Third, the insufficient openness of Kosovo toward the other parts of Yugoslavia and of them toward Kosovo, along with the swelling up of Albanian nationalism in Kosovo, opened wide the door to neighboring Albania, where an alliance of nationalism with counterrevolution is indeed beginning. Whereas it is all but practically impossible for the citizens of other parts of Yugoslavia to get a visa to visit neighboring Albania, relations, especially cultural, educational, scientific, tourist and similar relations between Kosovo and Albania, have been far more highly developed over the last 10 years than with the other SR's and SAP Vojvodina in Yugoslavia. Though this sounds paradoxical, it must be said that in many respects Albanian nationals were more privileged in Kosovo and had greater freedom than in their own country. The question arises in this connection: /How is it possible that people from a more advanced and humane community would idealize a community in which there is none of that, in which they could not find a place and which they could not tolerate?/

It must immediately be said that nationalism is blind, it may be vast, but it can never be great, it is irrational, and, as Karl Kraus says, "nationalism is a whirlpool in which all other forms of thought cease." /That is one thing, but the other is how a nationalist counterrevolution could have occurred and risen up in the context of socialist self-management; it is that which horrified the public the most. But actually the Kosovo counterrevolution confirmed the lag in underdevelopment of socialist self-management on the one hand and fear of it on the other./

The very moment that the process of socialist self-management slowed down in the context of the more independent constitutional status of SAP Kosovo in the SFRY and in SR Serbia, the political and bureaucratic-technocratic structures lounged back and relaxed, and by the logic of the thing pointed a finger at someone else for all the difficulties and problems which arose therefrom. The feeling of being neglected was nurtured in the consciousness of the ordinary people of Albanian nationality. /Certain of the leaders built their positions on this, and the more they emphasized it, the greater the recognition they felt they received as national leaders and saviours./ Carrying this logic still further and manipulating this kind of state of the people, they believed that they would exert pressure more effectively and extort more resources for development from the Federation and SR Serbia. On the other hand the intensified and uncontrolled relations and ties between Kosovo and Albania had two aspects. One was that the irredentists deliberately and in a lasting way took advantage of this uncontrolled development and the naive assessment and orientation of the leaders in Kosovo. They used all that to whip up anti-Yugoslav and especially anti-Serb feeling and to sow illusions about Great Albania as the only prospect for the Albanian people in general, in Kosovo particularly.

But the intensified relations and contacts from Albania also revealed the other side of the coin to Albanian citizens. Given that country's total isolation from the rest of the world and the regime of Enver Hoxha, which is like that of Pol Pot transplanted in Europe, through the relations with Kosovo Albanian nationals became aware and began to think more critically about their country's regime. /Out of a fear lest their government be shaken for that reason, the irredentists from Albania tried to shake Yugoslavia itself through the counterrevolution in Kosovo./ This is unambiguously confirmed by the brutality in the disorders and also by the starting up of the familiar Stalinist-Cominform arsenal against Yugoslavia when the counterrevolution failed.

In Kosovo the uncontrolled bureaucratic-technocratic tendencies made concepts confused, and the ability was lost to distinguish the national from the nationalistic. It was thought up until the most recent events that the Albanian nationality in Kosovo as the largest of our ethnic minorities, would be capable of achieving harmonious relations among the nationalities and brotherhood and unity once it had gained unrestricted conditions and opportunities for affirmation of its individuality. Nor has this belief been betrayed. The betrayal was on the part of certain of the most responsible leaders and the political structures that were under their influence and were also unvigilant and lax in the face of the activity of nationalistic fanatics, but not on the part of the people. A portion of the Albanian people in Kosovo were blinded and carried away by the hostile nationalistic euphoria, and it is becoming aware of its true interests as it sobers up from the shock, in the course of the political differentiation which is now under way in Kosovo, which has been proceeding successfully and is gradually putting everything in its place.

And something else. It is an old truth that the same causes give rise to the same consequences, there being differences, of course, in forms and time. In other words, when nationalism and liberalism emerged on the basis of decentralized statist production relations in the advanced regions, it was natural for them to emerge in the other regions as well, i.e., in Kosovo. When they were not dealt the necessary blow there at the time, they became bolder and stronger. In the context of the forging of the socioeconomic relations of self-management, this logically had to bring about the same phenomenon where at the outset it was dealt an initial blow. The capital lesson and implication of Kosovo is that the contradictions: socialist self-management--statism and technobureaucracy and regionalism, which emerges on the surface as a form of Soviet chauvinism, but is in essence a class deformation, will have to be stated in class terms and will have to be resolved in terms of social classes.

In the context of the shattering of the undivided economic space of Yugoslavia and of autarky, whose basis is the state-ownership and group-ownership relationship, and which is an expression of the technobureaucratic political and professional-management ruling group, there is no basis or space for activity of the revolutionary vanguard of the working class in favor of democratic relations in a creative dialogue carried along by the desire for real present and future truths. The revolutionary vanguard, insofar as it becomes dissolved in that shattered space and those relations, instead of winning out and overcoming, is removed from its historical mission and role by that same distance. A way with words is of no help here whatsoever. Quite often this eloquence conceals demagogy and a dangerous lulling, since it is not easy in practice to distinguish lasting from immediate interests, and it is still more difficult to fight for them. That is why it is neither easy nor simple even today to be a member of the League of Communists, and this is particularly true of responsible officials in forums.

The slow and lukewarm political differentiation in Kosovo, which has hardly budged, much less expanded, anywhere outside the organizations of the LCY, is merely a confirmation of that. If we are to face the truth, Kosovo is confirmation that under the strong influence of individuals the leadership bodies actually attempted to create an organization of the League of Communists to meet their own needs, as a point of support and protection of their egoistic-provincial policy and interests, and not to serve the interests of the working class. Taking all in all, there is not much space or time for debates about our moment of truth; it calls for action, since this moment in time is pregnant with an uncontrolled course of events wherever the class compass has been lost.

The League of Communists--class-oriented, not only nationally (republic-province) oriented, firm and resolute in its practical activity to serve the lasting interests of the working class--is as necessary to Yugoslavia today and to every nation and nationality as air is to the organism. It is a question of class consciousness, of a deliberate struggle by the most conscious forces of society--the League of Communists--to examine the working-class interests today and here along the important lines of strategy and in practical everyday action, and then all other relations establish themselves as a matter of course.

The counterrevolution in Kosovo demonstrated that so long as the League of Communists, from the primary organization to the highest forums, is identified with immediate and partial interests, there is no dialectical harmony, nor can there be, between the interests of the nationality and the interests of the class. The authenticity of the revolution and its continuity should be sought and evaluated in that harmony, and this should be done not according to declarations, but according to practice and the results of practice. That approach to social reality also offers opportunities for overcoming all the present difficulties, which indeed has been the case up to now in our revolutionary past.

Background in International Law

Belgrade VOJNO DELO in Serbo-Croatian No 3, May-Jun 81 pp 113-126

[Article by Dr Gavro Perazic, professor: "Albanian Intervention in the Kosovo Events From the Standpoint of International Law"]

[Text] Albania's intervention in the domestic affairs of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has been unambiguously expressed in a series of articles in ZERI I POPULIT, organ of the Albanian Workers' Party as well as in the official acts and statements of the Albanian state. The attacks on our country's policy made by the periodical mentioned can be described in the terms of international law as acts of "use of force and threat of force" against the territorial integrity and political independence of a state.

International law long ago condemned such acts, since they violate a state's sovereign right to regulate its own political system, especially its constitutional system, as best suits it. However harmless this may appear (since it involves an action by a small neighboring country which cannot threaten Yugoslavia's security), international law still cannot make concessions in the degree of its condemnation of such acts, which would be based solely on an assessment of the real danger to the country attacked and its readiness to defend itself against the danger that has arisen. Even though its strength is weaker in every respect, NR [People's Republic] Albania dares to undertake aggressive acts against a country which is in every respect larger and stronger. After all, as is well known, a state's behavior does not depend solely on its size and military power, but also on other factors which are sometimes decisive or even indeed the crucial ones. International law, then, condemns evenhandedly such acts whether they are committed by a small state against some large state, or the other way around, just as it evenhandedly protects the sovereignty of every state, be it small or large.

There can be no dilemma about this being a complex, planned and deliberate undertaking by the official Albanian government structure against Yugoslavia. After all, even if we were to confine the blame only to ZERI I POPULIT as though it were a free periodical, that would not correspond to reality, since in a political regime like the one in Albania, the symbiosis of the state and party, by the nature of the very system, has been carried to perfection, and this periodical of the Albanian party and government can in no way be regarded separately from Albania's policy.

But the matter is not confined to that. It has also come out that an official government agency--a diplomatic mission, was fully involved in the disorders in Kosovo--in a particular way, of course, as, incidentally, such things are done. Nor, of course, did the old truth fail to be borne out in this: that foreign policy has its source in a country's internal condition. And further, that a deviation on the domestic scene often causes a state to cast its domestic crises over the borders in order to prove that the origin of those crises should also be sought outside the country's borders. There have been quite a few such crises in Albania's political regime, since a political system of that kind actually engenders them, and it survived them by "seeking" the causes outside its own borders. Nor is the capability of this kind of manipulation of its citizens on the basis of chauvinism and nationalism debatable, in spite of the fact that it runs counter to international law.

I

The series of attacks on basic elements of Yugoslavia's sovereignty and certain values which constitute the exclusive domain of any country's domestic order and progress is covered in international law by several legal norms--institutions--which were shaped within an old institution of international law and which are very relevant even today, and the law defines that series of attacks as intervention (interference) in the internal affairs of other states, whose condemnation on the international scene is not disputed today by a single state in the international community.

Since in pursuit of one of its goals the Albanian side itself appeals to international law, [stating that] it was Yugoslavia's constitutional failure not to have set up Kosovo as a republic, describing that fact at the same time as a "contradiction of the principles of good neighborliness," we ourselves will discuss certain institutions of international law and set them against the Albanian acts in order to see to what extent the Albanian actions in the Kosovo events conform to those principles of international law.

II

A drastic manifestation of Albanian irredentism was contained in an article in ZERI I POPULIT on 23 April of this year, in which it explicitly emphasized that the Albanian nationality was "third largest in Yugoslavia, and it ought to be joined with Albania--your socialist ally in the national liberation struggle." On 17 May of this year the newspaper resorted to criticizing the historical events in the past which brought injustice to the Albanian people. That is, it began first of all with the 1913 London Agreement, when the creation of Albania as an independent state was proclaimed in a conference of ambassadors of the great powers. However, the Albanian side is critical of that event because Albania was parceled and because the largest northeastern portion (Kosovo and other Albanian regions) were next to the Kingdom of Serbia and Montenegro, thereafter to be left within the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes by the Versailles Peace Conference in 1919.

It is not clear why the author of the article bypassed the text of the secret London protocol dated 26 April 1915 between the Triple Entente and Italy, which called for creating an independent state under Italian protection from a small portion of Albania and under which Italy would acquire full sovereignty over Sazan Island and the town of Valona, and the northern and southern portions were divided between the kingdoms of Greece and of Serbia and Montenegro (Article 7). At that time certain of our territories (Istria and the coast) were also allotted to Italy. Thus Fan Noli, the Albanian representative, rightly noted in 1921 in the League of Nations that the secret 1915 London treaty was not binding and had no legal force whatsoever.[1] Incidentally, the borders of Albania as they were subsequently established were defined in London in 1913.[2]

The actual establishment of the borders went slowly and painfully, and then in 1926 the agreement that the border had been definitively established in international law was finally signed. We can conclude from that that at the time when Albania's borders with neighboring states was being debated, it was not an independent state from which anything could have been taken away, but a Turkish province. Nor was Yugoslavia an independent state until 1918, but the independent states were Serbia and Montenegro. So two of today's neighboring states are the heirs of those decisions in 1913, under which they would emerge as states after World War I, when in fact the political map of Europe changed a great deal. The circumstances were such that neither one nor the other could significantly influence how the borders would be defined, though they did have their representatives on the commission for delineation of the border. So, the truth needs to be stated: the great powers had the last word in demarcation.[3] Which is why the two new subjects of international law--Yugoslavia and Albania--were unable to alter the situation created in 1913, even had they been willing to do so, but they were only able to make certain small corrections when the border was being marked in the field.

At the beginning of World War II Albania was proclaimed an Italian protectorate, and independent Albania was again established after the war. During World War II, specifically on 12 August 1941, Italy, contrary to international law, proclaimed the annexation of a portion of Yugoslav territory to Albania and after the war the relations of status quo ante were reestablished.[4] Consequently, during the war the occupier did not respect the borders that existed. That made it necessary to conclude an agreement[5] to renew the border pyramids which had been destroyed and damaged and also to build intermediate border pyramids on the Yugoslav-Albanian state border in 1953. This document and certain others concerning establishment of the border were based on confirmation of the 1926 Florence Protocol, which definitively acknowledged that a regular legal situation existed with respect to its determination. De jure the two states have established and maintained the border and their jurisdictions in connection with it for more than half a century. At the same time, as legally independent states, both condemned the territorial changes which their common occupier made during World War II.

So, the two old subjects of international law, the Kingdom of Yugoslavia and the Kingdom of Albania, and their legal successors, the new Yugoslavia and Albania, have not up until this day brought up any dispute whatsoever about the borders which were established, nor have they appealed to historical oversights or "historical rights" to support their theses that the border was improperly drawn, that is, did not include a particular area within their state. Thus the motives and claims on the Albanian side possess extremely suspicious foundations, and they must be condemned in international law. Thus claims of representing to the public the genesis of the "historic rights" on the area where the Albanian nationality lives, particularly combined with emphasizing its numerical size as a factor, cannot convince anyone that the supposed purpose here is to indicate the possible ethnic purity of a community as an additional basis of that expansionism.

No, that is not what is involved, on the contrary, all of this constitutes a revival of the most sinister practice which the world came to know during World War II, when Nazism laid claim on that basis to territories where German ethnic minorities were settled and where they were more numerous that others, which, incidentally, we felt ourselves on our own soil.

There is not much to be said about the border as a basic attribute demarcating two sovereignties and the territorial integrity of states, nor about the fact that their violation by force or the threat of force constitutes an international crime. The reason for all that is that a violation of the sovereignty of a state and people, especially in a case of the armed form of that violation, occurs with its first act being the violation of the border. The entire system of international law on relations between states stresses inviolability of the borders as the most essential obligation. When condemnations are made of force, of aggression, of intervention, and so on, the reference is always to occurrences of these acts, above all against the borders of states, whether the border be directly violated or actions over the border are invisibly aimed at the state's internal being.

Though violation of the border did not occur in the drastic form in our case, as we shall later see, in the acts of interference of the Albanian state it is implicitly contained in the criticism of the historic solutions whereby it was established, since in that way it disputes the legality of the existing border.

It is for that reason that all the new documents in international law devote attention to these problems. For example, one of the most important documents of very recent date (the final communique of the 1974 Helsinki Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe) points out that "the participating states regard as mutually inviolable all their borders, as well as the borders of all states in Europe, and /they will now and in the future/ (emphasis supplied by G. P.) refrain from any assault on those borders." Accordingly, "they will also refrain from any demand or act of conquest or usurpation of a portion or the entire territory of any state whatsoever."[6]

To be sure, Albania did not place its solemn signature on that document, it boycotted the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and for that reason describes the spirit of Helsinki as a "soap bubble."[7] The question arises: Does that mean that this document is not binding on Albania since it did not enter into it?

First of all, the Helsinki document contains nothing new which had not been international law in effect for a long time already and which had not been incorporated in several documents of general and regional nature. European statesmen (and statesmen of the United States and Canada) solemnly signed that document, wishing once again to confirm their resoluteness to respect those rules of behavior on the European continent. That is why Albania does not have the right to go outside the limits of those rules. It is its sovereign right to decide whether it shall sign a particular international document or not, but it is not its sovereign right to choose the manner of its behavior toward that document. This is both understandable and logical. So, that document is equally binding on the signatories and those who did not sign it, be they small powers or great ones. This, then, is a top-ranking rule in international law regardless of the ethnic, religious or other arguments which a state presents as grounds to justify its claims to altering national borders. Otherwise chaos would prevail in international law and in international relations. At the same time, a state's right to survival (self-defense) includes the state's right to defend its borders with all means, with armed power, of course, and along those lines the right to take in advance all measures to protect and defend them.

III

It is self-evident that Albanian manipulation of the Albanian ethnic minority in Yugoslavia is serving altogether different goals, those of expansionism. Within this fact are present the tendencies to rely on force, even though it be displayed indirectly, in order to destroy Yugoslavia's constitutional order. That is, pointing to the numerical size of its nationality in Kosovo and to the compactness of the territory on which it lives as the factor which in and of itself, in the opinion of the Albanian side, constitutes the basis for a republic in the constitutional system of the SFRY, objecting to that nationality's being divided today among three republics, the author of the article in ZERI I POPULIT[8] obviously wishes to emphasize that this is a factor of force within the Yugoslav structure to which particular attention should now be paid in his demands for alteration of the status of the sociopolitical community, that is, for formation of a more independent constitutional entity--a republic--that is, to give it the "rank of a republic," within which there would be further opportunity for its freer manipulation. All this together, even though in propaganda terms, nevertheless constitutes a deliberate urging of Albanian nationalistic and irredentist forces in Kosovo to act with definite force, at present psychological, propaganda and political, toward breaking down the constitutional order of a neighboring country and toward its adaptation to initiatives from outside. At the same time Albania assumes the right to present itself as protector for the sake of supposed protection of its nationality in Kosovo and for support of its struggle to create a separate republic; this patronage would extend over the entire nationality, which in that way would preserve its common language, culture, spiritual homogeneity, and so on.

Albania has unfortunately been attempting in this way to revive a regrettable practice from the past, when states representing the parent nationality tried to make "dynamite" of their minorities, according to presentations once made in the League of Nations. It is worth just recalling the role of the Sudeton Deutsche Partei in Czechoslovakia,[9] similar organizations in states where German ethnic minorities lived, and indeed even in Yugoslavia between the two world wars. The Axis powers greatly expanded the effort to make use of ethnic minorities for expansionist purposes, and during the occupation of certain territories this approach was met with open arms. They thus refashioned and annexed occupied territories, which has long ago been condemned in international law. Nor has a case of annexation on behalf of Great Albania gone unnoticed in the history of international relations. It had to do with certain parts of our country which the occupier annexed during World War II to what was called Great Albania, since they were judged to be ethnically "homogeneous entities" and since Albania had been left without those territories by a "mistake of history." Though Albania itself had the status of an Italian protectorate, its puppet circles accepted that fact, which in any case was bound up with how the war turned out. Fortunately, the people in Albania and also the members of the Albanian ethnic minorities on those territories of ours gave a worthy answer to all that during the National Liberation War which they jointly waged with the nationalities and ethnic minorities of Yugoslavia. However, that practice of manipulating ethnic minorities in general during World War II had much to do with the system of their protection after the war being left to the constitutional order of every state where they lived, and to their status being regulated, if the circumstances existed, on a bilateral basis.

The possibility of manipulating minorities and this practice in the past had the result that states safeguarded themselves against the undesirable actions of minorities, and the principle of the "loyalty" of minorities as a correlate of their rights has been present in the science of international law as well as in the political practice of states. Very significant documents along those lines whose legally binding nature is implied, though sometimes in practice it is called into question, have been adopted in the international community. For example, the Third Assembly of the League of Nations on 21 September 1921 emphasized in its resolution recognition of the basic rights of minorities protected by the League of Nations, but it also "insisted on the duty of persons belonging to racial, religious and linguistic minorities to cooperate as loyal citizens with the nation to which they now belong." A similar indication was to be made by the 21st Conference of the Interparliamentary Union in 1923, whose declaration states in Point III: "The fact that they belong to a religious or linguistic minority in no way relieves the members of a state of the duties imposed on them by the constitution and law of that state."[10]

Of course, in states where minorities were to be found on both sides of the national boundary the principle of reciprocity has been a pledge for respecting their rights; when their rights are not respected by one state, the other state would respond in kind. In order to free states of obligations in this respect in advance, following World War I specific agreements regulated the transfer of population in states where their parent nationalities were living either on a reciprocal basis or by simple resettlement.[11]

Present Yugoslav policy, which is based on the same principles which we set down in the decisions of the Second Session of AVNOJ [Antifascist Council of the National Liberation of Yugoslavia] in 1943, when in a specific decision (on building Yugoslavia on the federal principle) we also established the right of ethnic minorities to free development, cannot accept either of the principles mentioned as a pledge for respect of their rights. After all, the "principle of loyalty" in and of itself contains the supposition that they are predetermined to be disloyal, and therefore must in this way be warned in advance if they want to enjoy their rights. Thus the prerequisite of discrimination with respect to confidence in citizens of a different ethnic, religious, national or similar origin is implanted in advance. Nor can the political system of socialist democracy accept the principle of reciprocity, since it contains elements and possibilities of revenge and reprisals against one's own citizens for something they are not to blame for at all. Minorities are not to blame because they have found themselves to be set apart within the limits of other states, by contrast with the parent nation which has remained more compact within one state. It is natural to expect that the state will guarantee them normal life and development as its citizens just as it does to all citizens. The state of the parent nationality has the right to be concerned with its destiny, but it must also refrain from any action which would make "dynamite" of minorities to threaten the unity of their state and in general the relations of their state. As we see it, neither can the numerical size of an ethnic minority be a factor in any sort of discrimination with respect to the rights of any ethnic minority in Yugoslavia in the sense of making the scope of their rights dependent upon that fact. Even the numerically smallest ethnic minority enjoys the same rights as the most numerous one. It is naturally borne in mind that the number of members of a particular ethnic minority and the compactness of the territory on which they are settled and where they constitute a majority of the population have an essential effect on preservation and homogenization of their ethnic characteristics, culture, language, customs and the like. But by no means does this signify that that ethnic minority which is not numerically large or is scattered over the entire territory of the state should be subject to any forcible assimilation into that portion of the nation that constitutes the majority. Those are the basic components of the policy of national equality of nationalities and ethnic minorities which are inherent in the social being of our community and which remain as our society's enduring ideology and political practice regardless of the setbacks or social disturbances that may occur in this process, as has been the case in Kosovo.

From the standpoint of international law, in evaluating the Albanian actions one cannot overlook the method which the official government uses in relations with its neighbor Yugoslavia in order to attain its irredentist goals. In it the basic element is instigation to civil disorders--conflicts, and there are certain indicators even of active participation and help in this regard. Certain actions were accompanied by instigation to arouse ethnic enmity among the Yugoslav nationalities, whereby a direct attack was made on brotherhood and unity--the basic postulate of Yugoslavia's constitutional order. Finally, there were even ultimative threats attacking neighborly relations with Yugoslavia. For example, ZERI I POPULIT indicated that if the demands of the Albanians were not met, "the wound would not heal, but on the contrary the gap would widen." And further, the Albanian has "always fought bravely and conquered his enemies," and emphasizing the threat of Enver Hoxha along the lines of "Don't anger the Albanian people, it is very patient, but when an Albanian gets mad, even the flint in the stone burns," and then "blood is not water," and so on. We will not, of course, pay particular attention to the content of these mystical and medieval threats which are devoid of any sense of responsibility on the part of the periodical and the institution under whose sponsorship it is published, that is, whose ideas it is interpreting. Nevertheless, we must point to the abuses of a newspaper like ZERI I POPULIT, which has arrogantly attempted to resuscitate some primordial hatred toward the nationalities of Yugoslavia and in that way to sow psychological poison, especially among the young people of Albanian nationality. Such acts undoubtedly fall in the domain of psychological warfare. In other words, these are acts of subversive sabotage. For example, the periodical writes: "so perhaps in Belgrade they do not require the Albanian to be a patriot...." These words themselves unambiguously demonstrate that this is a propaganda which assumes in advance that the homeland (patria) of that man is some other country and not Yugoslavia.

There can be no dilemma about the ultimate goal of these methods and slogans. It is quite certain that it is the matter of every political system what content it will choose to indoctrinate its own people, provided that content does not violate the standards of international law (for example, the standards concerning nondiscrimination, racial and ethnic enmity, and so on) in psychological commitment of the people to certain undertakings which the state is guiding. But insofar as those methods are opposed to the basic requirements set by the international community, they must also be condemned in the domestic legal system. After all, Nazism's policy of genocide arose precisely on that kind of basis--hatred of other nationalities. This is especially the case when such methods are directed against foreign nationals and when those foreign nationals are descendants of a nationality whose majority lives in another state. This is an abuse of the psychological complex of a population to break down unity and instigate disorders within their own state. Events which are provoked in this way and which must be prevented by up-to-date agencies of government, including the force of the government apparatus, serve as the basis for additional abuse in the hope that the propaganda will in this way become a steady stream and take on specific gravity. These are specific varieties of resorting to force in international law.

In this connection we would recall several standards of international law adopted after World War II which constitute the basic rules of behavior in relations between states. Thus one of the principles of international law concerning friendly relations between states explicitly condemns incitement to civil wars or terrorist acts. That is, every state has a duty to refrain from organizing the incitement, aiding or participation in a civil war or terrorism in another state or from tolerating organized activity on its own territory in order to carry out such acts. We should especially emphasize the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States in the Protection of the Independence and Sovereignty, which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 21 December 1965 and which points out that no state "can apply nor support the use of measures of an economic, political or any other nature that would coerce another state to subordination in the exercise of its sovereign rights or to secure from it advantages of any kind." Likewise, "all states shall refrain from organizing, assisting, fomenting, financing, inciting or tolerating armed, subversive or terrorist activity directed toward the violent overthrow of the regime of another state and also from interference in civil strife in another state."[12]

In examining intervention as an inadmissible interference by one state in the internal affairs of another, we need to point out that the United Nations Charter itself (Article 2, Paragraph 7) emphasizes the principle of nonintervention, so that the United Nations Charter itself does not authorize the United Nations to interfere in the internal affairs of states, that is, in matters "which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state." It follows therefrom, and the best-known lawyers have so stated, that when the international community cannot interfere in such affairs, this is especially prohibited to individual states.

Certainly the very term intervention presupposes a use of force, by the very nature of the "unauthorized" and inadmissible interference in the internal relations of another state with the intention of bringing about a state of affairs or of changing its domestic or foreign policy, in general or only certain aspects of it. As the matter is now looked upon, that force need not be direct--armed. That is why certain writers indeed take the view that intervention may be by armed force or without armed force. In a case when an intervention is carried out with armed force, no line can be drawn between it and open aggression. Also, the concept of force which the charter prohibits in the form of "threat or use of force" (Article 2, Paragraph 4) against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state need not necessarily be armed. It is therefore rightly emphasized that force is a broader term than armed force. This has been confirmed by all the documents which have been adopted by the summit conferences of the nonaligned countries, from Belgrade to Havana. Moreover, the position taken in the special bodies of the United Nations which have debated this problem is well known. It was stated then that at times economic or political force can be more dangerous than armed force.[13] It clearly follows therefrom that this concept embraces ideological, propaganda and other campaigns, psychological warfare, the organization and assisting of subversive activities, infiltration of political agents, and so on. This is also the meaning of force adopted by the United Nations General Assembly when it passed the resolutions we have mentioned on prohibiting force and intervention.[14]

Official Albania has undisguisedly shown its presence in the events in Kosovo. It is not just a question of an indoctrination imported from the Albanian side in the form of the educational content and ideologist-teachers on the basis of some cultural cooperation with the parent nationality, but it is also a question of secret acts to which it resorted, as has already been made known (an official government structure--the diplomatic mission). Tolerance, not only active incitement, is an act which has been condemned in international law as intervention, so that a fortiori such behavior by official bodies is all the more unlawful. And even the propaganda presented in the content of that newspaper contains vigorous acts of incitement.

The purport of the quotes we have given (the Declaration on Nonintervention), as we have seen, is to point up the duty of states to refrain even from "tolerating armed, subversive or terrorist activity" directed toward changing the regime of another state. Stricto jure, the concept of toleration presupposes a state's action to prevent acts within its jurisdiction which are directed toward that goal. Which means that it is not enough merely for a state not to organize and assist them, but when such acts are being prepared and conducted on its territory, it is to prevent them by action of its sovereign power. Finally, the excuse cannot be accepted that it had not noticed such activity, since every government must be in a position to know what is happening on the territory where it governs as a sovereign power. We do not believe that such acts could have occurred at all on the territory of Albania and escaped the attention of the Albanian law enforcement and security agencies. Of course, such a justification, which in some cases might even be an excuse, certainly does not come under consideration in this case. All signs indicate that this kind of activity received the spiritual, ideological and material support of official Albanian policy, and therefore one can speak in legal terms of direct intervention.

IV

It now remains to us to clarify the immediate goal of that intervention with respect to the exclusive jurisdiction (domaine reserve, domestic jurisdiction) of the victim of the intervention--the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

The basic demand in ZERI I POPULIT, which, there it is, emerged as interpreter of the disorders in Kosovo, is that Kosovo is not now a republic, and in the context of that demand there stands the complete ethnic composition of a possible republic, since that ethnic entity is now divided among three republics.

An important debate has been going on for a long time now about the scope of the state's exclusive jurisdiction, especially in the science of international law. It is, then, outside the sphere of international law, and here the state has the right to use all means which it possesses to defend and exclude anyone's state from interfering in those affairs. Consequently, this is basically the economic, political and legal order of the state.

A demand and an attempt to raise the Socialist Autonomous Province of Kosovo "to the rank of a republic" by force, which in a definite way was assisted by Albania, cannot escape condemnation as interference in Yugoslavia's internal affairs. A country's constitutional order, the organization of its government and administration, and a country's administrative division lie in the exclusive and indivisible jurisdiction of every state. This is outside the effect of international law, and any force or threat of force whatsoever in order to attain certain changes in such a state constitutes intervention.

The ultimate goal of these aspirations is very transparent, but in any case it is the result of a certain political blindness. That is, an obsession has come about to the effect that in the Yugoslav constitutional system a republic is at the same time a "state," even though it is a "self-managing democratic community," while at autonomous province is only a "democratic sociopolitical community." As the irredentists see it, the republic is granted greater legal and political autonomy as a state, including as well those rights in foreign political transactions. Out from under, as the irredentists put it, "SR [Socialist Republic] Serbia's tutelage" and set up as a republic, that is--a separate republic, Kosovo would by the nature of things be oriented in those transactions toward its neighbor--Albania, the place where the major portion of the same nationality lives.

Since in practice the elements of the statehood of the republics are stronger, especially in internal affairs, influence from outside is also easier to accomplish. This rationale counts on the fact that Yugoslavia is condemning every intervention by the center in the self-management of the sociopolitical communities, and thus the Republic of Kosovo would itself have its hands entirely free. In that context permanent infiltration from outside could favor the ultimate goal, when conditions are right, for separation in order to exercise the complete right to self-determination, which includes, according to their interpretation of the text of the Yugoslav Constitution, the right to secede.

An objective evaluation of matters from the impressions which imposed themselves thanks to the persistent and unceasing propaganda from Albania related to the so-called "historical arguments" and an effort to project the demands which at present have taken on only the public manifestation of wishes, cannot escape rendering the judgment that the constitutional order of the SFRY has been attacked by a method such as is used in practice by all who intervene. Leave to one side that Albanian propaganda refuses to grasp the fact that we set up the republics not in order to parcelize federal statehood into republic statehoods, but to develop the extragovernmental and free sphere of activity of society in such a way that it gradually overcomes the government sphere, a process in which the existing reality must, of course, be respected. Nevertheless, Albania is in a hurry, since time is not on its side, since that other sphere of the life of the Yugoslav community, ennobled by self-management as the basic social relation, will in the future reduce its chance of making the republic attractive as a state and its chance of finding an opportunity in that sociopolitical community for subversive actions of this type and with these goals. But Yugoslavia has thereby acquired the full legal basis for going to the defense of its constitutional system by appropriate measures, which are guaranteed it by international law as an inseparable right of every state. This has never been a matter of dispute down through history.

SLOVENES' ATTITUDES TOWARD NEWCOMER WORKERS SURVEYED

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian, No 1604, 27 Sep 81 pp 22-23

[Article by Svetislav Spasojevic: "Slovenia and Its Newcomers"]

[Text] No one can say with certainty how many workers from other republics there are in Slovenia today. The number mentioned by officials is "around 130 thousand," although many people say that there are even 200 thousand of them. One thing, however, is quite clear: at this time the Slovene economy could not exist without workers from the "southern republics," as is frequently said here. Many workshops, construction sites, and fields would remain empty if the "migrant workers without passports" for some reason went home. After all, these are almost a fifth of the total labor force in the Republic.

To tell the truth, the people from Bosnia and Hercegovina, Croatia, Serbia, Montenegro, and Macedonia would not get along very well without the work obtained in Slovenia. For the most part there is no employment or wages where they came from.

This says that the dilemma of who is more important to whom, and who is doing a favor for whom--the Slovenes for the "southerners," or vice versa, in fact, is an artificial one. Assistance and likewise benefit are mutually connected. Finally, this has also been confirmed by a questionnaire from the Research Center for Self-Management of the Council of the Socialist Alliance of Slovenia. We are talking about this subject, which is now being frequently discussed in Slovenia and outside it, and now and then only with the aid of emotions deprived of any facts whatsoever, with sociologist Silva Meznaric, who is responsible for research on the labor force from other republics at the above-mentioned Center. It is interesting that Meznariceva, who before this job spent a fair amount of time at the Ljubljana University working on the same subject, is also not a Slovene. She was born in Zagreb, and came to Ljubljana ten years ago, because, as she says, she was offered better working conditions, as well as some others on which she literally lives.

Still A Fair Amount of Randomness

"Slovenia, like other Yugoslav areas, has been well known for a long time for its economic emigration," says Meznariceva. "When Europe, that is the developed part of it, had mostly satisfied its needs for a cheap labor force from the less developed countries, including us, Yugoslavia even after this had a fair number of unemployed people within its borders. Then there were migrations from the southeast to the northwest of the country. The Socialist Republic of Slovenia, which itself had several tens of thousands of its people working abroad, primarily skilled and highly skilled workers, employed about a hundred thousand workers from the other republics in a very short time! Mostly unskilled ones, so Slovenia today has the worst personnel structure of those who are employed. About thirteen thousand people from the other republics came to Slovenia in 1977 and were employed. This was a record. Last year, for example, about eleven thousand arrived. At the same time, there is more and more of a return movement. I could not document this assertion now with precise numbers, but in any case they are not large."

Sociologist Meznaric notes that society has never precisely and scientifically confirmed why and how these workers from the other republics have come to slovenia how many will remain, and whether they will return and why. Everything, unfortunately, is still to a considerable extent left to chance, although both Slovenia and the other republics should take care of this. This applies primarily to Bosnia and Hercegovina, from which the most workers, 45.3 percent, have come, and Croatia with 33.9 percent of the total number of "southerners," etc. Experienced people claim that leaving for work in some Western countries is better organized than leaving for Slovenia.

What Is Bothering the Newcomers

"It seems to me that because of the frequent generalizations and the relatively "sensationalistic" treatment of the problems affecting workers from the other Yugoslav republics, we are losing sight of some basic consequences of the employment of these people."

Slovenia is not the promised land, as some people think. Most of the newcomers here are doing the hardest jobs, those avoided by Slovenes. This is why most of them are employed in hotel and restaurant work, 30.3 percent, construction, 26.7 percent (every other manual laborer is a "southerner"), transportation, 19.8 percent, forestry, 18 percent... and in industry, only 8.3 percent. Of all the workers employed in Slovenia, 18 percent are from other republics.

"The purpose of our research was primarily to show what the attitude of Slovenes employed in the economy was toward the employment of workers from other republics. We asked them why, in their opinion, workers from other republics come to work in Slovenia; whether the employment of workers from the other republics is useful for the development of Slovenia or not, and why; what we should all provide for workers from the other republics; whether the migration of workers from the other republics is a threat to Slovenes, and (if the answer is affirmative) what the threat to the Slovenes is; what characteristics Slovenes especially value in workers from the other republics, and what characteristics in workers from the other republics especially bother them."

"Exactly 41.1 percent of the respondents feel that Slovenia must in the future as well make possible the employment of workers from the other republics," says sociologist Meznariceva. "However, 28.9 percent of them opposed employment, while the rest were undecided. A third of the respondents feel that the employment of workers from the other republics is useful to Slovenia, and 33.5 percent do not know whether it is useful or not, while 20 percent feel that the employment of these workers is harmful to Slovenia's development!"

The data on why the employment of workers from the other republics is "useful" or "not useful" for the development of Slovenia are particularly interesting. The respondents feel that the employment is useful for the development of Slovenia because Slovenes will not do difficult manual work. Furthermore, they feel that Slovenia does not have enough of a labor force, and that the peoples are thus becoming closer to each other, while the workers from the other republics are assisting in the development and construction of Slovenia.

"The participants in the questionnaire feel that the employment of workers from the other republics is not useful because a less skilled labor force is arriving, and the newcomers are taking jobs away from Slovenes. Some individuals cite as a reason the threat to Slovene culture," says Meznariceva. "Over 44 percent of the respondents, however, feel that people from other republics in Slovenia should first be provided with an apartment, then the acquisition of qualifications, as well as an opportunity to bring their families."

"These data are a reflection of a state of affairs that should not be treated and depicted in a sensationalistic manner, or only "socially," Meznariceva says categorically. "Views on the arrival, characteristics, and residence of workers from the other republics are very different among employed Slovenes. This is why it is impossible to assert with certainty what Slovenes really think and what attitudes they have toward workers from other republics in their vicinity. The following, however, is known: there are no indications that among those employed in the Slovene economy it is possible to observe any national intolerance toward workers from the other republics. This is a result of the questionnaire in which we have no reason not to believe."

The Prospects Until 2000

The Draft Plan for the development of Slovenia until the year 2000 also mentions the labor force and the employment of workers from the other republics.

"What is important, but is frequently neglected in development models, is the fact that Slovenia is one of the strongest immigrant areas in Europe, actually dependent even in the projections on importing a labor force from the other republics," says Meznariceva. "In Slovenia, an increase of eight to nine thousand a year in the labor force from the nonagricultural population is planned until 1985. The requirements, however, will be somewhere around twelve thousand workers a year. The shortage in the labor force will not be able to be compensated for from our own labor potential."

Our interlocutor states that these data are over a year old and that they are taken from a study by Comrade Dof Vogelnik. Things are no longer the same. It is now being asserted here more and more loudly that in the future Slovenia will be able to satisfy its own requirements for a labor force by itself. This means that it will not need 12 thousand workers a year.

The time when it was possible to come by train from Tuzla, Zenica, Bitolj, Krusevac, or any other place throughout Yugoslavia to Ljubljana, Celj, Jesenice, or Kobaride, and find a job over the weekend, is behind us. Is it really that way, or do some people want it to be that way, or are they only afraid that something like that might happen? An answer to these questions entails the new and thorough analyses required by this serious subject. It is obvious, however, that for the unemployed, Slovenia is no longer the promised land.

DEVELOPMENT OF USSR-GDR INTELLIGENCE OPERATIONS IN EGYPT REVIEWED

Bonn DIE WELT in German 15 Oct 81 p 7

['Background' feature article by Werner Kahl: "Moscow's Tenacious Struggle for Cairo: KGB Tries Again and Again--From Camel Corps to GDR Agents--Six Spectacular Expulsions Since 1925"]

[Text] The Kremlin is not giving up in Cairo. After the most recent expulsion of their diplomats and agents operating under diplomatic passports shortly before Sadat's assassination, the Soviets are now turning the tables and loudly accusing the United States of interference in Egypt's internal affairs. Despite six spectacular expulsions by Egyptian authorities in the last 60 years, always with the hope of being rid of the Soviets, Moscow is again authorizing its fifth column to gain a foothold on the Nile River.

As early as the beginning of the 1920's, the first secret "door openers" of Soviet intelligence were found among the members of the Camel Corps astride Mehari dromedaries, the white riding camels of the Egyptian border patrol. Stalin's subversive GPU apparatus channeled his prospective agents across the vast, exposed and almost uncontrollable desert borders into the Nile valleys. The ideological battle for Cairo had begun. The Soviet regime was quick to recognize Egypt's importance as the key position on the Africa-Asia land bridge and on the shortest sea route between Europe and India. The Suez Canal became the kernel between the millstones of world politics. And while the Soviets sought bases in Egypt, at the same time they opposed the British as the main enemy of the time in the Near East.

Kremlin influence agents came as Russian emigrants by train via Berlin to Genoa, where they boarded ships for Alexandria, or they traveled to Egypt via Turkey and Athens as technicians and merchants. Sovtorg, the Soviet shipping company, transported money and material goods in support of the communist cells in the country.

In 1920, the Russian Joseph Rosenthal founded the Egyptian Socialist Party. The Moscow CPSU dispatched Comintern agents Krauss and Goldenberg to lead the party. In 1922, General Secretary Mahmud Hosny el Orabi studied the tactics and strategy of Stalinism in Moscow. His route, the same as that once taken by his instructor Lenin, was by way of Berlin. After his return, El Orabi showed his colors: From that time on the Socialists called themselves the Communist Party of Egypt.

But the comrades were overly eager to upset the Egyptian social order. In 1924, their appeals to workers to strike alarmed officials. A year later came the first major expulsion of Soviet citizens. Most of the foreigners then arrested under suspicion of planning a coup d'etat were of Russian origin.

The history of Soviet-Egyptian relations is a chronicle of scandal. It documents the constant intervention by Moscow in the internal affairs of the kingdom and the Republic of Egypt that followed it. For example, as the Egyptians determined in 1925, the "Argos" trade enterprise founded in 1924 was a firm owned by Soviet intelligence. On the list for the first expulsion wave was the name of Argos manager Lazarus Tepper, alias Glaser.

The Soviets did not give up. In 1926, they established the "Russian-Turkish Trading Company." Intelligence officer Y. G. Semeniuk became general director. With an American passport he was able to gain access almost everywhere. He disappeared without a trace in 1928, and the enterprise declared bankruptcy.

But the Soviets had already taken precautions. A year earlier a wool trading company had been established in Cairo. But by 1929 its head, Russian Nikolay Vasilyev, had already been expelled for conspiratorial activities.

Under cover of a complex relief organization for Armenia, communist intelligence set up a large network. HOG, the relief organization, established branches everywhere in the country. It sought support among influential Egyptians in clubs and societies. In 1932, the agent Fahan from Assadourian, an Armenian in Moscow's service, was sentenced to 3 years in prison as a potential subversive, and in 1935 he was expelled along with other foreigners.

The threat to Egypt from a communist-inspired overthrow attempt, seen by security officials in a study prior to World War II, was thought to come especially from Syria and Palestine. In the 1930's, Comintern agents were increasingly infiltrated into Egypt by way of Greece, Turkey, France, Lebanon and precisely these countries, Syria and Palestine. In return for large bribes, Soviet intelligence hired Orientals as secret agents and silent agents for "Day X," the date of the planned overthrow. The Soviets wooed orthodox Muslims most intensively, but attempts to infiltrate their circles were unsuccessful, with but a few exceptions. The Kremlin wooers were clumsy and brutal, according to an Egyptian situation report.

It is therefore understandable that, following Stalin's death in the mid-1950's, the Soviet intelligence agency KGB and the military intelligence service GRU tried to exploit the traditionally good relations between Egyptians and Germans. So they had the GDR State Security Service, not previously compromised on the Nile, work for them.

The officials from East Berlin, initially as welcome in Cairo as the West Germans, were more effective and craftier than the Soviets. GDR Ministry for State Security technicians, according to Egyptian security, in the late 1960's made "bug shops" (jargon for mini-spies) out of offices all the way up to the presidential palace. When in the early 1970's the Egyptian counterintelligence service recognized the true doings of the "technical advisors" from East Berlin, it came to a break. The Egyptian government once again resorted to mass expulsions in order to be rid of the Soviets and their satellites.

The latest affair, which became known a few days ago, once again incriminated the Kremlin's intelligence service and its water boys in East Berlin. Three KGB agents, including a woman and a man from the GDR, were arrested in Zurich and Hamburg. They worked in the Syria-Lebanon operations area and had orders to work to restore the tattered Soviet network of agents in Egypt and to throttle pro-Western influences.

"The Soviets," said President Sadat shortly before his assassination, "are preparing for a presence on the south Mediterranean coast for the duration of the next 50 years." In his last interview he declared in Cairo: "I accuse the KGB and Qadhdafi...."

BIOGRAPHIC PROFILE OF DEPUTY MINISTERS OF HEALTH

[Article: "Newly Appointed Deputy Ministers of Public Health"]

[Text] Professor Lyubomir Mikhaylov Shindarov, Honored Scientist

Born 4 November 1920 in Vratsa. Graduate of Medical Faculty in Sofia in 1943. Served first as rural district physician, later participated in Patriotic War as assistant commander. From 1946 to 1952 was a military physician, specialized in microbiology, graduated from Military Medical Academy in the USSR. Next was deputy production director at NIEM [Scientific Research Institute of Epidemiology and Microbiology], chief of republic epidemic control station, senior instructor in the microbiology department at ISUL [Institute for Specialization and Advanced Study of Physicians]. In 1957 elected docent and in 1963 professor of virology. From 1967 to date he has headed up the virology department. Has been chief of the Science Department in the Ministry of Public Health, rector of ISUL, director of the Institute of Contagious and Parasitic Diseases. He is a member of the Presidium of the Medical Academy.

Prof Dr Shindarov is a candidate of medical sciences and the author of more than 100 scientific publications in the field of virology. His scientific contributions are connected with the first etiological proofs in our country of several rickettsioses (Marseilles fever, Q fever and virus diseases (lymphocytic choriomeningitis, various nosological units caused by Coxsackie and ECHO viruses etc.), research on the natural foci of rickettsioses and viral infections, development of a laboratory method of studying virus reproduction and genetics, discovery of new virus inhibitors etc. He is a rationalizer and an inventor with inventions patented abroad. He is chairman of the EMVIPI [expansion unknown] Scientific Medical Society. He is past president of the International Society for the Study of Contagious and Parasitic Diseases and is at present vice president of the International Federation for Contagious and Parasitic Diseases.

Prof Dr L. Shindarov was a member of RMS [Workers' Youth Union] and BONSS [Bulgarian National Students Union] before 9 September 1944 and has been a BCP member since 1944. He is renowned as an active fighter against fascism and capitalism. He holds the orders of "Red Banner of Labor" and "Ninth of September 1944" first class and has been awarded the title of "Honored Scientist."

Dr Mil'o Tsvetkov Milev, Honored Physician

Born 24 October 1931 in the village of Dolen, Blagoevgrad Okrug, into the family of a teacher; active participant in the struggle against fascism and capitalism.

Completed his higher medical education at VMI [Higher Medical Institute], Sofia, in 1956. Served as physician in the village of Yonkovo, Razgrad Okrug; then as chief of health department in the city of Isperikh, and later as chief physician of the unified health service in the same city. In 1967 he was brought into service in the Ministry of Public Health as chief specialist; next was chief of the Secretariat Department, and from 1974 on was promoted to secretary general of the Ministry of Public Health. He specialized in public health organization in Moscow.

As scientist, student and physician, Dr Mil'o Milev has participated actively in sociopolitical life. He was a member of RMS and in 1958 was accepted as a BCP member. He has been organizational secretary of the GK [City Committee] of DKMS [Dimitrov Communist Youth Union] in the city of Trun, secretary of the Komsomol Society in the Medical Faculty, and deputy secretary of the PB [Political Bureau] in the Ministry of Public Health, and at present he is a member of the institutional party committee.

Dr Mil'o Milev holds the "People's Order of Labor"--gold and the "Red Banner of Labor," and has been awarded the title of "Honored Physician."

Senior Science Associate, Dr Chudomir Ivanov Merdzhanov, Doctor of Medical Sciences

Born 27 October 1930 in the village of Iskra, Plovdiv Okrug, into a teacher's family. Completed his higher medical education at VMI, Plovdiv, in 1954. Served for 11 years at the Kurdzhali Psychoneurological Hospital, first as chief physician and later as department head. Since 1965 has been senior science associate at the Clinical Neurophysiology Laboratory of the Scientific Institute of Neurology, Psychiatry and Neurosurgery. Since 1979 has been chief of the Therapy Department of the Presidium of the Medical Academy.

As scientist, student, physician and scientific worker, Senior Science Associate and Dr Chudomir Iv. Merdzhanov has participated actively in sociopolitical life. He has been a member of RMS since 1945 and of the BCP since 1964. He has been a member of the students' committee of EMOS [High School Students Youth Union], secretary of the students' scientific society, chairman of a trade-union committee, member and secretary of a party bureau.

Senior Science Associate and Dr Chudomir Merdzhanov defended his candidate's dissertation as department head in 1964, his doctoral dissertation in 1978. He qualified as university lecturer in 1972. He is the author of 90 scientific publications, most of them in the area of the biological approach to psychiatry.

LIVING CONDITIONS OF SOLDIERS IMPROVED

Sofia NARODNA ARMIYA in Bulgarian 28 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Lt Gen German Germanov: "Implementation of Party's Social Policy--Constant Meeting of Soldiers' Material Needs"]

[Text] The Bulgarian Communist Party'a Arpil line affirmed the consistent practical implementation of the principle: "Everything in the name of man, everything for the good of man." This Leninist principle of the BCP Central Committee has become the main theoretical and practical basis of the activity of BNA [Bulgarian People's Army] commanders, political organizers and administrative elements and services constantly to meet soldiers' material needs. The December program for raising the living standard of the people is of paramount importants for us. This program, formulated by the BCP Central Committee under the leadership of Comrade T. Zhivkov, has become the political, ideological and material basis of our effort to upgrade the material living conditions and medical care of the BNA. In his report delivered at the December plenum of the BCP Central Committee in 1972 Comrade Zhivkov substantiated scientifically and in reasoned fashion the necessity of a new approach to urgent social problems and to the study, planning and application of scientifically grounded norms in solving the problems of meeting the people's needs. On the basis of this programmatic document and under the leadership of member of the Political Bureau of the BCP Central Committee and Minister of National Defense, Army General Dobri Dzhurov, the main approaches, problems and measures were clarified and concretely defined. Wide-scale organizational and political work was launched for the improvement of military living conditions. We received and are receiving great assistance and aid along this line from a number of the country's ministries and central departments.

Thanks to the paternal concern of the BCP Central Committee, a number of problems with the ration, clothing allowance and medical care of the BNA have received new and first-rate solution. Special attention has been given to improving the nourishing rationing of personnel, this being a basic factor on which their physical, moral and psychological stability and fitness depend. In the period since the April plenum (1956) the ration tables for various categories of service personnel have been improved and bettered quantitatively and qualitatively six times. Our ration tables now approximate the upper limit of the optimum norms of scientific rationing. The proportion of animal protein--a basic cost index--has been increased nearly threefold as compared with 1956. Material and technical messing facilities are constantly being improved. Every year significant financial and material resources are allotted for the construction of new, and the reconstruction of existing mess halls and for outfitting them with up-to-date food-preparation equipment, plates, dishes and inventory. Systematic care is taken to upgrade the training and qualification of the personnel working in this sector. As a result, the quality and diversity of the ration and the standards of service have been improved appreciably.

There has been an increase in the efforts of commanders, political organizers and administrative workers to perform the tasks, set by the BCP Central Committee and Comrade T. Zhivkov, of improving the public dining system. As compared with 1956, the number of public dining establishments has more than doubled. One hundred percent of the extended service men and current servicemen have now been brought into the public dining service. Additional potential reserves for continuously cutting the cost of food are being sought and used. In the past two years 50 percent of the dining rooms and 68 percent of those taking their meals there have benefited from the reduction in the net cost of food.

In the Bulgarian People's Army a comprehensive program has been devised and successfully implemented for achieving the system, devised by Comrade T. Zhivkov, of self-sufficiency of the population in fruits, vegetables, meat, milk and fish from city or village systems. During the Seventh Five-Year Plan the yield of agricultural output produced on military farms grew 35 percent and during the Eighth Five-Year Plan will increase 50 percent. The personnel of the BNA is now provided every day with large quantities of fresh foodstuffs, thus relieving the national economy of the burden of supplying them.

At present we are working successfully to cut the cost of food in public dining facilities, using for the purpose some of the net income received from the activity of the military farms.

The BCP Central Committee under the leadership of Comrade T. Zhivkov is also taking ceaseless pains to provide service personnel with their clothing allowance. The allocation for the clothing allowance of personnel has been increased several fold. The schedule of clothing for officers and noncommissioned officers has been expanded. The quality indices of several basic items of clothing have been improved. A quality leap in the clothing allowance of military personnel has been made by introducing a holiday parade uniform and a sports outfit. The amount of underwear has been increased and its quality significantly improved etc. The post-exchange system currently in operation is creating conditions for providing regular and higher-grade service to personnel.

Requirements in the area of BNA medical care are being enforced creatively, too. The improved hygienic and living conditions in the barracks and the concern of commanders and medical workers for the health of service personnel have resulted in a toughening of their physical development and state of health. The hospital system is continuously being improved. Military hospitals have been converted into polyclinical medical facilities with capabilities of rendering all kinds of skilled care and in-patient treatment. The VVMI [Vissh Voennomeditsinski Institut; Higher Military Medical Institute] has a special place in the medical care system. Fruit of the April plenum and staffed with highly trained and skilled specialists, the VVMI is the key medical installation in the BNA, enjoying great prestige and confidence in the country. Great advances have been made in the area of sanatoriums and rest facilities. New modern sanatoriums and rest homes have been built which create very good conditions for the treatment, rest and recreation of service personnel and their families. At the initiative of the medical service, new forms of rest and recreation have been introduced into the BNA such as summer holiday excursions, camping at the seaside, short rest periods etc.

Recently the quartermaster service marked its 25th anniversary. Set up in the year of the April plenum, under the paternal care of the BCP Central Committee it has changed from a primitive enterprise into a large-scale modern economic organization with stable quantity and quality indices. Of extremely great significance for the development of the enterprise are the theoretical and practical studies Comrade Zhivkov has made of the concentration, specialization and intensification of production, of improvement in the planned management of the economy and the socialist organization of labor, of the consistent application of the new economic mechanism in all spheres of social life etc. All production links in the enterprise have now been organized as brigades with profit-and-loss accounting on the basis of a normed planned task. A number of questions relating to the organization of production, manufacturing processes and managerial activity are being worked out and adopted at an up-to-date level. Concern for the social development of workers and employees is constantly increasing.

Hard work has been done and significant advances made in mechanizing loading and unloading operations in the BNA. Heavy physical labor during materials handling is being resolutely replaced by the adoption of modern heavy-duty hoisting and conveying equipment, which to a great extent also raises the combat readiness of the units.

In our many-sided activity to meet the material needs of soldiers we have always been guided by the party requirements that we improve the approach, style and method of work of personnel of all ranks. The main thing characterizing the style of the numerous contingent of personnel who directly organize the material and medical backup of the BNA is their endeavor, by employing a programmatic and precisely targeted approach, to fulfill their tasks comprehensively and in first-rate fashion and make optimum use of all potential reserves for improving military living conditions. Planning effectiveness is constantly being improved and enhanced. Plans for the supply of materiel are prepared on the basis of thorough forecasting and study of the needs of the troops and the possibilities of realization. We strive continuously to intensify control, especially preventive control, and stringency as regards the fulfillment of assigned tasks and planned measures so that the fullest use can be made of the vast resources which our government allots for the support of the BNA. We are paying more attention to the immediate job in the local units where the tasks are performed. We endeavor to help them apply the right style and method of work and a high criterion in their own activity and that of the collectives subordinated to them, as well as continuously study the needs of the people and wage a campaign for the practical fulfillment of their tasks.

The Twelfth Party Congress assigned tasks on a larger scale in the area of social policy, implementation of which will raise the living standard of the people and personnel of the BNA to a new and higher level.

HIGHEST FEMALE CPCZ OFFICIAL ON EQUALITY OF WOMEN

Prague ZIVOT STRANY in Czech No 20, 21 Sep 81 pp 7-9

[Article by Marie Kabrhelova, member of the Secretariat of the CPCZ Central Committee, president of the Central Committee of the Czechoslovak Union of Women: "Convincing Proof of Women's Equality"]

[Text] From the first steps of the building of socialism to the current era of building developed socialism, the development of our socialist society has been distinctly marked by the active participation of women. It is no exaggeration to say that our society would not have achieved its current level if it were not for the millions of women who helped shape its life in every area.

Experience itself attests best to the fact that socialism is the first and only system able to guarantee and continuously develop full, consistent and quite specific equality of women, and that only socialism offers women the opportunity to be equal partners in producing all the values--material and spiritual--which socialist society creates for human happiness and welfare.

The effort to give women full equality in every area represents an indivisible part of the policy of our communist party--a policy based on the scientific foundations of the Marxist-Leninist theory. It is no coincidence that in their theoretical studies and practical programs the founders of scientific socialism, Marx and Engels, devoted particular attention to the question of women, to women's place and mission in society, and that they regarded political work among women and the exigency of their equality as an indispensable part of the revolutionary impact on the masses of workers.

In every socialist country where the Marxist-Leninist revolutionary parties generate the moving force, practice and experience fully confirm that Lenin's views on women's problems are absolutely valid and always timely. Lenin expanded and specified Marx' and Engels' ideas for the conditions of the socialist revolution and for the building of socialism. In his discussion with Klara Zetkin he said: "We cannot achieve the dictatorship of the proletariat without millions of women; we cannot build communism without them. We must seek a way to them; we must examine many things and try many things in order to find that way." Lenin often stressed that true equality of women cannot be achieved by a singular act of legislation but by a long-range process primarily involving women's integration, on the basis of equality, in the labor process, in the transformation of society, and mass-scale participation of women in political action and in the management of every area of social life.

The policies of the CPCZ always adhered to these principles; on the one hand, they endeavor, according to the possibilities and the level of development achieved by society, to create preconditions enabling increasingly better coordination of women's mission as mothers with their participation in the labor process and in social life, furthermore, to inspire political activity among women, to make them better aware of their vital interest in a comprehensive development of our socialist society, and to enhance their social activity.

Of course, these principles were shaken during certain periods. During the social crisis of 1968-1969 they became an object of disparagement in the political program of the antisocialist forces, which was evident, among other things, from the fact that women's participation in representative bodies and organs of social organizations associated in the National Front was drastically reduced during those years.

The principles of the Marxist-Leninist approach to the women's question were thoroughly restored when the new party leadership under Comrade Gustav Husak came to the fore. In his address to the statewide conference of the National Front in January 1971, Comrade Gustav Husak formulated the principles of our party's position. Among other things he said:

"The distinctive share of women in the development of society in our country is well known. Women deserve our profound respect for their role as mothers and for the upbringing of their children; however, women's participation in the management of our society, state and economy has been intolerably inadequate even in comparison with the period of 1945-1948 and with the years that followed...This has been explained in discussions by numerous objective as well as subjective causes...I do not intend to simplify these problems, nevertheless, it is obviously imperative that in the National Front and all its organizations we proceed from general reflections to specific actions. Everywhere in that area, on every level of the management, in every plant, in towns and villages, in offices and schools, we must deal with one problem after another, so that more women relatively soon take part in management and so that this helps create better preconditions for upgrading women's qualification, education and training for their important role and tutelage."

As a matter of fact, this orientation came to a full focus as early as the 14th CPCZ Congress and has been consistently implemented in practice.

It is to the credit of our party's political program that the role of women in the management and administration of our society is steadily upgraded and expanded. This is clearly evident from every aspect of our social life. Let us take as an example women's participation in the activities of representative bodies on all levels. The present situation will become particularly clear in comparison with the past or with current opportunities open to women in the capitalist countries.

Although before Munich our republic used to be one of the most advanced states in the world and liked to boast about its "superior" democracy, equal rights for women were out of the question. Discrimination against women existed everywhere--from their admission to education and training, through their opportunities in the workplace and rewards for performance up to women's participation in management, not to mention job opportunities for women. Throughout the entire era of the bourgeois republic, women were represented in the National Assembly of the CSR by 2 to 4 percent, i.e., by 6 to 12 women out of 300 representatives.

The situation existing in even the most advanced capitalist countries is similar. Even the highest representation of women in the legislative body of a given country at this particular time (for example, in Denmark or Norway) does not exceed 15 percent and in their overwhelming majority it is in the 2 to 5 percent range, as for example in the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, Belgium. Although women represent the majority of voters in the United States, their representation in federal and local administrative bodies is no more than 5 percent. Recent official data demonstrate that among the 73,714 representatives of elective bodies in Japan there are only 762 women.

On the other hand, the steadily rising participation of women in representative bodies on all levels in the socialist CSSR is typical for our developing socialist democracy, as convincingly documented by the following data.

Before the 1971 elections there were 18.3 percent women in the Federal Assembly of the CSSR, after the 1971 elections as many as 25.7 percent, after the 1976 elections 28.2 percent, and after the elections this year 28.8 percent.

The following data illustrate the composition of the Czech National Council: before the 1971 elections 13.4 percent women, after the 1971 elections 25 percent, after the 1976 elections 27.5 percent, and after this year's elections 28 percent women.

In the Slovak National Council: before the 1971 elections 14.8 percent women, after the 1971 elections 26 percent, after the 1976 elections 28 percent, and after this year's elections 29.3 percent women.

In kraj national committees: before 1971, 21.9 percent women, after 1971 elections 30 percent, after the 1976 elections 34.2 percent, and this year 35.2 percent women.

In okres national committees: before 1971, 22 percent women, after the 1971 elections 29 percent, after the 1976 elections 33.3 percent and after this year's elections 34.4 percent women.

In local and municipal national committees: before 1971, 18.3 percent women, after 1971 elections 21 percent, after the 1976 elections 29.3 percent, and at present 30.8 percent women.

In absolute figures, this means that in this year's elections to representative bodies on all levels a total of 60,866 women were elected among the 197,165 representatives, or 30.87 percent. Naturally, even after the elections more women are joining in the work of commissions and aktivs of national committees, citizens committees, etc. There are more than 20,000 women functionaries.

Naturally, their involvement is not reserved to representative bodies alone. Women are well represented as officials in social organizations of the National Front. More than 700,000 women are serving as officials of the ROH [Revolutionary Trade Union Movement], the largest mass organization of our working people; this is more than their 43 percent share in the membership of the ROH. Teenage girls and young women participate in a meaningful way in the activities of the SSM [Union of Socialist Youth] and Pioneer organizations of the SSM. More than 43 percent of the total SSM membership are girls whose representation in elective offices of the SSM amounts to more than 45 percent. Others serve as leaders of various hobby or arts and crafts groups, readers clubs, and so on. Even more girls are active in the Pioneer organization of the SSM--over 80 percent are instructors of Pioneer troops, almost 75 percent are troop leaders, and more than 80 percent are group leaders.

Analogical situations exist in other social organizations, especially the Czechoslovak Union of Physical Training, the Czechoslovak-Soviet Friendship League, the Rifle Squad, Red Cross, Union for Cooperation with the Army, and in cooperative and other organizations. It is self-evident that several thousands of functionaries are involved in the aktiv of our women's organization, the Czechoslovak Women's Union.

As for managerial capacities in every field (industry, agriculture, education, health care, culture, adult education, national committees, social organizations, etc.), 25 percent of women are leaders of work teams, which means that every fourth of all such workers is a woman. However, few women in that number have attained the top ranks in industrial management.

Thus, in their daily life hundreds of thousands of women are acquiring comprehensive political education--the school of socialist democracy. In every area of life and work of our socialist society women participate in the administration of public affairs with profound interest and enthusiasm. Women's organizational talent, determination, sense of proportion and understanding of practical and actual needs of our society find their application in this work to our common advantage. Thus, women are participating in various ways in the planning of operations and concepts for the building of socialism in communities and cities, in the development of plants, enterprises, institutions, in dealing with economic problems, general social programs, culture, education, health care, trade, services, etc.

Thanks to the goal-oriented Marxist-Leninist political program of our communist party, women's participation in the administration of our society has acquired a mass character.

It is significant that in their overwhelming majority women functionaries are proving their mettle in their offices, as objectively confirmed not only by their achievements but also by public opinion gathered by extensive polls conducted by public opinion research. Thus, for instance, the Institute for Research of Public Opinion very thoroughly polled citizen opinion on women's participation in our public life. The responses were unambiguously in favor of women. More than 90 percent of the respondents think that women have demonstrated their competence in public offices. Only 4 percent of the respondents made negative assessments. This confirms the good performance of women in our public life as well as the acceptance of the attitude that women's participation in administration will be further enhanced. The polls indicate that public activity of women is an important asset for our society and that most of our citizens regard women as equal and appreciate their public activity. And finally, this demonstrates that much of the prejudice against women in public life has been overcome in the minds of our people.

The experience of several generations of Czechoslovak women has convincingly shown that the political program of the communist party had always been very narrowly linked with goal-oriented efforts to give women real freedom and full equality and to offer them a dignified place in our society.

The report of the Central Committee presented at the 16th CPCZ Congress states, among other things: "Women's equality in our society is one of the generally recognized accomplishments of socialism. Nevertheless, this principle cannot be translated into reality all by itself. Various prejudices from the past must be overcome even here and woman's social role must be further enhanced." This is a clear directive primarily for communist functionaries in every area and on every level.

The interests and needs of our society demand that women of all ages participate in every area and on every level of management and that a harmonious balance between mature experience and youthful enthusiasm be further maintained. For instance, we consider it desirable that before young women become absorbed by family duties, they receive sensitive guidance in their places of work and have an opportunity to gain certain experience, not only to improve their qualifications, but also to generate feelings of self-fulfillment; during that period they should undergo training which will beneficially affect their future political and social activity, particularly when their children are a little older.

Furthermore, we must constantly probe whether women are appointed to managerial capacities, especially in the economy, to a degree commensurate with their experience, education and qualification. Our state has every right to feel proud that after elementary education about 46 percent of teenage girls continue their study in selective high schools and more than 42 percent in vocational schools; at present girls constitute 61 percent of the students in academic high schools and more than 56 percent of all students in secondary vocational schools; as for higher education, the share of female students is 62 percent in universities and colleges and more than 21 percent in technological institutes. If this enormous potential of schooling and training passes muster, the question is whether it is always fully utilized or whether the unjustified biases against women's abilities, particularly in our national economy, are no longer in evidence. In my opinion, it is a fact that women do not always hold positions equal to their administrative skills and aptitude (training, interhuman relations, experience, creativity, etc.). In this respect we often encounter certain managers who consider a woman of about 50 much too old for a managerial position. This kind of simplification embitters women. If some men at the age of 50 or over can enjoy every potential for a successful career in management, the same prerogative must apply for women. After all, such generalizations are refuted by the experience of our national committees where most of the women elected to the office of deputy chairperson or secretary belong precisely in that age category. The interest of our entire society demands that more women serve in managerial positions, especially in the industry, according to the directive by the 16th CPCZ Congress which is a challenge to us communists.

The positive achievements of the CPCZ political program concerning women are enormous. The position, the opportunities and the comprehensive development of the personality of Czechoslovak women offer solid proof of the advantages of realistic socialism and serve as examples and models for the progressive women in the capitalist and developing world who are now waging difficult class struggle for their rights. Therefore, we communists must make every effort to intensify and enhance in the future the share of our women in management in every area of our social life in the best interest of our entire socialist society.

COLLEGE TENDENCIES, DROP IN CP MEMBERSHIP CRITICIZED

Prague UCITELSKE NOVINY in Czech 8 Oct 81 pp 1, 3, 4

[Text of speech by CPCZ Central Committee Secretary, Josef Havlin, in Nitra, date not given]

[Excerpts] Esteemed comrades, CPCZ congresses have always been of great importance for the party and for our entire society. They set forth the party program for the coming period, as well as ways and means of its implementation. This was also the case of the recent 16th CPCZ Congress. It outlined demanding tasks for all sectors of social activity, including the sphere of education. It is our duty to exert all our forces toward its implementation. In this manner we will best contribute to the realization of great, and at the same time most humane, goals inscribed in the program of the communist movement, to making socialism--already a world system--become even stronger and more powerful, to see that it attract additional adherents, co-combatants against backwardness, against the warmongering forces of imperialism, against persecution and exploitation, for progress and peace throughout the world.

Our people are dedicated to socialism, to the communist party, they have deeply rooted internationalist sentiments, and are fully aware of their responsibilities stemming from this position. We are peace-loving people; however, we are determined to defend at all times the results of our work to date and all that was left to us by generations past. All these are indelible values and certainties of which we are proud and which we pass on to the coming generation.

Imperialism, especially at the present time, uses very devious and carefully planned methods. It has at its disposal great material and technical resources. It exploits the modern findings of science and technology for its power-hungry aims, for influencing the minds and actions of people. Well-adapted demagogy, presented on a silver platter, affects people, especially when they lack other truthful and objective information.

In the period between the 15th and 16th CPCZ congresses, our higher education registered unprecedented development. The number of students in all forms of study rose from 151,282 in 1975 to 193,000 in the school year 1980/81. The teacher corps was expanded and its quality improved. Through purposeful cadre policy, we have achieved a turn in the development of educational staffs. During the past 5 years, we have appointed 635 full and 2,081 associate professors. The Institutes of Marxism-Leninism were stabilized and their new cadre staffing was basically completed. The overall social authority of higher schools has increased, in recognition of their role as important political institutions, centers of science and high levels of education. The higher school must, in the true sense of the word, become the school of quality, effectiveness, and modernization, on the basis of socialist principles and Marxist-Leninist ideology.

Comrades, for a successful mastering of all the tasks stemming from the 16th CPCZ Congress line, which we will be confronting in higher education in the coming period, it is first essential to purposefully intensify the leading role of the party and improve its political, educational and organizational work. We have good prerequisites for this. Party organs and organizations in higher schools and faculties today have a substantial membership base at their disposal.

The overall share of party members and candidates among higher school teachers in all-state average fluctuates at about 40 percent which represents about 7,000 communists. This is a great force. What is gratifying is that the membership base among teachers has grown about 10 percent during the last 10 years. As a result of higher education development and care by party organs to strengthen its cadres, hundreds of new teachers come to higher schools, of whom most are party members.

What is unfavorable, however, is that the membership base among students has registered a declining trend in the last 3 years. In comparison with 1977 when student membership reached 6.7 percent, at the end of last year it was 5.7 percent. A serious problem is that there are great and unexplained differences between individual institutions of higher learning. Thus, for example, while the Pedagogical Department in Ceske Budejovice has a student membership base of 1.82 percent, the Pedagogical Department in Pilsen shows 9.7 percent, Charles University in Prague 10.89 percent, and Komensky University in Bratislava 5.6 percent. The all-state average of student party membership has not been reached by higher schools in the North Bohemian, South Bohemian, East Bohemian, South Moravian, East Slovakian krajs and the city of Bratislava.

Good cadre policy and admission of higher school students as party members and candidates will always remain one of the principal tasks of party organizations in higher schools. This work will be increasingly more demanding, especially because there will be increasingly fewer students who enter higher education as party candidates and, on the other hand, most secondary school graduates with matriculation certificates entering higher education will be 18 years old. The party organizations must base their work on this simple fact. They must care for the future candidates and members from the student ranks, starting with the first day they enter the higher school. The party organizations must get to know them with respect to their academic work, activity in social organizations, family background, they must entrust them with political, albeit low-level, tasks and, based on their performance, make a judgment on their acceptability for party candidate or member.

More Aggressive Implementation of Party Policy

In resolving this serious problem, district and department party committees must consider that higher school graduates enter not only the most varied spheres of our social life throughout the republic, but also that it is desirable that they come to their place of employment, to a greater measure than heretofore, as already party members or candidates. This problem assumes extraordinary political significance especially with those higher school graduates who in their future work will influence people's thinking and actions, thus also implementation of CPCZ policy. Here we mean, above all, teachers, physicians, artists, journalists and lawyers, without ignoring the growing importance of technological and natural sciences. Obviously, we cannot lower the requirements contained in the party statutes, or neglect the proven practice of recommendation for party candidacy or membership of the best students by organizations of the Socialist Youth Union.

Experiences of many party organizations at higher schools confirm that the best results are achieved when we succeed in fully involving party members and candidates in the fulfillment of prescribed tasks, when we consistently apply the Leninist method of criticism and self-criticism, when we create an atmosphere for substantive and principled assessment of shortcomings, their causes, as well as of new tasks.

An important duty of party organizations in higher schools is not to ignore justified critical voices on the quality and organization of instruction, educational work in student hostelries, comments on management, etc. In order that party organizations, along with the management of the school, department, or chair, may react in a timely manner and resolve upcoming problems, its members must be interested in and know the views of officials, as well as students. Only a good grasp of the situation enables the party organization to focus correctly its political work, provide incentive for initiative and activism of people on behalf of party policy, publicize good experiences, and draw appropriate conclusions from failure to fulfill assigned tasks. In this conceptual orientation of activity, we must see the foundation of mass political, agitation, and organizational work of the party.

The quality of party work must not be judged on quantitative indicators alone, such as the number of activities and participation in them, number of pledges, etc. Performance effectiveness of each basic party organization, every party group, as well as every member, must be measured by real results, the extent and depth of their impact on the operation of the school. Ability and political maturity of each party member must be assessed in concrete tasks. For these reasons, it would be greatly beneficial to control, for example, fulfillment of concrete tasks prescribed during the interviews in connection with the exchange of party cards.

In recent years, many schools or the University Night Classes of Marxism-Leninism have established independent classes or seminars for higher school instructors. From the point of view of preparing these teachers, this form appears most desirable and merits expansion in all institutions of higher learning. The adopted resolutions on party work in higher schools expect that all teachers will gradually become graduates of the University Night Classes of Marxism-Leninism, or later postgraduate studies at the Higher School of Politics of the Central Committee. Naturally, we must not interpret this correct principle as applying even to those who had already achieved a higher level of party education, or themselves lecture in the University Night Classes of Marxism-Leninism.

Constant attention must especially be devoted by the party organizations to the selection, education, placement, and evaluation of the work of pedagogical and scientific workers. Together with rectors and deans, the party organization must guarantee that all actions concerning people, including nomination procedures, are fully in consonance with the criteria of party cadre policy. All types of subjectivism cause great damage and undermine the authority of the party, as well as the management of the school. The magnitude of the tasks does not allow us to lower the demands on the political, pedagogical, professional, or moral qualities of teachers recommended for appointment to the post of full or associate professor.

We must eliminate from the life of the higher schools with far greater decisiveness all that is obsolete, all that deters us from a faster and more consistent advance in implementing the educational policy of the party formulated in the already-mentioned party documents.

We will focus the attention of all those who are responsible for the correct functioning of higher schools on responding convincingly, through everyday honest and tireless labor, to that which the 16th CPCZ Congress addressed directly to the institutions of higher learning.

For it was not accidental that the report the Central Committee addressed to the congress, contained the following passage: "The demand levied on our higher schools is growing significantly. The ministries of education and higher education management must not for a single moment lose sight of the fact that the measure of how well each higher school fulfills its mission, what authority and weight it wields, is determined primarily by the quality of its teaching staff. The authority of a higher school teacher is based on his professional erudition, immediate participation in the life of the school, his work with the students, and care for their academic, as well as political and moral growth. These are high demands, yet we cannot reduce them in any fashion."

The situation in the higher schools may be considered satisfactory insofar as we evaluate it only from the point of view of currently prescribed tasks. During the entire period which we are reviewing, higher school teachers have been meeting complex tasks and a great majority of them worked with dedication. However, a confrontation of the past with what lies ahead, under what conditions we will be fulfilling our tasks in future years, shows us that we must avoid simplification of views, that we must not succumb to remnants of academic bureaucratism still found in some of our fellow officials. Even in the higher schools, there are still considerable untapped material and human reserves, even here we still encounter, from time to time, a false cronyism in resolving complicated educational and organizational questions.

Formation of Maturing Personalities

We have always striven for and will continue to insist in the life of higher schools on a practice in which the prescribed subject matter is not only presented in lectures or memorized, but in which the higher schools, especially their individual chairs, become an arena for broad, even heated, discussion, confrontation of opinions, but always from socialist and communist positions.

We will always hold in esteem the work of those who are dedicated to the party and to socialism, and we will show our appreciation appropriately. However, we must not allow individual disciplines to stagnate in their development, nor permit them to live off the substance alone and off what was modern and acceptable 15-20 years ago. Life moves forward too quickly and to fail to recognize this reality, to remain immobile, would represent irreparable harm to our entire society.

The task of the higher school is to imbue graduates with an activist and creative approach to work, with respect for the working people and the values of socialism. The teachers are the main factor in the struggle for the minds of men in conditions of a class-divided world, in the formation of their Marxist-Leninist world outlook and in the struggle against bourgeois ideology. The socialist teacher must live for the future, he must identify with the policy of the communist party, and in this spirit educate his pupils. The higher school must, in every sense, become a school of quality, efficiency and modernization.

When working with the conclusions of the 16th CPCZ Congress, every higher school teacher must ask the question whether he is molding the young people correctly as activist social functionaries to whom it is alien to be indifferent, content with mediocrity, whether through his personal example he imbues them with pride in the revolutionary achievements of the working class, and with a sense of coresponsibility for peace and happiness of present and future generations.

We must abandon in the higher schools the practice that someone else, for example, from the school's management, the ministry, or the party organ, will present each chair head, each professor, with some sort of prescription for the application of the 16th CPCZ Congress in his discipline, in the methodology of his lectures, and that this will satisfy his responsibility, as long as guidance is followed. Every higher school teacher must himself deeply master and elaborate, within the concept of his professional discipline, the tasks set forth by the 16th CPCZ Congress with respect to the basic tenets of party policy, as well as in relation to the tasks of all principal spheres of practical social application. This elaboration of the congress resolutions into the concepts of one's own adademic discipline must be based on thoughtful concepts of scientific research and effective means of guiding the students.

Experience has shown that shortcomings are found, first of all, in the level of scientific management, beginning with the central organs and all the way down to the individual academic chair, from the planning of scientific work all the way to the control of its results. Scientific research has inadequately focused on the priority needs of our society as a whole. In incorporation the tasks into the plan, we have not sufficiently applied objective criteria, we still see the influence of many subjective interests in this respect. The blame, naturally, is not the research sphere's alone. Shortcomings are partially also caused by insufficient social demand. The higher schools should therefore use more initiative in seeking out the problems of social practices requiring scientific research and answers. The schools should in their own activity seize upon the most modern trends, such as biological processes, robot technology, cybernetics, etc. We must also make better use of material and, above all, moral incentive.

In raising the effectiveness of scientific research, it will be necessary to intensify even further our participation in the international division of labor with the socialist countries, oriented toward common resolution of the most serious tasks.

I am convinced that it is within our power to successfully fulfill the tasks assigned to us in the higher education sphere by the 16th CPCZ Congress. We have all the prerequisites for it. We have the support of the CPCZ Central Committee, kraj and okres party committees, support of the entire party and all of society. We have acquired great experience in our work. The almost 15,000 communists-teachers, students, and other higher school employees, represent a powerful political force.

PRESERVATION OF CULTURAL, HISTORICAL TRADITIONS REPORTED

Prussian Soldier-Poet Honored

East Berlin NATIONAL-ZEITUNG in German 22 Sep 81 p 7

/'W.G.' article: "With Lyre and Sword--Theodor Koerner and the Cultural Tradition of the National People's Army (NVA)"/

/Text/ To be officially opened on Thursday next in Berlin is the Conference on Culture in the National People's Army and the GDR Border Force. In the evening our soldiers will have many meetings in the House of the Academy of Arts with poets and authors, actors, singers, sculptors and composers. They will also celebrate on 23 September the 190th anniversary of Theodor Koerner's birth--poet, patriot and Luetzow mounted rifleman in the 1813/1814 wars of liberation. His name ranks high in the military tradition of our soldiers and, therefore, their intellectual-cultural life also.

The lyre and sword on Theodor Koerner's tomb in Mecklenburg's Woebbelin serve as symbols of the close links between poets and artists on the one hand and the armed popular struggle for a just cause on the other. Consequently the name of Theodor Koerner was adopted for the prize awarded since 1970 for outstanding achievements in the creation of interpretation of works of art contributing to the strength of our national defense, and for special services to the development of artistic creation and cultural activities among our soliders and people's policemen.

The battle song "That Is Luetzow's Wild and Daring Chase," set to music by Carl Maria von Weber, is probably Theodor Koerner's best known lyric. It has become a folksong, and the melody is now sounded as taps by our National People's Army. Theodor Koerner had dedicated it to the men of the troop of patriots who took the oath not to the king but to their fatherland alone. He fought with them against the foreign rule of Napoleon in order--as he wrote to his father Christian Gottfried Koerner, Dresden attorney and friend of Schiller--to fight for a fatherland for his art also. In his poems he welcomed the Russian soldiers who were comrades-at-arms of the Luetzow band.

Theodor Koerner did not live to see the victory of the brothers-at-arms. He was killed in combat on 26 August 1813 near Gadebusch. His poetry, though, still inspires the soldiers of the people to patriotic action.

Exposition on GDR History

Leipzig LEIPZIGER VOLKSZEITUNG in German 3-4 Oct 81 p 9

/'We and Our Times' feature article by Dr Guenter Katsch: "Three-Dimensional History Pictures of Highest Quality--Worthwhile Museum Trip into German History"/

/Text/ Bertolt Brecht admitted: "You must know I am consumed by an insatiable curiosity about people; I can never see or hear enough of them. How they deal with one another, make enemies and friends, sell onions, plan campaigns, get married, make wool suits, bring forged bills in circulation, cultivate potatoes, watch the stars, deceive one another, favor, teach, squeeze and assess one another, mutilate them, help them, hold meetings, found clubs, intrigue. I always want to know how they begin an enterprise and how they get on with it, and it is my aim to spot some inevitabilities which might enable me to make some predictions."

At this point begin the difficulties which are known to historians as well as other people. The generations who lived before us are no longer around. We must rely on that which they left behind and which lasted beyond their time: The witness of material and intellectual culture.

Reconstruction of the past from historical sources, that is the main task of the historian. And yet the heritage of our ancestors has more than that one function: They speak to the beholder himself and illuminate the statements of historians or call them in question. In the past the GDR has acquired several attributes commanding respect, and one of them is the fact that it is a country of museums.

It is in the nature of things that institutions concerned with history themselves have a history. That also applies to the Museum for German History, the foremost museum in the GDR. In his "Political Will" of 16 May 1671 the Elector Friedrich Wilhelm requested that an arsenal be built. His will was executed and the foundation stone laid on 28 May 1695. This specialized building, laid out rather like a palace on the street Unter den Linden, remained a giant weapons depot until about 1875. Not surprisingly it was stormed by the passes in the 1848 revolution. From 1881-1945 it served as a museum to glorify Prussian militarism. The building, severely damaged in World War II, was thereafter used to better purpose. In 1951 the SED Central Committee and the GDR Government decided to establish a Museum for German History, and this was housed in the reconstructed and modernized arsenal. Gradually the museum was able to expand its collection to include 350,000 pices and groups, and in the years 1962-1867 permanent exhibits on German history from 1789 to 1949 were put on public display.

On the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the GDR's establishment the doors opened on the permanent exhibition of GDR history. Fifteen years later the new knowledge gained by historians and the advances in museum science had needed to be accommodated by a fundamental renewal and transformation. A collective led by Wolfgang Herbst, Ingo Materna and Raimund Wagner worked out and implemented a new conception. The results were put on view on 21 July 1981.

Immediately on entering the visitor sees the tables of organization: From the earliest times to the 5-6th centuries A.D., from 500-1789, from 1890-1917, and from 1917-1945. He walks up the broad staircase, carpeted in red, and recognizes the deliberately plain busts of Marx and Engels. When, following the directional arrows, he turns right, he feels himself carried back across thousands of years. Small figures aim arrows and spears at a giant mammoth--a three-dimensional hunting scene featuring the so-called new men of the late ice age. Written on an enormous green board with the heading "On Becoming Men" are Friedrich Engels' words that men begin to differ from the beasts "as soon as they begin to produce food."

Suddenly we confront a staircase within the room. In a showcase, on a dark green ground, lie cast bronze jewelry and dress components--arm bands, neck rings, the remains of a chain belt, fragments of bracelets and glass pearls. The visitor learns that the technique of casting and hammering bronze was further improved since the 5th Century B.C., and that the Celts were perfectly at home with the technique of lost wax casting.

Even in the rooms dedicated to prehistory we see quite clearly that the organizing collective had abandoned the slogan "much helps much," preferring to follow the watchword "less is more." The exhibits are suitably chosen and arranged to best advantage.

Now the green of the tables and drapes is changing: Our eye meets a representation in relief of an early feudal and monastic rule of the land: Villeinage, three-field system of agriculture. Next to this relief the reconstruction of a Frankish peasant home on a scale of 1 : 10, which demonstrates the social situation of the peasants in the 7th and 8th centuries.

In these as in other rooms generally the visitor obtains an answer to such questions as what was produced? What were the tools used? What were the methods of production? Karl Marx' famous theses from "Zur Kritik der Politischen Oekonomie. Vorwort" /On the Critique of Political Economics. Foreword/, which Hermann Duncker called "the guideline for any study of history" are impressively brought to life in the section of the exhibition devoted to feudalism.

Dark brown walls, dark brown drapes. Flags hang from the ceiling. The letters dominating the room announce the slogan of the French Revolution: Freedom--Equality--Fraternity. In a glass case the declaration of human and civil rights. A new section of the exhibition begins: Capitalism in Germany. 1848. Powder is black, blood is red. The flame flickers golden. Rifles, pistols, sabres. 1871. "Awaken, Outcasts of this Earth!" Weapons and equipment of the National Guard. The Paris Commune's decree on the establishment of a revolutionary army.

Young people admire the Prussian general's hat worn by A.N. von Gneisenau. Two men chat in front of a steam cylinder machine dating from 1847. An elderly couple stands for a long time gazing at a kitchen in a reconstructed working class home of about 1900.

The variety of the exhibits is amazing: Production tools used by craftsmen, in industry and farming, old home furnishings, household china, clothing, weapons, uniforms and flags; documents such as leaflets, manuscripts, records, guild certificates, passports, posters, works of art.

The painting "October Revolution" (oil on hardwood by Werner Schulz) and the slogan "All Power to the Soviets" on a dark blue ground introduce the last section: The period 1917-1945. Once again history comes alive. We know from school history lessons that the International Workers Aid was founded in Berlin in 1921. The visitor sees gift stamps in denominations of five and ten marks. The KPD declared war on the Dawes Plan. Buttons issued by the KPD tell us about it now. What did a Red Front Combat Union member wear? What uniforms were worn by the fascist murderers, and what weapons did they use? Questions which are answered by the exhibition.

It takes several hours just to walk through, and even then we are able only to spare a glance for many exhibits. Not only for this museum is Berlin well worth a trip. The responsible collective achieved a nice balance of content and form. The linking thread is always the struggle of the masses for social progress, and the development of the productive forces, the material living conditions of rulers and ruled as well as the intellectual-cultural life are solid elements of the exhibition. The visitor thus obtains answers to the questions posed by Brecht and is able to appreciate that history is an objectively-real, uniform and inevitable process.

The excellent utilization of the rooms available, the different coloration of the sections devoted to socioeconomic eras, the choice of exhibits--restricted to the essentials--and their thorough explanation all join together to provide excellent quality three-dimensional images of history. The attraction of the museum (which also houses the exhibition "Socialist Fatherland GDR--Origin and Development," opened in 1977, as well as various specialized exhibitions) is documented not only by the volume of visitors but also by the fact that two of the five catalogues are already sold out.

BEZIRK GST CHAIRMAN OUTLINES PREMILITARY TRAINING PROGRAM

Karl-Marx-Stadt FREIE PRESSE in German 14 Oct 81 p 4

[Interview with Egon Fischer, chairman, Karl-Marx-Stadt Bezirk Executive Committee, Society for Sport and Technology (GST); by Stefan Geyler, FREIE PRESSE editorial staff; date and place of interview not given: "What Does the GST Give the Young People?"]

[Text] [Question] Comrade Fischer, the 1980/1981 GST training year came to an end in August. What results does the bezirk GST organization have to show?

[Answer] In our estimation the 1980/1981 training year was the most successful ever in the development of the bezirk GST organization. More than 2,600 new members were accepted into the bezirk socialist defense organization, and 19 basic organizations and 73 military sports sections were established. Thus, our bezirk organization now has over 62,000 members, active in more than 850 basic organizations.

[Question] One of the main tasks of the GST is to prepare young people for honorable service in the National People's Army. What is your estimation of the present level of premilitary training in our bezirk?

[Answer] Goal-oriented measures in educating and training tomorrow's soldiers have enabled us to make further progress in implementing continuous training faithful to the program. That is especially true for career training of motorized riflemen, military drivers, teletype operators, divers and naval specialists.

[Question] What is being done in the way of physical training of future soldiers?

[Answer] One component of athletic instruction involves training for the elements of an eight-part test. Included among others are a 1,000-meter run, pull-ups, rope climbing and the hand-grenade throw for distance and accuracy.

[Question] In conversations we have learned, for example, that not everyone can do the required 10 pull-ups.

[Answer] Yes, that is true. Some can do only four. Here, as in other parts of the eight-part test, differences are still too apparent, especially where strength and resilience are required.

[Question] Then is the GST just for "tough men?"

[Answer] No, quite the contrary. There are also numerous opportunities for girls to participate in military sports. At present about 10 percent of the bezirk's girls take part in the GST, among other things as marksmen, all-round and model competitors, and teletype operators. This level still does not satisfy us, for it is an open secret: A girl who becomes familiar with military customs in the GST will later have more understanding for her husband's honorable service in the National People's Army.

[Question] What role do military sports play in the GST?

[Answer] Their importance is increasing all the time. Each year the best in all military sports categories are determined in Spartakiad competition in schools, factories and kreises. We pay a lot of attention to competitive sports in the GST, for example to marksmanship and model competition. Thus, just last month sportsmen from our bezirk won two silver medals in the world championship for model ships.

[Question] Why is it so important to us to awaken even more interest in military sports?

[Answer] Military sports such as model competition, marksmanship and communications sports, among others, are well suited to stimulate the interest of school children and youths for work in the GST, and thus to do a good job of preparing them for premilitary training and competitive sports. And following military service, military sports contribute greatly to helping keep reservists in good physical condition.

[Question] A good opportunity for reservists would certainly be military combat sports, a combination of cross-country running and shooting competition. What response has the latest addition to GST military sports had in the bezirk?

[Answer] At any rate, it has still not had the response that we would like. There are now about 2,200 active sportsmen in this category in the bezirk. Our goal in particular is to interest even more reservists in this area. In this regard, results have already been good in Zwickau-Rural and Auerbach Kreises, as well as in the cities of Zwickau and Karl-Marx-Stadt.

[Question] What are the prerequisites for good results in military combat sports?

[Answer] These kreis organizations have set up advanced sections, for example, which compete regularly. In this way athletes in combat sports have many opportunities for comparison. In this connection the kreis executive boards of the Free German Labor Union Federation (FDGB) are especially strongly allied with the kreis organizations.

[Question] Included among military sports is model competition. To the outsider that may appear to be little more than a hobby. That is why readers ask us why we pay so much attention to model competition.

[Answer] It would indeed be difficult to conceive of the GST without this sport. Bezirk sections now have more than 1,800 members active in ship, automobile, aircraft and rocket model competition. More and more children and youths are finding this to be a constructive way of organizing their free time. We as bezirk directors support this development, because in model competition many abilities are acquired beginning in childhood: dexterity, perseverance and ability to concentrate, as well as knowledge in electrical engineering and electronics, for example.

[Question] In your opinion, how can the GST be made even more attractive?

[Answer] Very important is the organizing of mass competition in military sports. Last training year, for example, almost 160,000 workers took part in the FDGB cup marksmanship competition. One of every three bezirk inhabitants was present at the "Gold Ticket" competition. And 17,000 persons took active part in the 20 shooting matches. We support all efforts to make such military sports competition even more popular.

OFFICIALS DISCUSS CRIME, POLICE ACTIONS

Comments of Bialystok Prosecutor

Bialystok GAZETA WSPOLCZESNA in Polish 18 Aug 81 p 3

[Interview with Marek Lochowski, chief prosecutor in the Bialystok Voivodship, by Jerzy Kwaczynski, GAZETA WSPOLCZESNA: "A Law for Everyone"; date and place not specified]

[Text] [GAZETA WSPOLCZESNA] The public is disturbed by news on the growth of crime in the country. We hear this on the radio and television, and the daily and periodical press for some time has devoted more and more space to this subject. Is all of this not too alarmist, or simply speaking, for various reasons, exaggerated, and finally, if this is a nationwide phenomenon, does it also occur in the Bialystok voivodship?

[Marek Lochowski] Unfortunately, it is not exaggerated. In any case, it would be hard to speak of a sudden growth in crime, since we have seen this disturbing phenomenon for several years now. For example: in 1976 we recorded 5,082 criminal offenses, and last year this figure reached 6,437.

[Question] What types of offenses are recorded more frequently now than several years ago?

[Answer] Principally robberies, i.e., robbing people with the use of force. They rose from 101 in 1976 to 188 last year, and during the first six months of this year we have already recorded 119 cases, which in absolute numbers puts our voivodship in sixth place in the country!

The number of burglaries by breaking into private buildings during the 5-year period discussed, rose from 418 to 700, and burglaries of socialized buildings increased from 415 to 568. But cases of appropriation of public property went from 790 to 1,024.

The number of certain other offenses also increased, for example, abuse of family members while under the influence of alcohol, and more assaults and batteries are recorded.

[Question] The increase in criminal offenses must have an effect on the work of the prosecutor's office.

[Answer] Certainly. During the first six months of this year we recorded 28 percent more opened investigations than during the same period last year (in absolute numbers, this is 604 cases). For comparison, nationally this figure is much lower, for it amounts to "only" 20.8 percent. But returning to the 604 cases, they mean that several prosecutors and at least two administrative workers are needed to conduct them. And we have not received additional employees to fill either the former or the latter jobs.

[Question] Since we are making comparisons with the first half of last year, how many more criminal offenses are being recorded now?

[Answer] The increase pertains to many types of cases, but principally to rape (225 percent), assault and battery against Civic Militia [police] officials, 126 percent, burglaries in socialized buildings (92 percent), burglaries in private buildings (87 percent), robberies (47 percent), profiteering, 30 percent, and physical assaults and beatings (23 percent). The only decrease (9 percent less than during the first six months of last year) occurred in appropriations of public property.

[Question] The prosecutor offices' statistical data leads one to the unequivocal conclusion that we are truly faced with a very disturbing situation. But here we encounter the next doubts, that is, whether or not the reasons advanced for this situation are oversimplified.

[Answer] I think I know what you are talking about. I believe the reasons for the currently observed growth in crime are (not necessarily in order of importance): a general relaxation of social discipline, a weakening in moral inhibitions, alcohol abuse, economic disintegration, and also, to a certain degree, the weak reaction of the Citizens Militia [police] last spring to certain types of offenses caused by a campaign of agitation against that body in relation to the Otwock case, and in our area, the Bialystok Ironworks case.

[Question] Everyone who took part in or watched the events in Gdansk last August, including the police, was filled with admiration at the discipline exercised by society, as demonstrated by the disappearance, for a couple of weeks, of the plague of drunkenness and the considerable drop in crime.

[Answer] If we assume this to be true, and we have no reason to believe otherwise, the reasons for this really astounding situation must be attributed to the general social pressure which the "potential" criminals felt. That is, what we saw was the active position of the entire Coast community, a position of involvement that we have been appealing for and striving for for many years--to work with us in preventing crime. For not even the best work on the part of the police authorities is very productive, if this work is not supported. And everything points to the fact that in recent months neither the prosecutor's office nor the Citizens Militia could depend very much on this support. We must realize that if the work of the bodies appointed to fight crime is to be successful, it must have the support of the people. This is in the interest of these people, who certainly do not want to live in a state of perpetual threat. We defend ourselves against receivers of stolen goods and speculators, but the "suppliers" of stolen batteries can always count on customers, sometimes even the neighbors of those whose batteries were stolen...

[Question] The most effective way of decreasing vehicle thefts would be an increase in the production of spare parts.

[Answer] Yes, it would be. But because this is not possible in the foreseeable future, it is essential that public opinion be mobilized to condemn the culprit in the community to which he belongs.

[Question] But this society is now very tired, for one thing, and for another thing, the talk about pursuing criminals differs. It is said that not all criminals are being pursued, and we hear that requests to initiate investigations are being denied, both by the Citizens Militia and by the prosecutor's office.

So that our statements not be considered unfounded: Not too long ago the duty officer at one of the Bialystok police stations refused to accept a report of a robbery attack on a minor in the center of town, in broad daylight, saying that he did not have a radio-equipped car. Only the determination of the victim's father, and his offer of his own vehicle (the attack took place only two streets away from the police station...) forced the police officials to intervene. Successfully.

Another bit of information is even more frightening. A girl who was robbed, herself sought and found the guilty parties, but when her father went to the address where they were, the loot was returned to him, but he was "advised" not to report them to the police. The threat worked, and the crime was never revealed. And what is frightening is that the father of the victim is employed in the administration of justice.

Knowing about such cases, one loses confidence in the reliability of crime statistics. And if the statistics show that the Bialystok voivodship is sixth in the country in recorded robberies, surpassing the urban port centers of Szczecin and Tri-City (Gdynia, Sopot and Gdansk), then the question is, is this the result of the greater efficiency of the Bialystok police, or of the purposeful "reporting activity" of the police in these cities.

[Answer] I do not deny that some police officials, in an attempt to improve their statistics, do not accept reports of certain crimes, but I want to say that such a practice is firmly condemned by the official managements and appropriate action is taken in the case of the guilty.

Another problem which you mentioned is the so-called "gray area", which is made up of those crimes which are unreported or about which we get information after a long delay. If we add to this those cases in which the guilty have not been found (there are quite a few of those, as much as 17 percent), then of course we get the impression that we do not pursue the culprits of certain offenses.

However, I would like to emphasize that both the Prosecutor's Office and the Citizens Militia are bound by the rules of law. This means that if the police obtain reliable information about the commission of a crime, then regardless of who commits the crime, the guilty person must be sought. This law must be observed by everyone--citizens and offices alike. This is the basic canon of justice.

[Question] Public opinion has been demanding this for a long time, and NSZZ Solidarity has articulated this demand.

[Answer] True. But Solidarity is beginning to interpret legality in its own way, that is, that whether or not someone violated the law should be determined not by the body appointed to do this, but by Solidarity itself.

[Question] That is a strong statement.

[Answer] I will give you some examples. Is it legal to deprive people of their freedom? I am speaking of the recent case in the "Sosnowiec" mine, where, in addition, the prosecutor was not allowed in to free the management of the mine. Another matter: Is the distribution of leaflets and posters in violation of the law to go unpunished? Because according to the law those who distribute leaflets and posters whose text conflicts with the law are supposed to be prosecuted. For example, article 237 of the penal code states that whoever publicly, i.e., by disseminating leaflets and posters also, /affronts a state organ or political organization, trade union, higher public utility association, or other social organization of national importance, at his place of employment or in public, is subject to imprisonment for up to 2 years, incarceration, or fine/[in boldface]. Another rule of law, article 178 of the penal code, forbids insult, slander or defamation of persons or institutions. Which does not mean that the authorities cannot be criticized.

By the way, we should also mention that articles 237 and 178 of the penal code had their counterparts in the 1932 penal code, which remained in effect until 1970. This was one of the most modern codes in Europe, therefore we can say that these laws are, or rather they should be, based on the high legal standards of the Polish nation and nations of a number of other European countries.

So why these protests and various types of pressures on the prosecuting organs since they are only doing what the law requires of them? How can we demand a kind of selective responsibility and extra-legal immunity, if the observance of the law is important to all of us? Regardless of that, I believe that if there is a law, whether it is good or bad is beside the point, this law should be observed. According to the maxim, /dura lex, sed lex/[in boldface], a hard law, but the law nevertheless.

That is why I do not hesitate to say that we have reservations of a legal nature as to many of the leaflets, posters and the text of some editions of the Bialystok NSZZ Solidarity Information Bulletin. If the process of socialist renewal is to be established, then we should observe the law, a law that is interpreted similarly by everyone and towards everyone.

Comments of Opole Police Commander

Opole TRYBUNA OPOLSKA in Polish 7 Sep 81 p 6

[Interview with Lt Col Tadeusz Cielecki, commander of the Citizens Militia [police] in Opole, and his assistant, Maj Roman Lesniak, by Adam Bogucki, TRYBUNA OPOLSKA: "We Make it Too Easy for the Thieves"; date and place not specified]

[Text] Every eighth citizen of our voivodship lives in Opole; every fifth citizen is in it at least twice a week. Therefore, whether or not it is safe in Opole to a large degree depends on the state of law and order in the Opole voivodship--which is not good. It is true that the crime growth figures (over 8 months: 85 percent more break-ins into dwellings and other private quarters, almost 50 percent more thefts and about one-third more robberies) on the national scale are more disturbing than the same data from our region. Nevertheless from the standpoint of the most elementary criteria it is increasingly worse here also. This is particularly evident from the data for August, 1981.

Such a state of affairs suggests that the police are to blame. I have therefore presented the pertinent charges to Lt Col Tadeusz Cielecki, the Opole police commander, and his assistant, Maj Roman Lesniak.

[Question] A wave of garage break-ins passed through Opole. They were systematically cleaned out at the 25-Year Housing Development, at the Dambonia and First of May streets, at Polish Army. You were not able to find the culprits of a considerable portion of these crimes.

[Answer] It is not so bad with finding the guilty. That is not what is most important. The fact that the criminal is sitting in jail does very little, generally, for the victim. Particularly, since very rarely are we able to recover the stolen property, and everything disappears that can be taken: fuel, automobile parts, oil, vodka or detergent that is being stored in the garage, traveling equipment. It is interesting that most break-ins are into garages that are padlocked. But almost all are equipped with key locks. Still, some people reinforce the padlocks in such a way that they cannot be opened even with a crowbar. This gives almost 100 percent protection against burglars--people who are fortunately quite primitive, operating with the most simple tools.

[Question] Are the people themselves supposed to be responsible for the security of their garage? What about the police?

[Answer] It is very easy to attack us. Especially now. Are we supposed to place a policeman in front of every garage, or better yet, a plainclothesman? This is ridiculous! The owners should be the first to protect their property. The police are supposed to catch thieves. That is what they are for, and that is how it is everywhere in the world. But since we began with garages, let us remain at motorization. Vehicles disappear and will continue to disappear, because the demand for parts, in short supply at POLZMOBYT [motor sales agency], continues to increase. So much has been written about guarded parking lots that if every tenth line in the newspaper were transformed into one parking space, there would be no problem today. The housing cooperative and the municipal management should--actually, they must--top talking about the necessity to do something and start to do something. If a person has enough money to pay 200,000 or 300,000 zlotys for an automobile, then he should be able to afford the monthly fee of 250 zlotys for parking. There are also various protection systems available for purchase, if only the so-called umbrella [tarpaulin cover]. This does not cost more than 300 zlotys, and is very effective in preventing thievery. It is the same with bicycles, mopeds and motorcycles. These can be protected, very inexpensively, against theft...

[Question] It is said that no lock will keep out a thief. This, perhaps, is why there are so many thefts and break-ins into dwellings.

[Answer] And basements also--for pickles or tomato paste. It is a fact, that for a highly qualified locksmith no lock is a barrier. But there are no such professionals, thank God. The break-ins are done principally by very primitive methods--by ripping off a padlock in a basement, or forcing a door in a dwelling. And all that is necessary is to install another lock and reinforce the recess... An investment of 100 to 150 zlotys will provide a good guarantee that the dwelling will not be broken into. Please bear in mind that in our homes we have goods valued at tens of thousands of zlotys, yet we begrudge several hundred zlotys to protect these goods, something that we worked for half our lifetime. With basements, the matter is very simple. There are almost no break-ins where the basement is locked with a reliable key. The thefts here are not done by professionals, but by amateurs, frequently children. The dwelling administrations have a duty to see to it that the basements are reliably secured. Except that the tenants do not demand this, and the officials are satisfied with things the way they are, because when something happens they can easily blame the police, that the police were not watching for this. And how are we to watch for this?

[Question] I do not know. People are robbed while on the town. In the stores, on the street...

[Answer] To be precise, it is the women. Men somehow take better care of their cash, while women carry large sums of money in their handbags, which are often open. It is no wonder. They want to have some cash with them because something might turn up in one of the stores. There was a time when our women carried their money at their bosoms. It is hard to persuade them to do that now, but certainly they must watch their money. We do what we can. Our female inspectors, from the criminal division, are on the streets every day. As decoys. We have caught several groups of pickpockets this way. But when a woman, several days ago, had 40,000 zlotys almost right out in the open, and crowded into a queue because a delivery of vodka had come in and then the money disappeared, that is simply nothing more than tempting a thief.

[Question] You commanders do not have too good an opinion about women.

[Answer] Our opinion is very good. We have wives, friends--only we ask that they protect themselves against thieves. And they are scatter-brained. At work also, The leave the office open, with their handbag, containing their wages, hanging on the hook. Someone comes in, sees no one there, takes the handbag. Later, even if the thief is caught, the cash can no longer be recovered. We have many examples showing that a thief is actually tempted to steal.

[Question] A great deal has been said about the women. Now it is time for a word about the men. In Opole one cannot walk on the streets after dark. In this case, too, are people supposed to be themselves concerned about safety?

[Answer] No, that is our problem. We ask only that you quickly inform us if you see something taking place. And here we must make a comment. After dialing number 997, for 15 seconds there is recording: "Emergency police, please wait until your report can be taken." This may not be the best solution, but that is how it is. You have to wait that 15 seconds--at the moment there is nothing we can do about it. But because we got the information quickly we caught a thief, practically in the act, who robbed the PEWEX [foreign-currency shop]. There are more such examples, but still not enough. In general, if society does not help us, we will not be able to cope ourselves with the growing, unfortunately, number of crimes. And by the way, the number of break-ins into shops is decreasing. With the exception of PEWEX and KOMIS [consignment shops]... The thieves have shifted to dwellings. Trade is poor--there is nothing to steal.

[Question] Finally: There is talk now that crime is growing and that the police are not revealing all of it. This could be interpreted, it would seem, that your work productivity is dropping.

[Answer] We have never been that brilliant. Unless perhaps in the media, as the press, radio and television are now described. But now it is more difficult. And the situation is clear. Without the help of society we cannot really expect it to improve.

Comments of Slupsk Police Commander

Koszalin GLOS POMORZA in Polish 9, 10, 11 Oct 81 p 5

[Interview with Col Stanislaw Lukasiak, commander of the Citizens Militia [police] in the Slupsk voivodship, by Jerzy Rudzik, GLOS POMORZA: "The Same Law for Everyone"; date and place not specified]

[Question] Some say that the number of crimes has increased drastically recently. But other say that this is due to the fact that public opinion has been staggered, more greatly than ever before, by these matters, and there is even the question of manipulation of statistics. Therefore, are there more crimes or not?

[Answer] I reply most emphatically: There has been a distinct increase in criminal offenses and the state of security and public order has deteriorated. If we compare the first 8 months of 1981 with the same period last year, then I must say that in the case of criminal offenses, this increase is 33 percent, and nationally, almost 38 percent.

[Question] Please give us some examples.

[Answer] Gladly. In criminal offenses, the number of thefts by break-ins into private facilities increased by 114 percent; thefts by break-ins into socialized facilities increased by 123 percent; fires and arsons, by 94.4 percent; bodily injuries as a result of robberies and beatings, over 42 percent; thefts of private property, almost 23 percent. This shows very clearly that there are far many more ordinary crimes and violations of public order than before.

[Question] What are the reasons for this?

[Answer] Generally speaking, the country's well-known sociopolitical and economic situation, the market difficulties, relaxation of social discipline. Everything that stimulated activity in the criminal and parasitic-hooligan circles, and also the growth of arrogance towards representatives of authority and especially the police.

[Question] What is the arrest rate for these crimes now?

[Answer] Unfortunately, the arrest rate dropped 12.5 percent during this period and we now solve 72.6 percent of the crimes. Our greatest problems are in apprehending the perpetrators of the burglaries in public and private buildings, i.e., the category of crimes that is most vexatious to the citizens. And that is how it is throughout the country. For example, let me say that the apprehension rate for burglaries by break-in into private facilities dropped from 84 percent in 1980 to 56.5 percent in 1981 in the Slupsk voivodship. We do better in finding the culprits of fights and beatings: 85 percent were arrested in 1980 and 90 percent in 1981. We also apprehend almost all those who are guilty of homocides, crimes that fortunately occur very rarely in our area.

[Question] Could it be that the police are now less efficient?

[Answer] This is a complicated problem, governed by so many conditions that it would be difficult to give a short and unequivocal reply. The fact is, however, that we give special attention to the safety of citizens in public places--at stations, public squares, and cafes, there the danger to safety has increased greatly. At the same time, we cannot be everywhere because the number of policemen is not increasing and our duties continue to increase. It is enough only to remind you of our increased participation in anti-speculative operations, and more.

[Question] But how is this dangerous condition measured? Different opinions continue to circulate about this.

[Answer] We use, as I have already said, crime statistics, which are police-prosecution statistics, and in addition one of the important factors in establishing crime figures are the investigations and inquiries that have been instigated. In 1980, there were 1,415 of them, and in 1981, 19,887. Thus, the increase in criminal activity is also judged by the number of investigative proceedings that have been begun. In addition, if I have understood your question correctly, then it is true also that during the recent period, i.e., after August, 1980, the detective agencies, including the police, are better able to present data, including the unfavorable figures also.

[Question] We continue to receive information from throughout the country on different hooliganistic excesses, street brawls...

[Answer] Unfortunately, we have them here in the Slupsk voivodship also, although perhaps their reach and scale are not still as serious. However, their growing frequency and accompanying aggressiveness and the brutal behavior of a group of drunks, often young, accosting passersby, creating disturbances, attempting to steal, frequently right out in public, is very disturbing. We see more and more of these kinds of brawls in restaurants, which are a source of complaint from both the staffs of the restaurants and the customers. There is also a greater arrogance towards police officials, combined with attempts at physically assaulting them. We, too, not long ago, for it was in September, had a series of events of our own in Slupsk itself, but fortunately they were quickly brought under control. The hooligan brawls occurred not only in Slupsk, but also in Lebork and other towns, even, although more rarely, in the villages, such as the one that took place recently in Dretyn during some festivities. Unfortunately, we are dealing with a situation where large groups of people stand by and watch these excesses without taking any action, as for example, during the brutal beating of a person in front of the "Piracka" restaurant in Slupsk in June of 1981. In a couple of cases the police officials were forced to use their guns to arrest the culprits, without injuring anyone.

[Question] Often also the police officials risk not only an assault, but also a severe beating...

[Answer] The risk to health and life is part of the job and such a danger has always been there, but recently these dangers, as I have already said, have greatly increased. There are many cases of physical assaults.

[Question] Let us go on to economic crimes. We are concerned with certain general tendencies.

[Answer] In this field, comparing the already mentioned 8-months' periods of 1980 and 1981, it is rather difficult to talk about an increased incidence, although the financial losses which result from this are minimally higher. Historically, most of these offenses are committed in construction and construction-assembly services, in the food economy, covering all phases of production, storage, procurement and commodity turnover. The growing speculation and its sources is a subject that is too familiar to go into, just as, I believe, there is no need to argue about why so many crimes are committed in those fields of the economy.

[Question] What are the more important cases still under investigation?

[Answer] Truly it is hard for me to talk about everything, so I will mention only three. The first pertains to mismanagement, waste and corruption in the Smoldzino State Farms in the sum of about a million and a half zlotys. The person who is primarily answerable for this is the former director, Ryszard K. We are also investigating the purchase of alcohol, for 1,800,000 zlotys, made by an agent for the bar of the "Koral" Starogard Spirits Plants Rest Center in Leba, in agreement with the assistant director of the "Polmos" Spirits Industry Plants in Bialystok. Also in the initial stage is an investigation into mismanagement and exploitation of official position for personal gain by the managment of the "Czyn" Housing Cooperative in Slupsk.

[Question] And the notorious case of Tadeusz Szoldry, in which many prominent persons are involved?

[Answer] Yes, we were involved in that, but by a decision of the prosecutor general it was sent to the voivodship prosecutor in Koszalin. There is no doubt that the former director of the WSS [Voivodship Consumers' Cooperative] "Spolem" Complex Applications Plant in Slupsk was proven to have misused his position for material gain. In any case, he has already borne the Party consequences.

[Question] And how about some cases relating to social illnesses: drug addiction, alcoholism, prostitution, receiving stolen goods, bootlegging?

[Answer] Prostitution is not a big problem here, particularly outside the tourist season. Drug addiction is growing very slowly, but unfortunately is appearing in certain circles, particularly the high school student groups. We expect that this will increase. The fact that alcoholism is one of the main factors in crime is well known. During the first 6 months of 1981, of 1,273 persons suspected of committing a crime, almost 30 percent were under the influence of alcohol. Fencing and bootlegging? We eliminate them, but this is not an easy matter, because tenants, for the sake of peace, do not want to testify. Not too long ago in Kepice we raided a moonshining operation with apparatus that produced 18 liters of bootleg liquor in one distillation.

[Question] Are there any cases under investigation that involve anti-State activity?

[Answer] We are conducting three such cases under the supervision of the prosecutor. One concerns the defamation of the "Wdziecznosc" [Gratitude (to the Soviets)] monument in Slupsk, on which some yet-unknown person placed some inscriptions praising fascism. Another case involves citizen Z.Z.P., a member of an illegal organization called the "Young Poland Movement", and the third case pertains to the reprinting in the Slupsk Solidarity Bulletin of an appeal from an anti-socialist and anti-soviet organization, National Labor Union of Russian Solidarians, about which we wrote recently.

[Question] Sometimes the community is accused of passiveness and lack of feeling regarding the crimes that are committed, and an unwillingness to cooperate with the police. But, on the other hand, we sometimes hear that officials use excess force, that their behavior towards the citizens is not always courteous and even contrary to law.

[Answer] I do not claim that always and everywhere a person in a police uniform is a perfect angel. The present sociopolitical climate in the country--we must tell ourselves that very clearly--does not favor either an increase in police authority nor does it make it easier for the police to perform their basic duties. Generally speaking, however, the charges of illegal conduct against us are untrue. Please remember that during the course of a year we conduct hundreds of penal proceedings, thousands of various interventions. If some incidental improprieties occur in our activities, on which, in any case, our position is unequivocal, then only someone who is irresponsible and unimaginative can generalize from those incidents.

[Question] Perhaps then, specifically--are there complaints against police officials?

[Answer] Lately those complaints have fallen off. In 1981 there were, for example, no complaints about illegal detention of a citizen. However, there were nine such complaints in connection with the execution of trial actions, and only one was confirmed. Sixteen complaints pertained to lack of action by the authorities. Eight, unfortunately, were confirmed. Ten complaints concerned interventions, only one was confirmed. We know of three complaints of unwarranted use of a nightstick, none was confirmed. There were seven undocumented complaints of unwarranted use of force. Of seven complaints of unjustified issuance of tickets, one was confirmed.

There were also two complaints of personal gain from the performance of official duties, and we are now investigating both of them. I need not add that cases where officials act illegally are very severely punished. And, lest there be no misunderstanding, complaints of this type, or rather the investigating process, is supervised by the prosecutor, so there can be no accusation that the case is being "hushed up".

One thing, however, is certain: the police officials are fully aware that they must have the support of the people in their activities. Without this, the results of our work will not satisfy anyone. But on the other hand, the law must be observed equally by everyone without exception.

CONTROVERSY OVER RADOM SCHOOL RECTOR REVIEWED

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 4 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by Marek Maszek]

[Text] In the opinion of Justyn Napora, chairman of the Plant Council of the Polish Teachers' Union (ZNP) at the Higher School of Engineering (WSI) in Radom, the conflict goes back to last spring. At that time, maybe even towards the end of March, an order came from the Ministry of Science, Higher Schools and Technology (the same order went out to all schools in the country) to review the cadres because budgets cuts were necessary. Then, the chairman of the Plant Council says, Solidarity spread a rumor that due to mismanagement and faulty employment policies the wage fund had been exceeded by 6 million zlotys and therefore at least 25 percent of the employees would have to be dismissed. The main culprit was said to be rector Hebda.

Later it developed that Janusz Gorski, the Minister at that time, granted the 6 million zlotys and everything was all right. Most of the WSI employees regarded this decision to be the result of Solidarity's efforts. It was then that about 200 people resigned from ZNP-Science and went over to Solidarity. At the same time, the chairman of the Solidarity Plant Commission, Dr Michal Kelles-Kraus, resigned from his position and, in the words of J. Napora, "The young and angry in the union seized power. And then everything began. The negation of everyone and everything."

Solidarity at WSI compiled an entire catalog of charges against rector Hebda. That he performs his functions in an autocratic manner, that he misuses his position for personal gain, that he bribes some of the workers, giving them the choice commissioned jobs and assigns the subjects that are to be considered as crucial problems. Finally, that he is one of those who is responsible for the atmosphere that prevailed in the city and in the voivodship after the stormy events of June, 1976. The Radom Territory Interfactory Workers' Commission (MKR) entered into the whole affair. It was demanded that a special commission be sent in to investigate the charges. Also, delegations traveled to Warsaw demanding that Professor Hebda be dismissed from his position as rector.

Meanwhile, at WSI, just as in the other higher schools, a commission was appointed to develop the rules for electing school authorities. There was no official connection between these two facts, i.e., the demand for rector Hebda's resignation and the appointment of the commission. Rather, it was a coincidence, which, with time, transformed itself into a iunctim all its own, as the lawyers would describe it.

In the beginning, representatives of all of the school's social and political organizations took part in the work of the commission. At least J. Napora does not recall that any organization was omitted. At one of the first meetings of the commission, Solidarity presented a completed draft of the electoral law. It provided, among other things, that a candidacy could be offered without the consent of the candidate himself.

The advocates of this provision explained that some professors and doctors habilitatus (dr hab)--for only they could be candidates--would willingly offer themselves as candidates but do not want to do so for fear of retaliation and repression on the part of the present rector, Hebda. The draft also provided that a person who has already performed the function of rector for two terms cannot be a candidate. Everyone knew that only Professor Hebda was involved here, because the entire history of WSI at Radom goes back scarcely 2 years, and only he performed this function.

The main figure in the conflict, Prof Michal Hebda, a specialist in the field of vehicles utilization, came to the Radom school in the mid-1970's. This was not yet WSI but an independent center of the Swietokrzyska Technical University (Politechnika). It got its present name in 1978 and it was then that Professor Hebda was appointed its rector. Prior to that, for 3 years, he performed the function of chief of the Radom center of the Swietokrzyska Technical University. But before he came to Radom, he was a lecturer at the Military Technical Academy. In any case, the professor does not conceal his military origin. If, for example, Warsaw University or Warsaw Technical University, is without a rector for even as long as 3 years--the professor told me--no one will notice it. The life of the university will go on as it has for many years. But with a school such as ours, it is something else again. It could not pass the test. Everything would fall apart. Here everything must be ruled very autocratically.

As justification for his conclusion, rector Hebda gives as an example the many young scientific workers, whom only the protection of "a strong hand" can guarantee a further scientific career.

Professor Hebda admits that he has made mistakes in directing the school. The emphasis on developing the school numerically, for example; but he feels that his successes greatly exceed his lapses. Anyway, he believes that certain negative events were unavoidable. If, over the course of 2 years, the number of employees in the school increased from 400 to almost 1,200, then it is understandable that some of the scientific cadre must be--as he puts it--"not on target". In his opinion, now is precisely the time to take advantage of the school's dynamic growth in prior years and begin separating the wheat from the chaff. If, of course, WSI at Radom is to become a technical university, which is Professor Hebda's ambition and the promise he made to himself when he accepted the nomination for rector 3 years ago.

In mid-May, a special commission arrived at WSI to investigate the charges against the rector. As one of the department directors in the Ministry was supposed to have said, never in the postwar history of the higher school system in Poland, in any school whatever, has such a thorough and detailed investigation been conducted. The commission was made up of a dozen or so persons and all aspects of the school's operations were examined.

At the same time, another step forward was taken in preparing the rules for electing the new WSI authorities. In addition to the Solidarity draft, another draft emerged, based, it is true, on the first but differing from it in some details. Both drafts were posted on the school bulletin boards so that everyone could become familiar with them and make his comments. After about a month it was decided that the consultation phase should end and that the complete draft of the electoral law should be prepared.

However, the commission had not been able to reach an agreement and variant solutions had to be written for several points. They concerned, among others, restrictions on submitting a candidate who had already filled the position of rector. One variant provided for such a restriction, the other did not. Aside from that, the elections were to be conducted according to the same rules as in other schools. They were to be indirect, i.e., through electors, the votes were to be weighted, and different groups of workers had a guaranteed, previously prescribed, number of electors; it was similar with the students. Of course, the elections were to be general, secret, and equal. The elections conducted in this manner in other schools took place and in general made it possible to select the best candidate in the most democratic way.

Unfortunately, at the Radom WSI, all did not go well. The problem was the person who had been rector until then, although officially his name was never mentioned. School Solidarity demanded that a general referendum be conducted among the workers and the students precisely on the matter of restricting the submission of the candidacy of the present rector. Only after this matter is settled, according to Solidarity, can the entire electoral law be approved.

Meanwhile, the ministerial commission completed its inspection of the school and stated that the charges made against rector Hebda are not true. Solidarity claims to this date that the commission did not address itself to all of the charges made against the rector, and particularly as concerns misuse of his position for personal gain.

On June 24th the WSI senate discusses the draft of the electoral law and decides that it will decide itself which variant is to be accepted. Of 50 senators, 44 are in favor of not restricting in any way the submission of candidacies, 2 abstain, and 4 are against. As a result, the following week some of the Solidarity circles give the senate a vote of no-confidence. They demand that the voting be invalidated and consistently stand by the referendum.

It is now the end of June, so there is no chance that the elections can be conducted before vacations. But the matter is critical because on August 31 the present rector's term expires and it may happen that the school will be without leadership in the new academic year.

In September preparations are made to elect a rector on the basis of the electoral law written in the spring. But before that, a decision comes from the ministry that the term of the present authorities of the school has been extended 2 months, i.e., to October 31. The situation becomes dramatic, because the Radom WSI is the only school in the country that has not been able to elect new authorities.

On September 10th the senate appoints an election commission. Solidary boycotts it despite the fact that it has a reserved seat on it. The boycott is because of the electoral law which was passed by the senate and had not been preceded by a referendum. At the same time. Solidarity blocks the election of electors, not wanting the elections to take place.

Time flies, and there appears to be no chance that the elections will be conducted. A deputy, Prof Jan Janowski, arrives in Radom to act as a mediator, no longer in a dispute but in what is now an open conflict. Probably at his suggestion the WSI senate decides to conduct an election of a new rector in direct, general, secret and equal elections. In this way, weighting of the votes would be avoided, which in a divided community will always be regarded as an attempt at manipulation.

Several days later the Solidarity Plant Commission receives a letter from the Ministry, which says, among other things, that "acceding to the wish of Prof Dr Hab (Engineer) Michael Hebda, Citizen, the Minister on October 15, 1981, expressed his consent that he (Professor Hebda) terminate his employment with the Ministry of Science, Higher Schools and Technology, and leave the Higher School of Engineering at Radom effective November 1, 1981." The letter is the Ministry's reply to Solidarity's telex announcing that it will undertake a strike action if the elections for a rector are conducted on the basis of a new formula. Solidarity continues to demand that a referendum be conducted, and then the elections, but in accordance with the previous electoral law.

However, the WSI senate decides that the election of a rector will take place on October 27th. The elections are to take place according to the new formula--each voter, regardless whether he is an employee or a student--is entitled to one vote. In the end, seven names appear on the list of candidates, including that of... Professor Hebda. When I ask him why he agreed to be a candidate despite his previous resignation from his position at the school, he replied that he had no influence on this. He was committed to run by the school party organization. He does not know whether he will fulfill the function of rector if he wins. But probably yes, because if the school community decides to support him he cannot let it down.

On the day before the elections, Solidarity proclaims a strike. Its members occupy the rector's office. From then on, only those can enter who have decided to join the strike. "Remove professor Hebda from the position of rector." So reads the strikers' first demand. The second--"Conduct a referendum on the variant points of electoral law." The remaining demands pertain to less-important staff matters, and I would say, matters of prestige. At the end, the strike committee demands that a fully empowered ministerial commission be sent to Radom which would address itself to the demands.

Tuesday, October 27th. Election Day. One of the six voting sites was to be in the rector's office building. Obviously this is impossible so a school bus appears in front of the building, containing a ballot box. The voting lasts all day. The number of voters varies, depending on the site. In the evening it appears that over 50 percent of the employees and only slightly over 40 percent of the students voted. The winner was Professor Hebda, who received over 60 percent of the votes.

The main school building continues to be occupied by members of Solidarity, who were joined by students from the Independent Association of Students (NZS). The strikers are awaiting the commission from Warsaw. They do not accept the fact that the election of a rector has taken place. Althought it cannot be said that they were totally indifferent to it. On the doors of the occupied building the following slogan could be seen: "If you want a dictator, elect Hebda as rector" [a rhyme].

P.S. On Thursday, October 29th, Solidarity at Warsaw University proclaimed a warning strike to support the demands of Solidarity at the Radom WSI. On November 2nd, the strike at Warsaw University was suspended.

DECREE ON PRICES FOR REUSABLE SPARE PARTS

Bucharest BULETINUL OFICIAL in Romanian Part I No 64, 1 Sep 81 pp 1-2

/Decree of the State Council on the Manner of Setting the Purchase and Delivery Prices for Some Reusable Materials and Spare Parts/

/Text/ The State Council of the Socialist Republic of Romania decrees:

Article 1. The delivery prices for parts, components and subassemblies of machines, equipment and installations which result from dismantlings of equipment taken out of operation in accordance with the legal provisions and which can be used as such or through simple processing are set by the units that possess them, with the agreement of the customers, within the limit of at most 80 percent of their prices in new condition. In the case in which the parts, components and subassemblies need reconditioning, the prices are set within the limit of at most 40 percent of their prices in new condition.

Article 2. For parts, components and subassemblies resulting from reconditioning, delivery prices equal to the production prices are set by the units that perform these operations, with the agreement of the customer units, on the basis of the prices determined in accordance with Article 1, the standard expenses for reconditioning them and a suitable profit.

The delivery prices set in accordance with the preceding paragraph can go up to at most 80 percent of the delivery prices of the respective products in new condition, taking into account the condition and reliability of the respective products.

Article 3. The used spare parts, components and subassemblies reconditioned by the units that possess them that are used in the repair of their own equipment, apparatus or goods by these units are included in the cost of the respective repairs at the level of the expenditures made for the reconditioning operations, which cannot exceed 40 percent of the price of the spare part or component in new condition.

Article 4. In the case of the reconditioning of used spare parts, components and subassemblies performed as a service by other units than the possessing ones, the payment for the reconditioning operations will be done on the basis of rates that are set by the performing units, with the agreement of the customer units. These rates cannot exceed 40 percent of the value of the part or component in new condition.

Article 5. The delivery prices for materials reusable as such or through simple processing resulting from sawing, cutting or processing that are utilized in other units than those in which they result are set on the basis of calculation coefficients at 60-80 percent of the delivery price of the respective material in normal condition, depending on the volumes of processing, manual labor and other additional expenses in comparison with those for new materials.

The determination of the calculation coefficients, under the conditions of the preceding paragraph, is done by the Ministry of Technical-Material Supply and Control of the Management of Fixed Assets, with the agreement of the State Committee for Prices. As the case may be, the planned degree of utilization of the materials, the provisions of the internal standards or norms, and the provisions contained in Article 12 of State Council Decree No 465/1979 will be taken into account in establishing these coefficients.

Article 6. The delivery prices for construction and installation materials resulting from demolition are set by the possessing units, with the agreement of the customer socialist units, depending on the prices of the same materials in new condition and taking into account the degree of wear of the respective materials and, as the case may be, the volume of additional manual labor needed for utilizing them.

Article 7. For products in whose manufacture reusable materials and reconditioned parts and subassemblies are used and which have approved prices, the economic units will continue to apply these prices, on the condition of the maintenance of the technical, construction and functional parameters taken into account in the initial setting of the prices of the respective products, a situation confirmed by the industrial central or, as the case may be, the higher ranking body to which the main customers for such products belong.

The prices of new products in whose manufacture reusable materials or reconditioned parts and subassemblies are utilized are set with these materials being taken into calculation at the prices of those in new condition, in the case in which the fulfillment of the technical, construction and functional parameters stipulated in the quality documents of similar finished products is completely ensured, under the conditions provided in the preceding paragraph.

Article 8. The provisions stipulated in Article 7 are also applied accordingly to repair work and other services.

Article 9. The savings arising as a result of the application of the provisions of articles 7 and 8 are considered an individual effort of the respective economic units and will be reflected in the profits achieved by them.

The sums obtained from the utilization of parts, components and subassemblies of machines, equipment and installations and of old supplies and raw materials resulting from the dismantling of equipment taken out of operation are included in the economic results of the units possessing the respective asset.

Article 10. The purchase and delivery prices for reusable materials which do not have prices set and which are to be utilized in the economy are set by the Ministry of Technical-Material Supply and Control of the Management of Fixed Assets, with the agreement of the State Committee for Prices, within the limit of at most 50 percent of the price of the new material.

Article 11. The provisions of State Council Decree No 332/1977 are extended to all categories of used objects coming from individual households and are applied accordingly for all socialist units that, according to law, perform reconditioning work on such objects.

Article 12. The stocks of reusable material resources which are formed in the enterprises for the recovery and utilization of reusable materials, within the limit of the plan targets for recovery and purchases, and which temporarily cannot be utilized due to the lack of processing capacities or technologies are credited by the National Bank of the Socialist Republic of Romania, with an interest of 1 percent per year.

USE OF ROADS BY FOREIGN FREIGHT VEHICLES REGULATED BY DECREE

Bucharest BULETINUL OFICIAL in Romanian Part I No 64, 1 Sep 81 pp 2-3

/Decree of the State Council on the Establishment of the Conditions for Use of Roads by Motor Vehicles Registered in Other States That Carry Freight in International Traffic on the Territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania/

/Text/ The State Council of the Socialist Republic of Romania decrees:

Article 1. The use of roads by motor vehicles, including their trailers and semitrailers, with or without a load, registered in other states, that travel on the territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania, in direct traffic or in transit, is done on the basis of a transport permit.

The transport permits are issued by the Ministry of Transportation and Telecommunications. In their period of validity, the permits give the right to a single round trip.

The transport permits are sent to the competent authorities of the states with which the Socialist Republic of Romania has agreements concluded regarding international road transportation, with a view to their utilization in accordance with the provisions of these agreements, and to the Romanian units with tasks in the field of international road transportation, in order to be put at the disposal of the foreign carriers at the border, with the payment of the taxes mentioned in Article 3.

Article 2. For transportation with motor vehicles, including their trailers and semitrailers, registered in other states, with or without a load, with tonnages and dimensions, or only some of them, that exceed the maximum limits allowed by law, a special permit, supplemental to the transport permit, is issued by the bodies and units mentioned in Article 1.

The route and the conditions that must be observed by the motor vehicles mentioned in Paragraph 1 in their movement on the territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania are put in the special permit.

Article 3. Motor vehicles, including their trailers and semitrailers, registered in other states, that travel on the territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania, with or without a load, are subject to the payment of the following taxes:

a) The transport-permit tax of 53 lei;

b) The road-use tax of 0.08 lei per ton of total gross weight (the weight of the motor vehicle plus the load) and per kilometer traveled;

c) The additional tax of 0.24 lei per ton of total gross weight and per kilometer traveled, in the case in which the motor vehicles exceed:

The maximum limits of the tonnages on the axle and of the dimensions, or only some of them, allowed according to law;

The maximum limits of the tonnages on the axle and of the dimensions, or only some of them, applicable to motor vehicles registered in the Socialist Republic of Romania, on the territories of other states that have lower limits set than those provided by Romanian legislation.

d) The tax of 0.32 lei per kilometer traveled for partial compensation for the cost of fuel, applicable to motor vehicles registered in the states that, on their territories, levy such taxes on motor vehicles registered in the Socialist Republic of Romania.

Article 4. The payment of the taxes provided in the present decree is done in accordance with the payment agreements in force between the Socialist Republic of Romania and the state of registration of the respective motor vehicle. In the case in which a payment agreement is not concluded, the payment of the taxes is done in freely convertible valuta, at the official rate of exchange with premium in force on the day of payment.

Article 5. In the case of the failure to observe the route or the conditions indicated in the special permit, and in the situations in which motor vehicles that carry freight in international traffic travel on roads that are not open to such traffic, one of the following penalties can be applied to the carriers:

a) A warning;

b) The temporary suspension, partial or total, of the right to carry out transportation on the territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania.

In the case in which, as a result of the violation committed, the carrier has to pay a difference in taxes, the detainment of the motor vehicle can be ordered until its payment.

The penalties and measures provided in paragraphs 1 and 2 are applied by the bodies with control powers in the Ministry of Transportation and Telecommunications, under the conditions established by it, in compliance with the provisions of the agreements on international road transportation concluded with other states.

Article 6. The Ministry of Transportation and Telecommunications, with the advice of the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation, on the basis of the principle of reciprocity, can agree to the granting of facilities or the application of restrictions, as follows:

a) The exemption from a transport permit;

b) The limitation of the transportation carried out with motor vehicles registered in other states;

c) The raising, reduction or exemption from the payment of the taxes provided in Article 3, in correspondence with the level of the taxes that are levied by other states on Romanian motor vehicles that carry freight in international traffic on the territories of those states, there also being taken into account, as the case may be, the mutual volume of traffic;

d) The exchanging by the drivers, on each entry of motor vehicles registered in other states onto the territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania, of a sum in freely convertible valuta corresponding to the sum levied on Romanian motor vehicles in these states;

e) The application of percentage taxes on the value of the freight carried or depending on the travel time of the motor vehicles on Romanian territory or taxes of another nature that may be similar to those that are levied on motor vehicles registered in the Socialist Republic of Romania on the territories of the states that levy such taxes. In the cases when the value of the freight does not result from the documents that accompany the transportation, a fixed tax of 3,000 lei will be applied for each motor vehicle.

Article 7. The Ministry of Transportation and Telecommunications will keep track of the evolution of the level of the road taxes and other taxes applied to automotive freight transportation on an international level and will periodically update the road taxes levied in our country, with the advice of the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation.

Article 8. The Ministry of Transportation and Telecommunications, the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation will issue methodological standards regarding the calculation, collection and distribution of the taxes set in accordance with the present decree.

Article 9. The present decree goes into force 45 days after the date of its publication in BULETINUL OFICIAL AL REPUBLICII SOCIALISTE ROMANIA.

Council of Ministers Decision No 136/1970 for Establishing the Conditions for Use of Roads by Foreign Motor Vehicles That Travel on the Territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania, Carrying Freight in International Traffic, published in BULETINUL OFICIAL AL REPUBLICII SOCIALISTE ROMANIA, Part I, No 7, 17 February 1970, as amended by Council of Ministers Decision No 206 of 3 May 1976, is repealed on the date that the present decree goes into force.

ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF CENTER FOR AERONAUTICAL MEDICINE

Bucharest REVISTA SANITARA MILITARA in Romanian No 2, Apr-May-Jun 81 pp 217-219

[Article by doctor Captain Dr Traian Popescu: "The 60th Anniversary of the Center for Aeronautical Medicine"]

[Text] On 20 December 1980, the proceedings of the scientific jubilee session celebrating the 60th anniversary of the Center for Aeronautical Medicine were carried out in Bucharest.

This festive session, which was held in the auditorium of the Center for Aeronautical Medicine and chaired by aviator Lieutenant General Gheorghe Zarnescu, was honored by the presence of numerous personalities in the realm of Romanian medicine, academicians and corresponding members of the Academy of the Socialist Republic of Romania, professors, doctors docent and over 150 doctors, pharmacists, psychologists, chemists and engineers.

Sitting on the presidium of the meeting were: aviator Lieutenant General Gheorghe Zarnescu, academician professor Dr docent Stefan Milcu, professor Dr docent Marin Voiculescu, professor Dr docent Petre Groza, doctor Major General Dr Florian Vlad, aviator Colonel Dumitru Burlacu, aviator Colonel Toma Nicolae, doctor Colonel Dr Florin Uleu and doctor Colonel Dr Maurica Stoian.

In a splendid manner the following persons greeted the Center for Aeronautical Medicine on behalf of themselves and the institutes that they represent: professor Marin Voiculescu (Union of Associations of Medical Sciences), professor Petre Groza (Institute of Normal and Pathological Physiology), engineer Colonel Dr Constantin Teodorescu Tintea (National Council for Science and Technology), doctor Major General Dr Florian Vlad and aviator Colonel Nicolae Toma.

Other speakers were: reserve aviator Major General Constantin Sendrea (on behalf of the navigators), reserve Colonel Dr Vasile Lazarovici (on behalf of the former workers in the Center for Aeronautical Medicine), and doctor Colonel Dr Florian Uleu (on behalf of doctors in aviation).

In conclusion, aviator Lieutenant General Gheorghe Zarnescu spoke on behalf of the leadership of the Air Force Command.

The speakers emphasized the importance of this event and pointed out the contribution made by the Center for Aeronautical Medicine, the sole institute of this type in the country, to providing medical care for flight activities. They also gave high marks to the selection process, examination and supervision of flight personnel, to medical-aeronautical research activities and to the accomplishments and good reputation for which the Center is recognized abroad.

The scientific session was opened by doctor Colonel Dr Maurica Stoian with a report entitled: "The Center for Aeronautical Medicine on its 60th Anniversary." The review of its main moments in history and its traditions began with 6 August 1920, when the Center for Aeronautical Medicine was created by Decision No 466 of the Ministry of War regarding the organization of the Health Service for Military Aeronautics. This was one of the first institutes of this type in the world and it had as its purpose: "to conduct the medical exams on candidates for the flying school and to periodically review the flight personnel."

The Center for Aeronautical Medicine went through a period of development: in April 1938, it became the Central Medical Institute of Romanian Aeronautics.

After 23 August 1944, because of the special attention that the party gave to the army in general, the Ministry of Defense and the Medical Directorate provided everything necessary so that the Center for Aeronautical Medicine could experience an especially strong development.

The last 15 years have marked a spectacular leap forward through the development of the material base and the unending professional improvement of the doctors and through the achievement of a new quality in the activities for examining and supervising flight personnel.

Currently, the Center for Aeronautical Medicine has a functional place, a modern material base and a series of equipment for examination and investigation representing the latest advances in technology, as well as improved computer equipment.

The means of determining the state of health of flight personnel, the laboratory tests and the methods for testing functional reserves have been diversified, creating broad possibilities for uncovering many of the illnesses in their early stages and for ensuring the recuperation of the stricken flight personnel.

Examinations are carried out on the basis of certain modern, profoundly scientific concepts seeking to achieve a complete balance between man's physical and mental possibilities and the specific demands of flight activities.

There is true pride in the fact that the selection of the first future Romanian cosmonauts was conducted by the Center for Aeronautical Medicine, a process especially valued by collaborators in other countries.

Medical-aeronautical examinations are creatively completed through a sustained medical and psychological scientific research activity. The doctors in the Center are the authors of certain original investigation and examination concepts, have carried out a rich journalistic activity (over 110 papers and reports in the last 3 years) and have participated in congresses and conferences dealing with aero-space subjects both in-country and abroad (Canada, Czechoslovakia, GDR, USSR, Poland and France).

Continuing, doctor Colonel Dr Ioan Pintilie presented the report "Aspects in Scientific Research Activities in the Section for Functional Exploration," reviewing the achievements in the field of obtaining modern equipment and conducting functional investigations and in the field of scientific research.

The psychologist Dr Valeriu Ceausu reported on the modern methods that have served as a basis for the selection of future Romanian cosmonauts and on the scientific points of the "Psycho" program contained in the research program for the first space flight of a Romanian cosmonaut.

Ten other reports were also presented by specialists from the offices dealing with internal medicine, surgery, radiology, O.R.L., dentistry, the clinical laboratory and the aeronautical hygiene laboratory. The reports pointed out the the diversity of the concerns of the specialists in the Center for Aeronautical Medicine and attested to the research work under real and simulated conditions involving flight factors and their influence upon the human body and to the interest in finding the best measures for protection for the purpose of providing medical care for flights and preventing flight accidents.

Along with the jubilee session, a book was published and distributed to the invited guests entitled: "Studies and Research in Aeronautical and Space Medicine and Psychology. A Collection of Articles and Reports, Bibliographic Materials and Documents (1971-1975);" as well as "The History of the Center for Aeronautical Medicine" and the book "The Proceedings of the Scientific Jubilee Session - December 1980."

The major interest with which this scientific session was received on the 60th anniversary of the Center for Aeronautical Medicine and the broad and valuable participation at the session constituted a success and consolidated the position of aeronautical medicine in the realm of accomplishments of Romanian medicine.

BUREAUCRACY, FORMALISM BLAMED FOR POOR RESULTS IN OLTENIA MINING COMBINE

Bucharest SCINTEIA TINERETULUI in Romanian 15 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Ion D. Cucu: "Each Ton of Coal is Valuable in the Country's Energy Balance"]

[Text] Given its size and its great importance in coal extraction, it can justifiably be said that in recent years, the Oltenia Mining Combine has become a veritable barometer of Romania's energy production. Obviously, since this is the largest lignite exploitation in the country, the manner in which the more than 31,000 workers in the Oltenia mining area abide by the tasks they have assumed, and by the pledges they have made to extract and deliver coal to power plants, will determine the actual fulfillment of the program to develop the raw material and energy basis of socialist Romania, as adopted by the 12th Party Congress, a document which outlines our party and state strategy to achieve complete energy independence for the nation. Starting with these general considerations, and finding ourselves in the last quarter of the year, we felt that it would be appropriate to analyze the achievements of the plan's provisions at the combine, during the period which just ended.

"Acting on the indications that Nicolae Ceausescu, secretary general of the party, offered during his working visit to the Gorj coal area," we were told by the combine's party committee secretary, Ilie Rautescu, "the workers in the Oltenia mining units have oriented all their activities toward a better utilization of all production capabilities, and in particular of the high capacity equipment in mines and pits. We have established suitable measures for the conscientious, responsible participation of each miner to the achievement of this year's plan tasks, and for preparing the conditions necessary for increasing lignite production during the current five-year plan. The results obtained during the first nine months are higher by 2 million tons than those obtained during the same period last year. At the same time, the utilization indicator in open pits has grown by 4 percent, increasing the volume of excavations by more than 5 million cubic meters (mc). However, viewed in the light of the demands and requirements made by the party leadership to fulfill the program for development and valorification of the raw materials necessary to produce electricity, we must note that serious shorcomings still exist in our activity, as demonstrated by the fact that this year's production is lagging by 7 million tons of coal." What does this shortage represent? The answer is easy: it is the equivalent of the 1980 coal consumption at the Rogojelu plant, namely 4.3 billion kW of electric power! In continuing our analysis, we will of course delve mainly on the causes that have led to this shortage, stressing the measures that must be taken for the most rapid correction of the situation.

One of the essential conditions for fulfilling the plan's coal production tasks, is to achieve the volume of cover removal in open pits, which holds the mining bulk that must excavated. Here again, the results amount to only 40 percent, registering a plan shortage of more than 22 million m^3 a volume which is added to the shortages of more than 500 million mc of cover removal of previous periods. For the purposes of our investigation, let us find out what factors have led to this highly unsatisfactory situation. Our discussions have disclosed that the shortages are primarily due to the fact that only 79.1 percent of the intensive indicator for rotor excavators has been achieved, the average hourly capacity being only 599 mc, compared to the planned 757 mc. The situation is even more critical at Tismana I with an indicator of 45.1 percent, Rovinari Est with 62 percent, and Pesteana Sud with 66 percent. Much more serious yet, is the recording of hours of operation of rotor excavators, where only 64 percent of their extensive exploitation indicator has been met. In practice, nearly 25,000 of the 72,000 planned hours of operation represent non-operating time. The poorest performance is found at Girla (54 percent), Tismana II (49.7 percent), Rovinari Est (61 percent), and Rosia Pesteana (51.6 percent). This state of affairs can be easily explained: unjustified stoppages and breakdowns in open pits, which can be ascribed solely to indifference, poor discipline, and lack of responsibility, not only on the part of operators, but equally as well on the part of some management staffs. The explanations received from Aurel Merlusca, chief engineer at Rovinari Est, Dumitru Popescu, chief engineer at Pesteana Sud, and even from the director for mechanical and power systems at the Rovinari Mining Enterprise, Gabriel Miertescu, are far from describing the real causes, which supports the statement which we have already made.

Continuing our investigation, we easily concluded that the production plan also failed to be completed because all units of the combine have a large volume of unused tooling, in particular of tooling for underground work and ancillary equipment. Stored at this time without having been used, are 20 mechanized cutting systems, 30 heading combines, 10 cutting machines, 160 16-ton dump trucks, the waste carrier at Tismana, the slope bridge at Rosita, underground belt transporters, mine locomotives, compressors, and winches. In fact, the volume of unused equipment amounts to nearly 900,000 million lei. And in addition to the fact that it does not produce anything, this equipment is also proving to be extremely costly: the penalty interest that is being paid for it amounts to more than 100 million lei per year. If to this we add the great shortcomings in the management, storage, and maintenance of this equipment, and the fact that most enterprises do not even know the condition of their inventory--how big is their endowment, and how much of it is operational, under repair, or just parked--we have yet another proof of the poor discipline displayed by the actual managements of the combine's subordinated units.

One frequently encountered practice is the dismantling of equipment, even when new, under the pretext that spare parts are not available; this is facilitated to a large extent by the fact that the equipment is delivered "by understanding" or "by word of honor," without even minimal delivery formalities. On the other hand, the full force of formalism and bureaucracy can be felt when it becomes a matter of adopting effective and efficient measures; some situations are downright anachronisms. For instance, we learned that the daily report of underground mine production is estimated (and highly inflated:), without weighing the coal. Of course, the real reports--ten-day or monthly final ones--undergo essential adjustments as a result of topographic measurements. The solution is to weigh the production at each mine entrance, even at the risk of violating the instructions and methods of the ministry, which a document of the party committe for the combine qualified as being based on "increasingly superficial and estimative elements." And this is because only an exact knowledge of the situation allows the effective adoption of solutions to remedy shortcomings and bring the production plan back within its boundaries. Also under the bureaucracy chapter, we could include hiring practices, which are carried out through the intermediary of the enterprise (losing an average of 6-10 days), even though each mine has a personnel department which could do the same thing in 2-3 days at most. Similarly, materials and spare parts are supplied only with the approval (formal signature) of the enterprise, while a consumption file could easily be introduced, thus eliminating the intermediate link which complicates rather than simplifies matters.

And since we have mentioned this frequent formalism which impedes activities, some examples are in order. It is well known that numerous inspections have been conducted to correct the combine's economic situation; and measures have been taken, which in most cases mainly remain filed in folders. Such has been the case for the equipment utilization inspection (only 30 percent of the proposed measures being effectively implemented), for the analysis of indirect labor (with the indirect personnel being reduced by 30 percent on paper but only 15 percent in reality!), and for the fixed assets inventory (inventory which was repeatedly reported as concluded, but which as we have already mentioned, is far from even having been started!).

Given that we are getting very close to the cold season, the last point on which we will dwell is an analysis of the stage of completion of the program of technical-organizational measures, a program which will significantly influence the fulfillment of the production plan for the next period. We have learned that of the 584 measures for the combine as a whole, only 122 have been completed, and 423 are in progress. The deadlines have already expired for the remaining 39 (until the completion of the program). And even though it is known that the efficiency of interventions during bad weather is determined primarily by the availability of access to sites and work stations, the latter are the very aspects that have been neglected by the managements of units and sub-units at the enterprises Rovinari, Rosia Pesteana, and Jilt, when these organizations had both the time and the equipment to deal with them. In concrete terms, the protection canal was not completed at the open pit mine Tismana II, the access road was not built along T 401, sanitation installations were not placed in operation, and so on. The situation is not much different at the Jilt enterprise, (where the access road to the entrances of the Tehomir and Cojmanesti mines was not ballasted and compacted, and where the access road from the mine opening to the new Tehomir social and administrative complex was not built), and at the Urdari enterprise (where the heating installations were not insulated or inspected for water tightness, and where the necessary coal for thermal plants was not provided--sic!). For the latter, steps were not envisaged to remove underground water and protect the equipment.

Although oher examples abound, we will stop here for now, leting Ilie Rautescu, who has helped us conduct this investigation, state his opinion of these matters: "We are devoting attention to the problems that have been cited, and the efforts of the Oltenia Mining Combine management, as well as those of its subordinate units, are directed to find the most appropriate solutions for eliminating shortcomings. To begin with, steps have been taken to immediately organize the inventory of available equipment, send defective machinery for repair by specialized plants, and provide spare parts. Also on the subject of equipment, and since it seems to be the major cause for failing to fulfill the physical plan for coal and waste, we have established measures with the managements of units, and we will act to raise the utilization indicator of excavation units to 75 percent. Similarly, the degree of utilization of heading machines and of mechanical cutting machines (including the placement in operation of those in stock), will increase, so that the extensive indicator will be 86.5 percent, with an average monthly advance of more than 70 linear meters (ml) in cutting, and 190 ml in galleries for each combine. We will strengthen management, coordination, and technical assistance activities in all shifts. By means of these steps, we hope to recover part of the physical production shortcomings during the year's remaining three months. For the implementation of the program of measures for cold weather, we have performed ten-day analyses by means of which we aim to fulfill our tasks, having assigned specific tasks and responsibilities. There is no doubt however, that the workers remain the decisive factor, since they are the ones called upon to fulfill these measures. We are convinced that under the leadership of the party organization, communists, other workers, and all young people, who are in a majority in the combine, will not delay the inception of the tasks they have assumed, will implement the indications provided by the secretary general of the party, Nicolae Ceausescu, during his visit here in Gorj, with the conviction that each ton of coal extracted is important in obtaining the desired goal, Romania's energy independence."

STIPE SUVAR DISCUSSES YOUTH PROBLEMS

Zagreb VJESNIK in Serbo-Croatian 31 Oct 81 p 4, 1 Nov 81 p 3

[Concluding segments, Nos 5 and 6, of serial publication of the introductory address delivered by Stipe Suvar, member of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Croatia and chairman of the Croatian Republic Committee for Education, Culture, and Physical and Popular Technical Education, at the conference "Upbringing Based on the Achievements and Traditions of the National Liberation Struggle and Socialist Revolution," which was held 28-30 September this year on Zvecevo: "Achievements of the National Liberation Struggle and Our Contemporary Scene"]

[Text] Three-fourths of the Yugoslav population have no personal experience or memory of the National Liberation Struggle. They were born afterward, or they were small children who might remember something from their childhood. A man who is today 51 was 10 in 1941. He might, say, have some basic experience which is not a child's memory. But all of half of the population of Yugoslavia, indeed more than half, were not living even in 1948 nor in that time of impoverished socialism in the first postwar years. All of that is something told by others, what they have learned from their elders, the departing generations.

And when now the story about Stepinac surges up, since the top leaders of the Catholic Church in Yugoslavia would like the pope to proclaim him a saint (but the pope probably has better candidates for saints!), a university student, in NIN [WEEKLY NEWS MAGAZINE] it seems to me, published a letter saying: Well, give us, tell us, something about this Stepinac, this is the first time I have heard of him. How are we to be sure that the young generations hear about what they should hear and know about without that being a boring moralistic tale related in a private home, a tale, if such exists, in which by the nature of things the battle between fathers and sons in Turgenev's sense takes place? How to achieve a situation in which society, by its entire life style, if you like, emits that kind of reflection of everything that is our revolutionary tradition?

It Is Not Enough To Unveil Monuments

And I would immediately mention: it is not enough to have one celebration or event after another and to unveil monuments. There is a danger that young people will be indifferent to this even when they attend the celebrations and visit the monuments. It is important to acknowledge what is our recent history, what has given us our upsurge, and what has been happening in the contemporary period in the domain of revolutionary activity, which is also something that young people should be drawn into on their own, as principals.

After all, our young people today, just like young people everywhere and in all periods of time, are looking for their own identity in conditions of life which are not the conditions of life of previous generations. In 1968, to illustrate, there were some sort of student disturbances in Belgrade, and to a smaller extent in Zagreb, Ljubljana and Sarajevo. Members of that generation of university students, by no means all of them, were inspired by this as by some ethos of their own. Now these are mainly people between 32 and 36 to 38 years of age, but at that time they were attending the university. And they have taken up positions in the news media, in publishing houses, in universities and institutes. And now they have stirred everything up with their spiel, which almost implies that nothing important has even happened in our postwar development except that '68 of theirs. And they are passing this doctrine of theirs onto young people, as can be seen by articles in certain university and youth newspapers (for example, in STUDENTSKI LIST of Zagreb). But actually it was in '68 that nothing important happened: the children of our good socialist people, and it was primarily they, felt some sort of emptiness, felt that their studies were not what they should be and that they had no opportunities to show their own responsibility. And they began to shout against their own fathers the slogan: Down with the Red bourgeoisie. But those fathers are continuing even today to support some of them.

Those are those circumstances from which is born what one might call a false revolutionary consciousness. And then when they make comparisons, they set that '68 of theirs, [not] even tacitly, but indeed explicitly on a level with '48 and '50 and '41. How might they have behaved if something had happened? But I repeat, fortunately nothing did happen, since they could have caused chaos, which would not have led to further democratization in the direction of socialist self-management. However, even in the case of that generation it was a question of the search for identity, and there were and have remained in society many cracks; it is a fact that it is not easy for young people to arrive at satisfaction of their natural aspirations to express themselves, to affirm themselves and to come into what is theirs, to test what they have inside themselves and to become serious people.

In the "Student Center" in 1971, why hide it, several thousand young people sang the anthem "Our Beautiful [Croatia]" after Tito's speech in Karadjordjevo. They thought that singing "Our Beautiful" was some problem. But it was sung by the members of the council at the first, second and third sessions of ZAVNOH [Croatian Regional Antifascist Council of National Liberation]. Leave to one side that the nationalists and the hostile emigre community have been abusing that anthem and have historically taken it as evidence that the Croats, as they said, have still not gone to ruin. How to account for that gap? As though Tito had forbidden them to sing "Our Beautiful." Why was that sentiment formed? At least 90 percent of those young people were not nationalists then, nor are they today. But, you know, there are many people who are carried along by the wind, and he who takes the initiative takes them along with them. It is a question of who has the initiative at a particular time.

Now they are debating in Kosovo and in Macedonia the flag and symbol which the Albanian minority is to use. But in the period of the National Liberation Struggle Tito ordered from the Supreme Headquarters that the Albanian (Shiptar) partisans carry their own national flag, but just add to it a five-pointed star. And that is what they did. And there were no problems at all. But then came the bureaucratic policy after 1946, when a Serb in a rural area might, say, get married, ride around on his horse, and carry the flag which for him was both the national flag and his ethnic flag. If the Albanian did the same thing with the flag under which he had fought in the National Liberation Struggle he would have been under suspicion all the way up to 1966. To be sure, the problem is that in the meantime that flag had become altogether identical with the national flag of the Socialist Republic of Albania, and the nationalistic elements could abuse that fact.

Failures in Youth Policy

Why do I mention these details? Somewhere there is a break in real work with the young generations and in creating space for their involvement in social decisionmaking, for their responsibility, especially in the light of the fact that an ever greater percentage of young people are spending too long doing nothing but attending school, isolated from the world of work and from the problems of supporting themselves, and indeed from bearing some sort of responsibility both for their family and for society and for social development. An ever greater percentage are going on to postgraduate studies and even postdoctoral training, especially those in the large cities.

So drawing a parallel, making a comparison between the role of the young people in the National Liberation Struggle and those today does not come out in our favor.

I am personally concerned because of the outsider position of young people in our society, because of the real life situations in which it does not have responsibility for itself and for social development. Generations of parents have been almost pathologically sacrificing themselves for their children, supporting them even to the age of 30 and even 35, and the children are becoming more and more critical, not uncommonly even arrogant; they do not have a satisfactory work ethic, but they do on the other hand have an increasingly rebellious consciousness. To be sure, the social problem of youth unemployment is ever more serious because of the gap between education and work, and to that extent opportunities are restricted for young people to live off their work and obtain a place to live at an early age. This means that much has been and still is wrong in the social policy toward young people.

Let me not be misunderstood: I would mention that I am convinced that the large majority of the present generations of young people are committed to socialism and would behave according to that song of Balasevic's "Count on Us" (though there is something demagogic in that song, since the problem lies in the fact that the young people are singing count on us, but perhaps inside they are singing: do as much as possible for us, instead of its doing as much as possible for itself!).

The mentality of someone who likes to get everything on a silver platter has become widespread among young people. There are quite a few young people who expect everything to be served on a platter. The fact that the youth organization is not working is always supposed to be blamed on some leadership or some opstina conference. But why is anyone to blame except those young people who belong to a particular youth organization. We encounter a contradictory consciousness among young people: they demand the right to stand on their own feet, but they put themselves in the position of dependency. And that is what is disturbing.

The role of young people in the National Liberation War is more than instructive if viewed in the light of these trends. We often recall Tito's words uttered at the First Congress of USAOJ [Unified Alliance of Antifascist Youth of Yugoslavia] in Bihac in 1942, to the effect that 75 percent of the fighters in the National Liberation Army and partisan detachments were young people under 20. It seems that when it was necessary to tear down the old society and to fight with weapons in the first ranks the young people were very capable, but when peacetime development came they took up an outsider position in many things.

How To Be a Revolutionary Today

And when it comes to the impact on young people of the National Liberation Struggle on the one hand and of the counterrevolution on the other, we must not lose sight of the fact that some young people, we do not reliably know how many, may be tied in an intimate way, in their consciousness, in their orientations, to historical tendencies which were politically defeated in the National Liberation Struggle or afterward, to the forces of nationalism, clericalism, Stalinism, and so on. Even today counterrevolutionary and petty bourgeois forces, insofar as they are still present in our society, are fighting for the young. And the winds of the world also carry various things. Yet the degree of organization, the subtlety, the ability of the organized socialist forces to act in a subtle way, are often in doubt. The teaching of history, films and books that testify to those events, monuments--all that is necessary, but not enough. The basic thing is that we have an impact in bringing up young people by what I would call turning to the problems of the present and by linking them, in the sense of revolutionary continuity, to the past.

How is one to be a revolutionary today, how is one to act today in the spirit of what the revolution in the National Liberation Struggle specifically developed? That is the main question. Do this and this, and do not do this and this.

In short, we have not been waging a diversified and well-proportioned battle for the system of values to be found in the history of the National Liberation Struggle.

It Is Not Enough To Say That Someone Was a Criminal

There is something else that is important: When we speak to the new generations about the National Liberation Struggle, about what preceded it and what followed it, we often assume that their grandfathers and fathers participated in the National Liberation Struggle. If you want to know the truth, a majority did not participate, even though SUBNOR [Federation of Associations of Fighters in the National Liberation War] is an organization numbering in the millions even today.

At one time there were about 300,000 Chetniks of Draza Mihailovic, to take just one group. And there were about 300,000 Home Guards who, indeed like some of the Chetniks, went over to the Partisans, or at least gave them ammunition, and the Partisans removed their clothing when they captured them. There were about 90,000 Ustashi. And there were also quite a few Ballists and White Guards and other Quisling forces.

When today we interpret the National Liberation Struggle, we often forget to point out the true nature of the class enemy, which by a deeper logic is reproducing itself here and there even today. We still do not have a single solid socialist study of, say, the Ustasha or Chetnik movements. We do have some historical writing. In Serbia two books have been published about the Chetnik movement, and the book of the prewar emigre Jozo Tomasevic, who studied the international archives concerning the Chetniks, has been translated, and so on. But the ideology of the Chetnik movement, of the Ustasha movement, of the Ballist movement, and so on, by the nature of things cannot vanish that same moment when their organized military formations disappear. Incidentally, the last group of Chetniks who had gone into hiding was liquidated only in 1956.

In the interpretation of the complicated picture of the National Liberation Struggle, then, there is a lack of proportionate interpretation of the forces of the counterrevolution, which had set themselves up in opposition to it. After all, we mention the Ustashi, the Chetniks, and so on, only in a stereotyped way, to the effect that they were heinous criminals. Certainly they were that, but it is not enough to leave it at that. And in general not much is achieved in bringing up children and young people by reducing the National Liberation Struggle to a comic strip or a western. It is not enough only to say that someone was a criminal; one needs to interpret the class and social background of the nationalistic and counterrevolutionary movement. Those in the Chetniks and Ustashi were mainly the rural poor who had put on a uniform and weapons. But the one who led them is another matter.

So, to repeat: new generations do not live off the merits of the older generations. It is essential that they arrive on their own at what they should do, that they continue the continuity of the revolution today by creatively affirming themselves, by proving themselves through their work. Freeing the country, let us say, of the technological enslavement in which we are groaning today, would be a large task of the revolution today, and at the same time an open type of socialism would be preserved.

The new generations will carry on the cause of the revolution if they see their own future and the future of our society not in a flourishing of political freedom while the forces of capital exercise sovereign domination in the background, as in the case of the West, nor in perpetuation of the party and state, which is happening in the socialist East, but if they are inspired by what E. Kardelj wrote before his death, that neither the state nor the party can bring a man happiness, but he can create it himself if he makes the decision about the conditions of his work and life. So that every man, and especially the young, finds himself today in the upward swing of development, which had its origin in the National Liberation Struggle and without it we would not have amounted to anything, but would have vegetated in a provincial chimney corner of Europe, regardless of whether we would have been ruled by those from the East or those from the West.

The fight against sediment left by various floods on the highway of our socialist development, against all that sediment which is today burdening the mainstream of the revolution today, against privatization and petty bourgeois transformation of life in many spheres, against the growing parasitism even of an increasing portion of the young generations, against the rule of mediocrities, and the struggle to overcome the crisis of responsibility and socialist ethics, and so on--all of that is a revolutionary battle in the present time which can be unceasingly inspired by what the National Liberation Struggle meant and by its achievements and its tradition. I am deeply convinced that we will have to go through a catharsis to find our way back to the original values of our revolution.

RELIGIOUS CUSTOMS PERSIST IN MARRIAGES IN MIRDITE

Tirana DREJTESIA POPULLORE in Albanian No 2, Apr-Jun 81, pp 76-85

[The Development of Marital Relations in Mirdite District]

[Text] As a result of the further development of the socialist revolution, in Mirdite District, like everywhere else in the country, the family marital relations have changed in accordance with the socialist nature of our economic and political order, with communist norms and morality, with the principles of socialist ideology. The position of the party and of the people's authority toward this great social problem is based on the healthy principles of Marxism-Leninism, on the invaluable teachings of Comrade Enver Hoxha.

During the National Liberation War, the Albanian communists worked to protect the Albanian family from the seed of denationalization which the foreign rulers planted, to overcome the artificial obstacles in marital bonds resulting from religious differences, for equality between woman and man, for the activization of the women and youth in the national liberation movement and in the social and political life of the country, and so forth. The aim of our party, declared Comrade Enver Hoxha at the Second Plenum of the Central Committee of the AWP, is "...to work with ideological intensity for the molding of the family which can take place only when correct, equal and free relations are established, distinguished by pure and deep feelings, free of any control or remnant of private property and of its concepts...." (Enver Hoxha, "Reports and Speeches" 1967-1968, p 138).

Marxism-Leninism teaches us that marriage is a historic-social phenomenon born under specific historic-social conditions. "Our country--stresses Comrade Enver--has known forced marriages, has known the enslaving, polygamous, and inhuman laws of barter marriages for the women; it has known the laws of Catholicism, of the Vatican, which not only enslaved and denigrated the woman, but also tormented her in a beastly and spiritual manner" (Ibid., p 135). According to article 21 of the Code of Lek Dukagjini, marriage means "to provide the house with an additional person to work and to produce children." Consequently, marriage charged the woman with a dual function, to provide the family hearth with additional members, and to provide through sweat and effort, as a necessary addition to the family, a "work hand" just like a house animal to increase the income of the patriarchal-feudal family, without any right to self-enrichment.

Thus, our country inherited from the past a particularly accentuated backwardness in the area of marital and family relations. And one of the most serious plagues of the Albanian family before the liberation was the deep inequality and the enslavement of woman by man. In describing the condition of the woman of that period, Comrade Enver Hoxha stresses: "Woman's economic dependence on man locked the woman within the four walls of the house, and her only functions were to be a mother, to give birth and raise children, to do the housework, to wash and massage the feet of the husband, of the father-in-law and mother-in-law, and when the husband, the father-in-law and mother-in-law did not like her any longer, the husband would send the wife with a bag of rags back to her father, followed by a stamp, as they say in the south, which means separation. It happened that the man would separate from his wife only because she did not bear him a son but only daughters. Often he did not divorce her, but would marry two or three more times, if not more, thus turning the home into a slave harem" (Enver Hoxha, "Works," vol 13, p 58).

This panorama describes correctly the inferior position of the woman in family life and reveals the social inequality within the feudal-bourgeois society which relied on the exploitation of the majority of the people by a privileged minority. Especially in the past, the women suffered the most and were the most exploited and most oppressed. And, among others, the ones who suffered the most as a result of the inhumane customs of the Code "...three times enslaved during their entire life: by the clans, the church and the men," (Enver Hoxha, "Reports and Speeches," 1965-1966, p 362), were the heroic women of Mirdite, where the most enslaving and most barbaric norms of the Lek Dukagjini Code applied. This is the way the Code defined the enslaving position of the woman: The woman must be ruled by man, she must serve him without contradiction, must raise the child honorably, must clothe the child, and must not interfere with the engagement of the sons and daughters" (article 33). Whereas the right was recognized for the man "to beat and tie his wife when she objects and disobeys him." "The woman also has no rights regarding her sons at home" (Article 58, letter "b"). "The woman of the house does not have the right to sell, buy or barter without the permission of the master of the house," it is stated in article 23/3 of the Code.

The norms of the Code of Lek Dukagjini contain rules which not only openly sanction the inequality of women but also the submission and inequality of the other members of the family to the head of the family. According to article 11, paragraph 29 of the Code, there are taken into consideration among other things, trial marriage and marriage through abduction of the woman or of the girl. "The father has all the rights over the sons and daughters, whereas the mother has none over her children (article 55). According to this norm, the father's authority over the children is very broad, which includes the life, freedom and their income. The father has the right to arrange engagements for the children, especially the girls, anytime, even during infancy and often even before birth." In this way, one cannot even talk about the wish of the children or the right to choose the future partner. The Code also defines the amount of the price for the woman. The price amounted to 1,500 grosh [equivalent to a cent], the same as the blood of the woman. As a result, the woman became a product, "market item" an absolute property of the man. The man thus was entirely free to handle the woman as it pleased him, even to decide about her fate without being accountable to anyone.

Article 31 describes the right of the boy to break his engagement: "Whenever he feels like it, the boy is free to get rid of the abducted girl." Whereas (according to article 32), "an engaged girl has no right to break her engagement to the boy even if she does not like him." If the boy breaks his engagement to the girl, she has no right to marry in the village of his father. Whereas article 33 states that "if the girl refuses to accept her fate, she will be forced to accept the boy, and if he catches her escaping, he kills her with the bullet of her parents, and the blood honor is restored." "The promised girl cannot marry again as long as he lives."

The woman, according to the Code, did not enjoy the rights of inheritance of the wealth left by the husband or the children. She had the right to stay in the house of the deceased husband, "to eat and drink, or take along 13 'oke' [measurement of weight] grosh and 3 loads of maize, if she leaves."

The fact that the woman does not inherit anything from her husband, is evident in this typical example: by a decision issued on 9 June 1919, according to the Mirdite Code, the elders of Mirdite consider as heirs of the captain of Mirdite, Prenk Bib Doda, who died childless in 1918, his male relatives, and declared as void the will made by him in favor of his wife, Lucia, with the alleged explanation that a will, according to the Code, can be made only "to leave something for a human being." The chairmanship of the Council of Ministers, by its decision No 1187/1 of 5 June 1922, recommended that the wife of the deceased Prenk Bib Doda, has the right to present her demands with regard to the inheritance of the wealth of the deceased husband, which is to be resolved "according to the existing laws and not according to the Lek Code."

Taking advantage of the favorable conditions created for him during the feudal-bourgeois rule of Ahmet Zog, the former patriarchal clan leader, the Mirdite captain, Mark Gjon Marku, deputy in parliament during that period, managed to issue in his favor a personal law decree under the heading: "About the examination of old inheritance claims in the highlands where the code is implemented...."

With the enactment of this law, Mark Gjon Marku, requested from the Mirdite court that he be recognized as the sole heir of Prenk Bib Doda, and the court accepted his request. As far as Lucia is concerned, by judging according to the Code, she was recognized as having the right to live in the house of Mark Gjon Marku, "to eat and drink or take along 13 oke grosh and 3 loads of maize, if she leaves" (V. Meksi, "Pre-War Legal Cases," DREJTESIA POPULLORE, No 1/1979, p 104).

These backward, patriarchal customs have disappeared today, because the social conditions, too, have radically changed. The changes which our proletarian revolution brought about, have also been influential in eliminating marital limitations within the village.

Comrade Enver, analyzing the causes of the appearance of exogamy stresses that: under the conditions of our country in the period when the Code was prepared, the interests of the youth were made subject to a broader interest, to the interest of property and of the clan, marriage within the clan was not allowed because the girl was used as a means to establish friendships and blood alliances with another clan...each clan, at the time when the Code was implemented, in order to assure its own existence, felt very much the need to create political-economic and military alliances with the other clans, in the same manner as is done between states. According to the Code, the Albanian highlander remains a relative and brother with all those whom his ancestors have broken away from at one time or another. "The Albanian may be split by 400 fires, but he does not take or give, that is, he does not commit krushqi." This backward, reactionary norm, because of force of habit, continues to be reflected among certain people; but in general, in comparison to the past, it finds little support. The concrete cases of marriages within the village enable us to draw the conclusion that the working masses of Mirdite district the profound conviction, that under the conditions of socialism and of the existence of the state of the dictatorship of the proletariat, the custom of preventing marriages within one or several villages is baseless.

As in every other problem, in matters related to women, the clergy maintained the most reactionary and anti-democratic position. In the defense of patriarchalism, the clergy, by preaching about the role of the mother in the education of the new generation, of the protection and improvement of the moral characteristics of women, justified the submissive position of the woman, her extraordinarily low and inhuman position. Religion itself has sanctioned the blind conviction of the submission of the woman. In Mirdite, when the bride entered the house of the spouse, the horse reins were circled three times over her head.

The Catholic clergy has continuously promoted the enslavement of the woman. As a result, neglected at home by the father, husband, the son, and outside the home by the entire society, the women were forsaken as ignorant creatures, physically crippled and morally wounded. The law and custom, the state and religion formed a great plot, the victim of which was the woman.

In marriages between two people with different religious backgrounds, the most conservative and most reactionary was the Catholic religion, which in Mirdite has exerted great influence, was widespread and had deep roots. This is why, despite the great work carried out in this direction, despite the powerful blows given to this religious dogma, there continue to be encountered in Mirdite District fanatics who try to interfere when two young people in love, of differing faiths, want to get married. "The old which dies--Comrade Enver teaches us--will always be at war with the new which is born and which is strengthened (Enver Hoxha, "Reports and Speeches 1967-1968," p 121).

The spirit of the Code of Lek Dukagjini and the routine in the implementation of some customs, are still encountered in rare cases and not in an accentuated manner, in social life, especially in marital and family relations, in some persons who are not well-formed ideologically and politically. Also some negative cases which are encountered in judicial practice of Mirdite District, strengthen this conclusion. A series of decisions show clearly that some marriages have been created under the influence of the Code, and as a result, being out of step with the times, have been annulled. For example, P.N., a 17-year-old girl, through a marriage broker marries T.N., 47-years-old, from Blinisht without meeting him or seeing him prior to the wedding day.

The concept of increasing the work force through marriage has existed until recently in some zones of Mirdite District, although rare. This was the aim of the marriage between M.S. and L.S. from Kurbnesh. The latter was a soldier, and to get married he came home on 2-3 days leave. M. was 3 years older than L.S. Quarrels and disagreements resulted after his discharge from the army.

The so-called trial marriage, as can be seen from the court decisions, continues to be practiced. Thus, out of 153 suits for divorce during these past few years, 20 cases consisted of trial marriages. In this way, in violation of the norms of socialist morality and of the laws of the state of the dictatorship of the proletariat, under the influence of the old, backward code of marriage bonds, in the beginning these partners entered into a de facto cohabitation relationship, to follow it later with legal marriage. Trial marriage is always to the disadvantage of the woman, it lowers her dignity and personality. This is so because only marriage contracted according to legal rules is protected by the state, whereas de facto cohabitation, even if it is for marriage purposes, does not enjoy legal protection. From the studies of the decisions of the above mentioned cases, one arrives at the conclusion that the trial period has lasted from 9 to 12 months. The zones where this manifestation has been encountered more frequently are Kurbenesh, Blinisht, Shengjin-Fan, Shengjergj, Simon, Lufaj, Pelat and so forth. There might be even more cases of this kind but they have not ended up in divorce by court decision, since they have taken place without celebration.

The question of the complete emancipation of women in our country has become a big issue, for the party and the struggle against backward customs of the past, a great people's issue, and in this direction there are all-around successes, but still here and there, due to the lack of a systematic ideological struggle and due to the low ideological, educational and cultural level of some parents, there are cases of engagements below the legal age level.

In this manner, in upholding of backward customs, influence is exerted by the pressure of the elders whose patriarchal authority is substantial, as well as the submission of some youths, especially of the girls, some of whom are still not fully conscious of their important role in family relations and in society, as a whole.

In this direction, the bad custom of loading the woman's back, continues to be manifested and practiced here and there despite the fact that the sack and "terkuza" [rope] are no longer part of the bride's dowry. As an example can be mentioned the case of D.P., teacher, and N.P. from Nderfusha, the latter and his patriarchal parents demanding that D.P. carry on her back household things, such as wood and so forth. When she tried to carry the load in her hands, there was an outburst of insults and quarrels, which eventually led to the annulment of the marriage. During the judgment of this case, another backward custom, inherited from the distant past, became manifest and is to be found also in the code of Lek Dukagjini (article 23.3 mentioned above). Thus, the above mentioned D.P. would send some of her personal belongings to her sister in Reshen to be kept in the chest-of-drawers. This fact upset the husband N.P., who, operating by the Code concept "the house has a master" and "the belongings which have entered the house cannot be taken out," made the marital relations take a turn for the worse.

This custom also is related to the concept which is still practiced, according to which the gifts given prior and during the marriage, as well as the personal belongings of the woman or part of her contribution to their joint wealth or to the family of the agricultural unit after the divorce, in violation of the rules of socialist married life, the norms of socialist morality and the state laws, do not belong to the woman and as such they cannot leave the husband's house. This, and the taking by the woman of her belongings which, according to law, belong to her, were considered an insult. The above manifestations are aspects of the class struggle which is developed everywhere under the party leadership, by the progressive new against the reactionary patriarchal old.

From the judgment of divorce suits of Mirdite District one can see that here and there, as a result of some old practices and backward customs which must be fought, very expensive weddings continue to take place. Big expenses have nothing in common with the character of a socialist wedding. Of course, as Comrade Enver teaches us, to counsel against big expenses when a person celebrates the marriage of a son, this is correct, but to recommend how many to invite and to counsel against inviting some friends and acquaintances of the son and against being merry, singing and dancing is wrong.

But is it possible to consider a socialist wedding one in which, on the basis of feudal-clan customs of the Code, exaggerated huge expenses are incurred to the point that the partners continue to pay off debts for a number of years. It is clear that this situation can only lead to disagreements between the partners. The partners T. and P. in Reshen, during their married life, have not bought anything else besides food, but T. used his savings and hers to pay off the wedding debts, which even now after the divorce, have not been paid off. In Kurbnesh, D.T. and D.B. quarreled continually ending up in recriminations and beatings because, although both were employed, they did not improve the well-being of the family from the savings of their incomes, yet the husband [illegible]ed them to pay off the wedding expenses estimated at 7,000 lek. In this way, after 1 year of marriage until they got divorced, they were unable to purchase not even the most basic things for living.

In the above mentioned cases, when happiness and joy are understood in the narrow sense of the word, for 1 day only, with the idea that "one marries only once," it is only obvious that family dramas occur.

The above mentioned cases have nothing in common with a socialist wedding, the joy of which, in the first place, is the beginning of a marriage based on love, which looks at the future with optimism and not with confused thoughts about paying off wedding debts. The example of a truly happy and joyful socialist wedding is the case of Athina Mile which took place in Orosh in Mirdite District, to whom Comrade Enver Hoxha, among other things, wrote: "You are a teacher in Orosh, your partner is a cooperativist, you are from Permet, he is from Orosh, you are an intellectual, he is a farmer, you are from the city, he is from the village....To you, a young girl from Permet, Mirdite became yours, you also chose your life partner there, he whom you loved and who loved you, you thus created your new family on healthy foundations..." (Enver Hoxha, "Reports and Speeches 1969-1970," pp 36-39).

Now that our society has entered the stage of the complete construction of socialism, in place of the old types and kinds of families, a new type of family, the socialist family, is being formed and strengthened. The ever strengthening of the socialist family in Mirdite District, deals ever more powerful blows to the remnants of the Code of Lek Dukagjini which has played a profoundly reactionary role for the submission, rule and oppression of the woman by man, and sanctioning her political, economic and social inequality. The political and economic revolution and the deepening of the ideological and cultural revolution, under the leadership of the party, destroyed the social base of remnants which upheld the norms of the law of customs collected in the Code of Lek Dukagjini and other codes.

Comrade Enver, speaking at the Seventh Congress of the AWP about the need for the complete emancipation of the woman, stressed: "The energies and abilities of women, stifled and suppressed in the past, have erupted powerfully and irresistibly in all fields of our socialist life. The Albanian woman has entered the arena of the struggle for socialism, full of dignity,...and she has distinguished herself in work and life. Albanian women are to be found everywhere today, in the fields, factories, schools and laboratories. They have been entrusted with responsibile and high positions in the party and in the state. New relations of equality between men and women have been and are being created at work and in the family. The emancipation of women has strengthened and continues daily to strengthen socialist democracy. This proves Marx's statement that the degree of emancipation of women represents the natural measure of general emancipation" (Enver Hoxha, Report to the Seventh Congress of the AWP, pp 161-162).

In the direction of the development of the family and of marital relations in our country, the conclusion of Engels is being implemented; he predicted that only in the socialist society is there produced "a generation of man who will never have the chance in their lives to buy women for money or by other means of public authority, and a generation of women who will never be required to marry a man for reasons other than true love" (Karl Marx-Federick Engels, "Selected Works," Albanian publications, vol 2, p 225).

Using as an example Mirdite District, which has been one of the zones with the strongest old customs, now there are many instances of marriages for love and in every case with the consent of the future partners. But, parallel to the positive motives which are in full conformity with the norms of communist morality, with socialist ideology, as was said, there are also instances when the parents, by formally conforming to socialist social opinion, organize formal introductions through meetings, at a time when they themselves have decided about the marriage of their children. These types of instances become a negative example in regard to marriages for love.

Under the present conditions of the struggle for the complete emancipation of women, the right to divorce is of great importance. Divorce does not mean violation of the rights of women. On the contrary, our state of socialist democracy is interested in protecting and supporting only healthy marriages.

Comrade Enver, talking about divorce in our country, has stressed: "For the woman in particular, divorce is one of the most important victories...when the woman correctly understands this victory she will also know how to use it correctly, because when it is understood in this way, divorce divides but also unites, therefore it also serves to strengthen the unity between man and woman, to strengthen the unity of the family, for the proper raising of the children (Enver Hoxha, "Reports and Speeches 1965-1966," pp 357-358).

In the report to the Second Plenum of the Central Committee of the AWP in 1967 it is stated: "The harmony and the unity of the family are basic elements for good conjugal relations, therefore they are not strengthened by submitting to the prejudices and backward customs of bowing to the husband, but by opposing them in a correct manner, bravely and intelligently.... Divorce is the equal right of the men and of the women, and if properly understood, this right will not remain, as in the past, like the sword of Damocles over the woman's head, but will serve to strengthen the family" (Ramiz Alia, "Report to the Second Plenum of the Central Committee of the AWP," 1967, p 49).

Court activity in Mirdite District proves that the women of this district have exercised this right better with each passing year. Generally, there has been a steady increase in suits brought by women. Compared to the 49 percent of the divorce suits brought by the women in 1970, today the figure is 60 percent.

These data also clearly show the high ideological level of the women of Mirdite District, who being employed and economically independent, no longer submits to the despotic rule of the husband and to the backward customs in the family, and equality of rights with the husband and in the family are assured and developed.

Under the influence of the Catholic Church, in Mirdite before the liberation, the right of divorce, especially for the woman, was something unheard of. The fascist cleric, Gjergj Fishta, declared: "The most perfect and ideal system of marriage is Christian marriage based, among other things, in the principle of the indissolubility of marriage (prohibition of divorce). These reactionary concepts, have left sporadic marks also in the district of Mirdite. P.K. has been sentenced three times for repeatedly beating his wife. Everytime he was let out of prison, his wife was willing to live with him. Even after the court's divorce decision, and despite their continued quarrels they continued to live together. The annulment of marriages due to the fault of the husband in Mirdite District shows a higher percentage. This proves that the exercise of the rights and freedoms by the women has encountered the patriarchal and feudal-clan concepts of the men who want to behave as in the past, like rulers over women, whereas the woman has tended to be more receptive to the progressive innovation for equal rights with the man in the family.

Data shows that in Mirdite District there are few divorces. Despite a natural population growth, divorces show a downward trend.

In general, the length of the marriage of the divorced couple has been a short one. This shows that the partners did not know each other well, knew little of each other's outlook, desires, character and type. It is therefore necessary for the organs of authority and the social and law organs, to increase ideological work with the young people and with the parents in the struggle against backward customs so the young people can get acquainted before marriage not only through "the first straw," through superficial evaluation, but on the basis of thorough acquaintance, of free feelings and true love between young men and women.

Engels says that "a marriage based on love is a moral one and that only where love remains does a marriage exist" (cited by Enver Hoxha, "Reports and Speeches, 1967-1968," p 132).

In order to have a clearer idea of the progress made in marriage relations and of the strengthening of the family under the conditions of our social development on the road to socialism, in Mirdite District, the trend towards marriages between two partners with a small age difference is evident. This trend is accentuated in the tendency of the man to be 1-5 years older than the woman, a tendency which is steadily growing. The age difference over 6 years and especially over 10 years for married couples is decreasing steadily. Marriages of persons of the same age, on the other hand, are on the increase.

At the same time, according to the statistical data for Mirdite District, the conclusion can be drawn that marriages of women to younger men are few. From 1973 on, there have been no marriages between women and men where the women are 5 years older than the men. There are few marriages of these kind, and most of them have occurred because of the interference of their parents, following backward customs to provide the family with an "additional worker" and so forth. These marriages and marriages with older women are harmful to the strengthening of the family roots, therefore the trend toward the reduction of such marriages is a positive development. Also positive is the fact that there has been a reduction in the number of marriages with a greater than 10-year age difference. Marriages with the man more than 10 years older than the woman accounted for 0.86 percent of the marriages in 1977, 0.70 percent in 1978 and 0.60 percent in 1979. In this way, statistical data prove that the age difference between women and men in marriages is continually narrowing, approaching a normal average which is a characteristic of the socialist family. In Mirdite District, comparisons made show that the average difference in ages is about 6-7 years, with the man older.

The number of divorces in the cities of Mirdite District is higher than in the villages. This happens due to the influence of backward customs in the villages of the district.

The causes of divorce, during the past few years, in Mirdite District, resulting from the problems assessed and also in relation to the faults stressed above, are to be found in most cases, when men manifest patriarchal, petit-bourgeois, undisciplined, whimsical, feudal and clan mentalities. Thus, the anger, the indolence and so forth, of the men have caused continuous disagreements and quarrels during the married life. But during this time, some men openly express the feeling of superiority and try to rule in order for their women to be inferior, and as a result a lack of full understanding about everything gradually develops. Quarrels and lack of understanding also develop due to bad management of joint incomes, due to lack of proper division of work in the family, when only the woman is expected to do the work due to incorrect understanding in the relations between the wife and the other members of the husband's family, when the woman, in some cases, is still treated as a servant and is denigrated by all. The conservative concepts towards the woman and the force of backward customs, have led some men to create scenes of disharmony and misunderstanding in conjugal relations, and to come into conflict with state laws by mistreating their wives. These things prove that customs and the norms of old reactionary codes calling for the domination, submission, and oppression of women by men continue to operate here and there in a sporadic manner. No matter how few these concepts may be, social opinion must unmask them and punish them most severely. This struggle is essential since there may be some women, who since they have not reached the proper ideological level, accept the domination of men and of the norms of the reactionary past, rather than seek to gain the respect of their equality in the family.

The problems which have been treated here are evidence of the struggle waged everywhere in our country, including Mirdite District, under the party leadership, for the further revolutionizing of marital and family relations, as a concrete field of the ideological struggle.

If we succeed in achieving marriages on socialist bases everywhere, and if these bonds between young people are divested of everything old and reactionary, then we have accomplished a great job by deepening the requirement of our socialist morality which considers only the marriage entered into out of sincere love, as a basic moment for the creation of the new socialist family, as stressed by Comrade Enver "...a truly healthy, solid marriage based on acquaintanceship and free and open admiration of the pair, of sincerity and of a pure and ardent proletarian love between young men and women. This creates the harmonious basis for a healthy family" (Enver Hoxha, "Reports and Speeches 1962-1970," p 143).

EFFICIENT WAYS TO DESTROY ENEMY HELICOPTERS OUTLINED

Sofia VOENNA TEKHNIKA in Bulgarian No 8, 1981 pp 12-13

[Article by Col Spas Spasov, Professor and Doctor of Military Sciences: "The Fight against Helicopters;" material from the foreign press]

[Text] A group of cadets from the VNVAU [Higher People's Military Artillery Academy] "G. Dimitrov," in Shumen, is interested in questions concerning the fight against helicopters. We are publishing this article in response to their letter.

In the last few years, particular attention has been devoted in almost all of the member nations of NATO to development of army aviation, the foundation of which is the helicopter. From an organizational viewpoint, it is a part of formation and units of land forces, and it consists of individual batallions and companies.

In the infantry, mechanized and armored divisions of the main capitalist countries, helicopters of army aviation are intended for transport of personnel and military equipment as well as for providing fire support for troops on the battlefield. For that reason the helicopter units of the ground forces formations are also subdivided into transport and airborne helicopters like the SN-54 (Flying Crane) and SN-47 ("Chinook"), and helicopters for fire support such as the AN-16 ("Huey-Cobra"), the IN-1v (Iriquoise) and the AN-64. In all there may be as many as 1200-1500 helicopters in the zone of defense for a single field army.

According to the views of foreign military specialists, helicopters are seen as the most dynamic means through which the mobility of ground forces is sharply increased immediately within the military operations zone. Now they have become the primary material factor for the origin and development of views of so-called air mobility. As is known, Indochina, where more than 4,000 helicopters had already been in operation in 1970 (as compared with 400 in 1965), was the military testing ground for these concepts. It is now estimated that in the army of the U.S. alone there are 16,000-18,000 helicopters, and the number is more than 30,000 in all for the NATO nations.

That is why the fight against helicopters must be considered a primary problem in war and the operations of ground forces, to be conducted with the participation of all possible resources and under all conditions--during both attack and defensive operations, in simple and complex weather conditions, during daytime and nighttime.

Helicopters may be found in the most diverse situations on the ground and in the air. They are usually dispersed, and operate within the entire region of operations of a given formation of unit. All of this causes known difficulties in organizing and conducting the fight against them, which are reflected primarily in search and discovery operations, as well as in selection of the most suitable means for their destruction.

How can the fight against helicopters be waged most effectively?

In spite of the great maneuverability and the possibilities for multiple take-off within a 24-hour period, helicopters are on the ground more than in the air. Moreover, when on the ground they are immobile and more closely assembled, and, consequently, more vulnerable than when in the air. This is why their destruction on the ground is considered to be the primary and most effective means in which almost all fire capabilities of ground forces, aviation and the navy (in coastal regions) can participate. An action against helicopters located on the ground is organized and conducted according to the general rules for destruction of stationery earthbound objects.

On the ground, helicopters can be located in regions where they are permanently based at sites at distances from the battle lines of 80-120 km for transport helicopters and up to 30-50 km for attack helicopters. Moreover, when they are carrying out assigned tasks they are deployed further toward the front line within the initial regions for airborne attack (up to 50 km) to advanced sites (12-18 km) or ambush sites (2-4 km).

The conditions under which helicopters are parked at all of the sites are almost identical, with the one difference that their number and the time that they will remain under the varied circumstances will differ.

In the air, helicopters can fly in groups which vary in composition, altitude and speed, close to the front line or over our territory. In these instances, the fight against them will be conducted primarily by fighter aircraft and armed helicopters, as well as from land-based PVO [anti-aircraft defense] and rifle units. It is possible, under specific conditions, also to use fire from artillery (conventional and rocket) to fight against helicopters in the air.

Are there special weapons for the fight against helicopters? There are no weapons which have been created specially for fighting helicopters. This does not mean that all of the mentioned weaponry may be used in this fight with identical success and efficacy. The selection of means of destruction, the method of aviation operations or the method of artillery attack, as well as the necessary forces for destroying an individual group will depend on the assigned task and the conditions of the situation.

The most suitable means for destruction of helicopters on the ground are aviation fragmentation bombs, guided and unguided rockets (jet-propelled shells), canister shot and small arms-type aviation armaments and fragmentation artillery shells (including those with aerial burst).

Mortar fire may be used with success against sites located close to the front line or during disembarcation of airborne troops.

Determining the necessary aircraft (helicopter) or artillery for the destruction of either individual helicopters or groups of helicopters is made according to the general rules for preparing tactical bombardment calculations and calculations for fire from rocket or conventional artillery on board an aircraft (helicopter) or for preparing the necessary number of shells to cover a given area. The attack or air assault on the helicopters should be unexpected, massive and carried out in a short time since helicopters are quite maneuverable and can be moved to another site within several minutes (depending on the degree of readiness).

The greatest massing of helicopters may be anticipated at the permanent bases (measuring 800x1200 m); there will be 30-80 or more on the average for a company or batallion. At the advanced sites (measuring 300x400 m), 8-12 may be found, and at ambush sites (measuring 150x150 m), up to 2-4 helicopters.

The most general calculations show that in order to destroy the helicopters at a single permanent base, it is necessary to employ the forces of a fighter-bomber or attack unit; for the advanced helicopters; and for those which are waiting in ambush, up to 1 to 2 groups of 3 aircraft. Almost the same results can be produced by concentrating the fire of a division of rifled artillery or a battery of rocket artillery on the advanced sites, and of a battery on the ambush sites.

Artillery may also be used effectively to destroy helicopters performing flights at extremely low altitudes. Usually the majority of the missions are performed by helicopters at altitudes of up to 50 m (most frequently 15-20 m above the terrain). In these instances, after discovery of a helicopter group and with correctional assistance from the air, both immobile and mobile encompassing fire may be successfully employed.

Mobile fire zones may prove to be particularly efficient for prevention of, for example, an airborne landing, when the helicopters usually fly in relatively compact ranks over abbreviated distances and intervals. This may best be achieved using fragmentation shells with contact action or with aerial burst directly above or within the compact files of the groups [of 3 aircraft] and squadrons. The relatively low flight speed (up to 150-180 km/hr) assures adequate time for training fire from one position to another.

The fight against helicopters may be carried out with greatest efficiency when they are on the ground on sites with various tactical designations. They have relatively little sturdiness and quite a few vulnerable places (in the main and tail propellors, the motor and pilots' cabin), which makes them easily destroyable by almost any weapon (aviation and artillery) with high efficiency. Consequently, at this stage in the development of the helicopter as an aircraft and of the tactics for their use, creation of special weapons to destroy them on the ground and in the air is not required. This does not mean that all questions concerning the fight against helicopters are solved. On the contrary, a large segment of the questions associated with drawing artillery into this fight and, particularly, with the use of mobile fire zones, merits comprehensive and in-depth study.

BRIEFS

CULTURAL, INFORMATION CENTERS EXPANDED--Czechoslovakia operates cultural and information centers in Berlin, Budapest, Warsaw, Szczecin, Djakarta, Bucharest, Havana, Cairo and Baghdad. The Bucharest center opened its doors in 1981. The centers in Cairo, Baghdad and Djakarta have restricted their activities almost to the minimum because of the current situations in these countries. Another center in Kabul is planned, and currently being negotiated are centers in Yugoslavia and Algeria, which are to open by 1983. The Havana center, which is the sole center from East Europe in Cuba, is also shared by other socialist countries. [Bratislava SLOBODA in Slovak No 47, 19 Nov 81 p 2]

OCTOBER 1981 ISSUE OF SED THEORETICAL JOURNAL REVIEWED

East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 17-18 Oct 81 p 10

[Brigitte Zander review of East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 10, October 1981, signed to press 14 September 1981, pp 961-1072: "A Topic With High Demands." Translations and/or summaries of articles by authors cited below, as well as by others, are published in pages following this review]

[Text] "Conception of Developed Socialism" is the topic of the October issue of EINHEIT. That is a rather ambitious subject which, although it sounds like a book title, fits right in with our party's theoretical organ. Its treatment begins with an extensive quotation—paragraphs defining "Developed Socialist Society—that means...." from the SED program adopted at the Ninth Party Congress. Referring to the decisions of the 10th Party Congress, prominent authors demonstrate in five articles that this conception worked out 5 years ago has fully and completely retained its validity even under the new conditions of the 1980's.

Thus, Otto Reinhold writes that the key decision of the 10th Party Congress to continue the policy of the main task in the 1980's was due "primarily to the fact that this policy complies with the meaning of socialism, with the requirements of the basic economic law of socialism, and that it is the unity of economic and social policy which produces the decisive motivational forces of social development, especially the social activity of the working people."

In an economic-theoretical essay about the upward development of the material-technical base on the road of intensification, Helmut Koziolek proves "that progress in the continued shaping of the developed socialist society ultimately originates from the planned upward development of the productive forces." In an article taking issue with anti-Communist attacks, Guenter Gleissner explains why democratic centralism has always been and will remain the inalienable basic principle of socialist management and organization. In a philosophical essay on "Ideal and Reality in the Socialist Revolution," Wolfgang Eichhorn I deals with idealistic motivational forces in our dynamic development.

The topic is appropriately rounded off with a book review. Rolf Reissig introduces the anthology of "Marx and Engels on the Socialist and Communist Society," published by Dietz, [East] Berlin. All in all this is an issue that should also be used, inter alia, as supplemental literature for the current party school year.

FDGB OFFICIAL URGES GREATER ATTENTION TO WORKER SAFETY

East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 10, Oct 81 (Signed to press 14 Sep 81) pp 974-975

[Commentary by Horst Heintze, social scientist, economist, member, SED Central Committee; presidium member, secretary, Free German Trade Union Federation (FDGB): "Performance Growth and Labor Safety"]

[Text] The economy is and remains the decisive field of action for the party's and each communist's revolutionary conduct. Comrade Erich Honecker deduced from this 10th SED Congress statement for all party management organs the task to motivate initiatives and activities that ensure a high performance growth that comes through constant struggle for improving working and living conditions, for exemplary order, safety and discipline, and for working without accidents and breakdowns.

Wherever in collectives these interconnected tasks are an element of socialist competition, the experiences of the best workers are thoroughly analyzed and the strength of their example spurs all, we account for results that meet the high demands of the 1980's. Shop steward plena such as in the parent plant of the Bitterfeld softcoal combine, the Eberswalde crane construction, the Brandenburg steel and rolling mill and many others, as well as the conferences of the competition initiators, innovators and rationalizers in our capital Berlin and in Neubrandenburg impressively prove the workers, engineers and scientists, many women and young people among them, have turned the 10th party congress resolutions into their own cause. They are struggling for a maximum degree of efficiency and labor quality, for cost reduction and for further improving working and living conditions. They see to it that the funds available are handled carefully. And they also do everything to ensure order, safety and discipline and avoid accidents or breakdowns in the labor process.

Let us look back: between 1976 and 1980 alone more than a million jobs were formed or reorganized in industrial, construction and transport enterprises in the GDR and labor hardships and hazards were eliminated right along with it. During that period the working people, with more than 500,000 innovator proposals, helped further improve health and labor protection. To cite a few examples: in the VEB light metal foundry, Poessneck, by means of a newly developed vacuum casting procedure, labor productivity was boosted by 200 percent, up to 10 percent of material was saved, and a noticeable influence was brought to bear on the elimination of heavy physical labor. The working people in the VEB Diesel Motor Works, Rostock, as much as those in the railroad enterprise of Brueckenmeisterei Neudietendorf (Erfurt Bezirk) have confirmed the experience that performance improvements are on the long run possible only when the same determination goes into the struggle for improving the working conditions.

Such results—they are some among many others like them—are decisive steps toward setting up or reorganizing from 1.1 to 1.4 million jobs between 1981 and 1985, in conformity with the 10th party congress tasks, easing the work for between 300,000 and 320,000 working people, and developing and introducing more labor tools that are safer and easier to use. Points of major attention here are the manual transportation and storage processes and their maintenance because some of them constitute a very high proportion of overall labor, which makes them so important for the release of more labor. We shall further boost the proportion of working tools and procedures that will meet high requirement demands (safety qualities) for safety, hygiene and easier work. That is why we must use modern equipment and combine without reservation the most up-to-date technologies with a constant struggle for order, discipline and safety.

And those are precisely the tasks the trade unions pay the greatest attention to. They are aware the working people's well-being, pleasure in work, dedication and creativity largely depend on it. They see to it that the care about men and their well-being and health becomes standard procedure for management activity, attention is paid to the working people's problems, thoughts, suggestions and ideas, and no suggestion or criticism remains unanswered. That promotes dedication and initiative. They will grow where workers sense their opinion has some meaning and their experiences are wanted.

Still much remains to be done. Sound experiences are not always applied generally and broadly. There is, for instance, a dump-type lift truck for paint vats, made at the VEB farm machinery, Torgau, which makes work easier, yet of the 112 enterprises that were checked there were only VEB Sachsenring, Zwickau, the Ernst Thaelmann heavy machine combine in Magdeburg and the Erfurt automobile-body plant that were using that device though it is known to, and applicable in, at least 70 enterprises. The reasons for that: competent documentation is not precisely analyzed, suggestions to make use of it are checked only superficially, and the cooperation between the innovation office and the safety inspections is only sporadic.

What can be accomplished merely by analyzing and applying the central information service is shown, however, by the experiences in the VEB housing construction combine, Gera. The further improvements in working and living conditions, order, safety and discipline are standard procedure in socialist competition there. The working people in that combine and the 150 members of the P 5 youth collective working for years on the central youth project "FDJ Initiative Berlin" impressively document that performance growth goes hand in hand with improved working and living conditions and with working more safely without accidents or breakdowns.

Today about 90 percent of all work collectives in the GDR has set concrete tasks for the fulfillment and targeted overfulfillment of the plan without accidents and breakdowns. That includes the commitment to ensuring safety qualities in the preparatory production areas in the use of working tools and procedures, making working conditions technically safe and hygienically unobjectionable, as well as the commitment by the working people in other areas to conduct themselves always and everywhere in the labor process in conformity with labor safety regulations.

The 3-step check has turned out to be an important method for avoiding accidents or breakdowns. Every day before work starts the chief operator or brigade chief together with the labor safety engineer will check the jobs, machines, equipment and tools. They are checked every week by the department chief, the chairmen of the department trade union headquarters, the labor safety engineers and the chief mechanic. The plant director or enterprise manager, the plant physician and the chairman of the labor safety commission of enterprise trade union headquarters inform themselves about the status of health and labor protection every month by making an inspection attended by the manager and the labor safety engineers, from which they derive measures for enterprise management.

Working like that helps avoid labor accidents and breakdown and losses. Therefore the trade unions persistently advocate emulating the wearer of the Lenin Medal, Aleksey D. Basov, who runs a construction brigade in Moscow which for years has exceeded its plan without accidents and breakdowns, its working method, known as "Basov Initiative," having set standards beyond the country's borders. The "sole manufacturing" collective in the Grossenhain shoe factory, for instance, is working that way entirely. Like many other collectives it has helped reduce labor accidents in our country from circa 40 in 1970 to 29 in 1980, per one thousand workers. Softcoal mining, the energy industry and geology have had a major share in this development. There, the accident rate is circa 50-percent lower than the average in the GDR.

To carry on such positive developments and not diminish our efforts on behalf of order, safety and discipline remains an essential concern of trade union work this year. Combines and enterprises such as the metallurgical combine Ost, the VEB heavy machine construction BFG, Lauchhammer, and the Berlin housing construction combine managed to reduce up to the end of September this year the number of labor accidents by another 20 percent compared with the same period last year. That was possible only through the close cooperation between state managements, trade unions and the working people who, in socialist competition, adopted the goal to accomplish a zero interference quota in machines and installations.

To protect the life and health of the working people as best as possible, act in line with the Ninth FDGB Congress principle, "each accident is one accident too many," and not interrupt the continuity of production by breakdown, technical interference and fires makes high demands on the the work of combine and enterprise managements, party organizations and trade unions. It is and remains an urgent task to analyze and generalize the management and work experiences also in this area so that the working people's working and living conditions improve continually and plans can have their fulfillment and targeted overfulfillment without accidents and breakdowns. The trade unions are making their contribution to it by using the 1981/1982 trade union elections for organizing socialist competition so that it leads to high performance improvements, improves working conditions and always ensures order, discipline and safety. To that end the "Basov Initiative" and the collectives' efforts toward recognition as enterprise or area of exemplary order and safety are worthy of support and appreciation. The trade unions regard it also as a fine way of preparing for the 10th FDGB Congress.

WARNING SOUNDED AGAINST ATTEMPTS TO ABOLISH 'DEMOCRATIC CENTRALISM'

East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 10, Oct 81 (Signed to press 14 Sep 81) pp 995-1000

['Conception of Developed Socialism' feature article by Guenter Gleissner, jurist, department chief, secretariat, GDR People's Chamber: "Democratic Centralism--Inalienable Basic Principle of Socialist Management and Organization"]

> [Text] Fighting persuasively against unsolicited recommendations from those ideologists who, while mouthing "socialism," aim a blow against its basic foundations by attacking the Leninist principle of democratic centralism, it is being demonstrated that this principle is the crucial basis for revolutionary socialist development, exemplifying the party's Marxist-Leninist leadership quality. Opposing democracy with centralism is a senseless undialectical distortion and is directed against an inalienable basic principle for continued successful advances.

Since Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels in the Communist Manifesto 113 years ago formulated "the rising of the proletariat to be the ruling class, the gaining of democracy by fighting" as the interconnected task of the revolutionary movement, whole armies of bourgeois ideologists have been commissioned to prophesy the end "of democracy" by it. Since the days of the Great Socialist October Revolution, since the construction of the new, socialist society which, based on the political power of the workers class and the socialization of the means of production, made an end to the suppression of the majority by a minority, the imperialist ideologists have been directing their angry attacks against everything that explains deeply the successful advance of socialism. The leading role of the Marxist-Leninist party as the core of the political system of socialism, the political power of the workers class, and the Leninist principle of democratic centralism, which is the proven foundation for the construction, cooperation and activity of all the organs of socialist state power--all that is the focal point of the attacks by the class enemy simply because they are the cornerstones of socialism.

Attacks and Models

What is veiled behind the attacks against democratic centralism which is slandered as "totalitarianism" and defamed as "state bureaucratism"? What is hiding behind the recommendations to the effect that the socialist planned economy should have to be "dismantled so as to release the slumbering economic capacities?" They cannot help acknowledging, e.g., the steady high increase rates in the GDR economy, to be sure. Yet that does not prevent those same antisocialist spokesmen from denying in the same breath, schizophrenicly as it were, the very causes of these increase rates and offering the socialist countries their unsolicited advice they should "grant their enterprises the greatest possible measure of independence and abolish the central bureaucracy and the stubborn planning system." Nor do they let it go at distorting and denigrating democratic centralism--the essence of which happens to be the organic connection of central state management and planning with the self-responsibility and initiative of the local state organs, the enterprises, the cooperatives and institutions and with a truly creative mass initiative. Rather, they are at once offering "new models" based on the bourgeois "pluralism" theorem and are circulating recommendations on how thereby in socialist countries democracy could be "improved, developed or renewed." Different as the shades of their attacks may be, offered as counsel or "new models," the target is the same as in all counterrevolutionary attacks: to undermine the political and economic foundations of the workers and farmers power, deny the leadership role of the Marxist-Leninist party and subvert the unity of party, state and people, so as to liquidate mainstays of socialism and ultimately socialism altogether.

This precisely is what Poland's external and internal enemies have in mind in seeking to destroy the political system of socialism by exploiting economic and social crisis manifestations. To establish "pluralism also in socialism" and "dismantle" democratic centralism--all these are paraphrases for the aim to subvert the people's power and create "centers for political decision-making" against the objectively leadership-invested Marxist-Leninist party. Step by step, under the cloak of "truly socialist" concepts, central state management and planning is meant to be eliminated to push the party and the state, as merely advisory organs without any compelling authority, onto the edge of society and then to destroy them.

Real political practice in our country, as in all socialist countries, which is resolutely based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism, reveals the following: socialist construction proceeds successfully wherever the Marxist-Leninist party on the basis of a sound scientific strategy and tactics politically directs all of social development. A policy truly committed to the well-being of the people exists only where the state as the main instrument of the working people led by the workers class concentrates the central management and planning of social processes, in accordance with the Leninist principle of democratic centralism, on expert decision-making in basic matters while it promotes the local state organs', combines', enterprises', cooperatives' and working people's own responsibility and initiative toward implementing the state tasks.

Centralization or decentralization, central state decision-making or "democratic decision-making"--that is a totally senseless and contradictory formulation. All experiences of socialist development confirm: central decisions and democratic participation are by no means antipodal but are two sides of one-and-the-same coin. They form an organic, dialectical unity. Democratic participation does not exist apart from central state decisions but becomes part of them, their indispensable foundation. And more than that: how all the people come up with their knowledge and skill, how the working people's experiences are made the basis for decisions, on that depends essentially not only their quality but also the way in which an individual identifies with them and assumes his personal responsibility where he stands so as to implement through his commitment and initiative-rich honest work the stipulations which serve his own interests.

A Total Will According to a Total Plan

Spontaneously, without a total plan, the new socialist society cannot be established. Rather, it is the conscious and systematic effort of masses of millions, executed through a total will according to a total plan--to quote Engels. For the first time society is established systematically in conformity with the developmental laws on which it is based, which means: according to plan and in awareness. Nor does the need for systematic and conscious action diminish when socialist society gains in maturity. On the contrary: the role of the subjective factor grows in the course of the socialist revolution. By that we mainly mean the fact that the awareness and systematic manner in which we shape our society increase so that, in terms of Friedrich Engels, the results of our work in the social framework also ever more completely coincide with our objectives and intentions. That is the case today in the continued shaping of the developed socialist society and the full utilization of the historic opportunities, advantages and impulses of socialism in new dimensions and under changed internal and external conditions. It makes higher demands on conscious, systematic action, on a committed involvement in spotting and solving maturing problems in our development.

The speed and scope of our advances along the course charted for the 1980's at the 10th party congress significantly depend precisely on how consistently we continue to enforce the principle of democratic centralism in all social domains. This fundamental organizational and management principle, strictly abiding by it and creatively applying it, receives a still higher place value economically and politically in view of the tasks that must be solved in the 1980's. Decisions range into the far distant future. They are becoming more complicated and must be made still more complex—in conformity with altered internal and external conditions. Thus central management and planning must be aimed more still at basic questions. And for the very same reason there are also higher demands placed on all citizens' expert involvement in planning and ruling, be they workers or cooperative farmers, members of the intelligentsia or craftsmen or tradesmen, associates of central organs or local people's representations, Marxists, Christians, members of friendly parties or without party affiliation.

From this it logically follows that still more working people are called upon to take an expert and active part in social affairs. Party and state responsibility is growing further for mobilizing and promoting these democratic activities and directing them toward our unified goal. How democratic centralism is implemented as a basic managerial and organizational principle—that also is, not last, a mirror-image of the party's Marxist-Leninist leadership quality and the state organs' people-related, scientifically sound and rationally organized working style.

Basis for Active Participation

The political practice of successful socialist development provides this evidence: not a departure from central dicisions mobilizes the people's creative capacities and releases our "slumbering economic capacities." Rather it is the policy to be conceived by the revolutionary vanguard, the Marxist-Leninist party, and consistently oriented to the people's interests and needs, and its successful implementation that leads to a big boost in mass initiative. So our party in all the phases of socialist construction knew how to enforce its universal inevitabilities and principles in conformity with concrete-historic conditions and specific requirements, taking account of the real situation, internal and external development, by a progressive conception that addressed the masses whereby it mobilized them. That attested to the political creativity, the Marxist-Leninist-shaped leadership force, the mass solidarity of the party.[2] Only remember the creative acts of the workers class and all working people while we were getting set for, and analyzed, the 10th SED Congress, remember the sundry democratic activities at the people's elections. How the program on growing political stability and increasing economic capacity in years to come, adopted by the 10th SED Congress for steadily carrying on the main task in its unity of economic and social policy, is understood and translated into action by the working people, can clearly be glimpsed from the results in plan fulfillment in industry and agriculture in the first half of 1981: the working people in GDR industry accomplished in that period an industrial output of M 2.5 billion in excess of the plan, and this without any essential extra consumption of material and energy, which is tantamount to a plan lead of 1.9 working days. The produced national income was 5 percent higher than in the first half of 1980, with more than 90 percent of the growth achieved due to increased labor productivity. Mainly through the accelerated use of scientific-technical data, industrial labor productivity rose by 5.4 percent. During this period, 88,383 dwelling units were newly built or modernized, which improved the housing conditions for 264,000 citizens. In socialist agriculture state quotas were exceeded for all commodities of animal production. The strength of democratic centralism thus is confirmed by practice, by life, by our experiences. Relying on it we shall continue to cope successfullly with the tasks that have to be solved with firm steps.

The central decisions based on live socialist democracy ensure continued overall social advances and ensure our full employment, people's prosperity, growth and stability. They provide the combines, enterprises and local state organs, oriented to the interests of society, with clear leads and thereby create the needed foundations for the active participation by the working people and their collectives in management and planning. The preparation of the law for the economic plan, e.g., proceeded on all state levels with the trade unions getting especially involved in it, down to the smallest work collective of socialist society. Plan leads containing overall social concerns, in production conferences, brigade meetings, trade union shop steward plena, the various managerial collectives in enterprises and combines, thousands of conferences of deputies, committees, commissions and working teams of the people's representations become the starting point for new considerations and creative ideas of millions for reaching and exceeding their plan quotas.

Main criteria for these considerations are increased labor productivity, the science and technology plan, cost and material reduction, and the efficiency and quality of production. Where is there ever any comparable democratization of economic life, a more meaningful cooperation between the state and social organizations, especially the trade unions, than in this law on the economic plan, written by millions and ratified by the supreme people's representation? Here becomes true what Marx and Engels recognized was the role of the broad masses in conducting the socialist revolution as an inherent inevitability: "When it is a matter of a complete transformation of social organization, the masses themselves must be involved in it and must have realized what it is all about in what they dedicated their whole life to."[3] That precisely is the path from spontaneity to awareness, toward a historically new quality of democracy--the socialist one. That way state power is going to continue its development in the future, too.

Of special interest here is that in the preparation and implementation of the economic plans time and time again new ideas and suggestions are brought up on how quotas can be fulfilled and overfulfilled in fine quality. Thus "centralism, truly understood in the democratic sense, presupposes the possibility, created for the first time in history, for a complete and unrestrained development not only of local specifics but also of local initiative, the variety of courses, ways and means in advancing toward a common goal."[4]

Important also is that in the process of democratic participation time and time again new considerations are born that serve the perfecting of the structure of the economic management organs, the accommodation of economic mechanisms to new social conditions, the improvement in the scientific quality of management and planning, and the perfecting of democratic centralism. Precisely such questions about the most efficient management and planning forms and methods also are the substance of the work done by the commissions of the GDR People's Chamber and its working teams and deputies, of which the majority, incidentally, works directly in production collectives, acting as the seismograph for newly ripened problems.

All experiences in a truly effective socialist development confirm Lenin's realization: the workers class needs a strong state power, a centralized organization of power to manage the socialist economy and society.[5] From the early years of socialist construction down to the current phase of the continued shaping of the developed socialist society that realization also has been fully confirmed in our country.

The Principle Supporting Our State Structure

Our state in all its public domains and especially the organization of economic management and planning was built on the foundation of democratic centralism. The result was that the interaction between strengthening our economic base and its social superstructure and providing all the people with an ever better satisfaction of material and cultural needs could be developed according to plan. In this process our state turned out to be the political organization of the urban and rural working people which, under the leadership by the workers class and its Marxist-Leninist party, puts into effect the total will of the people and, with it, gives room to the working people's creative activities in all domains, indeed organizes and encourages them.

This democratic centralism in the form of unified management and planning, representing the total interest of society, ensures the systematic and dynamic development of the productive forces and promotes ever increasing socialist interhuman relations, the perfecting and consolidating of socialist production relations, comradely cooperation and mutual aid, a rising cultural and educational level and a constant elevation of the working people's sense of responsibility for real socialism. In the democratic centralism in the management and planning of the overall social interests there is also inherent a new type of relationship between the state organs and social organizations, especially the trade unions, the youth association and the women's organization. More and more strongly common interests are forming among millions in realizing all the people's basic freedoms while the political-moral unity of the people is growing.

These basic elemental matters of socialist power and the people's sovereignty in exercising that power are written into Article 47 of the GDR Constitution with reference to the socialist production relations: "The sovereignty of the working people, realized on the basis of democratic centralism, is the principle supporting our state structure." Centralization and democracy depend on each other for rigorously enforcing unified approaches by all elements of the political organization of socialism and creatively perfecting them, ensuring thereby the political and organizational unity of all levels and domains in socialist society and developing the creative actions of millions of citizens.

The further shaping and perfecting of socialist democracy is the main trend in which our socialist state power is moving. It ensures the broadest involvement of the working people in the shaping of social processes, in particular in state management. "We therefore aim our efforts at an ever closer cooperation of the state organs with the social organizations, the work collectives and the various activities of the working people in all domains of life."[6] That expresses the high responsibility by socialist state power for consolidating democratic centralism, mainly through the continuing vital work of the socialist people's representations. They embody a completely new type of representative bodies, are organs of state power as well as social organizations of the workers class and all working people. That brings out the creative function of the socialist people's representation in all its variety and truly democratic depth. The people's representations not only confer on laws and resolutions, they also directly organize their implementation and supervision. They are power organs elected by the people with legislative and executive duties and rights at one and the same time, representing the interests of the entire society in conformity with those of the individual.

Especially through the civic closeness of our deputies in all public domains, the working people are encouraged and challenged to take an active part in the shaping of the developed socialist society. Our socialist representative bodies have more than 3,340 deputies of the GDR People's Chamber as the supreme people's representation and of the bezirk assemblies and over 201,000 delegates in the local--kreis, town and community--people's representations. If one then also considers that in the ever more extensive and expert participation of working people in state and economic management and in other areas, more than 160,000 citizens serve on permanent commissions at the people's representations and 166,000 citizens belong to the temporary labor activists' groups at the people's representations--with an additional 335,000 citizens in the National Front commissions on all levels--, one has every good reason to speak of tremendous social strength in the management and organization of overall state affairs on the central scale as well as in the various territories.

So the unified will of the entire people to shape real socialism consciously and according to plan, where everyone through his creative activity in his place in society works for the program goals of our people and has a part in the strengthening of its organization, the consolidation of the socialist state, is represented on all state levels. In this sense the 10th party congress underscored the growing role of the socialist state as the embodiment of the political power of the workers class, the class of the cooperative farmers allied with it, and the other working people, and defined its continued all-round strengthening as the key of our policy for the future. "Socialist state power led by the Marxist-Leninist party, its authority and functional capability are the basis and prerequisite for our successful advances. That is and remains the basic issue of the socialist revolution," Comrade Erich Honecker asserted in the central committee report to the 10th party congress. "Only the political power of the workers class ensures the people's freedom to shape living conditions of human dignity for all citizens and the freedom of personality. Our state, a form of the dictatorship of the proletariat, represents the interests of the whole people and guarantees freedom and human rights. No one has been permitted or will ever be permitted to touch our socialist state."[7]

SOCIALIST ENTERTAINMENT ART CRITICALLY EVALUATED

West German Commentary

Bonn IWE-TAGESDIENST in German No 145, 7 Oct 81 p 3

[Report from Berlin: "SED Criticizes Entertainment Artists." A translation of the East Berlin EINHEIT article cited below follows this commentary]

[Text] The theoretical SED journal EINHEIT (No 10, 1981) has come out extremely critically against the current developmental state of entertainment art in the GDR and called for "overcoming the gap between quantity and quality in many entertainment fields." The "widespread opinion, regrettably often confirmed in practice," that with little effort one can make a lot of money in entertainment art should be responded to and refuted by more solid artistic quality. GDR entertainment art needed "more witty, chatty M.C.'s and better and more extensively trained popular singers, gramophone record entertainers on a higher level" and much more of a progeny going into artistic professions. "A completely new dimension" was required for promoting new ideas, scenarios, texts, compositions and choreographies for massively effective and artistically unique entertainment events and broadcasts. The point of orientation for the value and quality of accomplishments in entertainment should not only be the GDR top standard but also the international comparison and criterion.

Official SED View

East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 10, Oct 81 (Signed to press 14 Sep 81) pp 1031-1037

[Article by Dr Juergen Hagen, staff employee, SED Central Committee: "Entertainment Art in Our Country"]

> [Text] Within the aggregate of the cultural and artistic offers by GDR media and cultural institutions, entertainment art is gaining increasing importance. Entertainment and sociability are indispensable elements of the socialist way of life and closely tied up with the cultural traditions of the workers class. Especially since the Eighth SED Congress original forms and socialist elements have developed in the GDR's entertainment art which must be further developed through improved effectiveness and quality.

Resolutely our party sees to it that the ways and means of social life and individual conduct characteristic of the developed socialist society evolve more and more in all fields. Due to their specific and irreplaceable opportunities for making an impact, art and culture can affect this process significantly. More and more effectively, as Comrade Erich Honecker put it in the central committee report to the 10th SED Congress, "they affect the development of socialist personalities and the shaping of the socialist way of life."[1]

Within the aggregate of the cultural and artistic offers by the media and the cultural institutions, entertainment art is gaining increasing importance. There is every good reason to say that entertainment art in our country—with all its unevenness and a still fairly pronounced downward level—has made and is making an irrevocable contribution to positively affecting men's thoughts, feelings and actions. This involves cultural-artistic mass processes great in their effectiveness and radiating strength. A good entertainment program on GDR television draws 7 to 8 million viewers. Within one year, 13 million people attend concerts and plays, 20 million the social affairs in clubs and community halls, and 60 million the press festivals, folk festivals and homeland festivals, and the popularity of dancing is reflected by circa 600,000 dance evenings annually, attended by approximately 120 million. "Wherever our country's citizens relax and enjoy recreation and leisure, entertainment art is an important social concern."[2]

What Is Entertainment Art?

The concept of entertainment art always again brings up questions about the function, modality, thrust and forms of this kind of art. Discussions about it, at least in the field of theory, will not end for a long time. The exchange of opinions, conducted intensively in recent years—especially since the 1978 conference on entertainment art—, has given rise to some insights that may be used as premises for further considerations.

For one thing it became clear that the ability to entertain must not be limited to some artistic genres and specialties. Entertainment is and remains an irrevocable task of all the arts. The view that what is specific in entertainment art is that it is a reservoir of "types and genres of art" which in a special way "entertain through education"[3] and thereby differs from other arts has turned out not to be viable because all art entertains.

The expectations art lovers have of entertainment differ greatly, of course, in accordance with the particulars in their living conditions, the work they do, their living conditions, level of education, age and sex. Furthermore, a piece of chamber music entertains differently from a poem, a painting, differently from a stage play. And there is not likely to be any doubt that an audience that encounters art as a rule also expects entertainment. Brecht, comparing the functions of science and art, points out that both are to "ease the life of man, one supplying sustenance, the other one entertainment."[4] Art that neglects its entertainment function has trouble reaching an audience or gaining new friends. Thus it also has trouble fulfilling its cognitive or cultural function.

Secondly, on the basis of what we now know, it may be said that entertainment art is in the position to combine the various arts and artistic genres with each other.

In this regard, e.g., dance music, rock, chansons, jazz are primarily artistic genres of music and only secondarily count as entertainment art—through their use for specific forms of entertainment. Other genres too—to stay with music—have long held their function in entertainment production such as the folksong, the opera aria or works of chamber music. In well organized discos, balls and other events of entertainment, poetry readings, art auctions, feature and documentary films and many other art performances have become customary. Entertainment art is in fact marked by universally combining various arts even if that is by no means yet generally taken for granted, mainly as far as our big cultural events and folk festivals are concerned.

Moreover, it is typical of entertainment art that it also can combine its various artistic genres with many nonartistic factors. Games, sports, journalism, slides and so forth combine with music, dance, pantomime, literature and so forth to form new artistic variants and forms of presentation of a specific quality of their own.

Third, entertainment art is most closely tied up with the development of the modern mass media. Through the emergence of entirely new artistic production and dissemination instruments in the 20th century, entertainment art also receives unexpected opportunities for becoming massively effective. And more than that. Through radio, records, movies, tapes, television and so forth, new artistic elements and productions evolve which combine the traditional main-line arts into new combinations and have been producing new genres and types. Magazine and entertainment broadcasts and television programs, rock concerts, sing-in programs, television viewing and so forth are only a few examples of these new kinds of artistic forms of production. The development of records and cassette production not only increased the scope of making individual use of entertainment production but also encouraged new forms of entertainment in our cultural life, such as discos for all age-groups. Thus the media significantly affect the shaping of a specific entertainment art as a new type of art production and its broad transmissions, programs and other affairs in our country.

Fourth, entertainment art is closely tied up with cultural mass activity. Entertaining and sociable get-togethers in work collectives, housing communities, leisure-time groups, clubs, community halls, restaurants, discos, in vacation homes and at folk festivals, homeland festivals and press festivals or at other cultural events have taken on their own forms of entertainment and have offered opportunities for entertainers to perform.

Entertainment art thus is no new "specific type of art" but "a combination of various artistic elements with other cultural factors like information, communication, physical culture, games, sports and so forth." As a "specific form of art production" in the cultural life of the towns and communities and in the mass media, there evolve by means of this synthesis works and performances "which principally aim at relaxation, sociability, entertainment and amusement."[5] In serving this aim, socialist entertainment art—in conformity with its specific means and opportunities—fosters socialist modes of conduct and value orientations and serves the ideals of peace, humanism, equality and personal happiness of all people. It affects the thoughts and sentiments of the members of all classes and strata. It expresses human hopes and yearnings and can help make more perceptible and comprehensible that it is well worth working and living under socialism. Entertainment art in its productions is sensitive to the experiences and vital expressions of all members of our society, especially the workers class and youth, and in various ways reflects social psychology. But here we must always be aware that the substantive and ideological statements must be put into effect in a most discriminating manner, appropriate to the specific opportunities of the various entertainment genres and productions. Entertainment should and must always remain entertainment.

Important also is that in entertainment substantive and formal elements combine into as much of an organic unity as possible. The best dance music can properly entertain only in a dance hall that is large enough and has the proper cultural decor. The best text can move a listener only when the acoustics are good enough for him to hear it. Communication and communal fun at dance events and in discos can be attained only if both the musicians and the technicians understand that dance music in this framework is not an end in itself for the interpreters but is supposed to foster well-being and sociability, induce dancing and offer wholesome leisure-time experiences to those who attend. Entertainment art thus fulfills its social function both through the aggregate of various cultural factors and through the immediate effect of particular, specific genres and types of art.

The Legacy and Tradition of Socialist Entertainment Art

Essential historical roots of the entertainment art in our country are found in the proletariat's way of life and culture. We may in this context refer to Lenin's work, "Critical Remarks on the National Question," where he explains that "each national culture" already has "elements of a democratic and socialist culture" because every bourgeois society has a "working and exploited mass whose living conditions inevitably produce a democratic and socialist ideology."[6] That entertainment art, among other things, also is based on the way of life and culture of the workers class not last accounts for its mass basis and mass efficacy.

With the development of the productive forces, the industrialization and urbanization under capitalism, the proletariat formed, organized and disciplined itself as a class and--chiefly in the developed industrial centers--developed the forms of its political and social struggle and of its cultural life. The international May celebrations, e.g., became political, social and cultural demonstrations of all progressive forces. Cultural and artistic groups of the proletariat developed vigorously, such as workers choral groups, shawm bands, brass bands, amateur plays, agitprop groups and political-satirical cabarets. The cultural institutions of the workers class developed their own forms of entertainment which served their political work as much as the satisfaction of needs for sociability and entertainment. In the mid-19th century Friedrich Engels pointed out that music, e.g., was very important for the festivals of the working people but it was not the main element in them. "As little as a center forms a circle without a periphery," he writes in RHEINISCHE ZEITUNG, "equally little importance attaches to music unless there is merrymaking too, as the periphery for this musical center."[7]

In the early 20th century, the working class in Germany got its assembly halls. Demonstrations and political meetings of the workers took place there as much as events in club conviviality of choral groups and workers' sport groups. Much merrymaking went on there. There were summer, garden and children's festivals, there were evenings when people would play chess or cards, and all that always entailed vivid debate of political and social issues. In those halls the workers found their most important center where they could spend pleasant hours of entertainment and conviviality with others of similar persuasion. Clean rooms and good eating were very important.

These examples illuminate the tremendous wealth of experience contained in the cultural traditions the working class has in entertainment art in our country. In an SED Central Committee welcoming address to the conference on entertainment art it is pointed out that "entertainment and conviviality are firmly linked with the cultural traditions of the workers class and its political, social and cultural struggle."[8]

A second line of tradition in socialist entertainment art goes back to the private places of culture in bourgeois society, democratic and humanistic in tendency. Thus since the 19th century there have been facilities in the capitalist industrial ares and urban sprawls offering culture and art to the "plain people," the working people. There were dance restaurants, suburban inns, excursion spots, variety shows, cabaret stages and later the movies. Those forms were supplemented by touring companies, mainly the circuses and many actors' companies.

The popular character, mostly minor form and easily understandable manner of the art offers in these facilities made them often be referred to by the general term "small art," a somewhat derogatory expression for an art of lower rank and pretense, the art of the "little man." To the extent that capitalist society developed, more and more extended its suppressive function vis-a-vis the workers class and learned to use the modern mass media with their forms of dissemination and of having an impact with greater sophistication, the critical areas in this "small art" were commercialized. And so came the show business where entertainment and popularity would serve the designs of manipulation and profiteering. It turned out that these originally progressive accomplishments were redesigned by capital.

Entertainment Art--Firmly Linked With Socialist Life

After the workers class had seized power in our country, the democratic and humanistic accomplishments in this legacy--in conformity with the basic features of socialist cultural policy--were critically appropriated, creatively preserved and further developed. The institutionalized facilities of the bourgeois entertainment business and the artists themselves--provided they were committed to democratic and humanistic aims--became important institutions or coshapers of the newly developing socialist cultural life after the destruction of fascism on our territory. Circuses, variety artists, cabarets, actors, dance bands and entertainers working on their own formed the basic stock for the development of socialist entertainment art in the GDR. The contents, forms and achievements in their art were increasingly oriented to the requirements and contents of the new society and have been forming a creative synthesis with the proletarian cultural traditions and the progressive stimuli from international entertainment art.

Forms of entertainment and conviviality have evolved in the GDR that suit the socialist way of life. Especially those forms of events like brigade celebrations, excursions with the work collective, enterprise and residential area festivals, people's and press festivals and other cultural events draw an audience of millions each year. The party encourages this development. It is oriented to "using all opportunities and the various forms for the development of a cultured socialist community life in the towns, villages and recreational areas."[9]

The remarkable success we have had with our entertainment art cannot hide the fact, however, that the number of events has, e.g., gone up much faster than their quality. The great need for entertainment still leaves too much room for mediocrity and monotony. All entertainment art in the GDR should be marked by the desire to offer the public recreation, relaxation and artistic enjoyment on a high-grade level. The working people's steadily rising cultural level persistently challenges all who are working in this field. Television viewers, radio listeners or people who attend such events appreciate and expect humorous, interesting, intellectually demanding entertainment contributions, that is to say, the finest quality. From the fact that the various productions in entertainment art normally draw a large audience the particularly compelling task must be derived for the artists engaged in it to make a specific contribution to the development of socialist modes of conduct and value orientations.

Qualitative growth in entertainment art can be found mainly in places where year-long efforts have been made to achieve a unique profile that sets professional standards. Artistes and circus performers of the GDR have, e.g., convincingly demonstrated for years their internationally recognized standards at home and abroad. Other fields of entertainment also improved their qualities remarkably within the last 10 years--a practical outcome of our party's cultural policy since the eighth party congress. Most rock musicians, vocalists, song writers and cabaret performers, e.g., have already quite well developed in their art the socialist features typical of the GDR. Their work is marked by their frank avowal of the socialist social system in the GDR. Their texts, songs and scenes directly and relevantly deal with the real life situation of the citizens in our country. They affirm socialism and induce the viewers and listeners to get actively involved, this also in the sense of outgrowing historically obsolete modes of thinking and conduct. This real relevancy also essentially controls the socialist component in our entertainment art and explains the great public response, especially among the youth.

Developing our own socialist values in our entertainment art is not a smooth process without conflict, however. Still residues of the entertainment business of bourgeois provenance are at work and productions of capitalist countries are uncritically being copied. That is so, e.g., in many dance affairs in discos. The efforts to produce in this dance sector something of our own that is original and novel are still lagging behind. The achievements by some top interpreters should become more of a standard for all who are working in this field. A promising start in this direction was made with the "Hit-tune '81" campaign but that will only meet with success through steady longtime efforts.

Our constantly focusingon developing our own works of socialist realism in our entertainment art in no way means we are insulating ourselves from international trends and accomplishments. GDR entertainment art develops as a firm component of our socialist national culture that is hospitable to the world, remaining open to all progressive manifestations and humanistic accomplishments of other nations. Whatever is valuable in the entertainment art of other countries will have its importance to, and keep its place in, GDR entertainment art and be productively absorbed, integrated and creatively processed in it. Entertainment artists from friendly socialist countries have had a big hand in strengthening the socialist profile of GDR entertainment art. Today one can affirm with pride that the achievements of many GDR entertainers already meet international standards and that they, together with the artists from our fraternal countries, attest to the increased capability of socialist entertainment art. GDR representatives won more than 60 international awards in the last 10 years at international festivals and competitions.

For A Better and More Effective Entertainment Art

In the 1970's, the socialist features in our entertainment developed and deepened. Considering that also "in the 1980's, the demands for quality and effectiveness in our socialist culture and art will rise further,"[10] great attention must be given the constant qualitative development of our entertainment art. The 1978 conference on entertainment art and the 15 bezirk party activists conferences held in recent months with the comrades responsible for entertainment art and organizing such events not only drew up a balance-sheet but also formulated long-range tasks. So all the bezirks in our republic have long-term conceptions for developing entertainment and conviviality. Important coordinating bodies, e.g. the committee for entertainment art and the bezirk commissions, seek to make use of all potentials and to concentrate our capacities.

In wishing to develop our entertainment art further in the 1980's we mainly have to overcome the still existing gap between quantity and quality in many areas that sponsor such events. The widespread opinion, regrettably often confirmed in practice, that with little effort one can make a lot of money in entertainment art must be responded to and refuted by more solid artistic quality.

Better quality and effectiveness will require interpreters, artist personalities, with versatile and persuasive achievements on a high professional level, people with imagination and wit, high professionalism and a great sense of social responsibility. Without an attitude like that toward the work and the audience, all social promotion remains ineffective. Ultimately the level of interpretation does not depend on well fomulated promotional contracts but on solid and persuasive accomplishments on the stage, before the radio microphone or the television camera. GDR entertainment art needs more witty, chatty M.C.'s with a high-level education, political maturity and responsibility and the ability to adapt to different kinds of audiences involved through communication and entertained by humor in the best sense; it also needs better and more extensively trained popular singers who keep a healthy critical distance from their own repertory and act and dance and sing well. Standards in this field were set by artists from the CSSR or Hungary. Our entertainment art also needs more high-level disc jockeys. These people must not merely turn on their records or tapes but be able to introduce their, mostly, young audience, through tasteful commentaries, to what is best in our dance music. And it also needs many more interested young people enjoying art training and ready to carry on the GDR's fine traditions in the work of artistes and circus performers.

The point of orientation for the value and quality of accomplishments in entertainment is not only the GDR top standard, the radiation and millionfold effect upon the audience in our own country, but also the international comparison and yardstick, a worthy representation of our socialist entertainment art beyond our country's borders. Interpreters' competitions, cheerful premieres, accreditation and honorarium regulations, promotional contracts and perceptive qualification measures are and remain stimulating managerial methods of our cultural policy in this field.

Better quality and effectiveness also means a better quality of programs, transmissions and events. Some of the most mass-effective forms of such events sponsored in the GDR still are too cliche-ridden and monotonous and marked by a one-sided use of artistic means and artistic mediocrity. The substantive and formal structure of our entertainment programs must still more be oriented to the rising cultural level of our country's citizens. Entertainment art must be offered especially at places where people spend their leisure time. And new and more advanced considerations are called for altogether about how entertainment art might contribute more to to the working people's recreation, relaxation, labor capacity reproduction and well-being. As material, spatial and technical possibilities in our society permit, entertainment art must be put more into effect mainly at open-air events, at folk festivals, homeland festivals and press festivals, in residential, recreational and vacation areas or in large musical affairs for youth, at youth and children's festivals or during social high points. Here also applies the statement that exchange of experience is the cheapest investment.

A completely new dimension is required for promoting new ideas, scenarios, texts, compositions and choreographies for massively effective and unique entertainment events and broadcasts. For that we urgently need training and advanced training measures for program directors, producers, editors, directors and dramatic directors in this field. Those who do the staging in these events ultimately produce the complex effect of individual performances in entertainment art. Of an entertainment art showcase in May 1983 in Leipzig, impulses that place new emphases on the process of developing a higher program and performance level are expected. The massively extant and developing needs of our citizens for entertainment and sociability will be satisfied to the extent that we succeed in integrating the achievements of socialist entertainment art within the overall process of improving the quality and effectiveness of our intellectual-cultural life. That includes better entertainment values in all arts as much as new impulses for the development of cultural mass activity, i.e. cultural work with more ambitious socialist contents and massively effective forms--for the good of the people.

'MILITANT REJECTION' OF WESTERN NIETZSCHE REVIVAL URGED

Bonn IWE-TAGESDIENST in German No 145, 7 Oct 81 p 1

[Report from Berlin: "SED Demands 'Thorough Criticism' of Nietzsche's Philosophy." A translation of the East Belrin EINHEIT article cited below follows this commentary]

[Text] In its most recent edition, the theoretical SED journal EINHEIT (No 10, 1981) demanded of the GDR scientists a "militant rejection" of the Nietzsche "Renaissance" in Western countries. A "thorough confrontation" with Nietzsche's "anti-progress ideas" and their various effects on bourgeois intellectual life, including their having been a "spiritual forerunner of German fascism," was among the indispensable tasks in elaborating a comprehensive Marxist-Leninist image of history. All attempts by "imperialist forces" at providing a philosophical foundation for their "aggressive disigns, hostile to the people" by means of reactivating the ideas of Nietzsche should "most sharply" have to be opposed. The "intrigues of conservative and neofascist forces" should have to be unmasked which today were making full use of the thoughts of Nietzsche and of other philosophers of similar shades "as an ideological reservoir for neofascist and other reactionary tendencies."

GDR Academician's Discussion

East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 10, Oct 81 (Signed to press 14 Sep 81) pp 1038-1045

[Article by Dr Heinz Malorny, Central Institute for Philosophy, GDR Academy of Sciences: "Nietzsche Renaissance in the World of Yesterday." For a different GDR approach to the study of Nietzsche see translation of an article by Prof Karl-Heinz Hahn, published under the heading, "Critical Approach to German Philosophical Legacy Urged," in JPRS 79401, 9 Nov 81, No 1939 of this series, pp 22-26]

> [Text] The causes and manifestations of the imperialist ideologues' stronger recourse to Nietzsche's ideas. His philosophy (the renunciation of progress, the escape into the subjective and irrational, the orchestration developed in his conception of the "will to power," and his nihilistic ethical ideas) conforms to the life situation of the monopoly bourgeoisie and expresses its claim to an imperialist ideology of domination. No constructive answers to the questions of our era can be derived from the positions of that philosophy.

Trying to cope with the intellectual crisis in their society and in their struggle against socialism, the bourgeois ideologues are reinforcing the mobilization of reactionary ideas taken over from the past. This becomes most apparent in their increasing concern with the philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche (1844-1900). There is talk of a "rediscovery" and "reawakening" or of a "Renaissance" of his philosophy. Even though before it was by no means ineffectual, its revival is yet conspicuous. In the last decade, a great number of books, dissertations, magazine articles and contributions in the electronic mass media have been concerned in the FRG and many other capitalist countries with Nietzsche's life and work, his intellectual sources and his historical effects.

In parallel and partly in direct connection with the mobilization of Nietzsche by imperialist ideologues recourse has also been taken to some other irrationalist philosophers of the 19th century. Here on must above all refer to Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1869), Jacob Burckhardt (1818-1879) and Wilhelm Dilthey (1833-1911). The stronger taste for precisely these thinkers is not likely to be one of the fleeting fashions in bourgeois ideological development. However different the causes and intentions may be which result in a return to ideas of the past, it is impossible to ignore the connection between the choice involved and certain more long-range ideological needs and developments in imperialism.

Why Are Reactionary Philosophers of the Past Wanted Again?

The extremely intensified general crisis of capitalism entwined with the rapidly succeeding cyclical crises and the so-called global problems like energy and raw material shortages collapsed many illusions the imperialist ideologues and politicians still nourished in the 1960's. What has become of the hopes for steady growth and permanent prosperity, the technical feasibility and solvability of the problems, what of the construction and development of the "welfare" and "social state," and where is now the reform euphoria which, e.g., brought the social-liberal coalition into office in the FRG in 1969? The intellectual climate in the capitalist countries is greatly marked today by growing insecurity, pessimism, crisis awareness and dread, together with the penetration of irrationalism and mysticism. Generalizing on the condition of their society, bourgeois ideologues talk of a profound crisis of thought, of the sciences, the world-outlook, the values and their symbols, of an "orientation crisis" of mankind.

Under such conditions philosophies are wanted which mythicize the crisis and decline into a normal condition for human society and teach a "pessimism of strength" and a "heroic" endurance and pertinacity in a purportedly unalterable crisis situation. They offer multiple applications to the efforts by bourgeois ideologues to meet the all engulfing crisis processes of their society by heightened ideological activity. At the same time the basic ideological contents of such philosophies conform with the desires of the most reactionary bourgeois forces to push the political and ideological development in the capitalist countries more toward the right. Thus the ideologues of so-called neoconservatism propagate the "limits of progress" and the "feasibility" as well as the limitation of human knowledge and skill. They impute to the people's masses an inherent inability to be historically creative and postulate as supposedly necessary a social "order of precedence" of great "individuals" and elites as well as methods of authoritarian rule. They seek to insinuate to the masses that revolutionary transformations are harmful and an emancipation was bound to reverse itself into its opposite, into ever decreasing freedom, and things like that. And precisely such reactionary ideas are similarly found already in Schopenhauer, Nietzsche and other like-minded ideologues who precisely for that reason are having a renaissance in the world of yesterday.

Those philosophers and historians are important bourgeois conceptualists of the 19th century. They are precursors and progenitors of the conception of vitalism and irrationalism which evolved in the second half of the 19th century and then, along with the positivistic trend, became one of the two basic currents in late bourgeois philosophy and ideology. Their philosophy reflects the historic-social, intellectual-cultural and moral situation of their time they sensed to be crisis-ridden, which at the time still was that of evolving capitalism. With all the differences among them in detail, what they all have in common is a critique, launched from an aristocratic mental attitude, of industrial capitalism, its profit-oriented pragmatic-utilitaristic and technicistic bent, bourgeois democracy and "mass society," and certain capitalist tendencies hostile to culture and art. But their critique of the ills of capitalism of free competition and its liberal ideology was a critique from the right not opposing the decisive socioeconomic principles of the capitalist order but rather amounting to their affirmation and defense. Differing from most of their contemporary liberal ideologues, they did not in any way extenuate the social ills and antagonisms of capitalist society. In fact, they impressively depicted them for the sake of claiming their historic unchangeability. This way they arrived at a peremptory articulation of the crisis, decline and disintegration of the society and culture of their time and a profoundly pessimistic conception of the history of humanity, a denial of historic progress as such.

With it, while taking constant issue with the optimism during the rise of the bourgeosie about reason, cognition and progress, they departed from the "heroic illusions" of the progressive bourgeoisie, from the ideals of freedom, equality and fraternity for all men, from the ideas of historic inevitability and progress, scientific cognition and truth. Turning that way against the bourgeois-democratic propensities of their age and their own class, they would all the more fight against the liberation struggle started by the workers class and the ideas of socialism.

A Philosophy Hostile to Progress

The tendencies summarized find their extreme formulation in the philosophy of Nietzsche. Nietzsche's development was formed by the crucial historical events and processes of his age: the reactionary period after the defeat of the 1848/49 Revolution, the Prusso-Austrian and the Franco-Prussian War, in which he volunteered for service as a medical orderly, the founding and shaping of the Second German Empire by Bismarck and the stormy development of industrial capitalism, together with the rapid progress of natural science and technology. He was deeply uneasy about the power temporarily gained by the workers in Paris in 1871 and the German workers movement's advance against Bismarck's Socialist Law. "Above and beyond the struggle of the nations, we were terrified by that international Hydra-head that so suddenly made its horrifying appearance, as an indicator for entirely different future struggles."[1] That way the budding philosopher expressed the bourgeoisie's fear of the new political force. And elsewhere he writes: "Whom among the rabble of today do I hate the most? The socialist rabble, the Chandala apostles who subvert the instinct, the joy, the sense of contentment of the worker with his small existence--make him envious, teach him revenge."[2] These words of Nietzsche express his bitter hostility against the main social force of historic progress in his time, the workers class, its revolutionary movement and socialism. And this class-bound position gives rise to essential basic features in his thought.

Precisely the insight into the world-historic role of the workers class, the combination of philosophy with the struggle of the revolutionary workers movement was the basis for the revolution in philosophy that lies in the establishing of dialectic and historical materialism. There was the salient point for the scientific nature of philosophic thinking, the unshakeable optimism about history and cognition, and the real humanism of the new world-outlook by Marx and Engels. Late bourgeois philosophy, on the other hand, consistently negated the historic role of the workers class and the working masses. So it can and will no longer be a spokesman for historic progress, as classic bourgeois philosophy had still been, and what it has left is to be "a mere registrar and a cosmic-mythical-prerational transmogrifier of a society rendered obsolete by history."[3]

The beginning of this process is also mainly tied up with Nietzsche's philosophic thought. He created, most acutely in his last phase of development, an elitist-aristocratic doctrine that disparaged the working masses, the people, defamed the "herd," the "mob," the "far too many," and preached hatred against all democratic and revolutionary movements. All the critique Nietzsche expressed of social, political and spiritual-cultural manifestations, traditional philosophy and ethics and, most vehemently also, Christianity--of everything he regarded as decadent in his age and in all of human history--and of the contemporary liberal bourgeoisie and the Bismarck empire, he finally summarized in the reproach that it all expressed the interests and aspirations of the "herd" men or encouraged or, at least, facilitated their prevailing and "coming to rule." In view of these, in his eyes, deleterious developments, a "declaration of war by the superior men against the mass is necessary! All that which pampers and softens and makes the 'people' gain currency works in favor of the rule by inferior men."[4]

In his last phase of development Nietzsche believed he could bring about a world historic turn with his philosophy. It should end what he thought was up to then the wrong way of mankind through history, which only by seldom exceptions had accepted "superior men," and make possible a deliberate breeding of a small caste of a higher kind of men, even of a "Superman" as a "type which has turned out supremely well." So Nietzsche undisguisedly defended the interests of a small reactionary ruling elite, its privileges, its claim to unrestrained domination, its alleged claim to the exploitation, suppression and enslaving of a broad mass of people. By declaring slavery, misery and poverty, and the people's toil an irrevocable prerequisites for all higher culture, he dignified these and other social characteristics of the exploiter society as if they were natural conditions of life per se, he sanctified them as something that was allegedly grounded in the unchangeable nature of reality. Whenever Nietzsche expressed himself on general matters of ideology and natural philosophy, he invariably intended a cosmic or biological explanation for the social "order of precedence," the caste division between "masters" and people's masses and their suppression and exploitation. "Life itself," so he wrote, "essentially is appropriation, violation, rape of the alien and the weaker, suppression, hardness, imposing one's own forms, absorption and at least, and most charitably, exploitation."[5] Nietzsche's irrationalist philosophy, which denied inevitability and progress in history, ideologically culminated in his philosophical myths of "life," the "will to power," the "eternal recurrence of all things," and of the "Superman." His epistemology found expression in a relativistic perspectivism and fictionalism negating any objective truth.

Through his "revaluation of all values," prototypical in many respects, Nietzsche brought about the radical reorientation of bourgeois philosophy to the ideological requirements of approaching monopoly capitalism. Anticipating its tending toward reaction and violence, expansion, aggression and barbarism, he gave philosophic expression to them in a mythicizing form by his doctrines of the "will to power," the "masters of the earth," and of "living dangerously" and with his immoralism of "beyond good and evil" and of the "complete irresponsibility." His dictum, "Nothing is true, everything is permitted,"[6] provided imperialist policy with the concept for its guiding maxim, as it were.

The persistent and broad effect of those ideas, which have found fertile ground since the 1890's, was helped by the mode of presentation and the personal tragic fate of Nietzsche. An interesting life story and a history of illness, the fate of a lonely and embittered outsider during his life, outstanding language skills and an aphoristic way of writing, a most unusual style for a philosopher, the radicalism of his claims and the imperious prophetic tone, and then again sensitive lyrical tones in the ideas presented, all that came together to fascinate time and time again especially young and inexperienced people in search of a world-outlook. Idols were being smashed here presumably, and new, seductive symbols were offered that tickled many a petty bourgeois vanity: the "free spirit" and the "good European," the "legislator for the future," the "immoralist," the "new nobility" and the "masters of the earth," the "Superman," the "laughing lions and the "blond beast" and so forth. Nietzsche's unsystematic "opus of aphoristic fragments" (Johannes R. Becher's phrase), internally contradictory and thus subject to differing interpretations, offered usable and quotable chips of thought, as its effects through history demostrate, to most diversified ambitions: to poets, artists and philosophers of various persuasions, Christians and enemies of Christianity, opponents of technology and the ones tired of civilization, the ideologists of the so-called young conservatism as well as to anarchistic insurgents and super-radical madmen--and of course also to fascist ideology, to the most barbaric practices of the most reactionary forces of monopoly capitalism.

Because Nietzsche through his doctrines created the prototype for all subsequent reactionary subjectivistic-irrationalistic philosophies of imperialism, he became one of the most important precursors and pioneers of fascism and its ideology. The fascist leaders and ideologues took from his work the elements that suited them and inserted them into their own adventurous structure of thoughts. Nietzsche also in many ways had an indirect effect in that many of his successors and interpreters transformed, further developed and popularized his ideas so that they, thus changed, likewise entered the fascist ideology. Nietzsche's works and much of the literature about him formed reading material that prepared for adopting fascist ideas in that it undermined and destroyed still existing ties with the spirit of humanity, democracy, liberalism, the spirit of science, classical philosophy and culture. Nietzsche's ideas nurtured thoughts about cruelty and violence as purportedly unchangeable elements of life. His preaching of immoralism and nihilism was apt to destroy a still surviving sense of responsibility to mankind. The gas chambers of Majdanek and Auschwitz, in terms of intellectual history, were somehow anticipated by that someone had previously pronounced the doctrine of the "destruction of millions of misfits."[7&8]

The Reactionary Objective and Effect of the Return to Nietzsche Today

In view of the bitter historic experiences with the effects of Friedrich Nietzsche's ideas, the question inevitably arises what their renewed revival in the capitalist world intends to accomplish. In answering that question one must not be misled by external appearance. Looked at purely from the outside, the contemporary concern with Nietzsche offers an extremely complex picture. The philosophic and political positions from which one deals with him or acknowledges him are manifold. Dealing with his life, his work and his effect becomes for many authors a vehicle for confronting very many different topical ideological problems of our age. One gets the impression Nietzsche's work forms a sort of big supermarket for many contemporary bourgeois ideologues, for ideas and problems, from where to get a subject which they can then exploit no end. Typical of all these efforts toward reviving Nietzsche's ideas is their ignoring or directly denying the class character, the concrete historic determinants, the social class-bound functions and the ominous effects of his philosophy. Instead, the particulars of his personality and psyche, his circumstances in life and his individual destiny are made the focal point in explaining his thoughts. Such an approach precisely, opposed to any overall assessment of Nietzsche's philosophy from the vantage point of scientific historic materialism, facilitates interpreting and purposefully using it wholly at will, subjectively. However much the motives, concerns and final results may differ in this return to Nietzsche, and however much judgments about him may differ and partly even contradict each other, there is something that all this production of ideas has very much in common: the front-line position against social progress in our time, real socialism and the revolutionary doctrine of Marxism-Leninism.

From all bourgeois and revisionistic philosophizing about Nietzsche, with Nietzsche or proceeding from Nietzsche, actually there always results something that was contained in him in the first place: an expanded reproduction of a basic model of reactionary bourgeois philosophy and ideology opposed to social progress. Was it not Nietzsche himself who wrote: "Humanity does not constitute a development toward the better or stronger or higher in a way in which that is presumed today. 'Progress' is but a modern idea and that means, a false idea."[9] And that statement is aimed against social and moral progress and the progress of science, knowledge and technology alike. Thus it ultimately serves to cover up that reactionary class function if positions taken in journalism explain the current Nietzsche Wave in capitalist countries and the interest in his philosophy principally or exclusively by a general discontent that undoubtedly exists in imperialism in view of the various crisis manifestations, a "new satiety with Western civilization and its values," "renewed doubts about the blessings of mass culture in the technical-scientific civilization," a "propensity toward irrationalism" and a "spiritual countermovement against the rationalistic and materialistic zeitgeist,"[10] while the ongoing effect of his inhumane master-race ideology in imperialist society is ignored completely. Take Rudolf Augstein, e.g., who asserts: Nietzsche "is being praised like no one else, sometimes even sits on top of Darwin, Marx and Freud, but he is no longer resorted to for what he thought his very own, for his ideas on the master-race and on conquests, the contempt for and extermination of unworthy life, his crude power egotism and barbaric war enthusiasm."[11] Sure enough, after the experiences with fascism many bourgeois ideologues find it repugnant openly to refer to these elements in Nietzsche--but have they on account of that lost their effect? Are not, e.g., certain recent statements, and decisions to boot, by leading U.S. politicians and military, even if one may assume they know nothing of Nietzsche, marked by the spirit of conquest, power egotism and barbaric war enthusiasm? Are there no neofascist groups in the FRG as in all capitalist countries? Are there no fascist regimes in various parts of the world, from El Salvador and Chile to South Africa, which openly advocate such ideas and practice them, too? As long as imperialism exists, those ideas will find premises to work on.

Under the monopoly capitalist conditions of the FRG, where one never has truly come to grips with Nietzsche's ideas, the massive dissemination and popularization of his works is bound to have effects in an extremely anti-progress, anticommunist and antidemocratic and antihumanistic sense. Nietzsche's irrational myths becloud the view at social circumstances where rational clarity is needed to bring men to an understanding of and conscious struggle against the social causes for the crisis, unemployment, housing shortage, welfare reductions and educational misery, for crime and moral decline, racism and misanthropy, and above all against the arms race and war danger. Nietzsche defames the organization, awareness and historic activity of the working masses, whose actions alone can bring about the social changes for overcoming the manifestations of capitalism referred to. He preached contempt and hatred of all revolutionary and emancipation desires and, mainly, of the only true alternative to imperialism, of socialism. Nietzsche's elitist antidemocratism, his emphasizing an unlimited claim to rulership by a small elite, his extolling the military organizational forms of society, the giving of orders and the obedience to them as decisive in the relations between "masters" and people's masses not last serve to undergird philosophically the standpoint of being the boss at home held by the entrepreneur in his enterprise, the summoning of the strong man, the inclinations to dismantle democracy and proceed toward authoritarian and dictatorial forms of government in the imperialist countries.

Thus Nietzsche's ideas unequivocally function on behalf of the interests of the most reactionary circles of the ruling class, of conservative and neofascist forces. It is not by chance that right now mainly neoconservative ideologues like Guenter Rohrmoser are intensively and extensively reactivating the basic reactionary content in Nietzsche's thoughts, such as hisvehement fight against social progress and socialism, his awareness of crisis, and his "pessimism of strength," and declare those ideas are suitable means for a philosophical understanding and for intellectually and ideologically coping with the current situation of mankind. It was thoroughly possible to maintain the thesis, as Rohrmoser wrote in the Springer paper DIE WELT, "that the end of man, which Nietzsche prognosticated from the end of metaphysics, the disintegration of any form of meaning-conveying humanity and the practice he demanded of a revaluation of all values only now enters the stage of realization in history." Only now the age was entering the constellation which is signified by the name of Nietzsche.[12] What contempt for humanity and demagoguery stand behind such an appraisal of Nietzsche, which lifts him up to be, as it were, some sort of spiritual forerunner leading into the next millenium--and this, typically, by the very ideologues who undefatigably pose as resolute fighters for freedom, human dignity and humanity.

Marxism-Leninism Points the Only Real Way

Even in his lifetime Nietzsche gave no forward-pointing answer to the questions facing mankind. He neither made a contribution to the scientific analysis of capitalist society nor to uncovering the historic thrust of history or to philosophically or ideologically coming to terms with the tremendous advances in the natural sciences. That was ruled out by his whole style of thinking, his insufficient knowledge of the natural and social sciences, especially the political economy, and above all by his reactionary class standpoint.

The answers he did supply to the basic ideological questions of his era amounted to a philosophical reaction to what were then already obsolete class forces in history, against which the workers class, getting set for realizing its historic mission, had just received the philosophic equipment for its struggle from the founders of scientific socialism, Marx and Engels. Nietzsche's answers, thus, even at the end of the last century, found themselves in an unbridgeable opposition to, and behindhand, the state of knowledge and advance in philosophic and sociotheoretical knowledge Marx and Engels had elaborated.

Equally much anyone goes astray who would like to find in Nietzsche's philosophy any handles for correctly approaching the pressing vital questions of humanity today. And how could anyone expect a pioneering answer for a humanistic solution of them, for realizing social security, education and culture for all men, from an ideologue who in his inhumane contempt for the people's masses defamed the striving for "security, safety, comfort, and an easier life for everyone" as the "green pasture happiness of the herd,"[13] presented exploitation, poverty and misery as unalterable because they were rooted in the essence of life as such, regarded higher education and culture as an aristocratic privilege and identified their dissemination among the masses virtually with the decline of culture per se?[14]

Only Marxism-Leninism can point to the real way to solving our era's problems of humanity, eliminating war and hunger, and ensuring social security, growing prosperity, and fine education and culture for all men. With the elimination of the capitalist exploiter system, the construction of a new, socialist society, and the full development of the productive forces, the workers class, under the leadership by its Marxist-Leninist party and equipped with a scientific social theory, creates the social prerequisites for social security, the constant rise in public welfare, and education and culture for all working people.

Precisely this indissoluble connection of Marxist-Leninist theory with the vital interests of the workers class, all working people and all mankind it is from which also stems the Marxist-Leninists undeterred advocacy of peace. In this matter the opposition between Nietzsche's views and the interests of humanity is no less blatant. What would he have to say today to the peace-loving people who, in view of the exacerbation of the international situation on account of the aggressive imperialist forces, are increasing their efforts for the sake of preserving the peace? Will he only claim that war is unalterable and indispensable,[15] defame any preference to peace over war as an "abortion of decadence" or say something like "a society which definitely and by instinct rules out war and conquest is in decline"[17]? To follow Nietzsche in this today, the nuclear age, would be the way to doom.

The reawakening of anti-progress ideas of the last century by bourgeois ideologues and resorting to them for purposes of the contemporary ideological struggle call for a militant rejection by Marxist-Leninist scientists. Thorough issue-taking with Nietzsche's philosophy and its diverse effects in bourgeois intellectual life, including its role as spiritual forerunner of German fascism, is among the indispensable tasks in elaborating a comprehensive Marxist-Leninist image of history. This calls for a close collaboration of philosophers, historians, literary scientists and art historians. For solving this task we can rely on the whole breadth of already available valid Marxist assessments from Franz Mehring to S. F. Odujev and, above all, on the works of those Marxist-Leninists who in the 1930's and 1940's, in bitter struggle against fascism prevailing in Germany and against its barbaric ideology, took issue with Nietzsche.[18]

That includes opposing sharply all attempts by imperialist forces which by means of a reactivation of Nietzsche's ideas would wish to give a philosophical foundation to their aggressive anti-people inclinations. And it includes unmasking the intrigues of neofascist and conservative forces which today are making full use of the thoughts of Nietzsche and of other philosophers of similar shades as an ideological reservoir for neofascist and other reactionary tendencies. Thereby we would also make an effective contribution to uncovering significant intellectual sources and long-term developmental tendencies of contemporary bourgeois philosophy, the ideology of a declining world.

East Berlin EINHEIT in German Vol 36 No 10, Oct 81 (Signed to press 14 Sep 81) 'Resumes' addendum

Theory and Practice of Shaping Developed Socialism

[Summary of 'Conception of Developed Socialism' feature article by Prof Dr Otto Reinhold, economist, member, SED Central Committee; rector, Academy of Social Sciences, SED CC; member, GDR Academy of Sciences; corresponding member, USSR Academy of Sciences; member, EINHEIT editorial board; pp 977-985]

> [Text] The sound scientific strategy the 10th party congress has presented for the 1980's shows our party program also conforms to the changed conditions. What will the effects of these new conditions be in the 1980's? Why are economic growth and our resolutely going into intensively expanded reproduction—the prerequisites for which are laid in all domains of society—necessary conditions for the well-being of our people and for the safeguarding of peace? These are some of the questions about the shaping of developed socialism that are being answered in connection with conclusions drawn from the 10th party congress for our economy.

Upward Development of Material-Technical Base on Road of Intensification

[Summary of 'Conception of Developed Socialism' feature article by Prof Dr Helmut Koziolek, economist, member, SED Central Committee; director, Central Institute for Socialist Economic Management, SED CC; chairman, Council for Economics Research; member, GDR Academy of Sciences; member, EINHEIT editorial board; pp 986-994]

> [Text] An effective material-technical base is of fundamental importance to the further shaping of the developed socialist society. Which tasks are in the foreground for accomplishing the strengthening of our material-technical base, the intensification of our reproduction process and the acceleration of our scientific-technical progress as a unified process? What requirements arise for our basic assets economy, our investment policy, our resources economy and the effectiveness of live labor? Why is the formation of a closed reproduction process and its intensification necessary in every combine?

Ideal and Reality in the Socialist Revolution

[Summary of 'Conception of Developed Socialism' feature article by Prof Dr Wolfgang Eichhorn I, member, GDR Academy of Sciences; member, GDR Academy of Pedagogical Sciences; pp 1001-1007]

[Text] How are the ideals of the revolutionary workers class truly brought to realization? Which historic place is occupied in this process by the shaping of the developed socialist society? While answering these questions and paying tribute to the values and accomplishments of real socialism in their magnitude and to the ideals of the revolutionary workers class which become real in the life of socialist society, the article also shows what it means to make an effective use of ideals, the impulses of ideas toward solving current and future tasks toward the unfolding of creative action.

Persistent Struggle for Top Quality Products

[Summary of article by Dr Hans Broll, economist, general director, VEB Werner Lamberz Polygraphy Combine, Leipaig; pp 1010-1016. A translation of this article is published under the heading, "Combine Director Explains Keys to Production Success," in a recent JPRS issue of EAST EUROPE: ECONOMIC AND INDUSTRIAL AFFAIRS]

[Text] The Polygraphy Combine, which exports a great part of its output, is making great efforts to produce more commodities achieving top standards in terms of their scientific-technical as well as economic parameters. What management documents are needed for that? And how can one make sure that--supported by political-ideological work--quality work is done on every job which is prerequisite to top quality products?

Scientific-Technical Progress--Challenge for Young Generation

[Summary of article by Prof Dr Juergen Polzin, director, Research Center, GDR Academy of Pedagogical Sciences, Halle-Neustadt; pp 1017-1023]

[Text] Enabling the growing generation to cope with scientific-technical progress and making effective the personality-forming values growing out of its active involvement becomes one of the crucial tasks in communist education. The main thing is to awaken understanding for science and technology among the pupils and to enable them to solve, alongside the working people, tasks of our scientific-technical progress, thereby to instil in them responsible working and creative thinking and foster all natural-technical abilities, talents and gifts.

A Program of Revolutionary Marxism

[Summary of article by Dr Marga Beyer, deputy sector chief, Institute for Marxism-Leninism, SED Central Committee; pp 1024-1030]

[Text] The revolutionary German social democratic Erfurt Program of 1891 proclaimed the victory of Marxism in the German workers movement. That was a program of the revolutionary class struggle in which were firmly anchored the struggle of the workers class for the seizure of political power and for replacing the historically obsolete capitalist social system by the socialist. The revolutionary basic principles of this significant document are imperishably alive in the international workers movement's store of experiences, have found a firm home in our party and are part of real socialism today.

Africa's South in Imperialism's Global Strategy

[Summary of article by Dr Siegfried Buettner, sector chief, SED Central Committee; pp 1046-1051]

[Text] Proceeding from the economic, political and military-strategic place value of the apartheid regime within imperialism's global strategy, the background and aims are analyzed of the most recent escalation of terror and of the aggression against Angola and Namibia. Pretoria's policy, jeopardizing peace and security in the world, and that of the most aggressive U.S. imperialist forces behind it, have caused a worldwide storm of indignation and contempt. The people and government of Angola and the peoples of Namibia and of the South African Republic may in their just struggle rely on stronger worldwide anti-imperialist solidarity.

DEVELOPMENT OF NATION-NATIONALITY CONCEPT ANALYZED

Definition of Nation

East Berlin JUNGE GENERATION in German Vol 35 No 10, Oct 81 (Signed to press 9 Sep 81) pp 33-36

[Text] Each of use is likely to have made such entries as called for in filling our a questionnaire or visa application. Unquestioningly. But also in the awareness that he was here making a political statement documenting his incontrovertibly belonging to the first socialist German state. That sould suggest some more thorough considerations based on sound information.

In fact, national questions reflect one of the most complicated problems in social development. They have always been the centerpiece of the conflict between socialism and imperialism, socialist ideology and bourgeois revisionist ideology. With the class and national relations becoming more complicated in the world and with the increased efforts by imperialist forces at reviving nationalism and racism, these matters are becoming most topical today.

Only recall the attempts of bourgeois ideologists at "recommending" to the socialist countries "national models" of Marxism, rendering the national absolute with reference to class interests, especially those of the workers class, or insinuating the communists, on behalf of proletarian internationalism, rule out patriotism and a national sentiment.

Now there is actually nothing new in this demagoguery about the communists as "unpatriotic chaps." In their Communist Manifesto, Marx and Engels took care of the allegation the communists wanted to abolish the fatherland and nationality: "The working men have no country. We cannot take from them what they don't possess. Since the proletariat must first of all acquire political supremacy, must rise to be the leading class of the nation, must constitute itself the nation, it is, so far, itself national, though not in the bourgeois sense of the word."[1]

How Did Nations Evolve?

The term "nation" comes from the Latin: natio — "people," "tribe" and nasci — "to be born."

True enough—the genesis of a nation can figuratively be compared with the act of birth, both coming with labor pains. That merely means nations always arise as the outcome of class struggle. The bourgeois revolution here performs the crucial role in forming the capitalist nation, and the socialist revolution, the socialist.

Not always have there been nations in the history of mankind. They depend on certain social configurations for the form in which they will necessarily exist. What does that mean?

Nations evolve at a certain level of the class struggle, as a response to the exigencies of capitalist development. Capitalist production relations developing in the womb of feudalism pressed for overcoming feudal particularism and forming a strong political center. Capitalist commodity production and the commercial relations resulting therefrom required not only a common language but also, above all, a common internal market. Which makes the nation an inescapable product of the developing capitalist society. This is the sense in which we must understand Lenin when he said that the creation of "national ties (was) nothing but the creation of bourgeois ties."[2]

We must of course take into account that the evolution of a nation is facilitated by there previously having been tribes, peoples and nationalities that have adapted to one another, e.g., in their language and the particulars in their culture and traditions.

A nation exists, not only after all prerequisites for its existence have been met. As the characteristic features of a nation evolve during the process of its maturation, its conditions of existence also evolve. The two processes complement and condition each other.

In this sense then the formation of a nation within its territorial boundaries does not primarily depend on ethnical but on economic, political and social factors.

What Characterizes a Nation?

We have the definition of nation as "a historic community of people which evolves through shaping what they have in common in terms of their economic relations, territory, language and the particulars in their culture and character."[3] Thus, we look at the economic, political, social and ideological relations in their dialectical unity with the ethnic conditions. Primacy attaches here, however, to the factors of social class. They are decisive for the formation of a nation as for determining its sociohistoric type. In wanting to remain consistent materialists and dialecticians in this matter, such a class-oriented and concrete-historic approach becomes indispensable for us. That, Marx, Engels and Lenin have taught us. The latter, e.g., asserted: "Marx had no doubt that compared with the 'workers' problem' the national question was of secondary importance. But from ignoring the national movement his theory is miles apart."[4]

So it is only logical for us to consider that ethnic elements infuse the national. Those factors are essential aspects of any nation and must not be underrated. Only they do not mark the essence of a nation, their role is merely derivative as they are themselves class-conditioned.

This notion of the primacy of the ethnical, essentially an idealistic notion, contradicts, e.g., German history itself: common ethnic conditions in the final analysis proved too weak to keep the Swiss, Austrians, Netherlanders, Alsatians and Lotharingians from remaining outside the capitalist German nation when it was formed. They either formed nations of their own or joined others in the course of history. The causes in any case were political or socioeconomic in nature.

The same considerations apply to the role of language. Without wishing to slight its importance, we must affirm that the correlation of "same language--same nation" is wholly inadequate. As no one would get the idea to regard, say, the United States, Australia and Great Britain as one nation, merely because English is spoken there, no one would consider either Austria, Liechtenstein and parts of Switzerland a nation nowadays. The same logically applies to the relationship between the GDR and the FRG.

State territory is an important national characteristic. It is mainly defined by the prevailing economic and political relations in a given geographic area, not by common linguistic traits. "Without a community of economic life, a community of territory makes no sense as a national criterion."[5]

The Class Character of a Nation

Most factors determining a nation have class character. That also includes the ethnical and, mainly, the psyche and culture of a nation. Under the conditions of the antagonistic class society, national unity thus is only relative. Marx commented on that by saying that actually every capitalist nation is divided into a "nation of the workers" and a "nation of the proprietors."[6] There exist, to quote Lenin, "two national cultures in each national culture."[7]

In assessing and judging national questions we thus always have to ask ourselves and answer the following questions: Which national unity is meant, which social force leads it and by which social order is it marked?

Nation--Nationality

The concepts of nation and nationality are close but by no means identical. Nationality embraces the totality of ethnic features, specifics and traits of a population such as language, mores, customs, habits and the particulars of culture. That makes the concept of nationality more narrow than that of the nation. Unless one makes this necessary distinction and demarcation, it is impossible to comprehend the split between the nations in the antagonistic class society or the dialectical and historic connection between nation and nationality. How could one otherwise understand that in the world men of one nationality live, "dispersed," who by a long shot do not represent one-and-the-same nation, or a nation can be formed out of several nationalities (as, e.g., the United States, France or Spain) or, in turn, various nations can evolve from one-and-the-same nationality (as proven by historic developments in the German-language area)?

The Social Essence of the Nation

In the course of development the social essence of the nation changes in principle. But the nationality characteristics do remain basically the same. Which must not make us ignore the fact that they too are affected by class-bound factors.

Long before there was a capitalist German nation, when the feudal society came to prevail, a German nationality, e.g., had already formed, but not until the 19th century was the bourgeois German nation finally established. The bourgeois-democratic revolution of 1848/49 was a crucial impetus for it. But because of the betrayal by the haute bourgeoisie and its readiness for compromise with reactionary Junkerdom, the chance to establish a unified German democratic republic was lost. When then the German Reich was established in 1871--significantly, in the Paris suburb of Versailles--it did no doubt mean progress. Yet that German national state evolved through a "revolution from the top," as the outcome of Bismarck's "blood-and-iron policy."

Germany's unity had been established, to be sure, yet it was antidemocratic and under the reactionary Prussian hegemony. Furthermore, that German Empire was split up into 26 monarchies and principalities.

Not only in 1848 and 1871, also in 1918 and through all history, the German haute bourgeoisie has repeatedly demonstrated it cannot lead a nation. And more still! During all its class rule it has never hesitated to sacrifice the interests of the whole nation to its own class (meaning: profit) interests.

Capitalist Nation--Socialist Nation

The rending of the unified state territory after 1945--after the destruction of Hitler fascism by the Soviet Union and the anti-Hitler coalition--was the historic fault of the German monopoly bourgeoisie and took place wholly in the interest of the monopolies and out of fear of revolutionary development. Out of the capitalist nation two German nations emerged of opposite sociohistoric type: the socialist German nation in the GDR and the capitalist nation in the FRG. What is particular in this situation is that the socialist nation did not emerge--as might normally be the case--within the framework of the former bourgeois national state, but in a part only, in that part where the counterrevolution did not manage to prevent the revolutionary liberation of the people.

The formation and further development of the socialist nation in the GDR is an indissoluble and inevitable element of the socialist revolution. This has not happened in "empty space" or "unhistorically," as bourgeois ideologues from the West would like to have it. Our nation is firmly rooted in the progressive traditions in the history of the German people--from Muentzer and Luther via the Prussian reformers, and Marx and Engels, all the way to August Bebel, Karl Liebknecht and Ernst Thaelmann.

Our socialist German nation is "a stable community of friendly allied classes and strata, free of antagonistic contradictions. Its essential features are shaped by the workers class which, as the main political and social force of socialist society, also heads the socialist nation. The social rapprochement among the classes and strata itself takes place under party leadership and on the basis of the Marxist-Leninist world-outlook and the ideals of the workers class. It consolidates the political-moral unity of the people."[8]

The development of the socialist nation in the GDR is of course no one-time act that would be concluded within a few years. It is a lengthy historical process in which the economic and political foundations were created relatively fast, to be sure, but the change of the consciousness of the people, their sociopsychological propensities, requires much more time.

For this reason we must--relying on our socioeconomic and political development--continue to devote great attention to the socialist education of youth in the GDR and of all working people. This involves in particular our depening and reinforcing their socialist consciousness, their proletarian internationalism and socialist patriotism. The development of socialist national consciousness and national pride and patriotism has, at that, nothing in common with that type of bourgeois nationalism which spurs people on to chauvinism and national hatred. That it opposes implacably.

Aspects of 'Socialist Nation'

Leipzig LEIPZIGER VOLKSZEITUNG in German 17-18 Oct 81 p 11

['We and Our Times' feature article by Prof Dr Georg Harder: "The National Specific Has Nothing in Common With Any Form of Nationalism—On the Development of the Socialist German Nation"]

[Text] "The GDR people, in conformity with the historical process of the worldwide transition of humanity from capitalism to socialism, has irrevocably opted for socialism. Led by the workers class, it has constituted itself the socialist German nation. No one can do anything about it" (Comrade Erich Honecker, "Bericht des Zentralkomitees der Sozialistischen Einheitspartei Deutschlands an den X. Parteitag der SED [SED Central Committee Report to the 10th SED Congress], Dietz publishing house, Berlin, 1981, p 28).

This general statement in the SED Central Committee report to the 10th party congress reflects the historic fact that in the GDR, in the outcome of the successful socialist revolution, the socialist German nation has been established. In the further process of the shaping of the developed socialist society the question arises about the relationship between the general and the particular in the development of the socialist German nation. Any nation always expresses, as an individual nation, a relationship between the general and the particular, and so does the socialist German nation as well. The general of the socialist German nation in the GDR reflects those principles and basic features which mark it as a socialist type of nation. These principles and basic features are: the socialist mode of production, socialist statehood, the leadership role by the workers class and its Marxist-Leninist party, the socialist relations among the classes and strata, and the socialist superstructure with the socialist ideology dominating it.

The principles referred to act as universally valid inevitabilities of the socialist revolution and socialist construction and form the essential traits of the socialist German nation. These essential traits become apparent through the socialist character of the economic life practiced in common in the socialist nation of the GDR, the socialist relations among the friendly allied classes and strata in their mutual rapprochement based on the world-outlook of the workers class, and the unity between socialist patriotism and proletarian internationalism. The socialist type of nation is rooted in the existence of real socialism and the effects of its fundamental inevitabilities within the GDR.

The Implacable Opposition to the Capitalist Type of Nation

As in the other countries in the socialist community of states not other but the identical socialist principles and socialist basic features of social life exist as in the GDR, the general forms the basis for shaping what the socialist countries, states and nations have in common under the leadership by their Marxist-Leninist parties. The socialist type of nation, expressing the general and common in all socialist nations, at the same time reflects the implacable opposition to the capitalist type of nation in the capitalist countries, including the opposition between the socialist type of nation in the GDR and the capitalist type in the FRG.

Which also states that on German soil there have long existed two opposite types of nations, the socialist in the state of the GDR and the capitalist in the state of the FRG.

For what is particular in any given nation we have the concept of the national-specific. In this context the emphasis is placed not so much on the nation as the national as rather on the development of the specific in the national. It has to be kept in mind, to be sure, that the particular, here termed the specific, exists neither apart from a given nation nor from the general in a given type of nation. Through considering the national particulars as something apart from the economic, political and intellectual-cultural foundations of a given nation, one would arrive at a misconception of the national-specific and evoke the danger of nationalism. To make a special point of this at present is especially important because the ruling classes of imperialism, especially those in the FRG, are trying harder to employ nationalism as a Trojan horse used by anticommunism and anti-Sovietism against the socialist countries.

What then do we mean by the national-specific in the development of the socialist German nation? First, the national-specific in the socialist nation of the GDR constitutes a whole complex of differences in comparison with other nations. When compared with other nations, these differences appear as national particulars. The socialist German nation shows here various kinds of national particulars. The first kind of national particulars are those that have evolved from the history of the German people and the German workers movement in the struggle for social progress. In ths socialist German nation they show up as progressive traditions of the German people and revolutionary traditions of the German workers movement.

Heirs of Those Who Worked for Progress

The members of the socialist German nation of the GDR are heirs to all those Germans who throughout the history of the German people and of the German workers movement have engendered social progress. Thorough knowledge of and about that legacy is an essential source for the development and consolidation of the GDR citizens' socialist national consciousness. Another kind of particulars are those that have evolved on GDR territory as the outcome of the antifascist-democratic and socialist transformation of society. This includes doing away with the consequences of German fascism, eliminating the foundations of German imperialism in a capitalist stronghold, the struggle for creating a unified GDR with a socialist perspective within the territory from the Oder to the Rhine and so forth.

Through the historic process of a revolutionary renewal of society, the workers class, the working peasantry, the intelligentsia and the other working strata, led by the SED and united in the National Front of the GDR, gained not only a new social but a new national existence.

Among the third kind of differences from other nations we include those particulars that have to do with the development of the productive forces, the socialist production relations and other aspects of social life in the GDR. For example, we have a high degree of production concentration within a small territory, specific forms of distribution and so forth.

The national particulars of the socialist nation of the GDR--as stated--constitute a whole complex of differences in comparison with other nations. For one thing these differences have their historic causes, and then they have to do with the current economic, political and cultural development level. The socialist substance of the national differences in our socialist nation connects with the socialist substance in the national differences in other socialist nations through the rapprochement process among them.

So One Nation Can Learn From Other Nations

The rapprochement among the socialist nations is an inevitability in the development of the community of socialist states. It fosters and forms the most favorable condition for making each socialist nation blossom. Socialism creates all opportunities for enabling one nation to learn from another so that the nations can exchange their material and cultural achievements with each other. The effect of the national particulars of the socialist German nation in relating with the bourgeois nation of the GDR is wholly different. The socialist substance of our national particulars constitutes a comprehensive implacable opposition to the nature of the FRG. The principles of socialism and the socialist substance of social life also produced new qualitative changes of the forms of national life in the GDR.

The forms of national community among the classes and strata in the GDR already indicate considerable differences from those in the bourgeois nation in the FRG (economic life, culture, the content of ethical relations and so forth). Thus, the socialist nation of the GDR not only marks a different type of nation in comparison with the FRG but a different nation, different from the nation in the FRG. The fact that the socialist nation of the GDR and the bourgeois nation of the FRG have evolved from the former German nation, and that the citizens both of the GDR and the FRG speak German and in their majority are of the same nationality, is something the ruling circles in the FRG seek to reorchestrate into a common possession as between the GDR and the FRG. Their concern is to preserve the German nation, common national traits in the noninstitutional area or of the noninstitutional kind.

It is of topical significance to take issue with that concept, which stems from the bourgeois emotional-cultural theory of nation. By that conception the FRG ruling circles seek to subvert the further development of the characteristic traits of the socialist nation in the GDR and preserve an "overall German" consciousness.

UNIFICATION OF PROTESTANT CHURCH FEDERATIONS DISCUSSED

Frankfurt/Main FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 17 Sep 81 p 5

['Reportage' feature article by Karl-Heinz Baum, Berlin: "Getting Going--When Will There Be New Church Organs in the GDR?"]

[Text] In January 1979, 45 delegates from the GDR district churches made church history. In the "Eisenach Proposals" they recommended unification of the three GDR church federations into one "United Protestant Church." The optimistic outlook then was: "The steps necessary for the realization of these recommendations should be planned in such a way that, as of 1981, the organs of the new unified church could be established."

The attempt to accomplish [unification efforts during] 450 years of Protestant church history in Germany by one move lasting 2 years has not succeeded: no "organs of the new unified church" will be established in the GDR this year. Nor, probably, in the following 2 years--except for the fact that beginning next year a joint office of the three existing church groups is to begin work in August Street, East Berlin.

The existing organizations of the Protestant Church, however, [sentence incomplete as published]. The synod of the Protestant Church Federation in the GDR, which is to begin this Friday in Guestrow/Mecklenburg, will issue information on whether beginning with 1984--that is 3 years later than planned--new church organs will begin their work.

There are presently eight district churches in the GDR: Anhalt, Berlin-Brandenburg, Goerlitz (which includes the part of Silesia which today belongs to the GDR), Greifswald (the remnant church of Pomerania), Mecklenburg, the Church Province of Saxony (Magdeburg), Saxony and Thuringia. The three Lutheran district churches of Mecklenburg, Saxony and Thuringia have already been unified in the United Protestant Lutheran Church (VELK). The five remaining district churches belong since 1817 to the Protestant Church of the Union (EKU) of the former State of Prussia. The district church of Greifswald holds a special position because as a Union church it is, at the same time, a member of the Lutheran World Federation, just like the three other Lutheran district churches in the GDR. In 1969--after the separation from the Protestant Church in [West] Germany--all eight district churches were unified in the Federation of Protestant Churches in the GDR--a relatively loose parent organization.

If the Eisenach proposals are implemented, the three groups: VELK, EKU and the Federation, are to be dissolved in favor of the United Protestant Church in the GDR. But this is still a long way off.

Meanwhile, a joint committee has worked out two proposals: (1) a church law which is meant to strengthen the Federation considerably, and (2) a joint decision in which the eight district churches and the three church groups promise to realize step by step a "more binding unification."

A feature of the new church law is the fact that especially the EKU and VELK will transfer some of their authority, especially in the field of church legislation, to the Federation; the three Lutheran district churches will likewise transfer some authority to the Federation; because within the framework of VELK some of the district churches have far greater authority than the EKU. The authority transferred to the Federation can later be transferred without difficulty to the United Protestant Church, if and when this church should come into being.

In their joint decision the churches and church groups pledge closer cooperation; but this decision does not have the legal quality of a church law. Within the last year, a total of 11 synods have taken a position on the two proposals. The proposed changes and improvements are written down on more than 100 single-spaced typed pages. Last week, the members of the groundwork committee summarized all proposals, and hope that they have now found a common denominator. The Guestrow Synod marks the beginning of the decision-making process.

Before the end of the year, the other 10 synods will meet in order to accept these proposals--or reject them. The church law and the decisions will have been accepted only after all 11 synods approve them, always by a two-thirds majority.

The greatest worry for those working for a united church is the possibility that the church law which would strengthen the Federation would be accepted but that the approval by one of the 11 synods will not be by a two-thirds majority so that, as the Greifswald Church Synod has already hinted, "the synod is ready to agree to the church law that will regulate the Federation even if no joint decision should be reached."

After reading the various position papers and change proposals it becomes clear that most reservations come from the small churches in Greifswald, Goerlitz and Anhalt. These churches all belong to the EKU where they are three of five member churches, and are therefore obviously concerned that in a federation of five large and three small churches they would simply go under. It is from the ranks of these churches especially that proposals originated to extend the time in which the new organs would be formed from 5 to 6 years.

The position of the Saxony District Church Synod, the Protestant church in the GDR that is strongest in members and finances, makes it clear that this church will claim more authority than before in the future church structure, a demand that was met by the groundwork committee inasmuch as, beginning with 1 January 1982, the synod of the church federation will be enlarged from 60 to 80 representatives and that the Saxony District Church will be allotted 19 representatives, that is almost one-fourth.

The greatest obstacle for unification, however, was raised by the synod of the Protestant Church of the Union. Its position states that 2 years after the changes in federation regulations take effect, "accomplishments have to be examined and determinations made on subsequent steps." In other words: if the examination demanded for the beginning of 1984 has negative results, no further steps will be taken according to the wishes of the EKU. The automatic progress toward unification already begun would then be stopped. Because the groundwork committee did not include this demand in its joint proposal, the EKU synod in December will tell whether the necessary two-thirds majority acceptance is obtained.

The changes in the regulations of the GDR Church Federation pertain primarily to legal-administrative fields. Theological questions and also decisions regarding the special relationship between GDR and FRG churches are put aside for the time being. The joint decision makes it clear, however, that the participating churches want to establish a new form of their union, "as a community of churches," which makes closer cooperation in joint tasks of witness and service essential, and whose logic is described on the basis of theological discussions on the basic meaning of preaching the gospel. Theological questions, in any case, are of minor importance in today's GDR church. But when arguments arise, they extend horizontally through all Lutheran and United Churches.

ACTIVITY OF WORKER CONTROL GROUPS DISCUSSED

Bucharest ROMANIA LIBERA in Romanian 1 Oct 81 pp 1,3

[Interview with Gheorghe Petrescu, deputy chairman of the National Council of the Socialist Democracy and Unity Front, by Mircea Scripca; date and place not given]

[Text] The activity of worker control, led and organized by the Socialist Democracy and Unity Front, is a vast civic manifestation which polarizes important human resources in order to continually improve socioeconomic activity. With regard to the role and importance of this activity, the results obtained thus far and the planned objectives for better development of worker control, we addressed ourselves to Comrade Gheorghe Petrescu, deputy chairman of the National Council of the Socialist Democracy and Unity Front and chairman of the Central Commission for coordinating and guiding the activity of worker control.

[Answer] Within the framework of the institutionalized forms which permit the involvement of all categories of workers in better management and use of the means society offers them to continually improve the living and working conditions of the people, in carrying out the party's policy of increasing the well being of those who work, the exercising of worker control plays a leading role in important sectors of socioeconomic activity and of service to the population.

The role and importance of this activity of special social interest arise from the vast process of expanding democracy in our country, against a background of significant qualitative and quantitative changes in all social and economic life. Within this context, worker control currently represents an objective necessity, keeping in mind the fact that participating in the exercise of worker control are representatives of work collectives from enterprises, institutes, state and cooperative agricultural units, housewives, and students, they themselves owners, producers, and at the same time, beneficiaries, keenly interested in the efficient use of the material and spiritual means society has at its disposal.

The unions play an important role in organizing and exercising worker control. Keeping in mind the unions' experience, it was established by law that the unions--as broad organizations of the working class, of the working masses--should effectively participate within the framework of the Socialist Democracy and Unity Front in the entire activity of worker control. They work with increased efficiency in commercial units, services, mass transit, in maintaining and repairing housing resources, in health institutions, in spas, hotels, motels, and other places providing accommodations, and in the field of environmental protection.

Also, in this field, considerable activity is carried out by youth and women's organizations, especially in maternity hospitals and homes, children's hospitals, day-care centers, kindergartens, and homes for preschoolers and children of school age, in social assistance institutions, in educational institutions (schools and university departments) as well as in other sectors.

[Question] What is the range of worker control?

[Answer] At present worker control operates in over 148,000 units. In accordance with the number and complexity of these units, in 1981, 46,728 teams were formed from almost 195,000 members elected at union meetings and meetings of Union of Communist Youth and women's organizations, from city districts and from villages.

Special accent is put on the proper training of the team members. Periodically, or whenever necessary, the worker control teams are instructed for the purpose of understanding and applying the party decisions, laws and normative acts which regulate activity in the sectors that are the object of the control activity. Practical instruction in the field has proven to be very useful for proper training of the team members. Conferences and dialogues between the teams and the personnel of the units being monitored have an important role in fully and efficaciously capitalizing on the proposals made during the control; they offer a good opportunity for sharing positive experience and preventing future transgressions of a similar nature.

[Question] What significant operations have been undertaken and what results have been obtained in the activity of the worker control teams?

[Answer] On the basis of the decisions adopted by the Second Congress of the Socialist Democracy and Unity Front, and of the measures established at the national conference of representatives of worker control in February 1981, the Central Commission and the territorial commissions for coordinating and guiding this activity have begun to step up control operations in the socioeconomic and cultural-educational units stipulated by law. In many counties they have organized model control operations which resulted in increased efficiency. The practice of organizing--together with specialized state control inspections--inspections conducted within certain sectors or groups of units in which the need for prompt intervention is noted was extended.

In Bucharest Municipality as well as in counties such as Arges, Brasov, Braila, Constanta, Dolj, Galati, Iasi, Mures, Sibiu, Timis, and others, thematic inspections are being organized frequently in various fields of activity. In the capital, the usual major problems of control are discussed weekly with the leadership of the units being monitored and of the sector's people's councils. Of significance for the effectiveness of these operations is the fact that in the first 8 months of this year, the almost 30,000 inspections done in Bucharest were followed up by more than 16,000 proposals from the teams, of these over 85 percent were assimilated and worked out by the leaders of the monitored units.

The control operations undertaken have contributed to the elimination of some gaps in commercial activity (failure to observe weights or prices, preferential treatment of some buyers, carelessness in proper management of stock, and non-observance of health and hygiene norms in a number of units). Improvements were also made in the field of services, insuring more promptness in the performance and diversification of services as well as in behavior towards citizens. Similar results were obtained in various health units, day-care centers, kindergartens, hotels and spas.

[Question] In the control activity carried out there have also been some difficulties. What are their causes?

[Answer] If there have been difficulties, these are for the most part due to the fact that there are still unit leaders who underestimate worker control and feel that the teams are meddling in the affairs of the units they manage and are diminishing their authority, disregarding, in this way, the provisions of the law. At times it even leads to blocking the exercise of control by various means, by not presenting control records. In other cases, the managers of some units adopt a formal attitude, being thankful for the help given by the team, noting the findings recorded in the control record, but failing to take firm action to eliminate the shortcomings pointed out.

Of course, worker control would be more efficient were it not for some defects in some of the control teams' activities themselves. There are teams that show formalism in their activity, in the sense that they undertake superficial inspections which cannot lead to realistic proposals or to concrete measures for improving the work in the respective sectors. The fields entrusted by law to the control teams are not covered everywhere. In some counties such as Giurgiu, Hunedoara, Cluj, Bacau, Gorj and others, there are teams which have sporadic activity, failing to exercise monitoring activity several months of this year. On the other hand, in some places it can be noted that less attention is given to exercising control in construction units, in units for the maintenance and repair of housing resources, activities carried out in health and cultural-artistic institutes as well as in units which serve the rural population.

[Question] What measures are earmarked for increasing the effectiveness of worker control?

[Answer] The Central Commission, as well as the territorial commissions for coordinating and guiding worker control will take practical steps to activate all of the worker control teams in order to make best use of the findings of the inspections undertaken and in order to prevent the difficulties recorded in this field.

We also have in mind improving the work methods and procedures within the control teams' activity, in order to better execute the mandate delivered by society, as a revolutionary way of participating in the leadership of the workers.

Within this framework, the Central Commission and the territorial commissions together with the component organizations--the unions, youth and women's organizations--will pay greater attention to the political, professional, and moral qualities of those elected to the teams, and greater attention to attracting to the teams a greater number of workers who work directly in production. The teams will be directed to always have in mind the principal, basic, and currently urgent problems of the monitored units, in order to operate above all competently, with knowledge of the cause and in a spirit of responsibility. The team members will continually show intransigence in regard to the tendency--completely unjustified--of some buyers to overstock and to hoard agricultural food products. They will actively promote the spirit of equity and civic duty, making each person understand that if he stocks more than he needs, he does it to the detriment of other consumers.

We will assure the growth of the educational-preventative nature of the worker control teams' activity, working in close connection with the union committees, the organizations for democracy and socialist unity, the women's commissions and the Union of Communist Youth committees in the monitored units in order to intensify the educational activity of the working personnel tasked with ensuring the supplying and serving of the population, and special concern for the national wealth.

The effectiveness of this activity will also be enhanced by prompt reporting of problems uncovered during the inspections to the Councils for Worker Control of Socioeconomic Activity as well as to the specialized state control bodies. It is nevertheless worth mentioning that by law the principal obligation for promptly and fully using the proposals drawn up by the teams goes first to the leaders of the units which have been monitored, to the People's Councils, the ministries, and the other central institutions.

By increasing worker control and continually improving the activity carried out we will be able to make a greater contribution to improving the activity in the monitored sectors and to better satisfying the needs of the population.

STORIES OF FORCED MIGRATION FROM KOSOVO PROVINCE TOLD

Serbs, Montenegrins Accuse

Belgrade DUGA in Serbo-Croatian No 189, 23 May 81 pp 26-27

[Article by Rajko Durdevic]

[Text] They were accustomed to saying, "share and share alike," "what I have is yours," everything is shared by all, everyone is a brother.

The old expression is now being used with new intentions for some in Kosovo-the latest deceit, the latest pretence to make life more difficult for families, mainly Serbian and Montenegrin, in their part of the country.

It is quite certain that the majority of honest families of Albanian origin in Kosovo have disassociated themselves from the slogan. They were friends and neighbors with the Serbs and Montenegrins; many had even become godparents for the other's children. For decades they have mutually respected, helped, looked after and honored one another.

Then the slogan was heard as a pretence for greed. It began in 1968--"share and share alike." Was it the euphoria of nationalism, or a deception to seize another's property? These groups of slogan-sayers were louder than they were numerous, it was said. However, as they say in this part of the county, "one man's sins shame us all."

Incidents of oppression have been repeated. From 1968 to the present, many families have moved out of Kosovo; they sold out or abandoned their property, "the home fire was extinguished," some after many centuries.

Villages are being deserted, the people are leaving! It is a scene which is being repeated in the villages of Kosovo. Many have protested, apparently in vain. Both the oppressions and the departures continue. What is really going on here?

Not far from Decani, in the village Papracana, the brothers Vojin and Velimir Soskic lived peacefully for years. There were no problems or troubles at all until 1974. They owned houses, stables, livestock, eight hectares of fertile soil in one parcel. This was enough for 17 members of their families to subsist on quite well. However, Velimir has left for Montenegro and Vojin and his family have purchased some land in the village Vrcana near Gornji Milanovac.

"No one drove us away with a gun, but we had to leave," says Vojin. "Our land was fertile, but it had to be irrigated. And this is where the troubles began. The water came in by a stream, some sort of canal, from above Decani. Everyone had the right to use it, everyone equally. Honesty was the only measure for the distribution of the water. It was this way for years. And then the digging began.

Everyone Has Suffered for Years Because of It

"When the time came for us to irrigate the fields," says Vojin, "some local Albanians diverted the water to their land. If you went to see where the water had been cut off, you could expect that someone would take a shot at you. Take away the water and the crops dry up. It was like this for one, two, three years. Whom do you complain to? We went to the council to complain; three times I asked about it, and this is what they say. We, Montenegrins and Serbs, have chosen a delegation and made a complaint to the community: "People, our crops are burning up." It's useless, they look the other way."

The older people were ashamed of this. There is an ancient pride of poverty which is stronger than any law. However, a few individuals, whom the honest Albanians call a gang, have taken what belongs to others in order to enrich themselves. The honest people have become enfuriated. This has been a cause for suffering for years.

"I hear the news- now this is what has caused it, it is from desire, from power, from wealth," says Vojin. "What nonsense! Who is it that now has trampled on freedom? I don't know what is going to happen, 'when the water is so high that you cannot see the boat.'"

Ljudomir Vucinic also moved, from the other side of Kosovo from the village Ljubovac near Srbica, in 1971. He now lives in the village Velerec near Gornji Milanovac. There were 80 Serbian and Montenegrin houses in his village; now there are only six.

"This is what happened," says Ljubomir, "it developed over the years. In the spring of 1970 I was preparing to plant five bags of wheat, when an Albanian came up to me. 'What's going on, Ljubo, you're not really going to start planting, are you? Why throw seeks in the ground for nothing,' he asked, 'you must move out.'"

Afterwards it became too much. Every night the house of Ljubomir Vucinica was bombarded with rocks until daybreak. "I informed the police, but they said, 'It's children...!' The following night was even worse. I was driving the oxen to the market towards Vucitrn, and on the way they pelted me from the mountain- hit me right on my cap."

Afterwards I went over to Saban's house- he was the biggest landowner in the village. I said, 'Saban, I agree to sell!' The following night Saban and eight others came to my house to buy the property. 'Ljubo, we will give you three million and you transfer,' they said. 'No way, I might as well give you everything for nothing.' The house, the stables, the barns and seven hectares of land are all first-class. The price is not enough. But I see that there's no way out.' Saban, give me 7 days to get the children ready, and to say my good-byes.' 'Fine, no one will bother you,' he said. And so it was. Afterwards they did the sowing and I wandered around Serbia with the children. I had no where to go. I stayed on the road. Many of the families who emigrated from my village went through the same thing."

"Several years ago," says Ljubomir, "a police commander from Srbica came to my house in Velerec and asked, 'why did you leave?'" A certain Milan Martinovic had written a complaint to some high forums. He wrote out and enumerated incidents of how pressure was exerted on each family. Ljuba was included in the account. Because of this they came.

"What good is it," continues Ljuba, "With the commander also came the former president of the community and the recording secretary. They called me aside and said, 'Don't tell the truth, Ljubo. What is done is done. You have left, but we must continue to live there. Your family also remains there- think of them.'"

So Ljubo Vucinic signed the false record in this way: "I moved out because I wanted a better life."

According to Ljubo, he lived like brothers with many Albanians in the village. Two of them saved his life in 1941. Some of them were godparents to his children. Ljubo asserts that it is the trouble-makers who performed the crimes. He asks why they are trying to conceal themselves. He has heard that there would be an investigation as to why some people moved out. He hopes to be a witness.

When You Make Accusations, You Also Appear Guilty

Aleksandar Milosevic moved out with his family from the village Gornje Prekaze near Srbica in 1970, the last of all Serbs and Montenegrins to do so. Now they are scattered about Gornji Milanovac and its environs.

"What no one asks me is how I was forced out," laments Aleksandar. "Our properties were worth five hundred million. We had two houses in the yard, stables, barns, twenty hectares of first-class soil, over a furrow in depth, everything was grouped together. We received for all of it...better not to say."

There were 17 of them in the house, "they were not defenseless." What good was it. They were still planting, the crops had not been harvested. Some villagers, Albanians, drove their livestock into the crops, he says. Everything was crushed. The women in the house did not dare to move without help. "If you complain to the police, they say 'it was children,' or 'it was some lunatics.' They play the fools."

"We were still there," says Aleksandar, "and they destroyed our cemetery. Again they say, 'Children!' When you complain, you also appear guilty: 'you are nationalists,' they say. The police commander did not ask me anything. I would like to say to him, 'Because of you I had to run away. You protected those people who seized what did not belong to them!'"

The honest Albanians, the majority of them, condemn each extortion. In the villages the old Albanians bow their heads remembering those who have left. Some youths are greedy, they don't pay attention to anyone. Aleksandar recalls that the community secretary said to him when he complained on one occasion, "there is so much you never learned about Albanians!"

"Did you know," he added, "that after 1970, in some villages of Serbia, Montenegro, and Macedonia, they must give a quarter of everything they grow to certain bullies of Albanian origin? What are they? Landowners? Honest Albanians themselves have risen up against this tyranny; they refuse to give this tribute."

Many have abandoned villages in Kosovo with nothing but a sack with their possessions on their backs and their children in their arms. Prior to this they found notes on their doors saying: "this is your last day to move out!" Go to Krusevac, Kraljevo, Smederevo, Gornji Milanovac, Topola, Arandelovac.... "Say your good-byes and leave!"

Milan Scepanovic from the village Dasinovci near Decani thought otherwise. He was in the war, in the partisans; he was the commander of a company, a member of the Communist Youth League of Yugoslavia, a communist. He was wounded five times in the war. However, the most serious one was his sixth. On the 18th of July, 1971, he went out to inspect his crops in the field. Then suddenly in front of the house the shot of a carbine rang out. He was left without sight and hearing. Two Albanian villagers were later apprehended and sentenced for attempted murder.

Today, Milan Scepanovic still does not know how to explain why those two young men shot at him. At least something was done about it. He and his relatives have always been mindful of one anohter, they have tried to "honor one another."

Emigration By Force, Immigration By Force

Milan, as a communist, has always regarded all attacks by groups and individuals as something, he says, "that must be overcome." He enrolled his daughter in a school to learn the Albanian language. This is how they came to agreements in war, and this is how he has conducted himself in peace-time. The child lives here, let her learn the language.

In the end, in 1974, Milan Scepanovic sold his 9 hectares of land, his house, and everything else. The price was the usual one, "get what you can!" Now he lives in Jelenac near Topola. He recalls many events from recent years.

"Some people," says Milan, "are simply barbaric. When a certain Stanica Pesic from Donji Ratis near Decani was left without the male head of the family and was defenseless, an Albanian and his family moved into her house by force. He took possession of her house and started to work the land."

These types of incidents are repeated over and over again. Now this must be changed. Recently some communities in Kosovo have passed a regulation temporarily prohibiting the transfer of property. This well-intentioned move has already back-fired in some places. Many houses and properties have been abandoned, and there is nothing to buy on the market.

Violence and extortion by some individuals is not a matter for profound politics. Indeed, there are not groups of greedy poeple in every village in the world who are inclined to seize property which does not belong to them. There must be laws against this type of activity, and there must be a unified force to back them up.

In this regard the promise to investigate incidents of "emigration," and to prevent the violence of previous years from being repeated, is one which is to be widely acclaimed.

[Letter by Miljan Babovic]

[Text] Reader Miljan Babovic writes us that all of his family lived in Dasinovci near Decani, and he relates how they were forced to abandon their land and their home. They had 16.5 hectares of land. Today they have nothing.

I am a regular reader of DUGA, and for the first time I ask for a little free space in your column. The motive for my letter is the article by Rajko Durdevic entitled "Say Your Good-byes and Go" (DUGA, No 189). I am also one of those who emigrated from Kosovo, by force.

On the whole I agree with the statements made by comrades Ljubomir Vucinic and Milan Scepanovic (this comrade was my neighbor and I am familiar with the details of his case). On the whole I also support your campaign for an investigation of the emigrations from Kosovo. In my opinion, this is journalism, this is the truth!

I will describe to you the reasons why we, my family and I, abandoned our home in Dasinovci near Decani where we had lived from 1927 to 1974, before we moved to Montenegro to the village Kosic, near Danilovgrad.

My father and my uncle owned 16.5 hectares of land. For the most part it was wooded, with a little bit of tillable soil, while on the rest of it the soil was barren. At first there were 17 members of the family on the property, and after my brother and I married there were 24. The agricultural collective had been in existence for 15 years, and in 1961 they took six hectares of land from us with the promise that they would compensate us with money or other land. Don't be fooled by promises! We received neither. We did not dare to complain immediately, as my father, my uncle, and I worked in the collective, and we figured that we would be without jobs if we made any kind of a protest against this obviously unjust and unlawful deed. Moreover, we did not dare do anything because they had threatened us, and we knew what happened to those who did not obey. You say how Milan Scepanovic was almost killed, and he lost both his sight and his hearing. As our people say, the authorities just look the other way.

My father was bitterly disappointed, both because of the injustice and the mental torture. He killed himself, he threw himself under the machine that clears the forest. This was in 1961. The family was left without any sort of means of support, besides that little piece of land which was left us, barren and fruitless.

I then went to perform my military obligation in the Yugoslav People's Army, and my older brother, who was unemployed, set out for Australia to earn a little money. My mother, who was ill, remained at home with her small daughter and son (my younger brother), who died in 1969 at thirty years of age.

I returned from the army in 1964. Several times I had gone to the community of Decani in connection with the land which had been taken from us, but all of my efforts had been in vain. In 1965 I brought the case to the local court. Today, in 1981, 16 years later, the case has still not been resolved! I went from the district court to the supreme court. The supreme court returned it to the district court, but it still has not made this decision.

Twice I went to the Military Court and the Constitutional Court of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, I complained to the Federal Parliament; everyone who helped me asserted that I was right, but when the case was returned to the district court, again nothing happened. And to this very day there has been nothing!

After I had returned from the army, I was unable to find employment anywhere in Dasinovci or Decani as soon as I started to make my complaints. I was not able to go farther than these places, because where and how could I leave my sick family?

My Albanian neighbors were simply barbaric, menacing, and aggressive. I could not defend my property and my family, and I had to sell what I could for any kind of money, for a pitiful price, and I had to move to Montenegro; some unsold land still remained.

In the meantime, my brother returned from Australia. He had saved nothing, and in 1970 he left for a job in Germany he got through a bureau in order to earn some money for the purchase of the land in Montenegro.

We had, then, 16.5 hectares of land. From this and from my brother's earnings, we could barely afford to buy half of a hectare in Montenegro, and the same amount for my uncle in Divostin, near Kragulevac. Because of the barbarism of the neighbors and the authorities in Decani, we were left without anything anywhere, and we separated from our uncle permenantly.

Well, there you have the fate of my family, the Babovic family, who were forced to abandon their land and home under pressure. This is why we left Kosovo.

Finally, I hope that some authorized people from the Federation will read my sad letter. I will say to you that I am not the only one who was menaced in this inhuman way, both by the courts and by others who helped break up our home. My dispute in the court is unique in judicial practise. Sixteen years later and the court will not decide it. And the land is still kept in my name. For a full sixteen years I have been paying taxes on it!

EXPULSION OF FRENCH JOURNALIST--The French government issued a "strong protest" yesterday against the expulsion from Yugoslavia of Kosta Christitch, journalist from POINT, who accompanied Claude Cheysson, French minister of foreign affairs, to Belgrade. The French government considers this measure "regrettable and particularly inopportune." Kosta Christitch, of Yugoslav origin but French nationality, decided to remain in Yugoslavia until Tuesday, but he was arrested in the middle of the night, searched, then taken to the airport where he was expelled. ZHIVKOV SPEAKS AT ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION IN SHUMEN

AU281544 Sofia BTA in English 1440 GMT 28 Nov 81

[Text] Sofia, 28 Nov (BTA)--Today Mr Todor Zhivkov, secretary general of the CC of the BCP and president of the State Council, unveiled a big monument dedicated to the foundation of the Bulgarian state, in the town of Shumen.

This is the biggest monument in this country opened in the year of Bulgaria's 13th centennial.

At the opening Mr Todor Zhivkov delivered a speech emphasizing that the monument is inaugurated in the town of Shumen, in that part of the country where the roots of the Bulgarian state are, where its first capital, Pliska and Veliki Preslav, used to be.

Dwelling on the wide-scale celebrations of the 1300th anniversary of the Bulgarian state continuing throughout the year, Mr Todor Zhivkov noted: "We do not idealize the past of our state, we soberly and realistically scrutinize the road we have covered so far. But it is namely the reason why we highly appreciate our achievements and take well-deserved pride in them."

The Bulgarian leader expressed gratitude to the peoples on the Soviet Union and of the socialist community, to the peoples of neighbouring and faraway countries, to the progressive world public, to all governments, statesmen, scientists and men of art, who marked through cultural and political events the 1300th jubilee of the Bulgarian state.

Mr Todor Zhivkov stressed: "With the active participation of all who shared our emotions, thoughts and pride, the jubilee of the Bulgarian state has turned into a great international event contributing to the mutual acquaintance and getting closer together of peoples, to consolidating the cause of peace and social progress."

The monument raised on a hill above Shumen, is built on an area 200 m long and 60 m wide, and its tops is 50 m high. It lies on 2,000 cubic m of granite and 50 thousand cubic m of concrete have been cast to shape its whole body. The architectural and sculptural composition rests on the figure of the founder of the Bulgarian state Khan Asparuk, who has got off his horse and stabbed his sword into the ground. Next to him stand the three great khans of the first Bulgarian state--Tervel, the diplomat who concluded the first treaty documenting the recognition of the state, Krum, the legislator and warrior, Omurtag, the builder and philosopher. Built into the monument are the figures of Tsar Boris the First. During his time Bulgaria adopted Christianity and the Slavonic letters were created; and Tsar Simeon under whose guidance the Bulgarian mediaeval culture entered its golden century. [as published]. The space around the monument is decorated with small sculptures and mosaics featuring pictures of our mediaeval history. An enormous lion's figure gleams on the highest, 50 m, body of the monument—the symbol of the Bulgarian state.

Together with the monument, in the same town today there were inaugurated new buildings of the history museum named after Lyudmila Zhivkova, of the library and the drama theatre, restored houses of the epoch of the Bulgarian national revival. The opening of the aluminum plant in the town was also officially announced.

ZHIVKOV LETTERS TO ARTISTS

AU281115 [Editorial Report] Sofia RATOBNICHESKO DELO on 25 November 1981 carries on pages 1 and 2, a 950-word report on a celebration at the Georgi Kirkov Hall in Sofia held on 24 November to mark the 70th birthday of Academician Panteley Zarev, distinguished Bulgarian writer, during which Todor Zhivkov, BCP Central Committee secretary general and State Council chairman, presented the Georgi Demitrov order to Academician Zarev. The report is followed by the 250-word text of a letter from Todor Zhivkov to Panteley Zarev, in which Zhivkov congratulates the academician on his birthday and on the high decoration bestowed on him. Zhivkov also notes the writer's contribution to literature, literary criticism and national education in Bulgaria, adding: "Our joint work, our friendly meetings and talks have always given me joy and satisfaction."

RABOTNICHESKO DELO on the same date carries on page 2 a 1,000-word report on the celebration of painter Nikolay Shmirgela's 70th birthday by an exhibition of his works at the Sofia "Shipka" Art Gallery. The ceremony was attended by Stoyan Mikhaylov, BCP Central Committee secretary, and other officials. The report is followed by the 350-word text of a letter from Todor Zhivkov to painter Shmirgela, which was read during the ceremony. In his letter Todor Zhivkov greets the painter and congratulates him on his birthday and on the high award presented to him on this occasion--the title "Hero of Socialist Labor"--and praises his "realistic art, as well as the identity of his communist convictions and aesthetic views." Zhivkov expresses his admiration for Shmirgela's works which "have always reflected the crucial problems of our party's current policy," and wishes the painter a long life and further successes in his work.

INTERNATIONAL ACTIVITIES OF CSSR TU GROWING, 'SOLIDARITY' DECRIED

Prague PRACE in Czech 22 Oct 81 p 2

[Interview with URO Secretary V. Kozik by V. Klement: "International Activity of Our Trade Unions Grows;" date and place not specified.]

[Text] Recently the Bureau of the World Federation of Trade Unions [SOF] was in session in Bucharest; it was attended by the Trade Unions Central Council [URO] delegation, led by SOD Deputy Chairman and URO Chairman K. Hoffmann. We asked a member of the Czechoslovak delegation, URO Secretary V. Kozik, to characterize specifically the session. He told us:

[Answer] The session mainly dealt with final preparations of the basic documents for acceptance by the 10th World Trade Union Congress in Havana in February of next year. Apart from these, some organizational questions were discussed as well as the share of individual member organizations in the political and organizational preparation of the congress.

We paid considerable attention to the preparation of the World Trade Union Conference on the Social and Economic Aspects of Disarmament, which is to be held soon in December and will be a representative expression of the determination of all working people of the world to establish a permanent peace.

The approved basic document, Trade Unions and the Demands of the 1980's, was discussed and will be submitted to the 10the World Trade Union Congress. Our delegation participated in preparing this document and put forward some suggestions to increase the effectiveness of SOF efforts. Approval of this document essentially completed the subject-matter preparations for the congress.

Naturally, we have also met delegations of member organizations, primarily from socialist countries, and considered questions of our joint share in the congress' preparations and other possibilities for mutual contact, the exchange of experience and cooperation. It is necessary to say that in recent times the international activity of our trade unions is increasing. These activities concern roughly two areas: bilateral relations and the preparation of some significant international trade union actions.

In the area of cooperation with socialist community countries, consultations and contact actions are regular; we coordinate our work related to all significant problems of trade union life.

Also, we have bilateral relations with trade union centers in capitalist countries. Here we follow cooperative possibilities in those areas where our opinions agree: active participation of trade unions in the struggle for peace and disarmament, the improvement of living and working environment, the struggle against the influence of international monopolies and so forth. Recently we considered these problems together with representatives from West German and Austrian trade unions, the French CGT trade union center and the GWU trade union center from Malta.

The relations with developing countries have been equally successful. A cooperative agreement has been negotiated with the Afghan and Beninese trade union central offices. We provide material help to developing countries as well as education of trade union cadres in the form of seminars organized by the Central School of the Revolutionary Trade-Union Movement [ROH]. Recently there were seminars for trade unionists from Arab countries, including Palestine, and from Nicaragua, and we are preparing a seminar for trade unionists from Afghanistan.

We approach international trade union actions with great attention. We were one of those who initiated the idea of the World Trade Union Conference on Social and Economic Aspects of Disarmament, to be held in Paris in December. We participated in the work of the initiative group sponsoring the conference and were the hosts at the organizational meeting of the preparation committee in Prague in September.

[Question] Several days ago, a meeting of a URO delegation with a delegation of the national commission for the cooperation of the resort trade unions of the Polish People's Republic [PLR] was held, at which you were present. Can you tell us something about the mutual cooperation of URO and this national commission?

[Answer] Cooperation with the national commission for the cooperation of the PLR resort trade unions, with which we share class and ideological bases and goals, develops very successfully. It was emphasized again at the meeting, held in Ostrava, that cooperation between both organizations was developing successfully even along the line of individual unions and was beginning to develop even between regions and factories. I would like to voice particular thanks from the national commission to all our trade union functionaries, who received with understanding Polish children in the ROH pioneer camps. The degree of cooperation achieved is manifold and is always being enriched in new forms.

[Question] In the context of the so-called Solidarity holding its congress, its leaders assert demagogically that they sent invitations to the congress also to the trade unions of other socialist countries and they are making a fuss about the fact that these organizations did not attend the congress. What can you say to this?

[Answer] The so-called Solidarity leaders must justify themselves before honest working people, who condemn Solidarity's divisive activity, and before progressive world public opinion. While they sent the invitation to American trade unions, the AFL-CIO, ICFTU and other similar "allied" organizations, several weeks before the rally was held, the invitation was delivered to the URO at the last moment, immediately before the commencement; this actually proves that they were not interested in having representatives of the trade union centers from socialist countries attending the congress. Apart from that, such a course of action in international trade union relations is unusual, to say the least, and its actual essence was unveiled by the leaders themselves of the so-called Solidarity in the unprecedented and outrageous pamphlet inviting the working people from socialist countries to follow their example. This is gross interference in our trade union affairs. It underestimates the political maturity of our working people, who have their own historical experience and are convinced that their power rests in the unity of trade unions, struggling for the development of socialist society. In actuality, as it was rightly said, the pamphlet is nothing other than an attempt to export counterrevolution

It follows from the facts mentioned above, considered along with the explicit anti-socialist character of the congress and the documents adopted there, that it is absolutely inacceptable for us to attend a congress of an organization with reactionary goals. What would our members say if we attended a congress of an organization whose leadership systematically rejects constructive programs and proves in its daily activity that its program is one of destruction and destabilization of socialist social establishment, which deeply damages the Polish working poople's interests and socialist achievements. A considerable number of the Polish working people--not only in the resort trade unions--is becoming more and more strongly aware of this reality and sees that the basic way out of the crisis is in the elimination of accumulated shortcomings and in the consolidation of socialist values. We fully sympathize with these forces; they have our support and we are developing fruitful cooperation with them.

DIFFERENT FORMS OF ECONOMIC CRIME DISCUSSED

Prague TRIBUNA in Czech No 34, 26 Aug 81 p 4

[Interview with JUDr Karel Pesta, senior prosecutor of the Office of CSSR General Prosecutor, by Oldrich Bilovsky; Date and place not given: "Protection of Socialist Property"]

> [Text] As emphasized by the 16th CPCZ Congress, to promote respect for law and laws, and to strengthen citizens' socialist consciousness is among the foremost duties of mass organizations, school, family as well as of the socialist state. Practically, this means winning over a people for attaining the goals of building a developed socialist society, but also securing their active participation in the protection of everything created by their labor. These are pressing problems. The TRIBUNA interviews with a specialist in penal protection of the socialist economy, JUDr Karel Pesta, senior member of the office of CSSR General Prosecutor, aim at clarification of the problems involved.

[Question] The Czechoslovak penal code distinguishes several groups of economic crime according to the object of legal protection. To put it briefly, the laws punish in the first place criminal acts involving action against the prinicples of the socialist economic system, attacks on economic discipline and on property in socialist ownership. What do we mean by the term "attacks on the socialist economic system"?

[Answer] It is particularly speculation which falls into this category. It is illicit business activity which is known to the members of older generations under the name of "profiteering." The perpetrator is motivated by the idea of making profit which the offender achieves by exploiting momentary shortages on the market and so on. Speculators manage very skillfully to determine even the temporary shortages in supply to the retail trade outlets and to sell virtually everything--from spare parts for cars, to works of art, all the way down to Sparta cigarettes.

[Question] It may be interesting in this context to compare what people were speculating in before and what they are speculating in now.

[Answer] Definitely. While before, say from the beginning of the 1960's, people speculated almost exclusively in indispensable goods--food, textiles, household appliances--speculations gradually shifted to nonessential goods, that is, to the items which were not essential for maintaining the basic standard of living, but were desirable for its improvement. Thus in the 1960's, for example, it was various fashionable merchandise, cars and also television receivers for a number of years. At the present time, it is primarily digital watches, various foreign-made textile goods of latest fashion. The situation in regard to cars can be regarded as typical: at the present time, when the market is adequately supplied with them specualtion in them virtually ceased. Nevertheless, speculation in spare parts and components continues.

[Question] What is the situation in regard to illicit business ventures?

[Answer] This is another group of attacks on economic discipline. It includes criminal acts and corresponding misdemeanors--illicit business ventures and misuse of socialist enterprise. Among them are so called "fusky" [working for oneself on company time] and "lemouchy" [moonlighting]. These entrepreneurs, either on their own account or within their employment at the socialist enterprise, carry out various repairs, maintenance or similar acitivity.

[Question] Except--many people agree in this respect--that these entrepreneurs actually provde services where community and cooperative enterprises are not able to meet the demand. Moreover, these people work fast and usually also conscientiously. What is your opinion on that?

[Answer] In the first place, it cannot be denied that these people are more flexible and faster than socialist organizations in many instances. I would like to point out, however, that the citizens usually have in mind citizens' assistance which is sometimes called also neighborly assistance. This is quite in order. Our laws, and above all the Civil Code, allow citizens to engage in certain activities, including work, which represent assistance to someone else. Of course--and this is the condition--rendering such assistance must be in accordance with the rules of socialist coexistence. According to the Civil Code, a citizen who helps is in fact entitled to the reimbursement of cost incurred and also to remuneration. This remuneration must, of course, correspond to the nature of assistance. It must be taken into account whether the result was achieved through the personal endeavor of the citizen who helped. In other words, offering remuneration per se need not be in conflict with the rules of socialist coexistence. There is a difference, however, between somebody repairing a neighbor's water pipes or roof at the latter's request and taking remuneration for it, and somebody providing these services systematically as a trade and often taking advantage of emergencies of citizens who urgently need, for example, to have their water or gas supply system fixed and so on.

[Question] How can a citizen distinguish between illicit business venture and neighborly assistance?

[Answer] From what I have said so far it is evident--and everyday practice confirms it--that people themselves without legal help find out when such assistance assumes the nature of a trade which exploits particularly the elderly. I would like, however, to touch upon another problem. It is frequently pointed out that moonlighters charge low prices. Yes, sometimes their prices are low. But it is necessary to see why it is so. After all, these "entrepreneurs" do not pay any taxes and often they do not pay even for the material which they either steal or the customer must acquire himself. Moreover, they use the machinery and equipment of socialist organizations, do not bear any business risks or other costs. Above all, however, they do not offer a guaranty for their work in the scope and during the period stipulated by law for the socialists organizations.

[Question] In connection with illicit business enterprise, there is talk about considerable amounts of unjustified profit. What is the reality?

[Answer] Unfortunately it is true. At the present time, for example, we are prosecuting a criminal case in which a gypsy with meager education was the organizer of a very extensive illicit business enterprise extending over the entire territory of Czechoslovakia. More than 50 persons are being prosecuted, a number of prominent economic workers of socialist organizations among them. As to the profit: the turnover of this group exceeded Kcs 150 million in cash. This is a turnover equivalent to production of a medium-sized national enterprise.

[Question] To a layman it appears almost impossible. How is it done?

[Answer] I will give you an example for better illustration. The purchasing organization (usually a national enterprise or a budgetary organization) needs something to be repaired, built or manufactured. It has enough funds on some accounts, but wants to save on some items which are particularly closely watched. The expenditures on them serve as an important criterion for determining profit, productivity and so on. Most frequently they try to "increase productivity" in the area of wages. A common denominator usually is the effort to avoid the pressure of economic stimuli and particularly those described in the "Set of Measures for Improving the Planned Management System of the National Economy." The supplier, usually a cooperative or economic department of the mass organization, works as a partner. It has at its disposal the rubber stamp, invoices and an account in the bank or savings bank. Moreover--and this is an indispensable prerequisite--it must be an organization with socialist morale undermined to such an extent that it is willing to gain unearned income amounting frequently to many thousand Kcs. Its task lies in accepting orders for work which it cannot perform because it does not possess either the necessary labor force or material or even the right to engage in subsidiary production of this nature and in this scope. All this, however, would still not be enough. The existence of these two organizations and above all the willingness to disrupt the socialist economic system makes it possible for the illicit entrepreneur to appear on the scene. It is he who organizes the disruption of socialist legality.

[Question] How does he do it?

[Answer] It is rather simple. It is only a question of organizational capabilities, sufficient funds and the possibility of dealing in the labor force. He acts as a manager. He organizes, speculates and contrives. He usually hires workers either among the employees of the purchasing organization or makes use of the small group of people who avoid regular employment. These managers usually do not need any other qualification. As a rule they only have basic education and sometimes they lack even that. Outwardly, however, they claim to have academic degrees and act as representatives of economic organizations. They ride in luxury cars, reserve suites for their stay in hotels and it is no exception that they are accompanied by various "experts," and so on. Of course--and this is decisive--the dangerous nature of these new attacks on the socialist economic system is considerable. It is therefore necessary to examine the causes, some accompanying phenomena, to talk about them and to create a favorable climate for combating them.

[Question] Can you give us a concrete example?

[Answer] Recently the Office of the CSSR General Prosecutor started court proceedings against an entrepreneur who specialized in roof repairs. One of his criminal acts had the following course. One institution of higher learning in Prague had to have its roof repaired. It had the necessary permit and also the necessary funds for financing the project. It contacted various socialist organizations and inquired, whether they had free production capacity, At this point--at the right moment--the accused offered his services by phone. He pretended to be an engineer and the authorized representative of socialist organizations. Through his mediation, the university department ordered work to be performed by organizations actually existing at the other end of the republic. However, these organizations were not legally allowed to do this work: they had neither the necessary labor force nor the material. And in most instances they have not even carried it out. Their only "merit" was that they legalized the action of the intermediary--the manager. They simply made charges for work and collected hundreds of thousands of Kcs. The accused together with "his" five employees repaired the roofs. The total bill for this job exceeded Kcs 500,000 and was paid by the university department. From this amount--after deducting the cost of the material which was obtained stealthily--the supply organizations (essentially only for loaning the rubber stamp to the accused) received almost Kcs 160,000. The accused and "his" employees earned almost Kcs 200,000 in wages for several dozens days of work. Even this was not enough for them. They overcharged. The quality of work was low, the material billed did not correspond to its price.

[Question] You have mentioned that many of these intermediaries and managers make use of the employees of the purchasing organizations. How is the "transaction" carried out in such a case?

[Answer] Again, it will perhaps be best to give an example for better illustration. A certain national enterprise needed to manufacture a model of a piece of machinery. I will omit the motives (they are always essentially the same: they aim at improving the specified indicators, try to alleviate the pressure of economic stimuli and so on). It so happened that the model was made by the enterprise employees from the material owned by the enterprise and on its means of production. The invoice, however, was sent by the mass organization which hired the employees of the national enterprise for a temporary period and paid them like members of the labor brigade. It is not necessary to emphasize that the enterprise paid for this a considerable amount (it was substantially higher than what would have been spent on the production of the model itself) and part of it was paid to the mass organization, the illicit entrepreneur. There was a manager in this case, too. The blue-collar workers also got their share because they as the employees of the mass organization earned much more than they would have earned if the action had taken place within the socialist economic system.

[Question] Where does the social danger of such action lie?

[Answer] Such activity seriously undermines the socialist morale of workers: people receive much higher wages than specified by the wage scale for the same work. Frequently for these private projects material is used which was earmarked for some other purpose where it is then missing. It is obvious that trade carried on by illicit entrepreneurs is accompanied by pilfering or illegitimate use of things in socialist ownership of the organizations either employing the perpetrator or those making use of his services. I have in mind primarily trucks, tractors, mobile cranes, instruments, material and so on. In a similar vein, we can speak of other attacks on the eoncomic system which are associated with crimes against economic discipline, bribery, pilfering of property in the socialist ownership, abuse of jurisdiction by the public figures and so on. In this context, however, it is necessary to understand that an increasing importance is assumed by the forms which no longer involve the action of the private entrepreneur who threatens the economic system from the outside, but the effort of responsible officials of socialist organizations to make use of the private capitalist ambition of individuals in order to circumvent the economic rules or incentives or to make them commit other frauds motivated by lack of economic discipline. An accompanying phenomenon is also the fact that mass organizations or cooperatives are frequently misused for these new forms of attack on the socialist economic system. They enrich themselves illegally and moreover fail to discharge their social mission. It is perhaps not necessary to point out that this criminal activity is in gross conflict with the principles of life in socialist society and seriously undermines the economy, relations among people and other relationships.

In this connection, I would like to mention a case which we are now investigating together with the CSR Committee of People's Control. In this case, the respective socialist organization managed without illicit entrepreneurs, but hired the necessary people directly. It so happened that for work which was to be part of its operations it paid almost Kcs 131 million to various private persons over a few years. Yet, it did not record these payments as payments to private persons. There were at least 10,000 names on the payroll with the record of payments to persons who were not employed by the enterprise or did not have permanent employment at all. Their incomes were enormous--as much as Kcs 200,000 per year. Moreover, the contracts with these persons lacked the basic legal requisites--the description of what actually should be done, the deadline within which the work was to be completed and even the certification that the work was done. This and other cases indicate that it would be undialectical to assume that only the positive features of our economy develop and are becoming more dynamic. Part of my profession is also the duty to at least try to foresee how the forms of attacks on the socialist economy will develop in the future and what effective protective measures should be taken against the offenders.

[Question] What can effectively be done against these attacks?

[Answer] In the first place, it is necessary that the actions of the society be more comprehensive and coordinated. It still happens that the organs active in the criminal proceedings, the state fiscal organs, control and other organs which defend the interests of the entire society frequently encounter particular interests. It is by no means an exception that the representatives of ministries or of local interests defend the illicit entrepreneurs and frequently even regard them as helpers in plan fulfillment. On the other hand, the external control and financial organs play a very positive role. The internal control organs and managerial personnel must follow the same course. After all, the statutes and the Labor Code stipulate the right and the duty to protect the socialist economic system and social relations in general. It is imperative that they intervene directly, through their collectives and organizations, or indirectly, by warning the appropriate organs. From my own practice I can confirm that in those instances when this was done--and there were by no means few cases--considerable damage was averted. After all, crimes against the economic system have never been nor are committed clandestinely. On the contrary, it is usually a so-called open secret, something that people know about. But this is not enough. It is necessary to speak and act against irregularities and attacks on the socialist economy everywhere and always. This requirement was also formulated by the 16th CPCZ Congress: "The living standard of every worker should correspond to his contribution to the development of the society. It is no secret that there are people who live at the expense of the society, who get their wages not for work performed, but simply for the fact that they go to their place of work. It is necessary to vigorously fight against all forms of parasitism and speculation."

CONFERENCE FOCUSES ON 'SOCIALIST CULTURE' FOR ARMED FORCES

Two-Day Conference Opens

East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 25 Sep 81 pp 1, 2

[ND report from Berlin: "Cultural Conference of the GDR's National People's Army (NVA) and Border Troops Opens: Talk by Col Gen Heinz Kessler—Army Gen Heinz Hoffmann: Growing Demands on Political-Ideological Work—Hosted at the Academy of Arts"]

[Text] A two-day cultural conference of the GDR's National People's Army (NVA) and Border Troops opened on Thursday (24 September 1981) at the NVA Wilhelm Pieck Military-Political University in Berlin. It is being held under the slogan of "With Socialist Culture and Art for High Combat Readiness." Participating in it are commanders, staff and political workers of all staff levels; party, FDJ [Free German Youth] and union officials; soldiers and civilian employees. They are discussing how they, true to the decisions of the 10th SED Party Congress and the humanistic character of the socialist armed forces, are protecting the fatherland, preserving its cultural values and achievements and making use of them to mold the character of the soldier.

Taking part in the cultural conference are Army General Heinz Hoffmann, Minister for National Defense and member of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the SED, and his deputies. Warmly welcomed were the SED central committee members Hans-Joachim Hoffmann, Minister for Culture; Ursula Ragwitz, head of the Department of Culture of the SED central committee; and Colonel General Herbert Scheibe, head of the Department of Security Matters; as well as Dr. Helmut Baierl, vice-president of the GDR Academy of Arts. Other guests were Dr. Karl Heinz Schulmeister, first league secretary of the GDR Cultural League and chairman of the People's Chamber Committee for Culture, and Harmut Koenig, secretary of the FDJ Central Council. A warm soldier's welcome was given to Army General Ivan Shavrov, representative of the commander-in-chief of the Joint Armed Forces of the Warsaw Pact Nations in the NVA.

In his report, Colonel General Heinz Kessler, deputy minister of defense and chief of the NVA Political Directorate, spoke about the political-ideological activity in the armed forces and the role of spiritual-cultural work in socialist military character education. Amidst the applause of the participants, he thanked the party and state leaders for the continuous concern as well for the spiritual-cultural interests of the armed forces and described the safeguarding of peace and the socialist achievements as a cultural act of the first order.

Among other things, in his speech, Army General Heinz Hoffmann spoke about the growing demands on political-ideological work and, in this connection, stressed the need for overall further improvement in the spiritual-cultural prerequisites for raising performance.

In the stimulating discussion, the conference participants revealed their experiences of organizing spiritual-cultural activity in everyday life in the armed forces.

In the evening, the conference participants were guests at the Academy of Arts. Konrad Wolf, academy president, welcomed the guests that included deputy ministers for national defense Colonel General Heinz Kessler, Colonel General Wolfgang Reinhold, Lieutenant General Klaus-Dieter Baumgarten and Colonel General Werner Fleissner as well as Colonel General Herbert Scheibe. Konrad Wolf paid tribute to the firm alliance between GDR artists and soldiers who together exert their best for peace, human dignity and humanity. After an artistic program, the conference participants had the opportunity to exchange thoughts with academy members in 13 panels.

Those talking with the NVA and Border Troop members were Alexander Abusch, Helmut Baierl, Gerhard Bondzin, Heiner Carow, Guenther Deicke, Ludwig Engelhardt, Wieland Foerster, Wolfgang Heinz, Walter Heynowski, Gerhard Kettner, Werner Klemke, Wolfgang Kohlhaase, Gisela May, Arno Mohr, Erik Neutsch, Dieter Noll, Wolfgang Pintzka, Guenther Ruecker, Helmut Sakowski, Gerhard Scheumann, Maxim Vallentin, Robert Weimann, Manfred Wekwerth, Joachim Werzlau, Klaus Wittkugel, Benito Wogatzki, Walter Womacka, Juergen von Woyski and Dieter Zechlin.

At the close of the meeting, Colonel General Kessler thanked the members of the academy and its president for the joint social evening.

NVA Political Chief: Culture, Combat Readiness

East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 25 Sep 81 p 4

[Article by ND reporters: "From the Cultural Conference of the GDR's National People's Army (NVA) and Border Troops: Socialist Culture Is Part of Military Life--Col Gen Heinz Kessler: Our Weapons for Peace Include Also the Arts"]

[Text] "There is deep significance to the fact that we have gathered together for the Cultural Conference of the GDR's National People's Army (NVA) and Border Troops in the Military-Political University that bears the name of the first president of our workers' and peasants' state, 'Wilhelm Pieck'," Heinz Kessler said. "The great leader of the workers placed exceptionally high value on the contribution of culture and art to an upbringing that moderates classes and to military training and linked it as closely as possible to political work."

'The mission of our party organization, . . . must be to develop a broad, youthful cultural life. Only a warrior that is innerly happy, that sings and enjoys his life will exert his whole strength to defend his joyful, happy life in a graver hour. Those people, however, who are innerly grumpy, dissatisfied with themselves and their whole life have no courage to defend their own life and the life of their people.'

"This ardent call by Wilhelm Pieck, addressed to members of the officers school in Kamenz at the time, is still today expressing our heartfelt thoughts."

Members of Armed Forces Have Understood the Mission

"In striving to put into effect the decisions of the 10th SED Party Congress and the 12th Conference of Delegates of the SED Party Organization in the GDR NVA and Border Troops, as well as of the 11th Parliament of the FDJ and our 11th FDJ Conference of Delegates, the members of the armed forces, border troops and civilian employees are making great efforts and providing for the greatest possible increase in combat strength and readiness."

By their deeds, said Colonel General Kessler, the members of the armed forces and border troops are proving every day that they have properly understood the class mission of the 10th party congress. Together with the workers, they are contributing to the all-round strengthening of our republic and to increasing its defensive might. At the important Crimean meeting this year between the general secretaries of the CPSU and the SED, comrade Leonid Brezhnev and comrade Erich Honecker affirmed that consolidation and preservation of world peace is of paramount importance today. A great, comprehensive peace program for the eighties was presented to the people on earth by the 26th CPSU Congress. At the 10th SED Party Congress, we too made this program completely a cause of our own. At the side of its allies, together with all responsible political and social forces, the USSR and the GDR are doing everything to further strengthen the indestructible fraternal bond of the socialist community of states as the reliable bulwark of peace and social progress in the world.

"That is the main way of thwarting the adventurist confrontation policy and the imperialist arms race kindled by NATO," the speaker said. With their dangerous, aggressive policy, the reactionary circles of imperialism, headed by the Reagan administration, are jeopardizing everything that mankind has created in the way of cultural values over the millenniums.

Heritage and Traditions Mold the Soldier's Ethos Too

A consequence of the nature of socialist armed forces and their humanistic mission is that the members of the armed forces and border troops are always striving for ever deeper knowledge of the cultural heritage, art and literature of the present and past, as well as the culture of the fraternal nations. Getting involved with art and literature, singing and fellowship, with creative folk art activity is part of the everyday life of a soldier.

In the struggle of our times, the necessity arises of thoroughly mastering and successfully employing both the art of weaponry and the weaponry of art for the cause of peace and socialism.

Efforts full of sacrifice for the military protection of socialism and high culture are prerequisites for each other; therein lies one of the social advantages of socialism.

In his further remarks, Colonel General Heinz Kessler dealt with the cultivation of heritage and traditions within the National People's Army.

Everything that has been handed down in the way of human genius and valuable insights has been used to form communist ideals, value concepts and true military qualities. Special attention is paid to the revolutionary traditions of the working class and the working people from their beginnings to the most recent history of the GDR and its armed forces.

Culture and art are a strong motive force of military thought and affairs for the realization of the class mission. Ever since their establishment, the GDR NVA and Border Troops have been very closely associated with culture in the broadest sense and with literature and the arts. Among the writers, musicians and artists and creative people in the fine arts, film and theater who were there too at the inception of our armed forces are Erich Weinert, Friedrich Wolf, Kurt Barthel, Willy Bredel, Ludwig Renn, Otto Nagel, Lea Grundig, Hanns Eisler, Paul Dessau and Ernst Busch. They taught the soldiers of solcialism that art and culture are an effective weapon in the struggle to carry out the historic mission of the working class. They are, however, also an indispensable means of inspiring the people of the GDR and its arms bearers for the building of socialism and its reliable military protection.

Continuing these abundant traditions today, the close comradely cooperation of troop units, staffs and agencies with artists and people engaged in culture is part of everyday military life. This is a realization of a part of the active alliance policy of the party of the working class.

Colonel General Kessler then dealt with cultural and political work as a main direction of ideological activity of the party in the GDR NVA and Border Troops. In the eighties, it is being shaped by the higher requirements on the cultural level of communists, military superiors and all members of the armed forces and border troops. Objectively growing is the role of man, of class-conscious, disciplined soldiers, noncommissioned officers, warrant officers and officers who act creatively and with thought. "The extent of effectiveness of combat qualities on the battlefield depends on their military skill, their political-moral and psychical hardening, even their whole personality. The incomparably higher standard of the cultural level of the members of the armed forces and border troops stems from this revolutionary course, and the socialist culture of military life is becoming more and more the productive force, intellectual weapon and the source of confidence in victory. There is no combat readiness as we understand it without culture and art."

Proving Ground in Youth Organization

In this connection, the speaker went into the responsible work of the company and regimental clubs as well as the NVA houses and stressed the growing responsibility of commanders, political officers and all superiors. Club work is also a great proving ground for the FDJ organizations. The "FDJ-task 10th party congress" offers many possibilities for rousing the cultural initiatives of the young members of the armed forces and border troops, taking up their interests and needs and giving their leisure time sense and direction. Great importance is attached to the cultural-aesthetic education and training of young military cadres.

Colonel General Kessler referred to the leading role of party organizations in increasing combat readiness. This also applies fully to higher culture in everyday military life. "Applicable to a communist in the GDR NVA and Border Troops is the maxim that he always and everywhere supports high culture in personal and military activity, cultivates everything creative, encourages a frank exchange of ideas on literature and art and actively participates himself in intellectual and cultural activity." The more success in including socialist culture even more fimrly in the activity of the basic organizations, the higher will be the combat strength of the basic organizations and their influence and ideological effectiveness.

Defense Minister: Intellectual-Cultural Needs

East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 25 Sep 81 p 4

[Article by ND reporters: "From the Culture Conference of the GDR's National People's Army (NVA) and Border Troops: Give Valuable Impulses Toward a Soldierly Existence: Duty, Optimism, Zest--Army General Heinz Hoffmann, Minister for National Defense, Spoke During Discussion"]

[Text] In his contribution to the discussion, Army General Heinz Hoffmann, Minister for National Defense, stressed that socialist culture in everyday military life fulfills the humanistic mission of the armed forces. The socialist relations of class comrades, comradeship and the faith of members of the armed forces in each other have expressed themselves in that. It has involved all aspects of daily service events, combat duty, training and leisure time. "With that lies in all that we do to ensure high combat strength and readiness, always a new challenge and a growing demand on our political and ideological activity and on intellectual and cultural work in the GDR NVA and Border Troops."

A high state of organization of military life, conscious discipline, creative initiative and unconditional obedience are definitely not just elementary requirements of purposeful preparation for armed conflict. At the same time, a definite cultural level also expresses itself in them. The culture of a soldier's life in a socialist army is an important prerequisite for him to be able to feel well, for him to attack the fulfillment of his duties full of elan, and for him to be able to experience the months of his life as a soldier with optimism and zest.

Good Conditions for Organization of Leisure Time

Lenin saw in interpersonal relations, in which man is the measure of all things, in which respect and care for the dignity of man is the supreme precept, the highest purpose and most powerful expression of socialist culture, Army General Hoffmann explained. He reminded that whether a lively, intellectual atmosphere and a life full of culture prevails in the units, formations and staffs depends primarily on the members of the armed forces and border troops themselves.

The clubs down to company level have been equipped with modern radio, television and playback equipment. Each unit has a considerable collection of books, records and sports equipment. It is necessary to make even more meaningful use of these resources in future for the intellectual and cultural education of the members of the armed services and border troops.

Literature and art, as is well known, have an indirect effect on the practical actions of men. Minister Hoffmann encouraged arousing and developing new intellectual and cultural needs and interests that are directly related to the socialist military manner and give the members of the armed forces encouragement and impetus for their military duties in peace as in war. There is enough literature in which the soldier gets a word in, the warrior in the trench, at a howitzer, in a tank or an aircraft. Here situations where worth was proved have become relivable, whether on the training ground or in combat. It is essential to make even more extensive use of these valuable books.

Literature Conveys Important Experiences

Army General Hoffman referred in this connection to such important books as Bek's "Volokolamsk Highway," Chaykovskiy's "The Blockade" and Bondarev's "Hot Snow." In these works by Soviet brothers in class and arms, important questions of military discipline, unconditional obedience, fulfillment of duty and willingness to make sacrifices have been described and answered that have encouraged lively discussions both then and now. This also applies to Walter Flegel's books, "Regiment Commander," and "There Is No No-Man's-Land."

"When I stand up for the esthetic military literature here, that in no way means that we neglect the other resources of art and literature. I still know quite well, for instance, as a young man, how a whole new world was opened up and how much encouragement and intelelctual impetus I got as I became acquainted with the classics of world literature while studying at the International Lenin School," he said.

High Moral and Ethical Standards of Value

"Our Soviet friends speak of a 'kulturnyy chelovek' [cultured person] and mean by that a person who has been brought up and trained well, who is friendly and disciplined, who works conscientiously, cares for his body and mind and keeps healthy, who respects the dignity of man--his own and that of others--and who is guided in his thinking, will and actions by high ethical and moral standards of value."

The uniting and lifting quality of each true art and its capability of arousing, caring for and developing the human traits in man and in his personal relations should always be kept in mind and considered by members of the armed forces and border troops when they are talking about culture and art, so that their lives are enhanced and enriched by it.

TACTICAL TRAINING ACTIVITIES HIGHLIGHTED

East Berlin VOLKSARMEE in German No 41, 1981 (signed to press 5 Oct 81) p 11

[Article by Maj Klaus Koenig: "Severely Tested, Well Endured: Put to the Test after a Quarter of a Year"]

[Text[The 6th Company's armored personnel carriers have formed a column of vehicles in a forest lane. First Lt Siegfried Becker, deputy company commander for political work, sits in the rear of the lead vehicle. In his hands he holds the log book filled with observations, thoughts and conclusions about the past days and nights. Finally he thinks about the company firing practice, which was demanding on everyone, and in which the company reached good results. But he had laid the groundwork for that. His political work plan in the workbook is proof for that.

Knowing what the Subordinates are thinking

On 2 pages A-5, First Lt Becker has noted clearly and in great detail where he wants to direct his efforts before, during and after the company's tactical exercises--his theme for the political work during the high point of the training, confirmed by the company commander.

First Lt Becker does not like formal plans. Every plan was in concrete relations to young commanders, specialists, motorized infantrymen . If he wants to be their political leader--this is his motto--he must know what and how they think, he must relate to their moods, opinions and motives, to avoid being abstract and unrelated to their thinking, feeling and acting. The company is to pass the test in the field, be prepared for anything. This is a law of survival in our time, since the NATO well armed, continuously dallies with aggression.

Passing this test is to First Lt Becker almost like passing a test of his knowledge and ability, which he has gained in a 10-month course as deputy political officer. For that reason, he has hardly rested since he first joined the company in June. In many conversations and meetings he had informal friendly exchanges with his comrades and subordinates, in order to get to know their thoughts, moods and motives. His comrades recall that he was restless before this exercise. He could be found almost anywhere, spoke of his thoughts, inquired about the thoughts of others, during discussions with trainers, in meetings, personal conversations, in the park, field, the barracks. He called the company's 17 communists together, explained to them how much would depend on their setting an example, discussed with the party leadership tasks which the individual comrades were to demand. He recommended to the Free

German Youth leaders to farm out concrete tasks. Twenty specific assignments were given, to agitate, to spready enthusiasm in personal conversations, to inspire proper military conduct, e.g., take care of camouflaging.

First Lt Becker contributed his experiences when the platoon and squad leaders discussed how they might begin competition between the platoons during the exericses, and during a meeting of specialists with the gunners, he repeatedly told them why it is necessary to hit with the first round. With the political agitators he discussed the most effective argument, and with the editors of the military paper how they could set the mood for the exercise. The first lieutenant had an entire program to assure success with proven forms and methods of effective political-ideological work. A success, for which a good rating had been planned, and which had to be prepared for.

If Only One of them were To Hesitate in the Last Minute

Whoever observed First Lt Becker in the company's assembly area saw a restless man. A restless man about to find an efficient working style. He was nowhere for long. Whether it was during briefings, decision making at the side of the company commander, during inspection going from squad to squad, his thoughts always revolved around one goal: How he could have the most effective influence. Here he gave advice on how to improve camouflage, and there a tip on how to build ditches more efficiently. In between there were discussions with the company commander on the organization of the political work.

"19.30 h. Voice of the GDR." The voice of a radioannouncer came from the lead vehicle. In a semicircle, squatting on the ground of the forest, the political agitators gathered around First Lt Becker. Pads on their knees, pencils in hand, they jotted down the most important news as basis for discussion for the conversation hour among the agitators which followed immediately, and for discussions in the squads After that the first lieutenant explained the tactical situation to them. He said that this is necessary so that the comrades understand why, in a certain situation, they must act in a certain way and no other way. The deputy named soldiers and collectives who had fulfilled their missions in an exemplary fashion and he pointed out what the agitators should pay attention to during the next phase of the exercise. Even when he was a platoon leader he had already made the experience: The better the agitators are informed, the more effective they can move the collectives to giving their best.

One hour later, First Lt Becker was already engaged in another round of discussions. Young soldiers had to throw their first hand grenades. Calmly he explained to them once more how to handle the grenade. He referred to safety regulations and gave the soldiers courage, he encouraged them to use what they had learned during training for the success of the attack.

First Lt Becker knows what goes on in the heads of young soldiers, when they are supposed to throw their first hand grenade. Feelings of fear make them unsure of themselves, and it would not be the first time if one of them were to hesitate in the last second. Important points might be lacking at the end for the company to get the good rating. And what if one were to hesitate in combat? This thought is not that farfetched when one considers how intensively imperialism is increasing its aggression readiness. To be well prepared, just in case, for that this company also practices throwing the hand grenade. For that they try to be no worse than "good."

To Make a Decision--How Difficult it is

"Charge!" The company commander's order forced the motorized infantrymen from their positions. In file they advance for the attack, covered by the weapons from the APC's and tanks. Hours earlier First Lt Becker had still thought: He had done all that could be done in political work? What counted now was the personal example. But what was he to observe during the firing? NCO Jakobi, a squad leader nearing the end of his first year in service? He was still inexperienced and gave up quickly. Or should he, as deputy political officer, choose his place at the side of Lt Lauenstein? His platoon had to carry out independently a difficult mission--to surround and destroy an "enemy" strongpoint. Independently, because the platoon was operating in a depression which could not be observed by the company commander. And important targets could be expected there with certainty.

How was he to decide?

First Lt Becker discussed it with the company commander. They agreed that NCO Jakobi and his squad would remain in view of the company commander.

But Lt Lauenstein and his platoon formed the point of main effort. This would be the right spot for the deputy political officer. First Lt Becker had read much about the effectiveness of Soviet political officers in the Great Patriotic War. They could always be found in the hot spots in combat. And how often they had swept the soldiers along by their example, and thus assured success. Why then, should he act differently now?

"Assault...!" After this command, First Lt Becker charged forward at the right flank at the side of the platoon leader. He observed how the lieutenant directed the fire. He supported him in pointing out targets. He saw to it that the chain of men did not get severed from the APC's and he helped in quickly regrouping the platoon when one APC broke down. So they advanced. In this way they surrounded the "enemy" and finally fulfilled a decisive combat mission of their company....

The APC's have now formed a column of vehicles in a forest lane. First Lt Becker, deputy political officer, sits in the rear of the lead vehicle. Line after line fills his notebook. Observations from the past hours of trial--evaluations, examples. Among them first conclusions, to further increase the effectiveness of political work: complete fulfillment of party missions, critical analysis of achievements during a company meeting, friendly consideration to the platoon and squad leaders, helpful sponsorships over those less effective....

NEW TORPEDO PATROL BOATS DESCRIBED

Bonn WEHRTECHNIK in german No 9, Sep 81 p 93

[Text] The SHERSHEN (hornets) torpedo patrol boats built in Soviet shipyards have been supplied to the navy since 1968/69. The 35.2 m long and 7.7 m wide boats have a maximum water displacement of 18+ tons with a draught of 1.5 m. They are equipped with three diesel engines supplying a total of 8,830 kW (12,000 hp) and reach a maximum speed of 44 knots (81.4 km/h). They are armed with four torpedo tubes and two radar-guided 30 mm twin guns for engaging aerial and surface targets. The four tubes for the Soviet 53.3 cm torpedo--two each backboards and starboards--are firmly mounted and slanted towards the front. The 30 mm twin artillery is housed in turrets, one on the front deck and one aft. The POT DRUM (NATO code) radar, working on one band, which is installed on the grid, serves for tracking targets; the DRUM TILT (NATO code) radar mounted on a platform behind the mast guides the fire of the twin guns. The SHERSHEN boats carry depth charges to fulfill their secondary role engaging submarines. External characteristics of this class are the noticeably rounded outer edges of the center and rear decks, as well as the superstructure. At present, the GDR has 18 SHERSHEN torpedo patrol boats, together with the OSA (wasp) missile torpedo patrol boats--also of Soviet construction--and the small LIBELLE class, built in the GDR and suitable for deployment in coastal waters, they form the so-called "attack forces" of the NVA navy. These forces are divided into torpedo patrol boat brigades within the sixth flotilla (headquartered at Dranske-Bug on Ruegen Island). Missile and torpedo patrol boat packs are usually deployed together under joint leadership. The missile torpedo patrol boats are to first divert and attack the enemy from a large distance by launching missiles, and, under their cover, the torpedo patrol boats are to annihilate the enemy with surprise torpedo attacks.

ENGINEER UNIT COMMANDERS' DUTIES, TRAINING

Bonn WEHRTECHNIK in german No 9, Sep 81 p 93

[Text] According to NVA terminology, the engineers are special troops within the ground forces, who have at their disposal varied equipment and technology with which they are able to solve missions at any time of the year or day, in any kind of terrain, under all weather conditions, missions such as breaking paths into enemy barriers, assuring that obstacles are overcome, or making the terrain suitable.

The commander bears sole responsibility for the political-ideological education, political schooling and combat training of his men. He must guarantee the combat readiness of the engineering technology, of the armament and of his engineers. He is career officer with a minimum of a 25-year commitment. In addition to the customary prerequisites, such as possibly socio-political activities, applicants for this career should already possess basic military and political knowledge, premilitary training and, if possible, career training in the Society for Sport and Technology as military drivers or divers of the NVA.

Training at the Ernst Thaelmann officer academy in Loebau lasts 3 years and includes, in addition to the obligatory social sciences, military, mathematics, natural sciences, foreign languages and physical education, special training in subjects such as tactics, combat engineering safety, engineering technology, construction of positions, building barriers, bridges, crossovers, the fundamentals of underground workings and technologies. Two practical stints in the field are part of the course.

The graduate is promoted to lieutenant and his first commission will be as platoon leader of an engineering reconnaissance platoon, of an engineering platoon, a technical platoon or a road or fortification building platoon.

NAVAL VESSEL NAME, NUMBER DESIGNATIONS EXAMINED

Frankfurt/Main SOLDAT UND TECHNIK in German Vol 24 No 10, Oct 81 pp 584-585

[Article by Siegfried Breyer: "Ship Names and Ship Identifications of the GDR People's Navy; Names of Prominent State Functionaries Reserved for Future Ships?"]

> [Text] Within the past few years, among the GDR's People's Navy's warships--representing a new, second generation of warships--a few names have occasionally appeared, the meaning of which seems to be unclear. What, for example, is the meaning of the name SUEDPERD? Does it represent a name for a special breed of horses? Or is the term derived from the fields of geography or astronomy? And what is the meaning of the number designations of warships, which are designated by NATO as pennant numbers and, translated into German, as "PT numbers?" The following article is to shed some light on the apparent mystery.

The Names of Ships

Until now, ships and boats of the GDT's People's Navy were named after persons of recent history, after cities, geographic locations of the GDR, or after animals, astronomical terms or related areas.

The persons the ships were named after were of course individuals whose political acitivities were in harmony with the political goals of the communist movement, or those who resisted other forms of government in the West. The first frigates were named after the founders of the communist movement and those who forged its path: Karl Marx, Friedrich Engles, Karl Liebknecht and Ernst Thaelmann. Rosa Luxemburg appears to be missing here--but her name had been given to a ship earlier, when the navy was still called "sea police," and it was probably to be given to the 5th frigate of the RIGA class delivered by the Soviet Union, which had to be eliminated due to a fault in operation.

Torpedo patrol boats and missile assault boats--in the GDR often called "assault forces" at sea--have also been named after such persons; ranging from the leaders of resistance movements in the German fleet at the end of the first world war (Albin Koebis and Max Reichpietsch), members of the "Red Band" espionage group (like Adam Kuckhoff and Arvid Harnack), to high-ranking agents in the service of the Soviet NKWD, like Richard Sorge, but also--apparently in order to document political unity-- to politicians of different orientation and to victims of national socialism such as Rudolf Breitscheid. Small landing craft were given the names of crew members of a warship of the former German navy who, in the inferno on the Eastern front and during a rescue mission for hundreds of thousands of refugees had begun a mutiny, deserted, were court martialed and sentenced to death.

Wilhelm Pieck, the GDR's first president, is the only government representative to lend his name. The names of other prominent functionaries, such as Walter Ulbricht and Otto Grothewohl, have so far not been given to any ship. But the names of known German scientists and pioneers in the field of technology, such as Carl Friedrich Gauss, Otto von Guericke, and even Hugo Eckener, are represented.

Ships given geographical names of the GDR are usually named after cities and towns, and rarely after rivers, islands, capes and regions. Names used were not only those of major cities such as Leipzig, Halle, Rostock, Magdeburg, but medium-sized and small towns like Zqickau, Bitterfeld, Dessau, Neuruppin, Riesa, just to name a few. Even small villages are represented: Dornbusch (on Hiddensee Island), Freesendorf (on the East side of the Griefswalder Bodden) and Timmendorf (on Poel Island). A number of islands in the Baltic Sea (Reugen, Hiddensee, Poel and Ruden), as well as capes (Arkona on the Northern tip of Ruegen, Suedperd and Nordperd, both capes on the East side of Ruegen Island).

Minesweepers, submarine chasers and landing craft bear city names. A surprising break with tradition was the naming of the new missile frigates after cities. They received the names of Rostock and Berlin (the latter was called BERLIN CAPITAL OF THE GDR in the GDR military press!). Thus, there are no more ships in the GDR's navy which bear the names of communist historical figures. This leads to the question of whether they will return and are perhaps reserved for future warships, perhaps for frigates which are larger than the two units of the KONI class, or perhaps even for destroyers. It remains to follow the further developments carefully.

The names of animals, such as eagle, buzzard, leopard and tiger had been given to the first submarine chasers; after they were taken out of service, these names have disappeared.

Very few ships (warships never) display their names recognizably on the outside. Only few auxiliary ships, but all vessels given to the Sea Hydrographical Service, show them openly, in white capital letters. The names are painted on both sides of the forecastle, rarely on the stern. (In supply ships, at least in previous years, the name of the home port and commercial shipping line also appeared). The old school ship Ernst Thaelmann (the later Albin Koebis) was the only example in which the name appears in black capital letters (as still today on the paramilitary "Society for Sport and Technology").

The Codes

Since the end of the 1950's, all GDR warships have had three digit code numbers. Apparently the changeover to this from the previously used system represents an adaptation to the Warsaw Pact, i.e., the Soviet system. In contrast to the Soviets, the GDR navy rarely ever changes its codes. Since the beginning of the 1970's, a system has emerged which indicates that the first digit of the number implies a certain type of ship:

1 = frigates (so-called "coastguard ships")
2 = new submarine chasers (comparable to corvettes)
3 = minesweepers (so-called MSR's)
4 = older submarine chasers (HAI class)
6 = landing craft
7 = missile torpedo patrol boats
8 = torpedo patrol boats
9 = small torpedo patrol boats

Number 5 remains open; possibly it is reserved, since it was previously assigned to landing craft of the LABO-100 class.

There are, however, also exceptions to this system: 2-digit numbers, as for example "14" in a landing craft of the FROSCH-I class, and "17" in a submarine chaser of the BAL-COM-4 class, are experimental codes and are probably assigned on a temporary basis only.

Series are recognizable within the code groups from the last digit. Minesweepers of the KONDOR-I class of the "Coast Border Brigate" and missile torpedo patrol boats of the OSA class bear the numbers 1 to 4 (e.g., OSA boats 711, 712, 713 and 714, and then beginning again with 731, 732, etc.), torpedo patrol boats from 1 to 5, and submarine chasers, mine sweepers of the KONDOR-II class and landing craft from 1 to 6. This order is apparently an indication of the number of the boat within the detachment, the smallest unit of a flotilla after the brigade.

Non-warships have numbers preceeded by a letter. These mean:
A = rescue ship, tug boat
B = Anti-torpedo boats
C = fuel tanker
D = vessels of the Seahydrographical Service
E = material/ammunition/food supply ship (dry freighter)
F = fireboat
G = vessels of the "Coast Border Brigade"
H = other auxiliary ships (residential, yachts)
K = diving vessels
R = rescue ships (no longer carried today)
S = schoolship
U = submarine experimental/research ship
V = experimental ships
W = ? (so far seen only twice--on a minesweeper of the KONDOR-I class and a small torpedo patrol boat of the LIBELLE class (both prototypes), whereby the "W" could be referring to the shipyard).

The number designation of these auxiliary ships have 2 digits; one exception is recent schoolships, if they are warships (missile or torpedo patrol boats and minesweepers): They have 3 digits, but preceeded by an "S".

Auxiliary ships which have a name display only it and not the code. This is always true for vessels of the Seahydrographic Service, with other vessels only occasionally.

These code numbers are always displayed on the hull, on both sides of the forecastle, but there are some exceptions:

On submarine chasers, the code number is painted on the front end of the superstructure deck, because at high speeds they probably would not be visible if painted on the hull.

The minesweepers of the KONDOR class and the anti-torpedo boats evolved from their having their codes on both sides of the bridge superstructure.

On the small torpedo patrol boats of the LIBELLE class, the code appears on the hull as well as the forecastle (for planes) and on the stern.

Schoolships and boats deserve special scrutiny, because the numbers following the "S" are so close to it that the "S" is often read as part of the number, as "5", which leads to inaccurate reporting.

TEXTBOOKS INDICATE MILITARY EDUCATION FOR SCHOOLCHILDREN

Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German Vol 35 No 47, 16 Nov 81 pp 131, 134

[Unattributed article: "GDR: Dead Space"]

[Text] For months, the SED has been heaping praise on the peace movement in the West. But in its own country, it still promotes the education for a commitment to the military spirit and a readiness to fight.

Erich Honecker presented himself as a fighter for peace and disarmament. The SED chief told officer candidates of the GDR military academies that "the number of people from all classes and walks of life who are filled with deep anxiety about peace and the future of mankind" is growing.

But Honecker can only see this "mighty upsurge of the peace spirit" beyond the borders of his own country. The GDR's policies, after all, have been serving the goals of "peace and detente" for a long time. That is why the GDR has been promoting "socialist military education as a part of communist education" for the past 3 years. The aim is, according to a leaflet put out by the SED district organization of Ribnitz, to increase "the military capabilities of secondary schoolchildren; to solidify the commitment to the military spirit and to prepare" boys and girls for the "honorable duty of protecting peace."

Four 2-hour periods during the last 2 years of school are devoted to "problems of socialist national defense." Boys in the ninth form go through an additional 2-week cycle of "military training" at camps and the girls undergo a course in "civil defense." During the last year of school, there are 3 days of "military preparedness." Boys and girls must participate in 10-day paramilitary maneuvers of the Society for Sport and Technology, including target practice.

As for being militaristic, only the others are. "Youth needs peace as a flower needs light and that light only socialism can provide," said FDJ orator Winfried Langner before an audience of 50,000 demonstrating for peace on Potsdam's Alter Markt on the last Sunday in October. Another functionary said "there should be nothing separating people from each other in their joint efforts to prevent the horrors of nuclear war."

Under the conditions of real socialism in the GDR, such dangers do not appear to exist. The official SED newspaper NEUES DEUTSCHLAND can only detect a "threat to peace and security as a result of the madness of the arms race" in the imperialist West.

But it is slowly becoming clear that some of this has rubbed off on the East as well. The evangelical church in the GDR is planning to hold a "10-day peace forum" from 8 to 18 November to discuss new ways of "educating for peace." Authors in the GDR are in the process of organizing a congress on peace and disarmament with the unstated purpose of publicly discussing a home truth otherwise hidden from view in the GDR--that it takes two to make both an arms race and disarmament.

While there is protest in the streets of Western capitals about the NATO modernization plan, there are more and more people in the East now who no longer consider the Soviet SS 20's a more part of the "Soviet peace initiative" as NEUES DEUTSCHLAND would have them believe.

In the long run, the propaganda picture the SED paints of peace and war is too simplistic as is the attempt to pin the militarist label on the West alone.

This applies to the school systems, for example. "While there is a deep crisis in education in the capitalist countries, while the interests of popular education in the NATO countries are being sacrificed at the expense of increased armaments," NEUES DEUTSCHLAND wrote, "the superiority of the socialist social system is evidenced by the fact that we here are able to impart a modern education coupled with solid data to all our children."

If one looks at the official "history 10" text for secondary schools in the GDR, then it is only the imperialists who are engaging in an arms race; then there are arms expenditures only in the NATO countries and new weapons systems only in the United States. A table informs the GDR student about "selected U.S. arms programs" ranging from the MX missile to the B-1 bomber, but says nothing about any Soviet weapons systems.

As for "necessity" of building the Berlin wall, the history book reverts to undisguised propaganda themes:

During the first days of August 1961, the FRG militarists concluded final preparations for a military aggression against the GDR. In early August FRG defense minister Strauss visited the United States. Strauss told President Kennedy and officials of the American war ministry that a "popular uprising" in the GDR was imminent. The FRG government wanted to make use of this opportunity in order to institute a "police action" aimed at conquering the GDR and thereby resolving the "intra-German conflict." To support this plan, NATO troops stationed in Europe were placed in a state of alert. At the same time, the commander of NATO ground forces in Central Europe, the former Hitler general Speidel, conducted an inspection tour along the frontier of the GDR.

It was not until military conscription was introduced in 1962, the East German historians continue, "that the aggressive plans of imperialism directed against the socialist community of states could be thwarted...This helped make peace in Europe more secure."

Before then and thereafter, it was always the West that was to blame, if anything went awry:

On 17 June 1953, agents of various imperialist secret services who had infiltrated in large numbers from West Berlin into the capital and several districts of the GDR succeeded in persuading a small group of workers to engage in temporary work stoppages and demonstrations. In some cities, groups of provocateurs and criminals engaged in looting. They set fires, tore down banners, mistreated and killed labor movement officials, freed convicted war criminals from jail and called for the overthrow of the workers and peasants state.

Another instance:

By infiltrating fascist gangs as well as arms and inflammatory literature and by the ceaseless propagation of anti-socialist slogans over RFE, the internal enemies of socialism in Hungary received active support and prepared a counter-revolutionary uprising...By late October 1956, the preparations for an armed uprising had been completed. In Budapest and other cities, counter-revolutionary gangs engaged in bloody acts of terrorism against communists and government officials.

Still another example:

The planned test case for the imperialist policy of "bridge-building" was the counter-revolutionary attempt to overthrow the CSSR government in the summer of 1968...Operating under the banner of "improving" socialism as well as that of nationalism and anti-Sovietism, revisionist and counter-revolutionary forces engaged in a dangerous attempt...aimed at restoring capitalism. In this endeavor, they allied themselves above all with the imperialists in the U.S. and the FRG, who for their part engaged in multi-faceted counter-revolutionary activities directed against the socialist CSSR.

Even arithmetic is used to help strengthen the military spirit of East German schoolchildren. A group of authors, who apparently stop at nothing, included the following examples in the "mathematics for the tenth form" text:

During a NVA training exercise, an observer spots two machinegun nests A and B at an angle of 130 degrees. It takes him 7 seconds to hear a burst fired by A and 8 seconds for a burst from B. How far apart are the two machinegun emplacements ? The 122-mm NVA howitzer 38 has a horizontal angle of fire of 49 degrees. Its maximum range is 11.8 kilometers. How large is the maximum arc at the periphery that can be covered by its fire ? The anti-aircraft machinegun of a medium tank is fixed to the upper end of the turret at a height of 2.7 meters from the ground. The angle of elevation can be set from -5 to +30 degrees. Compute the radius of the "dead space" around the tank with respect to the turret machinegun!

"Among the laws approved by the Volkskammer," GDR schoolchildren are informed by the "history 10" text, "the law for the protection of peace occupied a prominent place." This law has been on the books since 1950. It states that anyone disturbing "the peaceful relations among peoples" is subject to a prison sentence.

But once again, these strictures only apply to the others—because in the final analysis this law, too, corresponds to SED dialectics and as such figures as a "weapon in the struggle against reactionary forces," as the text book says.

MORE TIME FOR OFFICER STUDIES--The officer academies in the GDR are at present undergoing certain changes. Beginning in 1983, training of officers will be uniformly 4 years and every officer will finish his studies with an academic degree as certified engineer or economist. Also changed will be the extent to which the individual subjects are studied. Twenty to 45 percent of the time is planned for military training, approximately 20 percent for social sciences including military pedagogy and military psychology. The rest of the training time of officer cadets--percentages depend on the speciality--is reserved for, among other things, the engineering technical, mathematics/natural sciences and foreign languages. [Text] [Bonn WEHRTECHNIK in german No 9, Sep 81 p 93] 9328

CEREMONIAL ATTIRE--During parades of the NVA, officers carrying cermonial daggers and sabers can be seen again and again. Both are strictly for officers. The saber is part of the equipment of officers leading honor formations, and the dagger can be worn during roll-calls, parades, or on leave; in other words, it is part of personal equipment. [Text] [Bonn WEHRTECHNIK in german No 9, Sep 91 p 93] 9328

ARMY MASS INITIATIVES--As the SED Central Committee announced, during the past 5 training years, members of the armed forces have "made essential contributions to the increase of combat strength of their branches and units through constantly growing achievements in competition." The following numbers are cited as proof for the mass initiatives: 318,000 soldiers and NCO's and 87,300 collectives won the "Best" title, 114,000 ribbons were given to infanterists, approximately 253,000 classification marks were given for military achievements in various specialty areas, and 400,000 badges "for good knowledge" were awarded. In the 1980/81 training year, 95 percent of the members of the armed forces competed for awards. During the five years, 15,600 military and civilian employees of the military made "suggestions" on how to improve training, combat readiness, care and maintenance of technology, as well as for material and financial savings. SHORTCOMINGS IN PUBLISHING ACTIVITY CITED

Bucharest CONTEMPORANUL in Romanian 20 Nov 81 p 5

[Interview with Valter Roman, director of the Politica Publishing House; interviewer, date and place not specified: "The Current Stage of Socialist Construction in Romania and How This is Reflected in Publishing"]

[Text] [Question] It seems to me legitimate that in a discussion with the director of a publishing house of such a great social importance as the Politica Publishing House we should begin with the contemporary fate of books in general and their role in forming the awareness of the people.

[Answer] I do not want to paint a portrait of or give a eulogy for the books of whose necessity and multilateral social utility we are all convinced. But, because in our times numerous especially powerful and efficient means of mass communication have appeared and because some people are of the opinion that a new culture, that of "pictures" and the "visual civilization," will replace the "book culture," I want to say that since it appeared centuries ago the book has maintained and is maintaining the prominence acquired within the framework of the means of spreading knowledge and culture. Even more, in our times when a true revolution is taking place, the book is fresher and the publishing houses remain, and will remain in the future, one of the most important keys in the framework of institutionalized systems in the field of culture and education.

But, because I would not want to get into a conflict with other important sectors that are nonetheless important (such as the press and radio-television), I can add that between us there can only exist a creative competition serving a common cause, with the two sectors being complementary and parts of an entire coherent grouping.

[Question] From this point of view, the social-political book and that of philosophy, integrated into the vast ideological activity of the creative development of scientific socialism and dialectic and historical materialism, have a determined and determing role in a specific manner. In connection with this, the value of the publisher's activities is given by the dynamic push for scientific and philosophical research and creative activities and by the contribution made to the formation of a revolutionary awareness.

[Answer] Ideological work and all activities for forming social and individual awareness cannot be separated from the transformation of social existence. Numerous times comrade Nicolae Ceausescu has referred to the scope and complexity of ideological activities and propaganda and has stressed that the problem "of completely eliminating different backward concepts from the people's awareness" and the raising of the level of civic awareness are difficult tasks, from the point of view of being more difficult than "building factories and ensuring economic development." Therefore, the ideological front is asked to make special efforts.

[Question] How are these efforts reflected in the activities of the Politica Publishing House?

[Answer] First of all, through the publication of party documents. To date, 21 volumes have appeared of the Works of the secretary general of the party, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, "Romania On the Road of Building a Multilaterally Developed Socialist Society." To this, we can add the 19 volumes from the collection "From the Social-Political Thought of the President of Romania," a new volume entitled "From Economic Thought" and two volumes of "From Philosophical Thought." These have also appeared in the languages of the coinhabitating nationalities - Hungarian and German - in a total publication run of 2,600,000 copies. Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu's presentations and speeches have been published in brochures, totalling, from 1965 to now, 436 titles and 21.5 million copies. Volume 22 of "Romania on the Road of Building a Multilaterally Developed Socialist Society" is in its final phases of preparation for release, as is "Selected Works" in three volumes, as well as new volumes in the three synthetic collections: from the social-political, economic and philosophical thought of the president of Romania. Similarly, we will also publish manuals, collections of lectures, studies and so forth. We give great attention to collections and series - in history, economics, philosophy, sociology and foreign affairs. We will continue to publish the collections: "The Multilaterally Developed Socialist Society," "Ideological Discussions," "Files of History," "Contemporary Ideas" and so forth. We will continue to publish (and republish) the classical works of Marxism. We feel it is a requirement of providing information to publish certain translations of social-political literature from the other socialist countries, as well as from the progressive literature of other countries.

[Question] I ask that you now detail the requirements that social-political and philosophical literature in our country must respond to in order to contribute to raising the level of awareness and to make revolutionary awareness an important factor for progress.

[Answer] By its own nature social-political literature is designed to reflect the processes and phenomena that occur in our country and the world, to explain these processes and phenomena and to contribute directly to the masses' understanding and mastery of our party's creative policies and to the mastery of the materialist-dialectical concept about nature and society. Under the conditions of creating a multilaterally and harmoniously developed socialist society, the changes that occur in modelling the profile of social-political books - regardless of whether we are talking about economics, history, philosophy, sociology, juridical sciences and so forth - I think can be summarized in the form of two great requirements. One which requires that the investigation will thoroughly study our realities and achieve an organic link between theory and practice; the second, intimately correlated with the first, has in mind the priority importance of those research efforts that can offer, through their specific and original nature, solutions to the decisionmakers. At the same time, of top priority is not just the informative role, but the formative role of social-political books and its substantial contribution to the formation and development of the workers' socialist awareness.

[Question] Beginning with the idea that a publishing program must reflect in its own manner a stage of socialist construction, with its structure and dynamics, it can be said that in your publishing house the books that appear correspond for the most part to the current stage of development. Not all, however, fill the requirements that you outlined, which makes me ask whether we can speak of a shortfall in the social-human sciences compared to the natural sciences. If so, how is this explained?

[Answer] I think that the problem of a shortfall in the social sciences can be viewed not in relation to the natural sciences, but in the dialectical correlation between social theory and practice. And, it must be remembered that the theoretical research efforts and results have remained behind social practices. The elimination of the gap- by covering certain major problems in our society and by dealing with certain cardinal problems of the contemporary times - is a fundamental task of our ideological front and, therefore, our publishing house. Thus, you are right; the major themes of the socialist revolution and construction are still not present to the necessary degree, either in the number of titles or in the number of copies. Still missing are the works for spreading the vast experiences of our party. If somehow there is a retrospective, historical literature, we need more and better prospective works that can contribute to bringing closer together the present and the future that is foreseen. To date, there still has not appeared such fundamental works as the history of Romania, especially about Romania's political history during the inter-war period, the history of philosophy, art and technology in Romania and so forth. I say this not just self-critically, but also critically. Our country still does not have its own great encyclopedia.

We still have not seen fundamental works with regards to dealing with certain universal themes from our point of view, such as world history. Nor do our positions in the contemporary dialogue of ideas fulfill the attributes of the desired quality.

[Question] This is from the point of view of the diversity of the themes discussed, a necessary reflection of the complexity of the work of creating a multilaterally developed socialist society and the complexity of the contemporary world. The observation made also referred, however, to the manner of dealing with these subjects, and this is necessarily different according to the different categories of readers.

[Answer] Let me begin with one finding. In Romania, the interest in the social-political book is ever more lively and it involves the most diverse and broad categories of people. This is attested to by, among other things, the rapid depletion of certain works (sometimes in substantial production runs) that requires their republication. This requires on our part, the publishers, a special care to give the readers the books that they are awaiting, that will answer their questions, that will respond to certain concerns or help them in their work and that will open new horizons of knowledge for them. Books, especially social-political ones, should not be easy to write and hard to read, as some authors unfortunately believe, but rather the reverse: to be written with great effort and be read with ease. Nonetheless, it must be said that in the so-called "conflict" between the head and the book, the book is not always at fault. Let me remind certain authors who are in a hurry to write for the sake of writing of the words of comrade Nicolae Iorga: "When I am writing a book I feel that I am doing something especially good; when a receive notice to take it to the publisher, I begin to have doubts about the book. And, when I finally find it in the library I ask myself if it is a successful work and, in any case, I decide that there is cause to write something better."

It should also be said that the necessary attention is not being given to literature for the villages, just as the presence of books at the middle and elementary level is also poor. As fas as we are concerned, we have taken a series of measures to fill this blank spot as quickly as possible. In any case, I feel that in their activities the publishing houses must guide themselves according to the principle that all the styles in which books are written are good, with the exception of one - that which bores people. The ideal situation is for the reader to find in just a few pages as many ideas as possible and, wherever possible, original and useful ideas. One of the causes of this type of shortcoming, which are not just in our publications, is the lack of preparation and exigency of the publishers. Under the pressure of events and the authors and sometimes under the requirement to fulfill the plan, books have been published whose value has suffered from every point of view.

[Question] Can you give us a specific example?

[Answer] It is difficult... it is not pleasant... to speak about unpleasant things. And since the phenomenon is not specific to merely our publishing house, it is easier for me to report on a type of book, that of history. Naturally, no one can live in the past. Certainly, no one can live without the past since the lessons of the past represent an important guide for our future. Some of our history books, and I am referring here to historical novels, do not reflect accurately, unfortunately, our distant or recent past. Certainly, no one can have the pretensions that historical novels are certain dissertations on history, but even historical novels must respect the historical truth. And, any novelist, just like any conscious citizen of our country, must know, as comrade Nicolae Ceausescu said in 1971, that "there is the past and the past." There is a past "of sad remembrance" and there is another past that we are proud of." The blurring of the light or the shadows does nothing but deform reality.

[Question] Because we are giving less than pleasant examples, and I understand how you feel, that are difficult to give, allow me to give an example from your publishing activities. I am speaking of the collection "Contemporary Ideas" where translations appear from the works of certain thinkers of our century, as well as original works, some of high content value. With regards to the utility and audience of some of these books there is no need, I think, to have a discussion. But, there are aspects that do not satisfy us. There are too few appearances of these books. And, this despite the numerous promises under the heading of "To Appear." Then, in the original works the numerical and value preponderence goes to those works dealing with the philosophy of science - especially the natural sciences. Specifically I am referring to, for example, those dealing with the implications of the scientific and technical revolution where there is too little coverage given to the problems of psychology, sociology, anthropology or culture. Therefore, we once again encounter the problem of the gap between the natural sciences and the social-human ones.

[Answer] First, I assure you that the announcements have a real meaning. The appearances are actually infrequent, six to seven volumes annually. This year there will be eight. There are many reasons for this. First of all, there is the difficulty of making selections from so many books that appear today in the world. Let me stress again that we do not have a sufficient number of specialized editors. Then, there are the difficulties related to obtaining the necessary amounts of paper and publication space. I can tell you, however, that soon an anthology of texts will appear from the works of Stefan Lupascu, "Racism in the Face of Science" (a book published under the aegis of UNESCO). Next year, books will appear such as: "The Third Wave" by Alvin Toffler and "World Defiance" by Jean-Jacques Servan Schreiber. We are trying hard to give a picture of the contemporary confrontation of ideas through introductory studies that will orient the reader and express our position with regards to advanced ideas and through such books, as well as those that have appeared to date. The problem of the gap that you raised again in this discussion is very complex and I feel that it deserves a special discussion. Now, I would merely quote some of the words of the scholar and recipient of the Nobel Prize, P. L. Kapita, whose anthology "Experiment, Theory, Practice" was translated here in Romania, who said that "As long as the social sciences are not unified, they will not be able to be developed."

[Question] Certainly, the discussion could go on for a very long time. Let us stop here, however, with the request that, in conclusion, you emphasize several of the principal ideas that relate to the current and future publishing activities.

[Answer] I will begin with those that satisfy neither the reader not us. We still are not carrying out an active publishing policy to a satisfactory degree in the sense of guiding and helping the creative search of an ever greater number of authors. This is an important task of publishing activities. To a certain degree, some plans are still the result of certain fortuitous effects and not of a conscious policy in which the needs of our society can find their expression.

I feel that in the future books in general and social-political books in particular, alongside and in harmonious cooperation with the press and radio-television which are pursuing common goals, will continue not only to maintain but even to amplify their role as the priority means of educating and influencing people and as a factor of culture and civilization. Naturally, there will be a continuing increase in the informational content of books, the formative and educational purpose of books. Certainly, as Mihail Sadoveanu wrote many years ago: "There are books and there are books. Some are destined to vanish right from the beginning since they are not a light within the light of humanity. The others are destined to survive as long as man lives under the sun: in these we have the aspirations and ideals of the generations, these are our best legacy." Adapting this to the context of our discussion, the words of the great author, I would dare to add that we, the publishers, have the duty now and in the future to contribute to the greatest degree possible to this legacy through the books whose appearance we ensure.

DOMESTIC PRODUCTION OF LANOLIN DELAYED BY BUREAUCRATIC RED TAPE

Bucharest SCINTEIA in Romanian 15 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Anica Florescu: "Lanolin's Long Road From Conception to Production"]

[Text] Lanolin - a valuable ally for women who want to protect their beauty. This is a definition that any cosmetician could agree with. Since lanolin, the heavy base of creams and other cosmetic products and the product obtained by processing the residual waters used in washing wool and fur skins, is one of the raw materials required not only by the cosmetics industry, but also by the leather goods industry and the footwear industry for use in the higher treatment of hides. It can also be used as a substitute for whale oil and other oils that we currently import. Similarly, in recent times the steel and iron industry has required larged quantities of lanolin. This is without mentioning the fact that on foreign markets the demand for lanolin and lanolin products is unlimited and the prices being offered are especially advantageous. So many uses for a product obtained from... nothing! But...

In our country, residual waters containing lanolin are thrown away! The potential of the gross lanolin resources represents over 4,000 tons yearly, but the use of this potential does not exceed three percent! On the contrary, year after year numerous enterprises show up as importers of lanolin.

Last year, in June, on the occasion of a visit by the secretary general of the party, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, to the "Aurora" Enterprise in Bucharest, an original Romanian procedure was presented for extracting lanolin from residual waters and for purifying this substance. We are talking about two inventions by engineer Ion Cocrean of the "Vidra" Enterprise in Orastie: "The Procedure for Obtaining Lanolin from Waters Used to Wash Sheepskins" and "The Procedure and Equipment for Purifying Lanolin."

The secretary general's directive was as clear as it can be: to quickly move to using lanolin obtained from residual waters, providing the necessary amounts of lanolin for the national economy and, at the same time, protecting the environment.

The so-called "Aurora" program was immediately put together for the purpose of accelerating the implementation of this tasks. If we keep in mind that the necessary technology has existed for over 5 years, the following question is justified: How much more time will go by until the entire amount of lanolin necessary for our economy will be produced in-country?

The lanolin in the waters being used to wash wool and hides comes in quantities that are too great and clogs the collectors and filters in the purification stations. This water, arriving in the rivers, threatens the beauty and existence and these bodies of water. In order to avoid shortcomings, they have resorted to the most damaging solution in these units: the destruction of the lanolin! Yes, lanolin is being destroyed! Using efforts, funds and specialized personnel. But, is there not some other way to save the beauty and existence of the rivers? That is, while also saving the lanolin by spending the money and making the effort to recover, not destroy the lanolin?

It is unbelievable how much effort is being made to destroy the lanolin that exists in our country while the necessary amounts of lanolin for the national economy is being obtained from imports using hard currency. We are talking about an annual requirement of hundreds of tons that, to date, has never been fully met. And, it is equally unbelievable that we are paying prices for a ton of anhydrous lanolin that are approximately five times greater than a ton of crude oil!

The idea of making better use of lanolin is rather old and engineer Ion Cocrean from the "Vidra" plant has been calling for it since 1975. His inventions have been patented for over 4 years and these patents are still protected until the end of next year. In the opinion of certain specialists, Romanian lanolin in sufficient quantities - approximately 800 tons yearly - will be available only beginning in 1984. Thus, from the future to reality there has been but one step, but this step has taken too many years! It is certain, however, that the timeframes established for the recovery and use of this raw material are totally unsatisfactory. Especially when we are talking about rescheduled timeframes compared to the pledges that were made and, especially, compared to the existing real opportunities.

At the Design Institute for Light Industry, we were having a discussion with project chief for the Orastie project, engineer Virgiliu Marcusanu:

-- It was possible and we should have had lanolin back even in 1980, our interlocutor tells us. Let us not forget that the invention goes back a number of years and the prototype facility at Orastie has been operating experimentally for 2 years with encouraging results. There is more raw material than we would need. If only there was not so much mistrust in new things, a mistrust that still exists in the mings of certain people...

-- What is the status of the documentation?

-- It has long been ready. Our institute has practically completed its mission. We started our work prior to actually receiving the orders in order to gain time. Time that was lost, unfortunately, because of diverse bureaucratic procedures.

To continue to delay the implementation of the Orastie experiment on an industrial scale and to continue to import lanolin when we have it here in-country at our disposal is, in the final analysis, a crass attitude of indifference toward the requirement of better using all the material resources we have available. The annual losses caused by the waste of the raw materials necessary to produce lanolin, according to the caculations made together with certain specialists, reach approximately 10 million lei.

At the Wool Central, engineers Stefan Danciu and Victoria Coreanu from the central's technical office did not hesitate to tell us that they are afraid of a... fiasco, a fear which serves as the reason for building merely a single model at Sighisoara in its first stage (necessary for extracting the raw lanolin), with the remaining five others to be built in stages. A situation exaggerated by many precautions precisely at the Wool Industry Central, that is, precisely where there should be an expression of a real interest and complete support for implementing on an industrial scale a valuable idea, an idea attested by two patented inventions.

A statement: the unit that should have the most to gain in the undelayed production of lanolin in our country is the Central for the Leather Goods, Rubber and Footwear Industry.

Thus, that is why we are here on the scene at the Central. We are having a discussion with a group of specialist about the twisting path being followed by the Orastie inventions. The only thing that we are trying to clear up is whether the Central can provide the proteinic concentrate, that base that is strictly necessary for the production of raw lanolin, as requested by the Wool Central for the fall of next year. We have been told that it is impossible; the prototype facility at Sighisoara is operating way below the projected capacities because of a lack of a proper atomizer, an absolutely necessary piece of equipment...

Naturally, we cannot conclude the investigation into using lanolin without knowing the point of view of the Ministry of Light Industry, which coordinates the two centrals involved in finalizing the Orastie inventions at the industrial level. We note several of the ideas worth remembering from the discussions with the specialists and authorities there.

Viorel Ocico, director in the investments directorate:

-- I find out from you that the earlier installation of an atomizer would have been a solution for the earlier production of lanolin. But, did anybody ask us for this atomizer? No one! How can the ministry guess what each enterprise needs?

...And more, in discussing this with specialists in the ministry with regards to the much disputed problem of the atomizer, we find that for several years our industry has been producing this piece of equipment. In the case of the technological process for lanolin, the question is one of miniaturizing the atomizer. This is something that we are convinced our specialists are capable of doing with complete success. But, we repeat engineer Ocico's statement: what is important is that the production of this piece of equipment must be requested. Why such indifference?

Susan Remus, the chief of the technical office:

-- The simple fact that we are removing pollution from the water and creating the premises for the recycling of the water is a reason to speed the final work on the investments regarding the production of lanolin. I agree that the price can still be discussed. The price can and must be recalculated. Since it is natural that we should take into consideration not only a narrow economic interest, but also the fundamental requirements of the national economy, in this case that of the undelayed use of the resources we have available. We must condemn the delays and the tendency of pointing the finger at others, instead we should ask ourselves what do we have to do first.

Yes, we believe that through this last point of view we can dot the "i". The main party at fault in the "odyssey" of lanolin is precisely this mentality of passing on responsibilities to those authorities who are called upon to work with all their energies to promote new things in the economy and to stimulate the creative initiatives of the workers.

It is absolutely necessary and fully possible to provide as quickly as possible, using our own resources, the lanolin that we need. It is necessary because our economy annually spends hundreds of thousands of dollars to obtain this product while we have the raw materials at hand. It is necessary because we are actually talking about a precious material resource that is being thrown away. It is necessary because by this means we can achieve not only important hard currency savings, but also resources with which to increase our exports. At the same time, it is completely possible for us to use all the lanolin we have available at the level of the national economy. This is because we have the technology, we have the specialists and we have sufficient resources.

CHANGES IN PARTY BYLAWS DISCUSSED

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 8 Nov 81 pp 6-7

[Article by Ivan Torov: "The Times Are Changing the Bylaws"]

[Text] This past week of political developments in the League of Communists of Yugoslavia will certainly be remembered for an extremely important and constructive discussion: there was a meeting of the commission of the LCY Central Committee whose task it is to summarize all the suggestions, proposals and opinions submitted so far on possible changes of the LCY Bylaws.

Though it was felt for a long time that the 12th LCY Congress should not undertake major changes in the bylaws (and it is in that framework that the discussion was conducted until recently), there has been an ever greater awareness that the present moment in politics and public affairs and the period before us call for resolute action toward further and more consistent democratization of the LCY, which in turn entails a reassessment of certain experiences and procedures (including those related to the bylaws). The League of Communists must be more responsive and decisive in confronting and adapting to everything which reality imposes on it. That is the origin of the vigorous opposition to the view that "the best thing at present is for all arrangements to remain unchanged."

The Congress in a Passive Position

The debate on changes in the bylaws (and this was indeed confirmed at the last meeting) has actually raised essential issues about the alignment and mode of operation of Yugoslavia's top-level political structure, but it has also initiated a reassessment of certain arrangements throughout the LCY which until yesterday were almost unchangeable.

We will take them in order:

1. The observation that secret elections at all levels--from the primary organization of the League of Communists to the Presidium of the LCY Central Committee--cannot be superfluous for us in the effort to further democratize the LCY has initiated a broad debate. By and large there is no one any longer who agrees with the present provision in the bylaws to the effect that political executive bodies are elected by secret ballot only at the level of the opstina organization of the League of Communists, but views differ as to which new arrangement is the most democratic--to undertake secret balloting everywhere or to apply acclimation everywhere.

So that this issue, which at the moment is undecided and is a crucial one for relations in the LCY, isn't dealt with "in haste," the commission has taken the position of offering two alternative solutions for further discussion: either elections of political executive organs at all levels would be secret everywhere or would be public everywhere.

ii. The manner of election of members of the LCY Central Committee has also attracted exceptional attention in direct relation to the previous issue. It is worth recalling that the members of this supreme organ of the LCY, as the provisions of the bylaws now stand, are elected in the interval between congresses by secret ballot in congresses of the League of Communists of the republics and provinces, and the LCY congress merely verifies that election. Many people are not happy with this arrangements, pointing out that the LCY congress, to which the LCY Central Committee is in fact accountable for its work, has thereby been placed in a rather passive and restricted position and cannot essentially influence election of the members of that body. To be sure, the rules of order of the LCY congress affords the possibility of contesting the individual election of a member of the LCY Central Committee, but it is a fact, the judgment runs, that this procedure is rather complicated and, still more important, it has never been invoked even once as yet.

Advocates of this view feel that the thing should be turned around: that members of the LCY Central Committee should merely be nominated in republic and provincial congresses, but should be elected at the LCY congress. This election would be by secret ballot, room would be opened for more than one candidate to be nominated for a position, and that candidate would be elected who received more than 50 percent or two-thirds of the votes of the delegates to the congress.

Adherents of the present provision of the bylaws on the other hand emphasize that adoption of the first alternative (election rather than verification at the LCY congress) would to some extent be an expression of lack of confidence in the republic and provincial organizations and congresses, who have already used the institution of the secret ballot once. They say that any possible change in election procedure would open up an essential debate concerning certain basic principles of the LCY and concerning the independence of the republic and provincial organizations of the League of Communists.

Since this is an extremely important political problem, the commission decided for the present not to undertake a discussion of alternative solutions, but to propose that the provisions in the rules of order of the LCY congress (which afford the possibility of contesting election of members of the LCY Central Committee) be carried over--with certain improvements--into the LCY Bylaws. This does not mean, however, that the door has been closed on further discussions. This is a major issue on which there certainly will be more debate before the 12th LCY Congress.

Many Decisions, Little Execution

iii. The dilemma about electing the chairman of the Presidium or the chairman of the LCY Central Committee has opened up a fundamental debate concerning the objective status of the LCY Central Committee and also about the relationship between the LCY Central Committee and the Presidium, its political executive organ. Sponsors of the proposal that the chairman of the LCY Central Committee be elected from among members of the Central Committee (the procedure that is followed, incidentally, in the republics and provinces) say that this is the right way to strengthen the leadership position of the Central Committee of the supreme organ of the LCY in the interval between congresses. It would thereby "put things in their proper place." The Central Committee would have political primacy over its political executive organ (the Presidium), and it would also strengthen its role in following up the implementation of policy and decisions. Tendencies said to exist in the direction of the Presidium's turning more toward decisionmaking and less to implementing decisions of the LCY Central Committee would be thwarted.

The proposal for election of a chairman of the Central Committee also assumes that he would supervise the work of the Central Committee and the Presidium and would coordinate the work of commissions.

The procedural problems implied by a solution of this kind have, however, been pointed out. Were the chairman of the Central Committee to be elected from among the members of the Central Committee, upon expiration of his 1-year term, he would no longer be a member of the Presidium. The frequent change in the membership of the Presidium, it has been said, could adversely affect its effectiveness as a political executive organ. Others say, however, that the chairman of the Central Committee (who is at the same time the presiding officer of the Presidium) would be put in a position of exercising oversight over himself in view of the role of the Central Committee with respect to the Presidium. That is why advocates of this view feel that the present election of the chairman of the Presidium should be retained.

The commission has decided that the further discussion should be conducted without alternatives, feeling that there should be more discussion of the views, opinions and proposals which have been presented. It is worth emphasizing, however, that the point of departure of the entire debate is that the overall situation in society and indeed in the League of Communists as well makes it imperative to reassess what has up to now been practice and operating procedure at the top level of the party. Quite a few participants in the debate have expressed the judgment that we still have too many bodies in which decisions are made, and too few of those which see that the decisions and conclusions of the party are carried out. These shortcomings are unquestionably having an effect on developments in society.

Summing up this discussion, the commission has suggested to the Presidium of the LCY Central Committee that it discuss once again the past experience concerning its organization and its operating procedure and that it propose to the LCY Central Committee measures to improve its effectiveness as a political executive organ, including as well a discussion of the possibility of reducing the number of members of the Presidium from the present 23 to 17.

More Than One Candidate for Each Position Within the Vanguard

iv. If there has been unanimity on any point, then it was in the debate in which there was insistence that Tito's view expressed at the 11th LCY Congress, to the effect that more people should be proposed and nominated than are being elected to all positions in society, including the most responsible ones, be vigorously and consistently applied, above all in the League of Communists of Yugoslavia.

The choosing of one of several candidates (not, of course, after the conventional representative pattern) will be a potent means, it has been said, for strengthening the personnel of the League of Communists and an impetus for party and political action, and all of this together constitutes a big step toward democratization of personnel policy. It would at the same time constitute a barrier to the privatization and bureaucratization of that policy.

As personnel policy has been conducted up to now, we have pretty much defeated constructive and progressive competition of personnel, we have restricted opportunities for a broader group of people to display their commitments and abilities even in the most responsible posts. In our behavior we have instead created a climate in which it is taken as almost an insult if a man is second or third on the list or if he loses 20-30 percent of the votes and is not elected.

It is often forgotten that the League of Communists of Yugoslavia is the vanguard of the working class, that it is composed of the most politically mature people, and that if we are not decisive and consistent here--it is vigorously asserted--how can we expect people in other domains of society to behave differently? If the principle of "multiple candidacy" is consistently accepted and implemented in true communist style, it will be much easier to deal with all the problems and reservations that might arise, for example: that we are a multinational community, that consideration must be given to the representation of all strata of society, that elections will become complicated....

The recent debate has unquestionably opened up a number of issues which until yesterday were thought not to be a sufficient occasion for discussion in the League of Communists. If one is to judge by the early going, we can expect that the upcoming public debate of party members in the precongress activity will furnish the right answers to many problems and outstanding issues and will thereby enrich still more the content of the 12th LCY Congress and the overall organization, effectiveness and democracy of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia.

ALBANIAN NATIONALISM IN SERBIAN BORDER AREAS DISCUSSED

Sarajevo OSLOBODJENJE in Serbo-Croatian 13 Nov 81 p 16

[Account of meeting of the Presidium of the Serbian Republic Conference of the SAWP on the political and security situation in the Southern Morava region: "The Situation Is Still Problematical"]

[Text] The counterrevolutionary activity in Kosovo has had an impact on the political-security situation in the Southern Morava region, especially in three opstinas with marked ethnic diversity--Presevo, Bujanovac and Medvedja, whose population also includes members of the Albanian minority. The situation in these opstinas, though the assessment is that no major acts of irresponsibility organized by counterrevolutionary forces could occur, is still problematical and necessitates still broader and better organized political activity to overcome and suppress cases of exclusiveness, vacillation and opportunism.

This observation was made at today's meeting of the Presidium of the Serbian Republic Conference of the SAWP, which examined and adopted a report on the political-security situation in the Southern Morava region. Aside from combating and prosecuting those who write hostile slogans and commit similar irresponsible acts, it was pointed out, it is very important at this juncture to develop the broadest activity in exposing the enemy's propaganda and goals, which are assuming a more disguised form.

About 55,000 members of the Albanian ethnic minority, that is, about 10.5 percent of the population of this region, live in three opstinas in the Southern Morava region. Those opstinas--Presevo, Bujanovac and Medvedja--are markedly underdeveloped and have a per capita national income which is less than 30 percent of the republic average.

Sima Jovanovic, chairman of the SAWP Interopstina Conference of the Southern Morava region, presented encouraging data on the operation of this region's economy in the first three quarters of the year, which suggest stabilization and improvement of the political situation.

105 Participants in the Demonstrations Have Been Identified

Among the approximately 1,200 secondary and university students from these three opstinas who are attending school in Kosovo 105 participants in the demonstrations have been identified. One of them has been sentenced to 13 years in prison for extremist nationalistic activity, and 14 were sentenced to 60 days in prison for misdemeanors. There were no organized actions by sizable groups in these opstinas, but leaflets with hostile content were discovered as early as 27 March in Presevo; thanks to the rapid intervention of the police and individual citizens they were not for all practical purposes distributed. Later there was some writing of slogans in schools and on walls. Charges were filed against three members of the Albanian ethnic minority--university students at the School of Technology in Leskovac, who in their official student records gave as their place of residence "SR [Socialist Republic] Kosovo" and as their nationality "People's Socialist Republic of Albania." Last month a hostile slogan was written in oil paint on asphalt roads, but the offenders have not been discovered.

Following the hostile demonstrations in Kosovo a tremendous number of working people and citizens in this region, in these three opstinas especially, have condemned those events and initiated organized activity to become familiar with the true character of the demonstrations and a campaign for ideological-political differentiation. Discussions with university and secondary students attending school in Kosovo and with their parents have been organized. The campaign for ideological-political differentiation has differed from one to another of these three opstinas, and it is judged that the best campaign has been conducted in Medvedja, then in Bujanovac, and the worst in Presevo. Incidentally, so far 43 members have been expelled from the League of Communists, 15 have been punished with a last warning, and 4 were issued a warning in connection with the events in Kosovo.

Analysis of Changes in Migration

However, there is still a certain exclusiveness, silence, leniency, a fear of reporting things, an opportunistic and passive behavior on the part of individuals, indeed of organizations of the League of Communists, and even of certain leaders in the opstinas. It has been pointed out that an opportunistic attitude must not be tolerated on behalf of "preserving personnel."

This year's enrollment of students from these opstinas at Pristina University was subject to the consent of the opstinas, and the scholarships of certain scholarship holders who participated in the demonstrations were terminated. It was noted that enrollment of students from these opstinas at Zagreb University has increased, though university schools in Skopje, Nis and Belgrade are much closer. It was also noted that over the last 2 or 3 months there have been considerably fewer statements by Serbian nationalists, which were especially evident immediately after the demonstrations in Kosovo. During the discussion the question was raised of demographic and migrational changes in these opstinas, which, it seems, are not following an altogether natural pattern. Quite a bit was also said about the use of textbooks in Albanian, which will soon be a topic of discussion in the Education Section of the Serbian Republic Conference of the SAWP. Especially responsible tasks lie ahead in exposing the intensified hostile propaganda from Albania, particularly after the Congress of the Albanian Workers Party, which did not just happen to coincide with new hostile actions.

ACTION OF CATHOLIC, ORTHODOX CHURCHES ABROAD CRITICIZED

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 8 Nov 81 p 6

[Article by Momcilo Djorgovic: "What Does the Clergy Want: Who Else Are the Church Bells Tolling For"]

[Text] Perhaps this is just an anecdote, but, knowing how enterprising the clergy is, it may perhaps be true. Not long ago, then, the youth organization in one of our villages bought its president a motorcycle which broke down after 1 year. It was purchased by a local priest, who repaired it and organized a course in riding a motorcycle. This case demonstrates how the churches use every means, even altogether profane means, in their patient and persistent efforts to win over sympathizers.

The following opinion was expressed at a recent meeting concerning the activity of religious communities: "Before the war the church operated from positions of power, and we fought for every man. Today the situation is the reverse." The extent to which the situation has been "reversed" is perhaps best demonstrated by the case of Yugoslavs employed abroad temporarily. There our religious communities, the Catholic community especially, have "tackled" every kind of nonchurch activity which makes it possible to bring our people together. Clubs and folklore and athletic groups are organized, there are programs for children and young people, there are large group pilgrimages, and "knowledge" tournaments are organized. And all these forms of activity often function much better than the programs set up by our official agencies.

Missions, But What Kind?

We have finally decided to reflect a bit on this activity of Yugoslav religious communities abroad, which has gone on for several years, and to say a few words about it. In the past 2 weeks a meeting has been held on this topic in the Socialist Alliance, and then the Federal Social Council for International Social Relations also met. The data on the activity of religious communities to date are incomplete, but sufficient. Unless the statistician is mistaken in the datum that 65 percent of the children of Yugoslav workers in West Germany are receiving instruction in nonschool and school institutions organized by churches from the SFRY, then the data are in fact alarming.

The Catholic Church from SR [Socialist Republic] Croatia and SR Bosnia-Hercegovina has about 250 priests in overseas countries, 161 priests in western Europe, and 164 social workers and parish assistants working in 470 cities. The greatest concentration is in West Germany. The Catholic Church from SR Slovenia has 300 priests in overseas countries, 200 of whom are political emigres; and in western Europe there are 36 priests and social workers at work.

The activity of the Serbian Orthodox Church is most intense in overseas countries, especially in the United States and Canada, where along with 3 bishops there are also 95 church school districts with 80 priests and 56 church school districts with 40 priests of the dissident Dyonisian Episcopate. In the West European Episcopate there are 53 parishes with 30 priests. To be sure, we should stress that the leadership of the Serbian Orthodox Church has at times distanced itself from the hostile activity of Orthodox priests abroad--which by no means is the case of the leadership of the Croatian Catholic Church.

The Religious Aspect and the Ethnic Aspect

Since we are an open society, and this was pointed out at the meetings we have mentioned, we certainly cannot by definition be opposed to missions and religious activity of churches from the SFRY abroad. Aside from that, the political situation in the world--which is full of tension, constant exacerbations, dangerous crises and dangerously opposed interests--is mobilizing the churches to become involved on the international scene in pacifying and avoiding military conflagrations. Yet there are also other kinds of involvement, commitments which we can freely refer to as inflammatory: connections with the political underground, which is particularly unwelcome for us when it involves an "embrace" with Ustasha and Chetnik leaders and organizations. Hoping to undermine the "communist regime" in Yugoslavia by establishing ties with the political emigre community, the churches in this case are actually favoring all the clandestine and public destabilizing factors on the world scene.

Nevertheless, the circles which have advanced the furthest in this kind of involvement in their various ways and to varying degrees are those associated with the Croatian Catholic Church. This kind of behavior logically follows from statements like this and many similar ones: "Trust between self-management socialism and religious communities and the churches--and this will not come about soon--necessitates a new historical period."

The "new historical period" is being persistently and patiently prepared in various ways even outside the borders of our country. Hostile indoctrination among our citizens abroad and emigres is being carried on constantly, cleverly and perfidiously--throughout all aspects of group and individual life. Clerical circles of the Croatian Catholic Church are claiming more and more openly that they are the legitimate leaders of the nationality in maintaining ethnic awareness and in "national liberation," and in so doing they firmly link the religious aspect to the ethnic aspect in all their statements.

The subversive and hostile activity of the churches cannot be combated by measures of the government. That would not be in the spirit of our system. A broad political campaign is needed, one in which religious people themselves would be involved, one that would not infringe upon their religious sentiments. In the meeting of the Federal Social Council for International Relations we were even to hear harshly intoned criticism addressed to the Socialist Alliance. It was stated that this our organization with the largest membership has not displayed the best response to the offensive of the clergy either in its methods or in the breadth of its action. The liturgy concerning the "new historical period," which is supposed to be inaugurated cloaked in a cassock, needs to be exposed in political terms and with sound arguments. A finger must be pointed at the malicious interests, interests altogether alien to our people, which are concealed behind the politically tainted ringing of the church bells.

ORTHODOX CHURCH PAPER DEFENDS 'BROTHERHOOD' MOVEMENT

Belgrade PRAVOSLAVLJE in Serbo-Croatian 15 Oct 81 p 13

[Article by Atanasije Jevtic, Orthodox monk: "What Is Darkness? or: On the Attacks Against Orthodox Zealots"]

[Text] When in the last century Vuk Karadzic was translating the New Testament into Serbian, this is how he translated Christ's well-known words about true believers in the Gospel according to Saint John (John 4:23): "But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true zealots shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such zealots."

Certainly Vuk did not invent the expression "zealots," but rather it came into being with the Serbian people, since there were Serbian Orthodox zealots who at precisely that time, at approximately the time of the "Hungarian revolt," began to make themselves more vigorously evident in our people in the form of the "movement of the pious": "Groups (brotherhoods) of zealots made their appearance; they broke out as swollen sources of our concealed, but still unextinguished piety.... This was a religious-moral rebirth on a purely Orthodox basis, and it came from below, from the people." That is the testimony concerning our zealots given by calmer spirits from times when there was no lack of attacks on the zealots and on the movement of zealots in our people.

After the hardships of World War I, when the movement of the zealots suddenly grew and numerous brotherhoods--Christian communities, were created, once again, along with the inevitable criticism and attacks, there were sober assessments and evaluations of the movement of the zealots and of the brotherhoods of zealots in the Serbian Church by outstanding figures of that time (Jovan Vuckovic, Milos Andjelkovic, Bishop Nikolaj Velimirovic, Justin Popovic, Stevan Dimitrijevic, who was dean of the School of Theology, Ilija Beleslijan, Damaskin Grdancki, and others). Thus the history and character of the movement of the zealots in our country is well known, just as the criticism and objections which had been made to it, which are still being made to it today, or which might be made to it, are well known. The zealots themselves, though they have striven and do strive to remain [(?) survive], in an endeavor to be closer to that ideal of Christ's concerning the true believers, know that they are neither infallible nor perfect. After all, the earthly paradise is far off, but earth is not hell either.

But Vuk's times have passed, and the times of the "Hungarian revolt" have passed, as have the hardships of World War I and World War II, in which even the true zealots--not without sin or fault, but not as "zealot-criminals" either (since there truly is no connection whatsoever between the one and the other)--suffered and suffered again for their faith and their piety, especially in Bosnia, where even now they are under the fiercest attack. The times have also passed of the postwar movement of the zealots when they stood apart and suffered for their faith and loyalty to Christ and to the Church, loyalty to their Orthodox faith as such, to their glorious and not "dark" tradition, to their Serbian national piety and church spirit. If there was someone who did not like that, or if someone does not like it today--there is plenty of room for him to speak, write and do what he likes against the honorable and peaceable Serbian Orthodox zealots.

We who are not zealots like them, who have not come from families or brotherhoods of zealots, see and know their human weaknesses, but we would be blind and unconscionable if because of those weaknesses of theirs, which are incidentally those of humanity generally and are less than anyone else's, see in them only "darkness," "revival of darkness," "religious fanaticism," "religious and ethnic exclusiveness," "abuse of the faith," "meddling in politics," "obscurantist machinations," "fomenting religious intolerance," "all sorts of foul dealings," "very risky political escapades," "the blackest darkness," and so on and so forth, in short, as though, according to the folk poem, "darkness fell heavily on all of Kosovo...."

There is no point in enumerating here everything that has been said and written and the origin of such writings and statements which have been made over the last 1.5 months against our zealots (especially in the Sarajevo OSLOBODJENJE and the Belgrade POLITIKA). This has been and will remain documentation that can stand on its own and will also stand for future generations. There is a point, at least for us, in pointing up the fact that the very faith of these people has been attacked, and that means our faith as well. After all, if zealotry is "darkness," then the faith is also "darkness," and what is the point of the hypocrisy of not admitting this publicly both to ourselves and to everyone. Incidentally, we have long been accustomed to hear these and similar descriptions of the faith, beginning with the very classics of Marxism-Leninism, but nevertheless we will continue to prefer to stand by the "darkness" of the faith, just like our brethren the zealots. Perhaps that "darkness" helps us to see better what others are doing "in the light," as Boza Knezevic would say.

Practically every day in the press we are exposed to a "criticism of the faith"--presumably as a "prerequisite of any criticism," stating the kind of faith and the "measure of faith" that we and our zealots are supposed to conform to, even though this faith of ours is being spoken about and interpreted to us by those who have nothing in common with the faith at all. That is why we cannot fail to recall Dostoevsky's melancholy words: "They criticize me for my supposed unenlightened and reactionary faith in God!... Those who in their lack of belief only prove the limited nature of their view of the world want to teach me and laugh at how limited I am.... If I believe in God, it is not as a stupid person and fanatic that I do so."

In the outcry of slander against the Orthodox zealots, especially in eastern Bosnia, where some of them, together with their priests, have even been put in jail, the only thing being achieved is what has been shown and confirmed by age-old Christian experience (Second Timothy 3:12). That is why we are not protesting, since not even an explanation and protest of the Holy Synod of the Serbian Church has had any success, even though otherwise "relations are good with the religious communities." There is nothing for us to do but remain silent (as we remained silent when we were aware that Bishop Nikolaj, leader of the zealots, was not a "war criminal"). And also--to staunchly believe that the truth is nevertheless stronger than slander and falsehood. Otherwise how would we believe even in the faith itself?

'MOMENT OF TRUTH' IN EVOLUTION OF SELF-MANAGEMENT NOTED

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1607, 18 Oct 81 pp 12-13

[Article by Dr Muhamed Kesetovic]

[Text] This fall we face a moment of truth which has been in preparation and postponed for a long time. The very fact that it has taken so much time to achieve agreement in evaluating a notorious matter like our economic situation points up more important, serious and lasting problems in our domestic development. There can hardly be any doubt: all the achievements of the struggle of the working class expressed in socialist self-management are facing the test of time and their greatest trial.

For a long time now we have been witnesses of the potential conflict between two basic currents: that which has never accepted socialist self-management as a strategy and lasting commitment, but has seen it as an optional transient tactic, and that current which firmly believes in self-management. This potential conflict has grown to become a real one and could have fateful consequences. Everything is also occurring within the framework of the same movement, within the framework of the League of Communists, and indeed even within the limits of its forums.

By all appearances the forms of that conflict will very soon be manifested straightforwardly in the form of a confrontation concerning the system, its foundations, its specific solutions and practical actions on behalf of self-management.

A considerable portion of the forces which have taken up self-management as a tactic occupies important positions in the system itself, has organized itself and is aware of their interest, which is alienated from self-management. Overcoming this situation requires in turn a return to Marx and Lenin and to their admonition that the "greatest danger" to socialism "comes from its own bureaucracy."

The technobureaucratic way of thinking, which has today become a captive of the difficult economic situation--which in large part it itself created--is on the offensive.

Technocracy of the Balkan Type

At the heart of our concrete problems is a conflict between centers of political power and the technobureaucracy on the one hand and the working class on the other, that is, a conflict of republic-provincial, opstina, economic, SIZ [self-management community of interest] and other statism--with socialist self-management.

In many respects our political, government and economic bureaucracy differs from that in state capitalism and from that in statist socialism. However paradoxical it might seem, in both those social systems the technobureaucracy is more responsible and creative than ours for the simple reason that there it is not the owner of the means of production and is accountable to whoever does hold those resources in his hands. Our technobureaucracy, aside from the fact that it is Balkan (it does not have democratic traditions or the mentality of responsibility for the public good), occupies a more comfortable and different position which allows it irresponsibility and parasitism. That is, it makes decisions and squanders funds in the name of self-management, but it does not bear any consequences whatsoever. That is the key to the phenomenon of irresponsibility in our context.

The root and evolution of the present situation lies in the crisis which federal centralism and statism fell into in the early seventies. The change of the base of society in the production relation in which that crisis occurred did not sufficiently keep pace with the overcoming of that crisis.

The statist and group-ownership production relation became the material basis of the bourgeois ideal: the national state. The idea of statehood has spread even over the provinces, and indeed the opstinas as well. Edvard Kardelj warned that "we dare not treat equality and independence in a statist way, i.e., solely as a division of government jurisdictions. That is the method and approach of bourgeois nationalism."

When the basis of the nation becomes more the state and less self-management, then remnants of bourgeois society begin to sprout: nationalism, narrow-mindedness, exclusiveness, fabrication and magnification of differences, and so on. And beyond that where has this led?

The decentralization of federal statism has not been accompanied by any essential changes in production relations, and republic-provincial statisms have developed on those same foundations. Now these new statisms are once again reproducing federal statism, seeking from it solutions when they have been otherwise unable to find one.

Consequently, if one wishes to strengthen the constitutional status of the republics and provinces, then there must be a change in behavior, there must be a more profound change in socioeconomic relations, which will strengthen the constitutional status of associated labor, and only through that status the status of the nationality and ethnic minority as well, i.e., the status of the republics and provinces.

The squabbles with federal centralism and statism typical of the outset of this decade, gave way to direct conflicts of the eight centralisms and statisms with one another, bringing all the consequences we now confront.

Second, when a negative example (the trend of separatistic and petty bourgeois nationalism) became a model and was not resolved in time at the federal level, and above all in the League of Communists--the vanguard of the working class and of its historical interests contained in socialist self-management, the phase of an unbridled technobureaucracy ensued. And income-sharing relations, though they even be the most favorable, simultaneously unite and disunite, since even the market joins together and sets at odds in performance of its revolutionary role in development of the productive forces. That is why a vanguard which sees further and better is needed. That is why there is no greater danger than for the League of Communists to slip into a partial interest. This is the key issue in our present ideological situation. When the League of Communists does slip into a partial interest and identifies itself with it, it loses the attributes of the "collective thinker" of the working class. And the complexity of the interests of the working class is contradictory. That is why it needs a vanguard in protecting it against the danger that its immediate and partial interests will cloud over its lasting interest. That danger is all the greater the further the working class is from direct decisionmaking concerning the conditions and results of its work.

The republic-provincial and opstina mania for investment and spending, which were aimed at demonstrating the capability and vitality of a romanticism based on statehood and nationality, have seriously shaken the cohesive forces of our unity and society's objective capability for its own construction and development. A period came when a fetish was made of the movement of things (political factories, pretentious monuments, magnificent cultural centers, universities, academies and institutes, all this on a wave of spiritual disintegration), while the social relations of self-managers remained something which was still to be discussed in the appropriate studies. This is most eloquently indicated by the disturbing frequency with which the self-management rights of the working people have been violated, which has even taken on the proportions of a problem of respect for the constitution.

The material basis and trend of development have thrown up to the surface people who are "obedient," people of mediocre or even lower ability, people who in the face of the "great" technobureaucratic eminences fell into a blindness in which the danger to "their own" nationality, "their own" republic or province, was measured by repulsion and resistance toward others. The failure to reach agreement, the failure to implement what was agreed on, the reduction of the general and common interest to a fabricated abstraction, are only the other side of the same problem.

And both objectively and subjectively there was a race to be the first to wave the red flag in front of the bull--"if the other fellow can do without me, I can also do without him." This created a particularly difficult situation with the population, encouraged nationalists and cleronationalists and all other stripes of enemies of socialist federal Yugoslavia and of its nationalities and ethnic minorities.

Responsibility of "Those Who Deserve Most of the Credit"

Given the difficulties and problems we now confront, various saviors have been emerging at the present moment, among them the better educated and probably more able technobureaucrats, who, criticizing the system, are actually criticizing technobureaucratic practice for inefficiency and failures, since those who up to now have been the "creators" were not capable of "predictions" and of building a "purer" technocratic model. In so doing they make use of the falsehood that the source of the troubles lies in the "Kardeljization" of the system, overlooking that it is the technocratic, "de-Kardeljized" practice that has prevented the application and verification of the system.

The removal of the working class from decisions on investment projects and on expenditure in general, the confinement of expanded reproduction to a zone in which decisions are made by technobureaucratic centers, has also removed social policy as a whole away from self-management, and to that extent it has deprived it of its class essence and meaning.

The working class has no motivation to put up with the shortages and restrictions and to respond to appeals for a linear tightening of the belt, yet the condition of society at this moment requires this without delay. There is obviously a need for an extensive prior Marxist critical analysis of the road that has been traveled, of successes and achievements, but also of failures and oversights, and on that basis there has to be a search for our lasting commitments (LCY Program) and solutions, and a need to discover room for large new advances.

It is not out of the question to anticipate a logical reaction by the working class in this situation in this sequence: responsibility of those who "deserve most of the credit" for the present situation; guarantees that commitment to overcoming the present economic situation will alter the social and class--self-management status of that part of society which creates the original material and spiritual values.

Indeed there is no more complete and successful self-management on the disrupted flows of reproduction, but likewise there is no straightening out of those flows unless there is a more thoroughgoing and complete self-management. We are not referring here to the myth of self-management, but to a comprehensive action, an action not confined to economic aspects alone. It is a question of a program from which the workingman will know why he is fighting and how much that commitment of his is worth. The situation we are in at the moment requires such a program, and it would not be a good thing for much time to pass without arriving at a unified assessment concerning the need for such a program.

It is true that in the recent past we have managed to overcome even incomparably greater difficulties through the will, unity and belief of the working class and all our nationalities and ethnic minorities, and in the recent past we have said and written a great deal about this. All of that was possible because it was based on the belief that what was being gained was greater than any sacrifices. Those great experiences of ours, those inspirations and lessons will, of course, be repeated under the same conditions, which necessitates a clear and strong program, a program of the times and of the passing moment. In practical terms this means that the working class will certainly take upon itself the burden of economic stabilization insofar as it is assured that by achieving stabilization it will be improving its own material and social position. Put still more simply, it means that our society and system are confronted with the necessity of resolute achievement of what has been set down in the constitution, the Law on Associated Labor, and the decisions of the LCY Congress.

The entirety and the seriousness of our situation make it imperative that we reflect about the need for a program of strategy and action. We are not referring to a program based on economism and planning (which must, of course, exist), but of a program of social action, a program for the new stage of development. Drafting it cannot be the concern of narrow circles and self-qualifying politicians and revolutionaries. This program must ultimately be the result of a general discussion and agreement by the party, the working class and the people. It must present to the working class and all our nationalities and ethnic minorities a precise and clear conception of our material strength and capability, of our human potential and of self-management creativity. It must be the program of society and of the revolution in the next stage, which presupposes involvement of all the various aspects of the country's potential--scientists, experts, practitioners, of experts along with politicians. How and to what extent are these aspects of the potential to be used effectively in the present situation, to what extent are they being used, what results are they yielding, what sort of results could they yield under other conditions and circumstances, what are those conditions, and how are they to be created? That would be the basis for a creative tightening of the link which pulls the chain, the basis for responsibility and trust.

Even abroad the approach to our situation in assessments and expectations is from the standpoint of the outcome of the conflict between socialist self-management and statism, and that then determines the overall domestic and foreign position and social developments within Yugoslavia.

In conclusion, if we take as our point of departure the social and class dimension of our present situation, then the starting point must be trust. Throughout the world the crisis of systems is essentially a crisis of confidence. More and more attempts are being made to find ways out of that crisis on waves of self-management. We have that, but confidence is shaken. This has occurred in our system because of the lag and deformation of self-management, which at the same time indicates the directions of the way out. This is our obligation to our revolution, but also to progressive and revolutionary developments in the world. If this crisis situation of ours were to become still more acute, this would discourage our friends, it would greatly encourage reactionary forces in the world, including the forces of the hostile emigre community which are turned against Yugoslavia.

BAKALI LC EXPULSION URGED--On the basis of the report of the commission of the presidium of the LC Central Committee of Sergia and of the LC Provincial Committee of Kosovo which established the party responsibility of Mahmut Bakali, there are entirely convincing and well-argued proofs for his expulsion from the LC. Considering the fact that despite all this Mahmut Bakali has not been expelled from the LC, it is entirely logical in this connection to ask: In addition to the irrefutable facts which the commission has already established, what kind of other evidence is still needed to prove that Mahmut Bakali should be expelled from the LC?! Does not this example eloquently attest to the fact that even more irresponsible action and conduct by LC members are stimulated by such an opportunistic attitude? Is this not an expression of privilege associated with the high position of Mahmut Bakali as president of the Kosovo LC Provincial Committee and member of the Presidium of the LCY Central Committee which was reflected in the mild criteria used in establishing the level of his responsibility compared to that of other LC members who are being expelled from the LC for incomparably less serious omissions and mistakes? Is it moral, honest, and in the spirit of the LCY Statute that less responsibility? ASLLANI ADDRESSES ANNIVERSARY MEETING IN TIRANA

AU282035 Tirana Domestic Service in Albanian 1900 GMT 28 Nov 81

[Summary] A solemn meeting was held this afternoon in Tirana to mark the 69th anniversary of the proclamation of Albania's independence and the 37th anniversary of Albania's liberation. The meeting was organized jointly by the AWP Central Committee, the Council of Ministers of the People's Socialist Republic of Albania, the General Council of the democratic front and the Tirana District AWP Committee at the Theater and Opera Palace.

The meeting was attended by vanguard workers of production and work centers, sociocultural institutions and central departments, war veterans, members of families of war martyrs and others. The meeting was also attended by AWP Politburo members Adil Carcani, Simon Stefani and Muho Asllani; Haxhi Lleshi, chairman of the Presidium of the People's Assembly; members of the AWP Central Committee, the Presidium of the People's Assembly and the government.

The meeting was declared open by Gaqo Nesho, Tirana District AWP Committee first secretary. The speech on the occasion was delivered by AWP Politburo member Muho Asllani. He said that the 28 and 29 November holidays were again being celebrated by the party and people in an atmosphere of high revolutionary optimism and with considerable successes on the production front. He stressed that the Albanian people have blazed their path in history with the sword, defending their freedom and independence against numerous enemies. Great successes have been achieved and great transformations have taken place during the past 37 years of Albania's free life under the leadership of the party. "The country is seeing the crises, unemployment, inflation, corruption, rising prices and other phenomena corroding the bourgeois and revisionist world." The people are building a happy life for themselves and are ready to defend it at all times, "relying constantly on the great Marxist-Leninist principle of self-reliance."

After speaking about some problems of the international situation, Comrade Muho Asllani said that "the AWP has waged and will continue to wage a determined, principled and consistent struggle to unmask modern revisionism of all hues, in defense of Marxism-Leninism, the revolution and socialism. This historic struggle, which has found and continues to find a brilliant reflection in Comrade Enver Hoxha's works, constitutes a contribution by our party to the common heritage of Marxism-Leninism." Comrade Muho Asllani then dwelt on the directives of the 8th AWP Congress and the magnificent prospects it opens up for the country, stressing that all the plans will be fulfilled "with no credits or aid whatsoever from anywhere."

After the speech, an artistic program was performed for those present.

SUPERPOWERS' 'NUCLEAR BLACKMAIL' CRITICIZED

AU211759 Tirana ATA in English 1730 GMT 21 Nov 81

["Atomic Blackmail by Superpowers in Europe"--ATA headline]

[Text] Tirana, 21 Nov (ATA)--The aggravation of contradictions between the U.S.A. and the Soviet Union has considerably increased the tension also in our continent, the newspaper ZERI I POPULLIT writes in an article. The situation has been aggravated among the others by the new threats by Reagan to wage a limited atomic war in the European territory as well as by those of Brezhnev for an unlimited nuclear conflict.

Naturally, the newspaper writes, this is not the first time that U.S. imperialist and Soviet social-imperialism threaten Europe with a new war. The conventional weapons that they have deployed on the two sides of Europe are not the only means of threat and war. But now, contrary to other times, the stress is being laid on the use of mass extermination atomic weapons.

After exposing the falsity of the clamorous promises made for years on end by the Americans and Soviets that allegedly they will never use nuclear weapons, the newspaper writes that the deployment of nuclear warhead missiles by the U.S. imperialists and the Soviet social-imperialists in Europe and the strengthening of the atomic potential of NATO and the Warsaw Treaty have increased still more the possibilities of transforming Europe into an atomic testing ground. In the meantime, the aggravation of the general crisis of capitalism and of the inter-imperialist rivalries, in the first place between the two superpowers, made the situation of uncertainty precipitate further, carrying with itself the fevers of atomic war.

In order to justify themselves before the world public opinion for the grave situation they have created and which is fraught with the danger of war, the superpowers shift the blame on each other, the newspaper writes further on, underlining that this is a known fraudulent tactic of the enslaving policy of the superpowers.

The atomic blackmail against Europe, the newspaper underlines, is exerted by the two superpowers to reinforce their present diplomatic offensive so as to weaken and subjugate the European allies. They in Washington know well that a united and politically independent Europe, as the big European capital claims to do it, may become one day a more recalcitrant partner for them than a Europe full of U.S. atomic bombs. Likewise, the Soviet Union through the atomic blackmail is trying to establish "order" in the "socialist community," already corroded by numerous crises and contradictions, to which the "Polish crisis" has been added.

By further intensifying this diplomatic offensive, accompanied with an uninterrupted atomic threat, the two superpowers aim at hitting the European countries and at spreading the illusion that at present they have no other way out, except for the acceptance of the U.S. and Soviet atomic umbrellas.

But this blackmail may intimidate only those who live under the shadow of the Americans and the Soviets, but not the peoples of the old continent, who know not only how to fight with determination and courage, but also how to win over their imperialist and revisionist enemies.

The peoples in various countries of the world are enhancing their national political consciousness in order not to allow their countries in the mercy of imperialist superpowers. The numerous manifestations organised in several European countries recently against the deployment of the new U.S. missiles in Europe and against the danger of war, are another proof of the determination of these peoples to oppose the aggressive policy of U.S. imperialism and Soviet social-imperialism.

AWP ORGAN OUTLINES FAILURE OF SOVIET ECONOMY

AU252123 Tirana ZERI I POPULLIT in Albanian 19 Nov 81 p 4

[ATA article: "Admission of Insurmountable Failures and Difficulties in the Critical Soviet Economy"]

[Excerpts] Moscow. 18 November: According to TASS, a plenum of the Soviet Revisionist Party's Central Committee was held recently to discuss the country's economic problems. Brezhnev's speech at the plenum was in fact an admission of the impasse in which the Soviet economy, relodged on capitalism's rails, has found itself for some time. He mentioned, among other things, the "great damage in agriculture and in the whole economy for 3 consecutive years." He indirectly admitted the stagnant situation in industry, expressed his "regrets" about the irregular food supplies to the people, the lack of major food items, especially meat, milk and dairy products. Similar admissions were heard in the recent session of the Soviet Union's Soviet Supreme in Moscow, which, according to [TASS] "began its proceedings with a difficult task: to find economic solutions to get the country out of its crisis."

These bitter admissions prove that the stale demagogy, which was not lacking even in the above-mentioned meetings, cannot hide the reality of the deep crisis the Soviet economy is experiencing. Failures and difficulties in a number of important economic branches have become more prominent this year.

The capitalist road of development has led the Soviet economy directly into crisis. The symptoms of this crisis have been manifest for some time, but at the end of the seventies and beginning of the eighties the Soviet capitalist economy was completely engulfed in a crisis and insurmountable difficulties.

Soviet agriculture is especially engulfed in a deep and insurmoutable crisis. Brezhnev was obliged to admit that 1981 was "a year of weak grain production" and he once again attempted to blame this situation on "bad weather." But the facts reveal that the critical agricultural situation has been this way for years and there is no sign of improvement. Gross agricultural production fell by 3.8 percent in the last 2 years. For the fourth consecutive year, grain production fell by about 60 million tons, which sets a record dating from 1975. There has also been a drop in the production of meat, milk and other livestock products. According to facts, the per capita meat consumption remains at the 1975 level and that of milk has fallen below that level. There is a chronic lack of necessary items, the black market is thriving and prices are continually rising in an open or disguised way.

According to the foreign press, there are systematic price rises in retail goods in the Soviet Union and inflation is about 15-20 percent per year. The Soviet bourgeoisie uses this as a means to realize its redistribution of income and to raise the level of the broad working masses' exploitation in order to increase its own profits.

The disease of the Soviet economy is incurable because it is nurtured by the continual decay of the ruling state monopoly capitalism of the Soviet Union. The phenomena of this crisis are becoming sharper in the midst of the feverish militarization of the economy, which swallows one-third of the national income. Speaking about "factors" which influence the economic situation in the Soviet Union, Brezhnev also mentioned the "complication of the international situation" and let it be clearly understood that the militarist course will be intensified in the future, including the arms race, which serves the Soviet social imperialists' aggressive and expansionist plans. All this shows that even more difficult times await the Soviet economy.

LEADERS ATTEND LEZHE-SHKODER RAILROAD OPENING

AU242013 Tirana ATA in English 0900 GMT 23 Nov 81

[Text] Tirana, 23 Nov (ATA)—Yesterday, the eve of the 40th anniversary of the founding of the LYUA [Union of Working Youth of Albania] Organization, Lezhe-Shkoder railway line was inaugurated.

The member of the Political Bureau and secretary of the Central Committee of the party, Simon Stefani, the alternate members of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the party, Besnik Bekteshi and Qirjako Mihali, the vice-president of the Presidium of the People's Assembly of the PSR of Albania Spiro Koleka, the minister of communications, Luan Babameto, the first secretary of the Central Committee of the LYUA, Lumturi Rexha and others had come also to take part in that nice celebration of the inauguration.

Amidst applauses and cheers for the party and Comrade Enver Hoxha, Comrade Simon Stefani cut the ribbon of inauguration.

In the square in front of the Shkodra railway station, a rally was organised. Besnik Bekteshi greeted on behalf of the Central Committee of the party, the Council of Ministers and the beloved leader of our party and people, Comrade Enver Hoxha personally.

The tasks the party has entrusted to our youth for the construction of the railway lines, he said among the other things, have been constantly honourably carried out and in the set time-limits, and precisely in this jubilee year, only 7 months after the inauguration of Lac-Lezhe railway line, we gathered again to inaugurate the Lezhe-Shkoder railway line.

About 7,000 volunteers form various districts of the country poured off their sweat and toil for the setting up of this railway line. Other still greater projects he said further on lie in store for us.

The 7th 5-year plan adopted by the ith congress of the party [word indistinct] congress adopted, open brilliant prospects to the flourishing and progress of our party.

The party has full and firm confidence in our heroic, loyal, wise and gold handed youth. The youth has carried out with honour everything the party has entrusted to it. It will always come out victorious even in the other important works and undertakings of the 7th 5-year plan in implementing the decisions adopted by the historic 8th congress of the party, such as the conclusion of the railway line from Shkodra to Hani i Hotit (border), of Fier-Vlore railway line and the other actions the party will entrust to it.

May these undertakings, too, Besnik Bekteshi said in conclusion, become a new expression of socialist patriotism, of the revolutionary spirit, and firm determination of our wonderful youth and its loyalty to the line of the party and the teachings of Comrade Enver Hoxha.

On behalf of the Central Committee of the LYUA the secretary of the Central Committee of the LYUA, Etemije Zeneli, greeted.

Spiro Koleka procliamed the brigades and individuals decorated with different orders and medals accorded by the Presidium of the People's Assembly.

The letter of the representatives of the 137 brigades of volunteers and veterans of the first undertakings of the youth addressed to the first secretary of the Central Committee of the PLA, Comrade Enver Hoxha, was read out at the rally. [Passage indistinct]

Amidst the enthusiasm and applause of those present, the alternate member of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the party Foto Cami read out the message of greetings that the beloved leader of our party and people Comrade Enver Hoxha has addressed to the younger generation of Albania on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the founding of the LYUA.

A speech on the occasion was delivered by the first secretary of the Central Committee of the LYUA, Lumturi Rexha.

Enver Hoxha Congratulates Organization

AU241730 Tirana ATA in English 0700 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Text] Tirana, 24 Nov (ATA)--On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Organization of the Albanian Communist Youth (today the Labour Youth Union of Albania), Comrade Enver Hoxha had addressed a message of greetings to the Central Committee of the Labour Youth Union of Albania, which reads among others:

It is a special joy for me today to convey to you, representatives of the younger generation and, through you, to all the youth of our country, the ardent greetings and the best wishes of the Party of Labour of Albania, its Central Committee and my own, on the occasion of the anniversary of the founding of your militant organisations. Some 40 years are completed today from 23 November 1941, when, on the instruction of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Albania, I had the honour to participate in the founding of the Organisation of the Albanian Communist Youth, loyal auxiliary of our party. Therefore, today, I am with my heart and mind amongst you in your great joy.

After writing about the contribution made by the Albanian youth during the last 4 decades, both in the great struggle for the liberation of the homeland and later on in the reconstruction of the country destroyed by the foreign occupiers and the construction of socialism, the message of greetings says that the party and the people are proud of the sons and daughters of our country, who, gathered in the Labour Youth Union of Albania, forge ahead resolutely on the road of the party, which is the road of socialism, the road of prgress and all-round strengthening of our beloved homeland.

The 8th congress of the party concluded its proceedings only a few days ago, the message of greetings reads further on. It was a great assembly which defined the tasks and endorsed a magnificent program for the development of our country in the future. The proceedings of the congress were characterized by a feeling of responsibility towards the people and the cause of socialism, the unity of the ranks of the party and loyalty to Marxism-Leninism, the penetrating ideopolitical and scientific analysis of the questions discussed.

Pointing out the great mobilization of the working masses in Albania to carry into life the decisions of the 8th congress of the PLA [Albanian Workers' Party], the message of greetings reads: One feels a great joy when he sees that, just as always, the creative activity and the selfless work of our heroic youth stand out, first and foremost, in this all-round mobilisation. You, comrades of youth, with your innovative and offensive spirit, with your militant drive and optimism, stand on the forefront of the advanced initiatives and actions being undertaken everywhere to turn into reality the tasks the party set at this congress.

As always, you are characterized by your vigorous action in the carrying out of the tasks, by your irreconcilability with routine, bureaucracy and sluggishness at work.

I express the conviction that, in particular, you comrades of youth, by assimilating more profoundly the teachings of the party, for which you nurture a boundless love, will study more persistently so as to ever better master the sciences in all the fields. In this way you will better serve to the homeland and the people, who, under the leadership of the party, are rearing and educating you with great care.

The active participation in the struggle for the construction of socialism and the strengthening of the defence of the homeland, the work to uninterruptedly increase the level of knowledge and culture, are tested roads that our youth temper itself with the Marxist-Leninist ideology of the party, with the love for the people and socialism, that it be always unflinching in the class struggle against the imperialist and revisionist enemies, against any alien manifestation and remnant which hinders us from our forward march toward the communist future.

Since the period of the anti-fascist national-liberation war and constantly the party has charged the youth with tasks of great responsibility and in all directions and it, no matter how difficult they have been, has always carried them out through to the end displaying great devotion to the people and the homeland. The party is proud of this and I congratulate and thank you in its name and, at the same time, express the firm conviction that our glorious youth, to which socialism has ensured a happy life, the guarantee for the present and the brilliant future, keeping always aloft the triumphant banner of the Party of Labour, will intrepidly and proudly forge ahead on the same road, the message of greetings reads in conclusion.

SYNODS DISCUSS 'SOCIAL PEACE SERVICE', CHURCH UNIFICATION

'Social Peace Service'

Frankfurt/Main FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 10 Nov 81 p 6

['epd' report, datelined Berlin, 6 November: "Five GDR Land Churches Support Demand for 'Social Peace Service'--Young People Admonished To Be Patient With State --Synod Conferences in Dessau, Goerlitz, Halle, Schwerin and Zuessow"]

[Text] In separate consultations this weekend, 5 of the 8 Land protestant churches in the DGR expressed their support for a "social peace service" to be introduced alongside existing military service and the unarmed construction units of the GDR Peoples Army. Some 4,000 persons appealed to the synods of the Land churches and the Church League of the GDR in petitions seeking support for this demand. As the Saxon Land synod had done earlier, the provincial synods of Saxony, Anhalt, Goerlitz, Greifswald and Mecklenburg now asserted in letters to the young people, that through resolutions concerning the church's responsibility for peace, passed by the synods of the GDR Church League in September, that they considered the peace declaration to represent their own view.

The large number of signatures to the petitions was seen by the Saxon provincial snyods as "a sign against resignation". They encouraged the mostly young signatories not to abandon hope, even if their demand is not met in the foreseeable future. To this point it was stated in the unanimously approved document of the synod, "Show that your will to peace extends further than its present possibility for fulfillment." In addition, it asked the young people to prepare themselves for a six-month term of social service even before a final decision is made concerning the introduction of an "alternative" to military service. In its decision the Goerlitz synod stated that the credibility of such a will to peace would be all the greater "if there were an attempt even now to find further opportunities for social service". The synod of the Greifswald Land church, which convened in Zuessow, expressed the hope that the legally recognized alternative service in the construction units of the GDR army would not generate handicaps for participants. The synods jointly expressed the wish that church leaders, in discussions with state authorities, continue to seek opportunities that would relate to the concerns of young people, even though the state had until now taken a generally negative attitude.

The proposed plan for the phased merger of the 8 protestant Land churches and their 3 parent organizations into a single "united Church" in the GDR, found widespread approval at the synodal conventions in Dessau, Goerlitz, Halle, Schwerin and Zuessow. The two draft resolutions which had been presented by the Synodal Federation, describing on the one hand the step-by-step merger process and on the other the modifications to the federation constitution, were accepted by the synods. In an appended statement, some of the synods expressed their particular wishes for the process of church unification and the form of the proposed federative community.

In line with the synods' own declaration concerning the threats to peace and their support for the introduction of an alternative to military service, there was unanimous concern expressed regarding the continued armaments race and the increasing militarization of GDR society. The provincial Saxon and Mecklenburg synods were particularly distressed at the intensified civil defense exercises in the GDR which frequently extended over whole localities and urban districts. The members of the synods viewed these exercises, which include even children in the first grade of school, as posing the danger of "playing down a possible nuclear war". The members of the Schwerin synod stated, "We know today that there is no effective protection for human life in a war carried on with nuclear weapons." The Halle synod pointed out that "on the one hand fear is provoked, while on the other hand people are being made accustomed to the idea of a possible war".

The members of the Halle synod stated particularly strong objections to the concept of securing peace through military means. In their peace resolution they urged, "a carefully planned preliminary movement toward disarmament, jointly agreed upon with our allies, (e.g. reduction of the number of SS-20 rockets)" and for "defensive, low-threat security systems (e.g. reduction of the numerical superiority in tanks) and in favor of a new basis for trust in Europe from our side out..

Like the Magdeburg church authorities earlier in their annual report, the provincial Saxon synod expressed its concern "that understanding and reconciliation with the Polish people is again threatening to dreak down". In a position paper, it characterized as "very disturbing" the manner in which events in Poland were being portrayed in the GDR media "because they threaten to generate the image of an enemy". For this reason all existing connections should be maintained and not abandoned thoughtlessly. In a unanimously supported letter to the congregations of the church province, the synod expressed its concern "that the tendencies to condescension and generalizations on Poland can be put forward and accepted by Christians so thoughtlessly".

Concerning the equality of opportunities for Christian pupils in state educational institutions, the Halle synod called to mind once again the discussion of the Church League with GDR chairman of the council of ministers, Honecker, on 6 Mar 78, in which "equal rights and equal respect for all citizens" was assured. The synod failed to understand why "serious breaches of (this assurance) still occur". During the convention in Halle, it was reported that a girl pupil in the 11th grade of the comprehensive high school in Bitterfeld, who had been baptized at the beginning of November, was summoned to a conference by the school authorities and urged to submit a request for dismissal from school. To help prevent such incidents, which are contrary to the expressed policy of the state, the synod demanded a clear declaration from the government "by which teachers, parents and pupils could abide".

Church Unification

Frankfurt/Main FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 21 Oct 81 p 5

['epd' report, datelined Dresden, 20 October: "GDR Churches Intend To Preserve Old Ties--Reorganization Before Dresden Synod--Concerns About Militarization]

[Text] Land bishop Hempel gave assurances today at the meeting of the Saxon synod in Dresden that the protestant churches in the GDR, in the event their planned merger should become reality, would maintain their contacts to sister churches in the FRG. These contacts, he said on Monday evening, could only be broken off "under compulsion". This position had been repeatedly expressed to representatives of the state. In the bishop's words, the relationships between the churches in the two countries have become "more matured and more partnerlike", and are concentrated increasingly upon objective tasks. They are "relationships of complete trust", said Hempel.

The central focus of the synod's third day of consultations was the merger of the 8 regional protestant churches in the GDR into one "united church". Two documents on this isuue were up for discussion, one of them a "joint resolution" in which the several steps on the way to the merger were described, plus the draft of a church statute for changes in the constitution of the previous "League of Protestant Churches in the GDR". Both texts had to be approved by all synods by a two-thirds majority before they could come into force. With the consultations in Dresden, the Saxon provincial synod had begun the complex process of decision which should be completed by the end of this year.

During the controversial discussions in Dresden, the argument was repeatedly brought forward that the planned merger would not create a simpler, more transparent ecclesiastical structure, but rather a more complex and cumbersome one. The present proposals gave only scant evidence of what had been formulated in 1979. The present product of the discussions was said to represent an "alienation from the church rank and file". Concern was also voiced that the denominational basis of the merger was still not clarified.

Over the weekend the synod discussed the almost 800 petitions of more than 2000 young Christians seeking support for a "social peace service" as a civilian alternative to military service in the GDR army. All speakers supported the concept.

Some critical comments were also aimed at the young Christians. Despite all agreement with the cause of the initiators of the "social peace service", it would have to be recognized that the number of persons obligated for military service choosing unarmed service in the construction units of the GDR Peoples Army, now numbering about 400 to 500, is not exactly large. Land bishop Hempel stated that the credibility of the church's peace committment would suffer if it were directed to a greater individual need for freedom.

In the public debate several church representatives expressed concern over the increasing militarization of further areas of GDR society. There were repeated reports of large scale civil defense exercises which have recently included whole towns or urban districts of larger GDR cities. In these instances what is being exercised is not defense in the event of an outbreak of hostilities, but rather behavior in the event of a nuclear attack. Concern over the increasing militarization of public life and the creation of an image of the enemy, as remarked at the synod, was shared by a large part of the population even though not always vocalized.

The protestant churches in the GDR were continuing to strive, said Hempel, for a discussion with the Ministry of Education concerning the problems of young Christians in state educational institutions. Such a discussion had not yet come to pass. Hempel stated that with respect to the problems of "communist education", there were "difficulties that are to me inexplicable" to be found from the side of the state authorities. Yet the impression had been gained during the conversation of the synodal federation with the secretary of ecclesiastical affairs, that "the modalities for the execution of such a concept would now have to be prepared with more precision".

CONSCRIPT' POLITICAL TRAINING IN PEOPLE'S ARMY DESCRIBED

Budapest PROPAGANDISTA in Hungarian No 4, 1981 pp 175-182

[Article by Antal Nemeth: "Political Education of Draftee's in the Hungarian Army]

[Text] The Hungarian People's Army was born and developed together with our new socialist social system. Our army was created to defend and increase our socialist achievements and together with the brotherly armies assure the conditions of peaceful creative work. The past three and one-half decades have shown that the Hungarian Army always completely fulfills its tasks in the spirit of the Constitution. In addition to preparations for the defense of our country and assuring a high level of combat readiness, the soldiers of our army have honorably taken part in assisting in the producer work of the economy and in warding off natural disasters or in eliminating their consequences. While carrying out its basic mission well, the army has also educated the masses of young people entering the service to love the socialist homeland, to respect other peoples and to foster and follow progressive democratic and revolutionary traditions. It is in the army that many youth have become familiar with basic political questions and the social tasks of socialist building and defense.

As a result of the organized political education and continuous education work, the young soldiers receive appropriate basic information to orient themselves in the complicated international situation and recognize the main causes and inner springs of events. As a result of all these things, the outlook, mode of thinking, the relationship to social questions and tasks of the soldier on returning to civilian life go through significant and positive changes. Dozens of letters from the managers of work places, from some parents sent to the armed forces express appreciation for and acknowledge the human and character-building influence of the army, and its role in the preparation for adult life. It is in the army that many young people are stimulated to deal more consciously with social policy, our economic building work, and the question of international life; and in the interest of more fundamental knowledge they continuously read and beome better educated.

Our experiences over the years with measuring the political consciousness of young people entering the army show that they are increasingly better educated politically, more interested in political questions, more sensitive to the contradictions of society, more capable of debate, and increasingly committed to the cause of socialism.

It can be established with approximate accuracy that about 8 to 15 percent of the youth entering the army have a good level of political knowledge, 50 to 60 percent have about average information, and about 25 to 30 percent begin their military service with weak and deficient political knowledge. A role is played in all this by schooling, the social-public life activities of the young, the family, the circle of friends, and finally social influence as a whole.

It is not my goal now to analyze the nature and effectiveness of this influence. I wish to stress that during the period of military service an essential change in knowledge composition takes place. By discharge, the ratio of those lagging behind drops from 8 to 10 percent, and the ratio of those with good political knowledge rises to 25 to 30 percent. This positive change has an importan effect on the later life of these youth. It seems to us that it is possible to build well on the knowledge acquired in the army, on the skills and on the socio-political activity developed in the military milieu.

In this article I wish to give an account of the substantive questions pertaining to the political education of enlisted men, pointing out those foundations on which it will be possible later in civilian life to build.

The basis for good fulfillment of military service is a high-level political and moral commitment.

The ideological-political education of the enlisted men in the Hungarian Army is an organic part of military life and a major educational branch. In 13 percent of total training we are imparting basic socio-political information. This ratio corresponds to practice in the armies of friendly countries.

In the ideological-political insturction of the enlisted men, we place emphasis on establishing education in a well-founded world outlook and in the formation of a social view. We strive to see that the rank-and-file understand the main goals of party policy, identify with these, and actively participate in socio-political practice. We assure them in a manifold way that socialist building and defense create unity, and their fulfillment is a patriotic and internationalist obligation, a matter of honor.

First of all, the young soldiers are familiarized with the goals and basic requirements fo the country's armed service. The essence and importance of the military oath, the substance of military obligations and their mode of fulfillment, and the socialist military life style are made known to them. They become familiar with the progressive military traditions, the lives and noble examples of the predecessors who strove for progress.

We make the soldiers aware that the most important creative element of the socialist homeland is in the workers' power and the socialist system, which becomes more perfect with the purposeful work of society as a whole. We make clear in a manifold way the close relationship between the individual and society, the social factors and possibilities of individual success. We familiarize them with the essence of socialist patriotism, and the class content and everyday practice of active patriotism as manifested in deeds. Various subjects of the instruction serve to help them recognize that socialist patriotism and the defense of socialism does not end at the borders of the country but requires a joint effort and internationalist unity in wake of the combined efforts of socialist countries to defend the achievements and values that are being created. To this end, we devote a great deal of attention to showing life in the brother socialist countries, to an understanding of the common laws of socialist building work, and to a recognition of the importance of ideological, economic, political and military cooperation. The deepening of the idea of friendship among the progressive peoples strengthens at the same time the feeling of socialist military comradeship in arms. The real strength and value of this is shown in the exercises of the Warsaw Pact, and in the exemplary, shoulder-to-shoulder execution of the tasks.

Political instruction for the soldiers deals with the essentials of our times, the essence of imperialism, its nature, and the main problems of the international class struggle. The soldiers become familiar with the practice of peaceful coexistence, the concept of detente and its contradictory aspects. The socialist countries adapt, above all, the goals of the Soviet Union's peace policy and the place and role of our armies in the struggle for peace. They recognize that a new world war would be disastrous for the future of human kind, and therefore the prevention of a thermonuclear war is a primary task, and this can be assured only by maintaining a military balance and constantly strengthening our combat readiness.

Various subjects deal with the characteristics of the class struggle conducted in the ideological field, and with its forms of manifestation. The decisive majority of the soldiers understand that the principle of peaceful coexistence can be used for a world-wide ideological struggle. Cooperation in certain political questions and in economic and cultural areas are inconceivable in ideological questions where the principles expressing the interests of the working class and the capitalist class cannot be harmonized and merged. The instruction prepares the soldiers to recognize the essence of ideological diversion and to perceive and see through the various hostile views. We take great care to see that the soldiers have adequate arguments for seeing through and negating erroneous ideas.

About one-third of the teaching material in various subjects includes problems of domestic socialist building work. We deal with the circumstances under which the Council Republic was formed, its achievements, the struggle of the Hungarian communists, the evaluation of the historical importance of our liberation, and the victory of the people's democratic revolution. We teach as a historical process the conditions for the creation of working class power and the struggle for the consolidation of power. We show in a many-sided way the process of strengthening socialist national unity, and its role in the building of socialism.

In the framework of a number of subjects, we deal with the development of the economy, the resolutions dealing with the economic building work of the 12th Congress. We show in a many-sided way the close relationship between politics and economy, the goals of economic-political measures, and the social importance of their realization. We explain the requirements of intensive economic development, of a change in the product structure, of economy and savings as well as the concrete tasks linked to their realization. In accordance with its importance, we deal appropriately with the tasks of a multilateral cooperation among the CEMA countries, making it understood that mutual exploitation of the advantages latent in the international work distribution is in the interest of every participating country and an accompaniment of peaceful coexistence between the two world systems.

We show in a many-sided way the role of successful economic development in the whole of social progress, in the solution to our socio-political and cultural tasks, in the development of our defense capability, and in the development of living standards. We devote a great deal of attention to making it understood that the protection of the living standards already achieved demands more purposeful, organized and superior work from the country as a whole.

In instruction we deal with the basic questions of ideological and cultural life, the basic principles of the socialist military mode of life, the essence and forms of socialist democracy, and its role in our development. Our experience shows that many young people who enter the army underestimate the importance of work place democracy, and regard the operation of democratic forums as superfluous. Therefore, we devote a great deal of attention to suppressing of erroneous views relating to democratic forums by using convincing arguments.

Given the nature and basic mission of the army, we devote a great deal of attention to instruction in basic questions of the socialist defense of the country. In the course thereof, we vitalize our people's progressive, historical and freedom fighting traditions, and the heritage of our revolutionary past. Intellectual and emotional identification with the instruction materials is promoted by military museums, collective fostering of troop traditions, and the discovery and recognition of the revolutionary past of the garrison troops. We teach the history of our army, its development, characteristics, and how the Warsaw Pact Organization was established to counter the aggressive imperialist bloc. The soldiers become familiar with the composition of the armed forces of the Warsaw Pact states and with the life of our brothers-in-arms. As a result of the instruction, the ideas of socialist defense and faith in the strength of the socialist defense federation are strengthened.

By outlining the subjects that are taught, I wished to give an awareness of the main substantive elements of the ideological-political work conducted among the enlisted soldiers. This instruction is well supplemented by a system of bimonthly political lectures at which foreign and domestic political problems are generally treated. In these, we devote great attention to see that in addition to explanations of the main events in world politics, the soldiers also receive continuous information about questions of domestic building work and the life of the country. We provide the soldiers in every barracks with daily newspapers and periodicals to inform them of daily questions. The soldiers regularly watch television, listen to the radio, and read in the subunit club houses during evenings and leisure hours. The army maintains a well-developed library network, where political writings can be found in addition to literary works. We are very pleased that the great majority of the soldiers show no disinclination for reading. Our troop libraries are well visited, and in fact many young people continue to be regular book readers even after discharge.

The System of Instruction

Planned political instruction is conducted in training time, in the framework of instruction days. A given instruction day consists of five fifty-minute hours. The first element of the instruction process is the lecture; this is followed by a viewing of training films (motion and filmstrips), and the individual study of textbooks.

With the conclusion of the individual learning, the soldiers fill out a short test form from which the activity leaders can assess right away what stuck in the soldiers' consciousness from the lecture and the additional information, what they learned, and how they grasped the course materials.

We regard group activity as one of the most essential and valuable parts of the instruction day, where they discuss the subject matter, supplementing and enriching it with their own experiences. The activity groups are those small military groups in which the soldiers live and work together. The great majority of the activity leaders are the officer commanders of the soldiers.

A solid foundation for the effectiveness of the training-educational work is provided to a large extent by the fact that the activities of the rank-and-file are guided by commanders who are ideologically and politically well prepated and who have rich educational experiences and a propagandistic background of many years. Their preparation and the work of the propagandists is also helped by the activity leaders' auxiliary materials which contain lecture outlines for given subjects, suggestions for demonstrations, table outlines, recommended questions for group discussions, and so forth. The preparation is also assisted by the Cabinets of Political Work, where recommended literature and selections are available for the propagandists in addition to aids for the techniques of instruction.

We devote great care to demonstrations. Most of the various data sources are provided centrally. We will rewrite, modernize and reprint the textbook following the year of the party congress and the so-called midterm Central Committee session. The users receive the textbook and the auxiliary materials of the activity leaders free of charge.

The political instruction of enlisted men in our army develops in the direction set forth in party resolutions and in harmony with social practice. But we can see that there is still plenty to do. Our main goal is to increase the effectiveness of our instruction. An essential index of this is theory and practice, the strengthening of the unity of word and deed in training, service combat activity, building work, and private life. We want to improve the unity and the harmony of propaganda, agitation, political information, and public education activity. We also want to make progress in developing illustrative material. We prepare propagandists with great care for their tasks, and we attend to the continuous development of their theoretical and practical knowledge.

In the foregoing, I wished to show the substance and the system of political instruction for enlisted soldiers with the intention that it can be taken into account in their daily work by the party propagandists working in civilian life.

THEOLOGIAN STRESSES MARXIST, PROTESTANT SIMILARITIES

Budapest ELET ES IRODALOM in Hungarian 14 Nov 81 p 7

[Article by Peter Szanto: "Protestant Communism? A Discussion on the Reconcilable Contradictions of Religion and Marxism"]

[Text] Several weeks ago, a conference of theologians and materialist philosophers was held in Debrecen. On the first day, they held a sumposium on the theory of religion and, on the second day, a Marxist-Protestant dialog. Most of those who made comments at this religious-historical dialog spoke chiefly of common, cohesive elements. Is there identity in the teleology of religion and Marxism? What is the difference between Christian morality and Communist self-discipline? On which side of the front line can religion be found in the present world situation? We talked about these problems with Dr Laszlo Makkai, deacon of the Debrecen Theological Academy and the scientific advisor of the Historical Science Institute of the Hungarian Academy of Science.

[Question] Will religion become the superstructure of socialist society?

[Answer] There is no outlook for this, although at times the peace between state and church arouses such an appearance. However, I must emphasize--as a Marxist philosopher also expressed himself at the conference--the Hungarian situation is unprecedented even in respect to the neighboring countries. It must be said, however, Marx believed that the church and religion itself must be the fantastic mirror of an impoverished society. This is how it was at least in the times with which Marx was dealing. But we must not forget that the church as a significant progressive past. Consider only the role of Calvinism in the early bourgeois revolutions in the Netherlands and England. Or look at the fermenting effect of the Reformation on the German peasant wars! The demand for a hard self-examination appeared on behalf of Christian churches even before 1945--in a word, it is not true that they arrived at the present situation from opportunism but rather from a rigorous theoretical clarification. Even before the liberation, the main question was the following: how did the church which gave us Bocskay, Molnar Szenci, Apaczai, and--in final analysis--"produced" Moricz and Ady, come to where it became an identified part of the Horthy system, that is, for an oppressive, exploitative system?

[Question] But still there are basic differences, are there not, between the progressivism of religion and Marxism?

[Answer] We must acknowledge this basic difference before any further reflection or any further thought. Marxism is an immanent philosophy and Christianity transcendent. The belief in God is antithetical to Marxism, and not only in the subject area of atheism. There is also a dispute, for example, over the question of the two kinds of Hegelian dialectics. They say about Marx that he turned Hegel around from his head to his feet, while we are still working with the dialectic that "was left standing on its head." Its major heir, the philosophy of Kirkegaard, is the basis of modern Protestant theology, the so-called dialectic theology. There is also discussion of the death of the church. Marxism says that the church will die in a socialist-communist society. (Well, of course, later on the state also will die.) We believe that religion will come to an end with human fulfillment, with the coming of the Kingdom of God. We wait for the end of religion as Marxists wait for the end of the state. As the conference ended, we jokingly wished one another the death of the two institutions as soon as possible.

[Question] There also was discussion of ideological identity, or similarities.

[Answer] The main debate, for example, in which both sides are seeking for the answer is whether man is basically good. Can man redeem himself, cast off all forms of alienation? To put it in Christian terms: can he be without sin? In Marxist terms: is he capable of perfect self-realization? Another similarity is in the fact that both are teleological and that transcendence is not lacking from Marxism. But the utopian makes concrete existence transcendent. However, this philosophy continues the utopian path in actual existence, it remains immanent, whereas in religion the path continues on the transcendental plane.

[Question] What kind of answer does Christianity give to modern social phenomena? How does it explain, for example, the bad phenomena evident among the nonbelievers? Can it give counsel on how to overcome these things?

[Answer] There was a great deal of discussion at the conference regarding the relationship of puritan morality and communist self-discipline. These two have in common their cult-type respect for family and work. Puritan morality was born at the beginning of capitalism among the English petite bourgeoisie and the early proletariat. This way of thinking does not belong unconditionally to capitalism. Obviously, this cannot be applied to the large capitalists, who of course never thought of denying themselves the task in the interest of some moral goal. This morality was not alien to the early workers' movement. Those men invested time and lives in matters of which they knew that, at the best, it would bear fruit for very distant descendants. The relationships of the two moralities also can be demonstrated historically, in fact, also in the writing of the Marxist classicists.

[Question] You said that this kind of morality was not alien to the early workers' movement. In the view of Christianity, is it alien to modern socialism?

[Answer] We Christians feel that it has been deemphasized by Marxism. Well-being is unprecedented, although in the present world economic situation we can hardly permit this for ourselves. The excessively great range of variety, the luxury consumption, the uninhibited imitation of a consumer society is burying morality. Both religious and atheist morality.

[Question] I believe that this problem was raised in the 1960s in the discussions on frigidaire socialism. He is not unconditionally a good Marxist who has nothing to lose but his chains. I do not believe that the frigidaire, the automobile, or the villa on the Balaton will in themselves endanger morality.

[Answer] It is not a question of frigidaire socialism at all. This question has already been solved for themselves by the believers and the nonbelievers alike. The question is whether our manipulated variety policy is correct. The pursuit of productivity for its own sake, the widest commodity abundance possible, its variety--this is capitalist morality. I do not believe that we should be imitating the wasteful consumption of capitalist society, or its prestige consumption.

[Question] Undoubtedly, socialism also is opposed to prestige consumption, the tasteless consumption pretensions of the poor, the enthusiastic fulfillment of false demands. But what is the solution?

[Answer] At the time of the Abigel debate, many people attacked the author, Magda Szabo, for raising to great moral heights such vital principles as are alien to life and "prudish." Fortunately, it was the critic of NEPSZABADSAG who defended the TV film. In essence, he said that the morality which restrains itself in order to serve others is not only a Christian but also a Communist morality. In brief, our common heritage should receive greater emphasis in the education of people. It is all the same whether we call it puritan morality or communist self-restraint. We should induce people to make sober judgments on their lives. With a sober measurement of our resources, we should work out a demand system which is not nomastic but modest. Not everything should be ungainly, grotesque, but we should not forget that the plain beautiful can also be beautiful. Let us have culture, attractive designing of consumer goods, variety, but for people not for consumption. Let us concern ourselves more with the upbringing of the soul, not only with the "right" commodity abundance.

[Question] Plainly speaking, are we talking about the "service principle"?

[Answer] There are disputes between religion and materialist Marxists over how to judge man. At the time, Marx said that the wretched are oppressed and that is why they are grotesque. When he sought for a practical way out of this situation for mankind, he rationally did not research whether man was good or bad. Christianity feels that the Marxists have not made a decision in this question. The Christian churches, of course, are pessimistic, they believe that man cannot realize himself alone, the good can be liberated in him only by God. On the other hand, man is educable, must be educated! Both sides agree on this. But educable for what? For a life form in which the other man is the true value. The individual undertakes to do the service precisely for the sake of the other person. For the other person, for the future, and for himself. In order for this to be realized in Hungary, it will be necessary to rethink fundamentally the teaching of antagonism.

[Question] No matter how we think of the matter, the belief in God and atheism are irreconcilably opposed to one another.

[Answer] Theoretically, they will remain so. But for a long time now, the two ideologies have been moving in other than the world of pure abstractions. Therefore, we maintain that certain antagonisms will fade away. The front between worlds is no longer between the believers and the nonbelievers but between the believers in a future and the nihilists. Of course, this refers to practical activity, but it would be a laughable matter if the entire society were to occupy itself incessantly with the philosophical and world outlook problems of atheism. Let everyone according to his own belief await the coming of communism or the Kingdom of God if the essential thing is to confront jointly the nihilists, who believe in nothing--perhaps only in the neutron bomb.

[Question] Then this is the camp which struggles for the future?

[Answer] We can actually classify people into four groups. There are the believers and the nonbelievers in religion, more precisely those who hold the principles of materialism and Marxism. Then there are the humanists, who have lost their faith in one of the two, but do not believe in the other one, or they never were and never will be believers in either one. However, since they believe in the future, we are in the same trench with them. And the fourth group consists of the nihilists.

[Question] Which group is the strongest among the four? Obviously, not the first three because then we would not have to wage a worldwide struggle against the fourth group of people, whom I would call the indifferent rather than the nihilistic. This could include the nihilists, but I believe that indifference is even more dangerous.

[Answer] At the conference, someone asked how many of those present were absolutely conscious, well-prepared, and unshakeable Christians. And how many Marxists of the same high level? And if there are 40 of us in each group, how many can there be in the whole country? Several hundred, several thousand. Between them, however, are the indifferent masses. It is the common task of these two groups--with the help of the humanists--to awaken the unconscious, indifferent masses. This is a common task which will reduce the difference between the believers and the nonbelievers and force the antagonisms into the background as we have enormous, common problems that can be solved only in common.

PAST PERFORMANCE, FUTURE OF SZSP ASSESSED

Warsaw TRYBUNA LUDU in Polish 11 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by Ilona Morzol: "The Socialist Union of Polish Students (SZSP) the Year After Its Congress--What Next?"]

[Text] Following its renewal proclamation the SZSP was the first organization to convoke its own extraordinary congress--a congress which duly sanctioned only those changes initiated at the earlier conference of the aktiv in Uniejow. The SZSP declared itself as an independent, political organization of Polish student youth, but at the same time it did not renounce its union activity. In the new declaration it adopted an open world outlook for the union and its internal democratic structure, the guarantee of which was to be the great importance of collegial officials. Specification of an upper age limit, once and for all, was supposed to prevent workers from becoming detached from "the crowd."

At the congress a number of demands were made on the party and the government calling for the democratization of life in Poland and for radical social and economic reforms. But the SZSP did not formulate its own program of political and organizational activity; in the renewed organization this program was supposed to be built from below and to result from everyday practice.

The fact that students and not permanent workers fulfilled most of the functions on the school and district councils allowed people to hope that the SZSP would become a truly student organization. As if to confirm this, in its declaration the SZSP appealed to the traditions of the Polish Student Association (ZSP) and Rural Youth Union (ZMW), organizations which once really mattered in the student community.

In practice, however, the hopes raised by the congress turned out to be difficult to implement.

In the New Situation

In the year since it lost its monopoly in student affairs, there has again been an outpouring of a great deal of criticism at the SZSP--on the one hand, criticism that, despite its declaration of independence, the SZSP continues to "be led by the nose by the authorities," and on the other hand, criticism that in losing its former look, it had not managed to define itself anew, criticism that it had become an organization without character which, having called itself political in its declaration, in reality had relinquished this sphere of activity without a struggle to the supposedly apolitical Independent Association of Students (NZS).

The Lodz strike, which proved that an abyss remained between the bottom and the top of this organization, also added to the criticism. Rank and file SZSP members took an active part in strikes at all the schools and made up the Lodz strike committee; the chief authorities of the organization remained passive to the end, limiting themselves to formal support for the strike.

The position of the SZSP in the schools also changed in substance. Sharp political divisions were created in many schools by newly selected academic authorities expressly opposed to the sole student organization which had been patted on the head not so long before this. In some schools, for example, the art schools, the organizations ceased to have any meaning in general.

It seems, however, that the factor most damaging to the SZSP is its internal problems, and primarily the inertia of the collegial bodies which are supposed to decide on the look and activity of the union. One month after the congress, at its first plenary session, the Supreme Council had difficulty beginning its deliberations, since already at that time it lacked a quorum in the room. This situation was repeated at all the subsequent plenums, until it was necessary to make a decision concerning the takeover of the functions of the Supreme Council by an Executive Committee composed of a dozen or so members.

It is not hard to imagine how unfavorably such a situation affects the authority of an organization among its own members, and also its credibility in the community.

Such an important document as the political program came to be ratified only at the third plenum which was devoted to this matter. This situation certainly was influenced also by the myriad of important political events in Poland, before which the internal affairs of the organization had to take a back seat. But this does not change the fact that, aside from discussions on truly essential matters in Poland, at the meetings of the Supreme Council there were also lengthy procedural arguments which--it is apparent--could not affect the formation of the specific look of the union. Several quick reactions to political events in Poland, such as the position adopted on the matter of the events in Bydgoszcz, for example, can constitute proof that union authorities are not a group of people devoid of a political face. Yet this certainly is not enough to imply that the entire organization possesses such a look.

An attempt was made to find this look at this year's council in Uniejow, where a position was adopted on the most important issues in Poland. Declaring itself in favor of the socialist development of Poland and in favor of maintaining the status quo of authority, the SZSP in its next course of action expressed its attitude toward the main political forces responsible for Poland's fate: "The Polish United Workers' Party (PZPR) and Solidarity must (...) recognize that the achievement of social harmony and stabilization is possible only if there is a conscious self-limitation of both forces. The PZPR must turn over part of its authority to self-governing bodies and to democratic citizens' institutions. Solidarity must give up its political aspirations, its unconcealed aspirations to usurp authority (...). We believe that it is necessary to form an alliance of sensible people, where our place also must lie.

Questions without Answers

It is only a shame that even the chief authorities of the union could not approve this document, since again they failed to turn out in force. I thought that more than 200 members of the aktiv of the SZSP came to Uniejow not only to state the need to find their place in an alliance of sensible people. It seemed to me that they came also to define that place.

Of course, the unstabilized situation in Poland does not help to define the place of individuals or, all the more, of organizations; even those who most likely found themselves in a new reality after August 1981 are feeling something akin to shortness of breath today. Yet the situation in the student community seems so much clearer that the NZS defined itself in practice quite distinctly as a political organization drifting to the right. In this situation, the need for a strong left-wing organization in the schools is all the more apparent.

From the moment of the NZS uprising it was understood that a political struggle would take place in this community that would be perceived as a battle of arguments arising from differences of opinion. This does not exclude collaboration in purely student affairs, but it assumes a struggle when essential questions such as constitutional principles or the binding legal order in Poland come into play. Only the specific position toward the NZS adopted this year in Uniejow concerned criticism of its disrupted activity in the international student movement. For its own national bailiwick, the SZSP adopted the tactics of hiding its head in the sand. This follows, I believe, from the lack of a consistent program of political work, which was not elaborated either at the congress or during the subsequent year. And, in my opinion, this has some significance for the basic elements of the union.

A man who is a member of a political organization (and I want to believe that at least half the students who challenged the legitimacy of the SZSP did so with conviction) would wish not only to read in a successive document that he should declare himself for socialism and fight for it but would also want to find out what practical significance it has for him. And he has a right to believe that the aktiv of his organization can manage to declare itself specifically on this subject.

Outline of the Program

At this year's meeting in Uniejow there was a shortage of the faith and optimism characterizing the previous year, and although the discussions were heated more than once, their temperature resulted more from the general mood of irritation with tensions in Poland brought to Uniejow both by students and invited guests. Out of the jumble of opinions and evaluations of what is happening in Poland, in the academic community, and in the organization itself, they still did not succeed in drawing conclusions on how the SZSP is to function in the future and work in the schools as a political union organization.

In regard to the second goal, however, we can already speak of a certain program outline. The Economic Commission of the Supreme Council has elaborated a plan for a new system of material assistance for students and students' families and its own proposals for solving the problem of employment of graduates and for improving the state of the academic health service and nutrition.

The SZSP also took an active part in the social projects of the Commission, elaborating a draft law on higher schools and announcing its essential views on matters of financing this school system, the participation of students in collegial bodies, and the shaping of the self-governing body.

The new academic year is supposed to answer the questions, how large will the SZSP be, and how will its relations turn out not only with the NZS but also with the Union of Socialist Polish Youth (ZSMP), just entering the schools? It should also bring an answer to the question, will the union become the actual support for the academic left-wing, or will it regain its credibility? I would hope that these answers would be consistent with the expectations--as I see them--of a large segment of student youth.

COMMANDER DISCUSSES AIR DEFENSE CAPABILITIES

Warsaw PRZEGLAD WOJSK LOTNICZYCH I WOJSK OBRONY POWIETRZNEJ KRAJU in Polish Oct 81 pp 5, 7, 8, 9

[Article by Division General Longin Lozowicki, commander of the national air defense [OPK] forces: "Guarding the Air Boundaries of our Socialist Nation"]

> [Text] For the national air defense [OPK] forces the year 1980 was a year of implementing tasks in a complex political-military situation in the world and socio-economic in the country.
>
> Following the Soviet proposals presented in Berlin, there occurred contrary to expectations of a positive reverberation, the December NATO decision regarding the deployment of Euro-strategic arms in Europe. In the leading capitalist nations, rightist and revisionist forces became active, whose primary goal is to increase military potential and to sow the psychosis of threat. Political activity was accompanied by an intensive development of the material bases of armaments and confrontations with socialist nations. Tensions mounted constantly in the Near and Mid-East.

The military-political situation in the world requires constant alertness, resistance and above all, a high degree of defensive readiness within whose framework, our forces perform one of their basic tasks.

The socio-economic situation in the country was also not conducive to the implementation of the tasks standing before us. The events of the second half of the year, especially those of August and September were particularly difficult for the country and the party. They placed our country in a profound state of socio-economic crisis, which we experienced in common and whose effects can still be felt today; and within our capacity as soldiers, we are doing our part in overcoming it.

Despite tension and unrest in the country and frequently felt bitterness and disillusionment brought out by the depth of the crisis and its causes, the cadre of OPK forces did not succumb to the atmosphere of the moment and to despair but unselfishly carried out planned tasks, stayed with the soldiers, exhibiting political wisdom and judgment in explaining the country's current situation.

The high level of political culture of the professional cadre had a significant effect on the attitudes of soldiers in basic military service and on civil employees, military families and on strengthening the fellowship of the military community.

The strength of the formed attitudes reveals itself today as well, through conscientious service and a high degree of ideological and ethical-moral maturity of party members in an, after all, rather difficult period of consolidating party energy around the plan for leading the country out of the present crisis.

The resolutions of the Sixth Plenary Assembly of the KC [Central Committee] of the PZPR, which have initiated the process of changes, were passed in all communities of OPK forces, receiving general approval.

Ardent, objective discussion during sessions of echelons and at party meetings; during military meetings, information and political work, particularly during the period preceding the Ninth Extraordinary Party Congress--fully confirm the high degree of concern on the part of soldiers for the fate of the country and the nation and their readiness for earnest and unselfish service to socialist Poland.

The year 1980 was the last year for the implementation of tasks of the 5-year directives of MON [Ministry of National Defense] and for the fulfillment of tasks of the 5-year plan.

The balance of the 5-year period of implementing tasks standing before OPK forces--is the daily concern of our military population [stanow osobowych] for the maintenance of a high level of combat readiness, operating efficiency of technical equipment and expert mastery of the principles of its operation. The last year of the past 5-year period was especially difficult for us. It should be stated with true satisfaction that in this complex and difficult situation, the national air defense forces carried out honorably all tasks of the final year of the binding directives of the National Defense minister regarding the activity and training of armed forces.

We fully maintained the held opinion of the Polish Army as the leading branch of the armed forces. We confirmed this with the results from drills, inspections and controls carried out by various levels with the Command of the Combined Armed Forces of the Warsaw Pact and with daily service in all elements of our air defense system. All the soldiers of our forces carry out their duties with dedication--from this, they have their own, personal contribution to and a reason for honest soldierly satisfaction.

The past year brought to all environments, further improvement in the atmosphere of coexistence and human interrelationships. We bear in mind, however, that in the light of the country's complex, socio-political situation, continued concern over the proper structure of human interrelationships has a particular significance. Leadership, party and political-upbringing responsibility for the proper culture of coexistence--that is the observance of laws and responsibilities, the unity of words and actions; it is trust and goodwill towards people and their daily and official life's matters.

In the past period, the process of ideological upbringing of all communities of OPK forces proceeded with regularity. The ideological commitment to the best accomplishment of tasks resulting from party resolutions and directive-type documents was molded successfully. All elements displayed constant concern for a high moral-political state. Our soldiers' contacts with soldiers from units of the Soviet Army forces, the NAL NRD [German People's Army of the GDR] and the CzAL [Czechoslovak People's Army] served well the shaping of internationalist bonds.

The guiding force of these undertakings was a well prepared, educated and ideologically committed cadre as well as party and youth organizations in our units.

Commitment, a high level of ideological awareness; the ability of soldiers of the OPK forces to take advantage of opportunities, which are made available by modern combat materiel; high qualifications of commanders, of flight personnel, rocket forces personnel, technical and support personnel--these are the essential qualities of a high degree of combat readiness of our forces, which defend the country against the unexpected action of enemy air attack forces.

These qualities enable us to maintain a high level of our forces' combat readiness, improve on the system of combat duty tours and raise the efficiency of the command system, particularly in terms of its vitality.

The radio-technical forces recorded considerable accomplishments last year. In a dynamic fashion, they worked on improving the system of radar detection, control and reporting. A number of undertakings were accomplished, related to the improvement of the radar range, the automation of processes of forwarding radar information, the support of the activity of rocket forces and the fighter air force of the OPL [antiaircraft defense]. In complex checks such as drills, training [exercises], controls and inspections, a high level of combat readiness of the radio-technical forces was confirmed and of their capacity for the effective detection and tracking of air targets. The regularity and timeliness of collecting radar information from subordinate subunits is evaluated highly. Vigilance in fulfilling daily duty tours on combat elements has also increased. Much attention is devoted to the expansion of the training base and improvement of instructional and upbringing activity.

Within the national air defense system, the OPK rocket forces fulfill a responsible task. They destroy enemy air attack forces before they can reach the task fulfillment line [rubiezy wykonania zadania]. They can successfully fight with air enemy forces in all weather conditions, during the day and night, at great distances and heights.

Proof of the proper training of our rocket forces is evidenced by very good evaluations obtained during rocket firings in training areas.

The rocket forces have achieved a high level of competence in combating air targets and have increased resistance to jamming. Much progress has been made in combating small targets at small heights. The operating efficiency of equipment has increased in the rocket forces. Many initiatives have been also undertaken for the purpose of maintaining a high technical state of rocket systems and their modernization.

The constant increase of requirements in the area of combating modern air targets, compels our rocket forces to increase their knowledge and specialistic capabilities by, among other things, acquiring class qualifications and mastering alternate specializations.

The OPK air forces concentrate their activity primarily on pilot training, which as is known, is a complicated, long-term and continuous process. The goal of this training is expert mastery of the technique of piloting in difficult weather conditions at night and during the day. Attention is focused on skill in conducting a battle with a specific enemy and on opposing enemy action with personal battle tactics. In service training and action, the need is recognized for perfecting professional qualifications with other air force specialists, without whom the modern air force would be unable to perform combat duties.

The liaison and flight support forces of the OPK forces have also merited special recognition and emphasis. The principal directions of their work were political and professional activity, innovation and rationalization, work safety as well as economic and operational effects. Last year, for the second time, they took first place among districts and branches of the armed forces.

The implementation of material-technical and economic support of our forces proceeded in exemplary fashion. The technical personnel was well-prepared for the operation and servicing of automated command equipment and air force equipment. This enabled the efficient and failure-free introduction into operation of new types of armaments. Extensive activity was carried out in the area of improving the principles and methods of rational management and searching for reserves as well as liquidating useless materials; repair workshops planned and completed a series of repairs and tools and the recycling of replacement parts, which with the present supply difficulties is exceptionally valuable.

Considerable effort was put into the continued engineering development of units, command posts and airfields.

The accomplishments of OPK forces are to a considerable extent, the result of the implementation of joint, allied training undertakings; they influence not only the effectiveness of our national defense but also the efficiency of defense of the entire socialist camp.

The obtained training results were made possible due to the unselfish and committed attitude of the unit membership of OPK forces and, in particular, owing to the experienced, expertly handling and servicing combat equipment--cadre of our forces. The assumption has been fully confirmed that well organized leadership and competition form an integral part of the training-upbringing process and constitute an important instrument of effective action in the formation of committed attitudes and the emotional attitude of soldiers towards military service and towards better execution of service duties.

Within the context of tasks for the upcoming years, we shall pay particular attention to the perfection of our forces in terms of detecting and combatting small air targets acting under conditions of disturbances and at small heights; to the improvement of the firing aim of our own and subordinate operational-level [army, front] forces and equipment. The object of our activity will also be the continued development of unit command and staff personnel in the operation of the automated command system, which has an exceptional significance for the maintaining of a high level of efficiency of military activity.

The implementation of our plans should be accompanied by principles of rational and economical management of operating limits, material supplies, military possessions as well as electrical energy and fuel. We shall strive so that in every case, in the implementation of every undertaking, maximal training goals will be achieved with minimal outlays and costs.

I am aware of the difficulties, which will accompany the implementation of our tasks. High specialistic-professional requirements, the unlimited working time of our cadre, difficult duties and the great responsibility for people and military possessions result in making military service particularly difficult today. Nevertheless, despite difficult working and service conditions, our cadre works unselfishly and fulfills its party-military service reliably. Fully committed, it cares about soldierly honor and dignity and about the good name of its units.

In the implementation of tasks, we are counting on the commitment and collective wisdom of party and youth organizations, which mold patriotic and internationalist attitudes among soldiers.

The high standard of training of our forces will contribute to the celebration of the 38th anniversary of the formation of the Polish People's Army.

The significance of the national air defense in case of a possible armed conflict is particularly important. On its effectiveness and strength may depend not only the proper functioning of the nation and the armed forces but also to a large extent, the results of combat on the external front [combat zone]. This is the gauge, which should be used for measuring the role and significance of the National Air Defense Forces in the Armed Forces of the Polish People's Army as well as in the unified air defense system of the Warsaw Pact nations.

With the above National Air Defense Forces in mind--they will fulfill with honor and dignity their important mission of the effective defense of air boundaries and our nation's productive work and, by the same, that of our entire socialist union in a close alliance and brotherhood of arms with the air defense forces of fellow armies of the Warsaw Pact.

POLITICAL BUREAU POSITION ON YOUTH AFFAIRS REPORTED

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 1 Oct 81 pp 1, 5

/Text/ Affairs of Youth Demand Special Care

The Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the PZPR (Polish United Workers' Party) at its last session on 29 September examined the current situation in the youth movement and the problems concerning young generation. The fact that this very subject was discussed in the present complex socio-political situation was--one should think--not only recognition of the young people, but it also is proof of how valuable the role of youth is to national life. Also, it is a result of the complicated problems that appear in that environment. The Political Bureau of the Central Committee, fulfilling the decisions of the Ninth Extraordinary PZPR Congress is expressing its views that the youth problems should have a priority [position] among all the affairs that require special attention of the party and society.

The facts are simple. The profound crisis in which our country has been immersed for many months is affecting young Poles in a special way. August 1980 uncovered errors and deficiencies in our system of upbringing, causing the definite system of values and many rules to break down: at the same time, enormous expectations of youth were released. The degree of these tendencies varies according, of course, to the environment. The further, often stormy, changes in the evaluation processes take place in our very eyes.

Example--the complex situation in the environment of the young working class. This class was, as we know, in the vanguard participant in the turbulent summer of 1980 and an active participant in the workers' protest; still today it plays the significant role in shaping social situation and the course of political events; it decides about the results of management. Nearly 50 percent of all employees are younger than 30. The Political Bureau--let us note--brought our attention to the fact that the economic consequences of the crisis have hit living conditions of young families the hardest.

Taking into consideration the specifics of the environment, one can speak about the similarly difficult situation of the students. The progressing disintegration of social consciousness can be observed everywhere in the influence of the multiple ideological trends, the feverish search by the youth for their generation's identity. The system of upbringing is eroding from various sides. The results today are negative. Indifference can result in further, more painful consequences.

The transformations that were and are taking place in the youth movement are serious. The movement is a particularly attractive territory for infiltration of various forces, some of which have nothing to do with renewal or with socialism. That is why indications by the Political Bureau regarding the necessity of the firm counteraction against using young people for purposes contradictory to the interests of Poland, of the working class, and contradictory to the best traditions of Polish democracy are so significant.

The activity of the socialist youth unions is of great importance for the party to aggressively fight to solve the concrete problems of everyday life, like studies and youth work, and fighting in the ideological sphere for socialism, party, and state.

The socialist youth unions corroborated their ties with the party at their recent meetings. In a practical way, these unions confirmed in recent months that they do not intend to participate in the historical processes that occur in the country, but they would assist in economic reform, make concrete suggestions, draft various laws, and try--more or less effectively--to solve real social welfare problems. The process of reconstruction by the unions and their credibility and authority is not, of course, exempt from restraints and errors given the fact that it is taking place under conditions of a sharp struggle.

The Ninth Extraordinary PZPR Congress, in its program resolution, strengthened the important fact that profound change in the relationship of the party to youth affairs and to the activities of the youth movement. Paternalism and false promises, so common in the past, were completely abandoned. Discrepancies between aroused aspirations and the possibility of their fulfillment, between proclaimed programs and implementation into practical life have resulted in weakening the youth's trust in the intentions and political life of the party. Many facts taken from the everyday life of the party organizations give evidence that this phenomenon has become an anachronism and it is not--it must be emphasized--the result of the procrastination caused by the difficult economic situation of our country, but simply a return to the basis of Lenin's party's policy toward the younger generation. Two aspects of that polich have--in the current situation--particular significance. Party acknowledges that political education of the youth is as important as the rapid resolution of the urgent social, welfare, and educational problems of young families and the socio-professional upward mobility problems of young families. The present and the future demand is that the party organizations strengthen their influence among young people, who should play a more active role in backing the socialistic renewal to reform the state and lead the country out of the crisis.

It is high time that the party precisely define the goals and substance of ideological upbringing. At the Political Bureau meeting, many educational tasks were considered of equal importance, such as: propagation of elementary civic values and virtues, the sense of responsibility for the country's fate, creation of respect for the national traditions to permit a better understanding of the present events. Knowledge of history, acquired through studying history to protect youth from choosing improper roads and values. Today the relationships between party organizations and the youth are based on partnership and mutual trust. The youth organizations, based on socialist values, have conditions for the genuine participation in creating a program of ideas for PZPR for active, statewide political struggle to represent the endeavors and aspirations of the youth. It can be expressed also with the words: Independence of Socialistic Youth Unions--yes, but not separation of their activities.

The session of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee determined in fact that the youth organizations are under strong obligation to shape the political unity of the younger generation. As a matter of fact, the fulfillment of an unusually important condition to build the strength of those unions is at stake. That strength will be greater, when the unions are consolidated, uniform in their ideological character and promote socialist values. In many spheres, a common front of activity of the Polish leftist youth is indispensable, but it does not exclude autonomy in programming and the specific functioning of each individual organization. While supporting these initiatives, the party does not impose itself on anything: it will, however, take care that favorable conditions are created in which organizations, standing on the same ideologico-political platform, can cooperate mutually.

It is easy already to see all the numerous social and welfare problems of the young generation that for years have been waiting resolution. At the initiative of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee, a report was prepared on the living conditions and professional careers of the young people beginning careers. All these problems are presented explicitly. The Ministry of Labor, Wages and Social Affairs, as well as a team of social experts, point out in their report the enormous need to create equal opportunities in the professional, educational, and intellectual fields and in the sports, tourism, and culture. The final remarks of the report propose tasks to be undertaken now and in the future. The economic situation, still unstable, brings up new problems. Their solution depends on how soon we get out of the crisis. Does it mean that we are to wait with our arms folded? The youth organizations have special reasons to start acting right now, in their own interests wherever possible. The important matter is, of course, that the young producers work effectively and honestly in every field and on every position.

The youth unions, as well as other institutions created for this purpose, should step forward more daringly in the face of the negative societal events, events that appear with particular sharpness among the young people, such as: increase in crime, parasitism, narcotics, alcoholism, and so on. Going back to the principles of organic work, basic work is one of the main precursors of the youth organizations attaining the real support of the young people. So it is good that there is more and more initiative on the part of the socialist youth unions in connection with housing construction; labor cooperatives; comradeship help; and, for the last several weeks, with the problems focused on by the economic reform, such as translocations on the labor market and employment of school graduates.

The session of the Political Bureau has initiated a further stage of preparations for the plenary meeting of the Central Committee, at which the problems of the younger generation will be discussed exclusively. This puts under even stronger obligation the Central Committee Youth Commission and the youth commissions of the party committees that are currently in charge of yough affairs and its organizations. One should expect that, in the preparations for the plenary session, all elements of education and upbringing will enter in. The problems are so enormous and so urgent that every voice will have to be listened to and every opinion taken into consideration.

CEAUSESCU RECEIVES NEW CSSR AMBASSADOR

AU232133 Bucharest AGERPRES in English 2015 GMT 23 Nov 81

[Text] Bucharest, 23 Nov (AGERPRES)--On 23 November, President Nicolae Ceausescu of Romania received Josef Simon, new Czechoslovak ambassador to Bucharest, who presented his credentials.

The address presented on the occasion mentions the Czechoslovak people to appreciate highly the successes of the Romanian people, and to enjoy sincerely the permanent development and deepening of the Czechoslovak-Romanian collaboration in the political, economic and cultural fields, the strengthening of the mutual collaboration within the Warsaw Treaty and the CMEA. This collaboration, the address goes on, has created a lasting base for a continuous multilateral development of the relations between our fraternal countries, to the advantage of the peoples and to the interest of the socialist community as well as of socialism and peace worldwide.

In his response address the Romanian head of state stressed that the working people in Romania should appreciate highly the activity carried out by the working people of Czecholsovakia and pointed out the traditional relations of friendship and bilateral collaboration: "We are happy to learn on this occasion, too, that between the Romanian Communist Party and the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia, between the Socialist Republic of Romania and the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic there have been established and developed relations of tight friendship and collaboration, grounded on fully equal rights, mutual esteem and respect," the address reads, expressing at the same time the conviction that the Romanian-Czechoslovak multilateral collaboration would witness even stronger development in the future, to the advantage of the two countries' peoples, of the general cause of socialism, detente and peace in Europe and worldwide.

The address points out that Romania carries out an extensive international activity for the assertion of a policy of peace, of halting the deterioration of the world situation, the cessation of the arms race and the passage to disarmament, nuclear disarmament in the first place, the settlement of all conflicts and litigious issues by peaceful means, by negotiations.

We pay special attention--the address reads--to the collaboration with the member countries of the CMEA, as well as with [those] in the Warsaw Treaty, to the development of the relations of friendship and solidarity with the developing countries, with the nonaligned states. We also promote broad relations with the developed capitalist countries, in the spirit of peaceful coexistence.

DELEGATE ADDRESSES MBFR TALKS IN VIENNA

AU201406 Bucharest Domestic Service in Romanian 1100 GMT 20 Nov 81

[Text] The peace and disarmament appeal of the Socialist Democracy and Unity Front [SDUF], initiated by President Nicolae Ceausescu, was presented at yesterday's plenary session of the Vienna talks on the reduction of troops and weapons and on accompanying measures in central Europe.

Our country's appeal for disarmament and peace, the head of the Romanian delegation stated, vigorously calls for energetic action, now, before it is too late, to stop the dangerous trend toward arming and military spending and to put a halt to the deployment in Europe of intermediate-range nuclear missiles and of the neutron bomb and to proceed to disarmament, and primarily nuclear disarmament, to preclude a new world war and ensure peace in Europe and throughout the world.

The Romanian representative presented our country's concept according to which ensuring a balance of forces must be achieved by firm measures aimed at reducing weapons and military expenditures in a balanced manner and under appropriate international supervision, so that the security of all countries and of all nations will be ensured.

The Romanian people are determined to act, together with all progressive forces, so that from one end of Europe to the other the peoples' will to live in peace, stop the arms race and renounce nuclear weapons and the neutron bomb can be heard clearly.

The contents of the SDUF appeal and President Nicolae Ceausescu's concept regarding eliminating the danger of a war were also presented at the press conference that followed the plenary session of the Vienna negotiations and met with--as everywhere in the world--broad and keen interest.

PROBLEMS OF SECONDARY SCHOOL EDUCATION EXAMINED

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 18, 20 Sep 81 pp 10-12

/Article by Iosif Tripsa, state secretary, Ministry of Education and Instruction: "Current and Long-Range Problems of High School Education"/

/Text/ This fall about a million youths are starting out as pupils in the two stages of high school, in day and evening courses. Many million textbooks, thousands of new educational and production aids, hundreds of classrooms, study halls, laboratories, shops, agricultural plots and zootechnical farms will enhance the high school inventory in the new school year, making it possible to improve the process of education and instruction and to bring out and exploit each youth's qualities and capacities in order to provide future graduates with a broad scientific and cultural background as well as a sound training in basic occupations and a good humanistic, patriotic and civic indoctrination.

As a basic factor for civilization and culture and the main means of training the labor force to meet the general needs of the nation and of each and every community, the schools now have the necessary resources for the radical changes in subject matter required by the generalization of the first stage of high school in Romania as part of 10-year compulsory education. The complete integration of education with research and production has brought about an improvement in all its basic parameters, namely organization, material resources, scholastic plans and programs, and textbooks. As it was said at the 12th RCP Congress, in general the process of reorganizing Romanian education on a new and modern basis has been completed and school activity is to be further perfected by continuing improvement in the process of education and instruction, for which purpose steps have been taken by the First Congress on Education and Instruction.

Nevertheless we regard modernization of education as a task aided by several elements in education and in other fields as well, and we feel the need of constant efforts to analyze and evaluate the various aspects of school activity and to expedite improvement of the entire process of education and instruction.

Levels of Graduates' Training and Integration in Work

Romania's socioeconomic development in the present decade (to be the decade of science, technology, quality and efficiency) also makes new demands on manpower training, especially because education is a very valuable investment but also one that takes a long time to produce. The present pupils and students will start work in production or other fields toward the end of this five-year plan and will be employed until the year 2025 or thereabouts. There is no question that throughout their active lives they will have to cope with the many radical changes wrought by the scientific-technical revolution as well as some highly complex economic realities. The future workers, technicians and specialists will be handling production means greatly improved over those now known as well as superior technological processes, and they will use systems of labor and production organisation that are as yet unknown in order to secure several times greater productivity and to make incomparably better products than the present ones, with practically complete use of the raw materials and energy that may even be in new forms unprecedented today. In other words, the socioeconomic effectiveness of the future classes of graduates will be far greater. That is why we are making every effort to give the present graduates who are starting to work in production an increasing ability to make a rapid improvement themselves in all the technical-economic indicators, especially in those of product quality and competitive power, and also to contribute to consistent application of the new technologies and systems of organization, including the new economic-financial mechanism, and to participate in scientific-technical creation and in improvement of the products, equipment and production processes. Most of the efforts of high school education are intended to meet those requirements.

Yet we now find that integration of high school graduates in production is still too slow and difficult in many cases. In the first months the labor productivity and product quality they achieve are rather low. Moreover their participation in scientific-technical creation is inadequate and their efforts to improve themselves professionally are sporadic.

Because of these and other failings of the high school graduates, some enterprises prefer to hire graduates of trade schools or even of short-term qualification courses instead of high school graduates with bachelor's degrees and certificates of qualification. Usually under family influence, some high school graduates express preferences which become demands for easier, so-called "clean" jobs with the highest possible extra incomes while such basic sectors of the economy as the extractive and metallurgical industries, construction and agriculture do not have enough manpower. Graduates with such demands who quit their jobs aggravate the instability of the labor force in in major industrial enterprises.

Too great differences in the levels of training of high school graduates are found, both in the basic sciences (mathematics, physics, chemistry and biology) and in occupational instruction. In the same graduating class peak results are to be found, obtained especially in the international competitions in physics, chemistry or mathematics, but also a great deal of mediocrity. There are also great differences in specialized training, indicated by some graduates' fulfillment of the production norms even in their first days at work, but also by others' failure to meet those norms even by the end of the probationary stage.

The high schools and the higher authorities, including the Ministry of Education and Instruction, are primarily responsible for these results. Despite the measures taken, they have not succeeded in eliminating all the failures and defects in the pupils' theoretical and practical training and in their education. The reasons why these failings persist are indicated by the finding that there is still a discrepancy between the body of knowledge the graduates have and their ability to apply it in practice. This proves that too many disciplines of an informative nature, some of which are outmoded and others pointlessly repeated in different subjects, are still being taught to the detriment of the formative function that should predominate in all instruction and education.

The inherited practice of making pupils memorise quotations, formulas, expressions and rules, usually mechanically, and of grading them by their ability to recite what they have learned is still strongly entrenched in high schools. Modern teaching technology, based on methods of active participation and capable of interesting all pupils in learning by experiment and immediate application of the knowledge acquired in the work done in study halls, classrooms, workshops or in production, is still progressing with too great difficulty despite the efforts of the responsible elements and the real successes achieved by means of it.

But not every pupil in all high schools has been provided with a work place of his own in study halls, laboratories, school workshops and production experience. Although there are enough laboratory kits, only a few of the pupils perform experiments and assemblies while most of them either watch their classmates' work or think about something else. In too many school workshops and and most often in production experience the pupils do not have work places at all but are assigned in groups of two, three or more to a single work place. Consequently some of them work effectively for only a small part of the time specified in the school programs, to say nothing of the fact that many of the operations they perform require a low level of qualification below the standards of the practical instruction program. To remedy the defects of this kind the Ministry of Education and Instruction jointly with the Ministry of the Machine Building Industry, the Ministry of Agriculture and the Food Industry and other ministries have taken the necessary steps so that all pupils will be provided with work places of their own as well as the specialists, raw materials tools and equipment needed for their practical instruction.

Yet it must be said that a number high schools, especially those organised by the county people's councils, still lack adequate technical equipment and the necessary materials, and they have difficulty in obtaining orders for the school output from the pupils' productive instruction. Discussion of the above problems between the high school directors and those of enterprises assigned to sponsor the high schools has proved effective, since those discussions are arranged by the municipal and city RCP committees and implementation of the established measures is carefully checked.

The investigations show that when some high school graduates are hired in production they find it difficult to observe worker discipline, including technological discipline, indicating that order and discipline are below the necessary standard in the high schools that graduated them, that the pupils are unaccustomed to strict observance of the standards and rules of conduct, and that the teachers take an unprofessionally indulgent view of violations of discipline, waste of time, and deterioration of public property.

This also explains the youths' lack of interest and even indifference to the discussions of production problems at the workers' general assemblies in the sections and enterprises where they work, and their failure to play an active part in the public organizations and the various vehicles of workers democracy (commissions, councils and cultural, social and athletic programs), indicating deficiencies in the indoctrinational work in high schools. To remedy these failings, much closer contacts between high schools and enterprises must be established through all public organisations and joint programs must be started that will appeal particularly to pupils in the final grades (10th and 12th).

Emphasis on Formative Quality of Education

In giving priority to the foregoing problems, it is unquestionably necessary to adopt and consistently enforce measures to improve the high school graduates' training and to considerably improve the overall efficiency of their performance on the job. For this purpose it is highly important to enhance the formative quality of all instructive-educational work in schools, to clear the lectures of obsolete material, and to eliminate repetitions and descriptive elements. This means all the instructors must be familiar with the graduates' future jobs and must collect from them examples, exercises and projects to analyze at the proper time in the course of school work. For example, the idea of the RCP committees in Dimbovita and Galati counties, who arrange tours of duty in production for high school teachers, has proved useful. This experience has produced good results, and it must be continued and generalized because it has enabled the instructors to interest their classes more and to better correlate the lessons with the real necessities of the graduates' future jobs.

In all the high schools we have an extensive inventory of educational aids including many motion picture projectors, tape recorders, TV sets, and even closed circuit TV installations which, when skillfully used, permit generalization of modern teaching methods. In 1980 the Ministry of Education and Instruction organized an intensive course in modern teaching methods in Alba Iulia for inspectors and instructors throughout Romania, who are assigned the task of becoming instructors in their counties so that all teachers will start applying the methods of active participation to all school activities.

The problem was taken up again at the conference organized by the Ministry of Education and Instruction in June 1981 in Pitesti, where the responsibilities of teachers in all counties in this respect were determined. Although good results have been obtained, they are unfortunately sporadic. For example, use of the modern teaching methods in several Iasi high schools proved very effective, where they began to apply those methods to all disciplines in the last school year, using the results of a small but excellent collective of pedagogic researchers at Iasi University. It was found in all cases, but especially in the Iasi high schools, that the pupils took a considerably greater interest in school as reflected by fewer excused and unexcused absences and by an improvement in the schools' efficiency and in the results of occupational instruction. Accordingly the Ministry of Education and Instruction intends to generalize the new teaching methods in all high schools during this school year.

Use of the methods of active participation greatly reduces teaching activity properly speaking, replacing it with analysis and in-depth study, along with the class, of the disciplines that are to be acquired and applied. Moreover judgment of the pupils' capacities for practical application of acquired knowledge as well as the occupational skills they master becomes one of the main standards for evaluating and grading them.

Since science is becoming more and more a productive force and since this characteristic will be intensified in the near future, the problems of the most prompt and efficient application of the new data and laws that are discovered are becoming increasingly urgent, and consequently the training the high schools provide in the basic disciplines (mathematics, physics, chemistry and biology) is acquiring a growing importance. This certainly does not mean merely memorizing and reciting the various hypotheses, theories, laws or axioms howver. The various phenomena and processes must be studied, especially experimentally, and the various possible applications of new technologies based on those phenomena and processes to the future occupation must be mastered.

A very interesting conclusion has been drawn from the many analyses and studies made by the pedagogic and psychological researchers concerning the main reason why high school pupils are overloaded, namely the great waste of time in some activities and especially in practical-productive instruction. Therefore steps must be taken to make full use of the time for all activities, especially those in school workshops and enterprises, through more rational organization of the activities but also through better guidance of the pupils by instructors, specialists in production, and instructor-craftsmen. In all cases practical instruction of pupils in the final grades (10th and 12th) should take place in enterprises, through actual work on the future jobs where they are to be employed after graduation.

Meanwhile the technical standard of school production must be raised by all possible means, including manufacture of new models of products or models of future products in the school workshops. High schools have a labor force on a high theoretical level that is inadequate in many enterprise shops for models and single-design products, and it is this shortage that is often given as a reason for nonfulfillment of all plan tasks for technical progress in some industries. For example, creative sections could be assembled in the workshops of the appropriate high schools from a number of light industry enterprises.

In another connection, it is very important to form and develop the progressive attitude toward physical work in close conjunction with intellectual work on the part of the pupils. This is essential for strengthening order and discipline in schools and in practical-productive activities and also for civic education and a greater sense of responsibility for growth of the national wealth through the most rational use of energy and materials, greater labor productivity, and better quality and greater competitive power of the output. There is also a need of further involving all the educational elements including the family in the proper scholastic-occupational guidance of youth, since the labor force must be trained according to sectors of the economy and regions. In order to train the manpower needed for the priority sectors of the economy (the extractive and metallurgical industries, construction and agriculture), all youths who qualify for scholarships are to be enrolled and maintained in courses, and their desire for higher learning in evening or correspondence courses is to be encouraged.

The measures established by the party and state administrations for organizing the first stage of high school in all rural communal centers in at least one school, as provided by the Law on Education and Instruction, are vital to the objectives we have mentioned. There are many advantages to this provision. It facilitates completion of compulsory 10-year education by youths in rural areas while they are benefiting by the educational influence and supervision of the family and the warmth of the parental home. It also increases the number of youths being trained to work in agriculture.

The first stage of high school is being organized this year in 728 more rural communes, raising their total number to more than 1,700. Organization of the first stage in all communal centers is to be completed next year. New classrooms, laboratories and workshops have been built for the efficiency of the first stage, and study halls have been equipped. The uniform agroindustrial councils and the cooperative and small industry units, whose manpower is being trained in these schools, must also give them all necessary support.

To enhance the occupational improvement of CAP [Agricultural Cooperative] members and IAS [State Agricultural Enterprise] and SMA [Agricultural Mechanization Station] workers in the trades of agricultural machine operator and agricultural mechanic, agroindustrial evening schools are being organized to begin this year under every uniform agroindustrial council. These schools will include the whole population employed in rural areas and will be compulsory up to the age of 40. This year 15,000 agricultural workers will be enrolled in them, and 26,000 next year. They will teach modern agricultural methods, operation of tractors and agricultural machines, and maintenance and operation of installations for industrial processing of agricultural products. The technological courses for workers in crop production will be held in winter, with practical training during the agricultural campaigns by direct participation in field operations, and those for zootechnical workers will alternate with production experience, being organized in the intervals between the scheduled activities on the zootechnical farms.

Further expansion of evening courses in high schools, trade schools and schools for craftsmen is a consideration with far-reaching implications for Romanian schools. This year the total number of evening pupils in the second stage of high school will be more than those in daytime courses, and their number will be further increased to accommodate the youths who want to start their active and productive careers earlier. This trend appears in all the developed countries and it is associated with accelerated psychosomatic development of youth.

Consequently the number of young evening pupils has become predominant and that of adult ones has declined, a fact which calls for reconsideration of the teachers' conception of evening high school education. In their age and training structure, the evening grades are becoming more and more like those in daytime education.

As a result the instructive-educational process is becoming increasingly uniform in evening and daytime education. It still depends upon the pupil's individual effort, but in evening education that effort must be made in the classroom alone because the idea that the evening pupil can train himself outside of class is an illusion, since he has employment obligations, public activities and family concerns.

In the light of the points made in this article, it can be said that the problems of broad social significance that confront Romanian high school education call for revaluation of the Romanian schools' rich traditions on a higher level, as well as rapid modernization of this education in keeping with the technical-scientific revolution and society's current and long-range needs.

DISCUSSION OF SOCIOLOGY CONTINUES

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 18, 20 Sep 81 pp 16-19

/Article by Catalin Zamfir: "Whither Romanian Sociology?" Fifth in the following series of ERA SOCIALISTA articles: "Values and Limits in Current Sociology" (No 12, 1981), "Investigation of Social Realities As Basis for Development of Sociology" (No 14, 1981), "Young Sociologist's Position" (No 16, 1981) and "Sociology Faced with Social-Human Realities" (No 17, 1981)/

/Text/ ERA SOCIALISTA's start of an important discussion of the present stage of Romanian sociology and of the extent to which it meets the demands of the present evolutionary stage of Romanian society is welcome. It affords the opportunity for an exchange of views in which we wish not only sociologists would share but also those who actually or potentially benefity from sociological activity.

I see no need to dwell upon the importance of sociology to Romanian society at the present time. It is sociology's highly responsible task to help devise and implement the new strategies for social development that are required by the qualitatively different stage we have entered.

It is time for us, the sociologists, to ask ourselves a direct question that is essential both to the future of this discipline and to the way it serves to improve Romania's socialist society: Is Romanian sociology ready to respond promptly and effectively to the practical demands of Romanian society? And furthermore, is it in a process of development that will meet in the years to come the expectations that will surely be increasingly high as regards its contribution to the solution of the various social problems and to the implementation of effective developmental strategies?

In view of its critical bent, sociology should be first of all critical of itself. No formal, self-assuring approach can be of the slightest use. On the contrary, it cannot lead to any attitude favoring the development of our discipline because it hinders formulation of the real problems that must be solved. Therefore I think the discussion should concentrate upon diagnosis of the difficulties and problems and upon formulation of their solutions.

Beyond a number of noteworthy successes, I feel Romanian sociology's present image is predominantly one of stagnation and "marking time." And this is not, as we would like to believe, any "crisis of growth," inevitable in a certain period but presaging a rapid future development. It is the result of many factors, including some wrong developmental strategies that we sociologists adopted at the start and have not corrected but perpetuated for lack of more thorough analyses. Perhaps this judgment will appear unduly harsh to some. Actually the overall estimate is not as important as analysis of the particular main difficulties of Romanian sociology at present and, more important, discussion of the measures to be taken. I shall try to review some of them.

Empirical Sociological Research

Under the conditions of Romanian society, which is committed to a planned social development and is trying new forms of social organization, an active sociology primarily takes the form of undertaking extensive empirical research projects. The first aspect that must be analyzed is the thematic, quantitative one. There is no question that investigation of the great social processes characteristic of Romanian society has been emphasized by Romanian sociology from the start. Ion Ungureanu's analysis of the subject matter of the sociological journals shows that sociology has readily responded to the party and state administrations' efforts (See ERA SOCIALISTA No 7, 1980). But while the great social processes characteristic of socialist construction were treated in general, less research effort was expended upon analysis of the difficulties and problems that such an undertaking inevitably has to face.

After a period of enthusiasm characterized by the start of many research projects that was not always sustained by adequate professional capacities, a certain limitation of the projects was to be expected. The initial experience was of a kind to demonstrate that sociological research leading to satisfactory results cannot be accomplished by enthusiasm and good intentions alone but requires a good theoretical and methodological preparation.

At present the number of extensive empirical sociological studies under way has declined and is even seriously limited. Many subjects important to the development of Romanian society are practically uninvestigated sociologically. Normally there should be at least two or three research groups working independently for every great process or important aspect of Romanian social reality. That does not mean duplication or waste of forces but is essential to rapid scientific development. Work "in parallel" provides the necessary variety of approaches and opinions, mutual stimulation, cumulative results and a distinctive scientific community that can support a rapid development of knowledge in every one of the investigated fields. Because of its many aspects, social research can be done more effectively through supplementary developments, as each team explores a possible viewpoint and applies a group of methods. The results obtained that way are compared and mutually validated.

It is not only the number of empirically treated subjects that is deficient. There are broad fields of sociology for which we have no adequately trained specialists au courant with the world technical literature who would set high enough standards of professionalism. To go on with the quantitative appraisals, it may be said that every important field of sociology requires at least three to five good specialists to provide the necessary knowledge acquired throughout the world, to initiate the necessary studies, and to provide for the training of new generations of specialists, and such a situation is still a long way off.

From the standpoint of quality, empirical sociological studies show definite progress. In the 1960's sociological research was done by "beginners" who were sustained more by good intentions than by adequate scientific capacities, but in time those who remained and specialized in sociology progressively improved their scientific qualifications. Yet there is still much "amateurism" in research, and there are too many studies not characterized by any clear idea of the purposes pursued and suffering from serious theoretical as well as methodological defects. Some of them are still started considerably below the level of the acquired knowledge, so that they are marginal and underproductive from the beginning. This explains why a good many sociological studies produce no noteworthy results although they engage impressive human resources. There is still a great discrepancy between the efforts expended on the studies and the quantity and quality of the results obtained. Many studies are abandoned before any of their findings is placed in final form, and even when the results are published they are often limited to endless tables of figures that present no significant facts. Few solid facts and empirical generalizations are to be found in Romanian sociological literature that would inspire enough confidence to encourage new studies or to substantiate theoretical development. Recently in particular the number of books and studies systematically reporting the findings of the various empirical studies has been very limited and even seems to be diminishing to some extent. Somewhat higher scientific standards have also contributed to this, which is a very good thing, but the small number of studies, as well as the mediocre quality of many of them, are certainly important factors too. This explains why Romanian sociological literature is lacking in reference works concerning empirical analysis of the great social processes characterizing Romania's evolution.

Application of Sociological Research Results

This is now one of the crucial problems of our discipline. The low effectiveness of the recent sociological studies is also to be explained by a conception, which I think is wrong, of the methods of social application of the research results.

On the one hand, there is often a misunderstanding about sociology's contribution to solutions of the practical problems confronting society in its various areas. Some sociologists have underrated sociology's theoretical as well as actual capacity at a given point to formulate such solutions. What I wish to maintain is that some sociologists, with the best of intentions, have uncritically undertaken tasks beyond the actual possibilities by simplistically interpreting the effort to solve the social problems. The fact must be considered that practical social activities, in their entirety, have many social, psychological, economic, political, legal, moral, ecological and other components, while sociology provides access only to some facets of reality and not to all of them. Therefore a solution to a practical problem usually cannot be formulated by a sociologist alone but must be the result of multidisciplinary collaboration.

On the other hand, the sociologist is oriented differently from the practical expert. He is more of a researcher, concentrating on recording the facts and detecting the real mechanisms, and less of a technician or engineer creating new social systems. What is called "social engineering" is still not very far developed and probably will not be confined to the field of sociology. The fact is the present sociologist is primarily a researcher. Often he is even insufficiently familiar with the whole activities of the actual social systems wherein he is asked to make his particular professional studies. In order to suggest satisfactory solutions, the sociologist needs effective collaboration with the practical expert in the respective system. The practical experts are usually in a much better position to formulate solutions than sociologists coming from outside the respective systems who cannot understand some very important practical aspects. The sociologist can aid a practical expert with his specialized knowledge and specific research findings. He can enhance the practical expert's capacity to formulate effective solutions, especially by means of the "sociological awareness" that he is helping to develop. Accordingly the best practical solutions are more likely to result from the dialogue between the practical expert and the sociologist, and of course it is advisable to include other specialists in the dialogue as well.

I think the source of the dissatisfaction frequently expressed by sociologists because their solutions are not given sufficient consideration is to be understood chiefly in this light. This happens primarily, but not exclusively of course, because their solutions are not invariably practical, to say nothing of the fact that this dissatisfaction of the sociologist results from an attitude that is uncritical and from another point of view. Adoption of a solution by a social system is a social process par excellence which itself is within the province of sociological research. The sociologist should not complain because his suggestions are disregarded but should try to understand why it happens and to determine the causes and possible sources of resistance to the process of change, and he should try to overcome them.

The research reports are deficient not only in the formulated solutions but also in their "form." I would say we have not yet determined a style for the sociological research report addressed to the practical expert or the specialist in a field other than sociology. Most of the research reports are unreadable to anyone but a sociologist and consist of a conglomeration of theories, methodological considerations and figures couched in unduly technical language carelessly and vaguely written. For a great many reasons the stage of writing the report is the most hasty one, and little importance is attached to the way it is done.

The totally inefficient way (from the standpoint of communication) in which the research reports are drafted is chiefly due to the lack of any clear idea of their function. And there is another contributory factor. It is the current practice to make several copies of the research report, one or two of which go into an archive while a few others (usually just one) are lost in the desk drawers of a supposed beneficiary. This situation cannot encourage any sustained effort to edit the report or to find the most suitable form of effective communication.

A research report is actually used to provide specific information that the practical experts have only in an unsystematic, intuitive form and to indoctrinate them in sociology (what we have called creating a "sociological awareness") by enhancing their ability to understand the social components of the activity they are performing. But in order to perform this function the sociological research report should not be addressed to a limited number of people, even if they are important administrators in a system, but should be widely circulated to all those engaged in the activity of the respective system to become one of the instruments of self-management and participation in all bodies concerned in any way with the respective kind of problems.

The current system of research reports is also deficient in another respect. It contributes to the researchers' isolation from each other and impedes communication among them and any active social continuity in research. Reproduced in an extremely small number of copies, the research reports cannot come into scientific circulation in the community of sociologists even if they reach the responsible authorities in some system. Another sociologist called upon to investigate the same kind of problems cannot benefit by the experience and results acquired by those who preceded him. He often has to repeat the entire job from scratch. In other words, "scientific application" of research is practically nil in such a system.

Scientific application of an empirical sociological study means disseminating its results in professional circulation and making them the collective "property" of the scientific community from which other researchers will proceed. Therefore sociological research reports should be circulated not only in all the social systems concerned but also in the sociological research system itself, as a basic form of communication among specialists that also contributes to development of the cumulative nature of scientific research.

As we know, application in the form of books and studies published in technical journals is very important but generally limited, not only in time (publication often takes far too long) but also in content. There are a number of data of more restricted interest that normally do not require more general journalistic circulation. Therefore the research report addressed not only to the practical experts but also to the specialists interested in the respective problem is an indispensable means of scientific application. As a matter of fact, this technique has long been established in the countries with a developed sociology.

Besides ensuring effective practical and scientific application, wide dissemination of results in the form of research reports also serves other purposes. It motivates a researcher to write a research report of good quality (You write material differently if it will be read by hundreds of persons than if it is for the probable perusal of a few). Moreover it is the most effective means of professional control that the scientific community has, and it promotes high professional standards. Often these reports are the only way the scientific community can evaluate sociologists' work.

It is platitudinous to say that a science exists through its publications, books and the studies published in technical journals. There the values created in the field of the respective science are made objective, both as the basic material for its progressive development and as an external influence on practical activity. And good results have been obtained in this respect. The quality of sociological journalism has steadily improved. But the same cannot be said of its volume, which appears to be stationary. But the content of sociological journalism also has a number of drawbacks. And even if they are not characteristic of current sociological journalism as a whole, many of them not even being predominant, they exist and I think their presence is significant enough to warrant pointing them out.

Theoretical Sociological Research

In the previous discussions a certain "obsession" with methodology and epistemology was mentioned, and an excess of efforts of this kind. Clearly no one would contest the importance of methodological and epistemological studies in developing a discipline. I think it is also easy to agree that their excessive presence in proportion to the studies directly treating problems of content properly speaking of sociology is a symptom of immaturity or even of stagnation. Methodological efforts "in a vacuum" without actual research and undertaken in the hope that the results will be useful to others in future studies risk being underproductive for development of science and may even be marginal. To be sure we need good specialists in methodology, but it would be difficult to concede that we can have a good methodology with poor scientific research. Methodology can develop only in close connection with actual research experience. Otherwise it may become more of a scholastic exercise with few prospects of actually influencing research. We would have greater need of some good textbooks on methodology, translated or originally written, to disseminate the gains already made throughout the world.

I agree with Mihu Achim that the excess of epistemological studies is also a defect of Romanian sociological journalism. No theory of sociology can be developed if the actual practice of it is insufficient. Epistemological considerations tend to become mere specualtions with no effect upon actual scientific research unless they are on the real ground of science rather than the imaginary one. But I do not think these two kinds of obsessions, real to be sure, are the worst features of Romanian sociological journalism.

Theoretical and methodological amateurism, lack of scientific information at the developmental level of sociology, and misuse of the research methods are among the defects that are still quite frequent. Theoretical naivete as well as elementary methodological errors are still to be found in the Romanian publications.

I think the main shortcoming of Romanian sociology is theoretical rather than methodological. The view was held for a long time that Marxist philosophy provides sociology with a complete theoretical basis to be directed more toward empirical research. This resulted partly in an underdevelopment of the theoretical components and partly in a superficial empiricism. The theoretical gaps were often filled by endless and sterile discussions of the meanings of the various sociological terms (which in fact have no significance outside of a coherent theoretical whole) or by interminable and usually superficial citations (sometimes apologetic, sometimes severely critical) from other works. If we analyze the references in some published texts we shall be surprised to find they occur more in expressions that seem to sound well and in sentences taken out of context with little significance except in theories properly speaking or in distinct theoretical pronouncements.

The theoretical deficiencies caused difficulties in understanding the great social processes in Romanian society, leading to a superficial empiricist description of reality. What characterizes the empiricism that some sociological studies display is not excessive descriptivism but, paradoxically, its profound break with reality. They do not offer the reader facts or descriptions of the social reality and the processes and mechanisms that operate there but only the results of some processed questionnaires presented in dozens of tables with hundreds of figures. The finding from a questionnaire is still not a fact. It does not become one until it has been critically examined by a sociologist and its true significance has been established. Lack of such a critical analysis may lead to a wrong picture of reality. Such situations sometimes occur. The picture resulting from research differs radically from what is indicated by common sense and experience. The data are not coordinated in an articulated and credible picture of reality, but forced meanings and uncritical projections of rudimentary theoretical patterns are associated with them.

It has been noted that there is a mania for the questionnaire in sociology in general and especially in Romanian sociology. But in their campaign against this mania some show excessive negativism devoid of constructivism. The error appears only when the questionnaire is the sole channel for collecting information about reality. Then you have the impression that the questionnaire is a barrier between the sociologist and reality rather than an effective means to empirical knowledge. Sometimes the sociologist visits the social unit he is investigating only occasionally, and the questionnaire is almost the only way he takes cognizance of his subject, and sometimes it is even applied by others! Unqualified use of questionnaires that is not guided by a clear theoretical background is a major source of errors in sociology, and their results contain very few clear or distinct facts.

Continuity and Cumulative Quality of Research

One of the most conspicuous defects of Romanian sociology, characteristic of the beginning stage, is the poor continuity and cumulative quality of the studies. A science can live only if it is conducted in a scientific community as a result of collective cooperation, and this is particular true of sociology. We may speak of Romanian mathematics for example, but when we say "Romanian sociology" we have something much more specific in mind. By the very subject of its study (social reality not only in general but particularly the specific reality characteristic of a community), sociology has a marked national character. To employ Gusti's expression, it is to a great extent a "science of the nation."

I do not think we should say that there is an international sociological movement that we should join and benefit by its results. What I mean is that there are many things that only the sociologists who live in a given country have in common. A great part of their effort is expended on investigating them. Therefore the need of cooperation, communication and accumulation of the results on the level of the national scientific community is far more urgent for sociology. You might say that the Romanian publications lack the "sense" of belonging to the Romanian scientific community. This lack appears very clearly when we analyze the bibliographical references included actually and functionally but not formally in the published works. It may be normal for most of the quotations and references to be to foreign sociologists. But a large part of these references should be made to Romanian authors as regards both the general theoretical statements and especially the facts brought out and the theories about the Romanian reality.

As a rule Romanian sociological literature is more of a marginally constituted output in extension of the universal one, with poor internal communication so important to formation of a real national scientific community. I do not think this is to be explained by the subjective orientation of Romanian sociologists but basically by the poor quality of many of the publications. In many of the published studies it is very difficult to distinguish ideas, theories or even facts formulated clearly and distinctly enough to become a frame of reference for other sociologists.

Romanian sociology already has a history, having had a number of good and bad experiences. To become an effective movement, it must take cognizance of itself, its history and the particular path it has taken, and it must learn lessons from past experiences. The internal coherence of a scientific community is conferred not only by receiving the contributions and accumulating the results but also by the critical spirit and the disputes that help the community rid itself of errors sooner and discern the sound acquisitions with more perception.

The Sociologist As a Practical Expert

The formation of a profession of practical sociologist is one of the most difficult problems of current sociological development, and this also applies to Romanian sociology. Outside the system of professionalized scientific research and that of teaching sociology, the sociologist has begun to be involved in the practical activity of the various social systems. Accordingly the industrial sociologist and the enterprise sociologist have appeared as, especially in Romania, the emphasis has been placed on practicing sociology in the industrial system. There are also other social systems that now include sociologists as specialists who will make their own contribution along with the others to the efficiency of the social activities. Formation of the profession of practical sociologist is a sore point of Romanian sociology.

The first emphasis was place on education. There was a need of turning out young sociologists. I think two interdependent mistakes were made. In the first place, in emphasizing education in order to launch sociology as a practical profession, sociological research in its institutionalized and professionalized forms was neglected. And second, production of practical sociologists was accelerated too much. The absence of a stong research system, in my opinion, deprived Romanian sociology of the support of needed knowledge. Especially in the first developmental stages of a new professional field like that of practical sociology, research plays a crucial part. It must produce the knowledge and operational techniques essential to the practical expert. A practical profession is to a great extent the result of a collective accumulation of operational techniques and knowledge. Especially at the start, when the teachers themselves were not yet trained in the new discipline, education could not effectively train sociologists ready for practical activities. They provided only some basic knowledge and generated a professional vocation and a social and professional status rather than the tools of an effective practical activity.

Let us take the profession of industrial sociologist as an example. It was intended that every enterprise should have its sociologist, which is not bad in principle. But in practice the situation was as follows: The young graduates appointed to sociologists' positions in enterprises found themselves completely unequipped professionally. They had illusions and good intentions instead of actual kowledge. Actually, their profession was not crystallized as a profession on the level of the sociological community. Every young industrial sociologist was supposed to determine himself the problems on which he would work and to develop his operational tools. The idea was tacitly implied that every graduate can establish his own profession himself. But that is impossible. A profession is a collective product and not an individual one. The scientific system could not provide the practical expert with the works essential to his professional training and development. Romanian sociological literature is still too impoverished quantitatively and qualitatively to support such a process.

Accordingly I think the difficulties the practical sociologist is experiencing under Romanian conditions are primarily due to the lag in scientific research. The sociological situation can be remedied first by special emphasis on more rapid development of the research system and by promoting journalism of good quality. Practical sociologists cannot be mass produced until the research system succeeds in producing enough for the foundations of the various practical sociological professions to be laid.

Therefore the question is not that of recognizing the profession of industrial sociologist or not (although that too is obviously important), but one of effective preparation of the profession, which primarily depends upon the contribution of the research system. The latter must also assume its function as a methodological and professional forum for all sociologists working as practical experts. The situation can be remedied, partially at least, by expanding and institutionalizing the system of contacts between the practical sociologists and the research centers and teams, and by engaging them in the sociological research projects. And it is also clear that sociological research must also supply the scientific material essential to sociological education.

Even the strategy for practicing sociology in the practical social systems was fundamentally questionable from the standpoint of effectiveness. To take the example of the industrial enterprises again, the assignment of sociologists to enterprises was based on the implicit idea that the social problems they were to help interpret and resolve are predominantly local, characteristic of each enterprise, and soluble on the latter's level, whereas actually that is not true.

The development of the Romanian industrial system entails a number of more general social processes that can be better controlled on the higher management levels, especially in a society based on planned management. Therefore it was natural for the sociologists to be employed in investigation and formulation of solutions to the various social problems of industry beginning with the central management levels of the industrial system (industrial sectors and county management) and not on the enterprise level until the second stage. Under these circumstances, a central institute of industrial sociology could make a decisive contribution to the operation of the more general social processes and to methodological improvement of industrial sociologists in enterprises.

And finally, we must briefly discuss the problem of personnel. There are major differences there between generations because of the historical conditions under which Romanian sociology evolved. There are few representatives now of the old generation that was trained before the war and made a substantial contribution to the revival of sociology in the 1960's. The sociologists of the generation between 40 and 60 years of age came from other fields, usually from philosophy. They benefited by certain favorable conditions, but under the pressure of events they had to be professionalized rapidly, and such a situation was bound to have its effects. Those approximately between 30 and 40 years of age are the first who received a special sociological education from the start. But few of them could be kept in the system of scientific research or higher education, since they had good conditions for professional development there. But there are relatively few of them, since the phenomenon of personnel aging occurs in the field of sociology too. I do not consider the present procedure for personnel training in sociology adequate for the modern standards of the profession, and it may perpetuate amateurism and large gaps in training.

At the present time we see a growing interest in sociology in Romania, on the part of both the various administrative authorities and the mass of researchers. That is to be expected in a period of qualitative changes in the strategies of social development.

In order to cope with the increased demands on the profession of sociologist responsibly and effectively, it is our duty to analyze thoroughly the present stage and the problems and difficulties confronting us and to find the best solutions on that basis. There are many aspects of sociological research that are already under consideration by the various responsible authorities in the field. I only wished here to bring up some more general problems for discussion by my colleagues.

I am sure a frank confrontation on this subject will stimulate sociological activity in Romania by enabling it to contribute even more effectively to the solution of the great problems to be resolved by the development of Romanian society in the years to come.

COMANECI REFUTES HUNGARIAN REPORT OF HER ATTEMPTED SUICIDE

Bucharest SCINTEIA TINERETULUI in Romanian 21 Nov 81 p 5

[Article by Nadia Comaneci]

[Text] Although it had been suggested that in today's column I should offer you the questions in the new contest entitled "Who Knows Wins an Autograph," along with the answers to the regular letters, I feel obligated to postpone starting the contest so that I can dwell on something much more important.

An envelope sent by a student from Oradea contained two pages from KEPES SPORT, No 42, which appeared in Budapest on 20 October 1981. Our friend from Bihor also sent a translation of the article signed by newsman Feleki Laszlo, asking me what and how much was true from what was written there. And, so that I do not make you wait so long, here is the text published by this paper:

"David Sandor's book entitled 'Freedom of the Leap' cannot be obtained now even under the counter. Written very well and competently, it owes its popularity to Chapter 10, as Andras Ko also points out in the Sunday issue of NEPSPORT. David is a scrupulous person and everybody knows how calm he is. He is a television commentator. He does not broadcast in a spectacular style and with him the volcano is replaced by his competence. And now, if he writes about gymnastics, he is doing such a well-founded work that I would call it a scientific work if it was not so pleasant to hear the lesson. Chapter 10 in short is concerned with that human torture through which trainers transform little girls into world-class gymnasts. Yes, he transforms them, if necessary, with palms, with hitting, with the locker room or with being humiliated. Known throughout the world, Nadia Comaneci tried to commit suicide when she had to lose 10 kg. The joints of some girls are similar to those of a 75-year-old man. Perhaps the truth should be uncovered for the public at large. Because one thing is certain: at the price of such means, we do not need Olympic gold medals anymore!"

I shall save one passage from the end of this text for later. For the time being, let me dwell on the above and I think we are less interested in who Feleki Laszlo is because he did nothing but write about what he read in David Sandor's book. For a start, then, we should ask who David Sandor is in gymnastics. Personally, I have never heard of him, ahthough I know very many newsmen in the specialty from all over the world, including from Hungary, with articles signed by Peter Szalay or Istvan Gyulai always being interesting and to the point. The possibility that this particular television commentator is a technician knowledgeable in the problems of gymnastics, without also making his presence felt as a newsman in the specialty, is reduced, if not impossible. And, yet,here is David Sandor rushing into the "territory" of gymnastics, not just in any old way, but through a book published in a large number of copies, in which he issues evaluations and gives absolutely ridiculous verdicts.

In his case, for him to talk about competence seems to me to be nothing more than a joke, but to label his incursion into gymnastics as a "scientific work" is something taken beyond the limits of the good sense of the"commentator." And here is why: any scientific work has research, personal work and one's own experience at its base as well as successes in the particular area. Which does not exist in D. S.'s case since he did not feel it right, even from respect for his readers, to solidly document before placing serious assertions on paper, which encroach on the work and results of trainers and sportsmen throughout the world of gymnastics. So that D.S.'s declarations are nothing more than gossip and painful hearsay, in no way judged to be valuable for the world of gymnastics or for the readers.

I do not know on what basis D. S. asserts that one reaches world class in gymnastics through tortures, palms, humiliation and lock-ups. In my training (or that of other Romanian girl gymnasts), D. S. never attended. From what I know, the other big schools of gymnastics in the world, such as the Soviet, East German or Czech, work as we do, that is, scientifically, with passion, with pleasure, with love for this sport. True, there are palms, but they are our own, the ones we work with and which are proof of the work, palms meeting the equipment, not with cheeks, as the author insinuates insultingly. If you wish, there is also humility, but before the element of great difficulty and before perfection, which is so hard to achieve, just as fighting, but on the trampouline which propells us in the jumps, the beam or parallel bars. Sometimes even tortures exist but with the accent on the first syllable [translator's note: torturi is the Romanian word for cakes] that is, sweet ones of chocolate which repay us for our efforts, sweetening our work and accompanying our victories!

I know rather well the gymnastics of Hungary and I know and appreciate the value of its technicians, its exceptional sportsmen. Zoltan Magyar, the great champion of the vaulting horse--I always have applauded him, admiring his talent and expertise, not to speak of Eva Ovari or my old friend and partner in the competitions, Martha Egervari. Could they have reached the nice results they have obtained, through fights, humility and torture? It is hard to believe. Even if the explanation for the dark vision which D. S. has about the training methods for modern gymnastics could come from attending (by chance) Martha Egervari's training, where she might have accepted more harsh training methods. There is nothing more normal, however, in this case, bearing in mind that her training takes place within the family, since the trainer is her own...husband! Or D. S. did not know this minor detail or he knew it and wanted to come out against the conventional-educational measures practiced here and there in the family! However, there are cases when "a palm" from a parent is welcome, somethingthe author of "Freedom of the Leap" probably did not know.

And now, to come to what hurts me more, I should tell you how I committed suicide! Actually, I shall do nothing more than to give a passage from my book "Victory for My Country," which is to appear at the Bucharest Sport-Tourism Publishers, but also a passage which appeared in the volume of "Nadia, My Own Story," recently published in London:

"I was staying temporarily at the 23 August Sports Hotel in Bucharest and, that evening, I had planned to wash my clothes! I had prepared several outfits, training socks and some underwear, but I saw that I did not have any detergent. Taking a container, I went out in the hallway to ask the maid for some soap solution; I made some noise and inevitably the trainer appeared who commented that I was not sleeping although "lights out" had been called for. I showed him that I had taken some detergent to wash my equipment and angrily went back to my room. I put the container on the desk , next to another, identical, one, in which I had taken some fruit juice from the restaurant, and I began to write my mother a letter. After a while, absorbed in what I was writing and nervous, my mouth dry, I put out my hand instinctively to the container with the fruit juice. I remember perfectly that it was on the left,that is, both were, one next to the other. I took it and put the one further from me to my mouth. The one in which there was detergent and not fruit juice, as I thought! I started to take a healthy sip, in the next moment feeling the taste of lye of the solution and suddently understanding, I began to shout and hold my stomach, throwing myself down. The first to come was Dana Turner. I was able to explain what I had done and in several minutes I was taken to the Center for Sports Medicine, where the doctor on call gave me a very unpleasant stomach wash. After two days I returned to training.

"And, so that is how I did not succeed in killing myself, but concluding absolutely that it is not recommendable to drink detergent at night! You should drink juice!"

Thus, an amusing and not a tragic accident, an accident which was not a premeditated suicide because I had to lose 10 kg (!?), as several reporters hurried to write in FRG, Italy and England and as David Sandor, also totally misinformed, did later.

As for the Romanian newsmen, they found out the whole truth the next morning and, whenever we meet, some of them have begun offering me fruit juice...in a bottle!

However, all joking aside, we should dwell a moment on the problem of maintaining my weight. It really is a real problem, but not only for gymnasts but also for the male gymnasts, boxers, wrestlers or even the cosmonauts! To control your weight means to know how to fight with yourself, with your appetite, with your preferences for sweets, which I have. So it is a matter of losing, but not as demanded by someone in particular, but by the sportsman himself who wants high performance. The 10 kg written about in the book and in the particular article were only 5, but 5 kg means two days of strict diet, intense training, sauna and running and in no way a reason to panic!

Now, I shall return to the passage I saved from Feleki Laszlo's article: "I feel the note by the SPORT editors at the end of Chapter 10 is absolutely correct: 'In this chapter, the author writes his own opinion about some very complex problems, thus, his personal opinion which, at the same time, may be considered as summing up the opinions received from a group of specialists (editor's note: ???). His arguments can be opposed by contrary ones, but we are ready to hear any counterargument in our publication, 'Current Problems of Physical Education and Sports.' The Editors."

The editor's note seems eloquent to me with regard to the conviction with which the particular editors viewed the author's "views." I do not wish to make counterarguments to what David Sandor wrote, but I wanted to show what actually is the truth in this volume entitled "Freedom of the Leap." It really was much too free a leap. But...over the horse. So let me ,for once, be the judge, giving the mark of 1.00. But not like in Montreal!

P.S. To Comrade Eugen Barbu, in SAPTAMINA No 57 of 13 November 1981, my photograph appeared with Octavian Vintila.

Thanking you for your initiative in congratulating me through the magazine you head, at the same time I should inform you that the text accompanying the photograph includes an error in the date on which the interview was given. Actually I was in Brussels on my birthday.

CORRUPTION OF BAPTIST CLERGY EXPOSED

Bucharest FLACARA in Romanian 29 Oct 81 pp 1, 10

[Article by Cici Iordache]

[Text] Some time ago our editors received a completely unusual letter. Dumitru Stefan of Bucharest, aged 72, brought to our knowledge acts of corruption, fraud and theft from church funds, being committed by some Baptist pastors in the Bucharest community. Since he dared to speak publicly about them, he was expelled from the cult (one asks puzzled, why pastor Vasile Talos was not expelled from the cult following the shameful act he committed, together with other brothers concerned with counting money , obtaining large amounts from the church collection for personal interests. The amounts were taken out before the money was counted. A fact known by the leadership of the Bucharest community, that is, the president and secretary, but silently overlooked). Of course, if the problem of religion and the belief of the person who wrote us is a personal matter of his, which the country's constitution guarantees and respects, if expelling the corrupt pastor is a matter for the particular cult and other organs, in the name of the laws and morals of our society, however, we cannot be indifferent to the fact that a citizen--even if he is a pastor--changes religion into a springboard for troublesome businesses and that he is hiding acts of corruption under the shield of it and defying social structures.

The old man's letter led us to settle other similarly inadmissible acts.

We Are Refused Any Explanation

Of course, our first steps were to the leadership of the cult's Bucharest community. In an austere office with many working tables where nobody was working, its president greets us; this is pastor Iosif Sarac, who refuses to have any talk with us. We hardly had said who we were and why we had come when he accused us "of interfering in the cult's affairs." (!!) He does not even allow us to answer, he speaks by himself in a raised voice, fighting we don't known whom, asserting, sustaining, that "the church decides what it does with its money and in no way does FLACARA." In his tirade, with deformed logic, he does not realize that he is betraying what is understands by "church." That is, himself, the president of the community and its clan in sacrileges. But let us allow the facts to speak for themselves.

Masked Embezzlement

Of course, how could the very initiator, encouraging and concealing, explain to us the figures and motivation for a theft of 651,699 lei? In his capacity as president of the Bucharest community of the Baptist cult, by abusing his function, the pastor Iosif Sarac had at his disposal the community's money however he wanted it, ignoring any financial discipline and legislation of the country, which is valid equally for the cult organizations, as well, with its being a question of the state's money. The methods of withdrawing it and establishing an "autonomy," where--in his opinion, a curious opinion--nobody was allowed to penetrate, not even a state financial organ with checking functions, were many and very clever. "The money is ours and we do what the church decides with it!" he maintains forcefully, confusing the church and the cult members with himself and the several supporters he carefully had selected. The pastor president does not feel dutybound to give an account of what he did with the community's money, not even to the Executive Committee of the Union of Christian Baptist Communities, the highest forum, and he feels wronged, considering as "interference" even the basic management check made during this year by specialists, legally undertaken following some complaints and notifications by some of the cult's members. The main tactic and his cover were disorder in the recordkeeping method and in the preservation and deposits of the cash coming from the churchgoers. The cash register was kept unnumbered and not initialed, contrary to all valid legal provisions for all organs, forums and organizations which handle money. Large amounts of between 1,000-17,000 lei were kept on balance, from which the so-called payments were made, with the well-calculated purpose of avoiding bank checks on the issuance and utilization of the cash. Since the same person Ioan Olariu--a fact incompatible with the law--was holding both the job of cashier as well as the community's accountant, a check of the receipt documents and payments was not being made or of the correctness of the balance written in the register of cash. Who was going to do it? Should Ioan Olariu check on Ioan Olariu? If he were to become too scrupulous in his respect for legal financial standards, he could anger Iosif Sarac, the pastor president, reminding him that he could not have at his disposal and parcel out the money received from the parishioners as funds for the cult affairs and support of the churches (as the state provides)! Because he would have harmed his own pocket first,the one which the amiable pastor filled plentifully. Anyway, the shirt is closer than the jacket! Although a state retired person, Ioan Olariu innocently received his complete pension and salary as cashier, damaging the state social security fund, without recalling the law which regulates receiving a salary and a pension. So, illegally, he received more than 12,000 lei, plus "aid," plus "allowances" plus "prizes" from the "leadership fund." The "leadership fund," another defiance of financial discipline and of the provisions of Decree 85/1976, another broad, very broad channel through which the parishioners' money flowed like rivers into the pockets of the small clan: Iosif Sarac, president of the community; Pascu Geabou of Alexandria, pastor secretary, and cashier Ioan Olariu. Here is what the documents say. In less than two years, the first one gave himself "exceptional allowances" valued at 9,544 lei in about three successive stages through abuse and without legal basis around the winter holidays. In legal terms this means embezzlement of the church wealth, a public wealth! Following the president's example, the pastor Vasile Brinzei presented himself with even more substantial "allowances of 7,500 lei in 1979 and another 7,500 in 1980,each quarter and sometimes even bimonthly. In 2 years, 15,000 lei, along with his salary and other incomes obtained in the cult! Some pastors in the Bucharest community, besides the manner shown by the person who wrote us, completed their budget by giving themselves "gifts" from the church money. They signed payment orders in order to give themselves birthday presents of coats, shirts and ties. In other words, one "brother" works and another spends! But the manner of the "aid" (as provided by the cult's statutes)more often was used even more flagrantly in order to load the pockets of those few. (How could the contributing members of the cult not react, when it is a matter precisely of the pastors and not just any pastors, but the ones elected to the community's leadership?!) Using the motive that he has many children and has a right to "aid," Pascu Geabou obtained 6,050 lei along with his salary as pastor, along with the allowances for leadership as secretary of the Bucharest community, along with the "exceptional allowances," along with other incomes obtained in the cult, from two churches (nursing from two sheep) in Alexandria and from Nenciulesti Commune. On top of that, he is harsh with others in social life as well as his "brother" Iosif Sarac and is turbulent in relations with the official state structures and institutions. On his own account he took the initiative to have the church in Tiganesti demolished, doing this as a kind of rebellion, not to put it another way, on the day of our people's national holiday, on 23 August, and promising the parishioners that he would build another one, more splendid, with the hard currency he would obtain through his relations abroad. He loses another 14,000 lei, buying a building for a house of prayer without legal authorization and from a citizen who cannot provide legal proof that he belonged to him and that he was its owner.

In order to see Geabou Pascu's moral appearance, we give you part of Marin Stanescu's letter:

"I am a 71-year-old citizen who has enjoyed the freedom of conscience and of belonging to a cult in conformity with Article 30 of the Constitution of the Socialist Republic of Romania until 1974, the date from which I no longer have enjoyed this right. The reason is that preacher Geabou Pascu is at the Baptist church in Alexandria; he removed me from the Baptist cult because I reminded him not to date a certain woman anymore, but he pushed me wildly and injured me, I found myself all bloody, cut by the window and held by the hands as he was trying to strangle me and I began to shout and the militia came and saved me. From that dangerous scandal, I have been left with an illness which have now been aggravated. If we have been ensured freedom, we must be people who are of use to society, good people and not for preachers like Geabou Pascu to strangle us."Cashier Ion Olariu also is somebody "aided" (probably for him to improve on his amnesia when it comes to legality) with consistent amounts: 6,000 lei in 1980 alone. And these are the amounts which, in exchange, "aided" people whose family difficulties perhaps were acute: Alexandru Ferche, 2,500 lei (1979 and 1980) in 2 years and Radu Ilie--500 lei. This is how the cult is understood and respected by its president-pastor Iosif Sarac, the person who, proven to be tendentious and irrational, interprets our right to resolve the workers' letters, regardless of belief, as "interference in the cult's affairs!" Investigating the truth and revealing the embezzlers, we are giving proof of respect for the country's constitution, respect for a religious cult, recognized by the state and the members of which, in context, are required to respect the laws of the state. But let us go further. The methods of stealing funds from the community's wealth, as we were saying, were much more numerous, with disorder and offences being spread to all chapters of the budget of the Baptist community of Bucharest. Including that of salaries. Not even in this sector, where speculations can no longer be made, the standards of the Code of Labor and of other regulations in effect are not being respected. Iosif Sarac and Pascu Geabou were being paid supposedly by the hour for their jobs as president and secretary with amounts which were 50 percent greater than the salary for the basic job as pastors of the church contrary to the legal provisions for salaries for personnel in cult units. The former received 5,316 lei additional in 3 years and the latter--5,492. Pastor Vasile Brinzei, although he has a secondary school training and around 10 years' seniority in his job, is employed in a higher grade of salary than due him, with his being paid 3,600 lei additional, until the financial check. Pastor Buni Cocar was paid 20,718 lei as "allowances" and "collaboration prizes" during 7 months, exceeding by 8,000 lei the legal amount for his job and seniority. Payments were made--tens of thousands of lei--in the form of "aid" to persons who could not be identified and, thus, who could not confirm the intent of the money. Employment of persons also was made without legal basis, without work contracts, however, paying them salaries

"by ear." Fixed assets were obtained, also without support of the law. Tens of thousands of lei were spent for official dinners, without justifying acts, with the regulations of the cult themselves being violated.

Contributing members of the church give the money they have worked for honestly at their jobs, while others send it to the devil! It is not merely from their own po ket and work; what is more, they are rounding out their own personal incomes as best they can. If these acts legally could be called embezzlement, an abuse of one's job, fraud, negligence in management of financial resources of the community, what could they be called morally? Are they not incompatible with the very statute of the cult and of any faith? Of any morals ?! The Executive Committee of the Union of Christian Baptist Communities of Romania, through its president, pastor Cornel Mara, and the secretary general Paul Barbatei, an attorney, ensured us in August that these violations would be discussed at the September meeting of the committee, when recommendations would be made for the particular churches to take measures. Coming back in October, we found that nothing was begun, with just 12,065 lei having been recovered on the basis of a receipt, representing "recovery of salary" from the one with the lay job, from the cashier Ion Olariu. But when will the 651,699 lei be covered? Who is interested in supporting such a group? Is it not cause for the investigative and criminal organs to intervene?

PROPOSED CHANGES IN LOCAL-LEVEL LC ORGANIZATION

Belgrade KOMUNIST in Serbo-Croation 30 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Velimir Filipovic: "According to the Requirements of Practice"]

[Text] Although no great changes can be expected from the changes and additions to the LC [League of Communists] Statute that are to be adopted by the forthcoming party congresses, it is already quite well known that the Statute should be supplemented with the regulations attained from practical experience of the League of Communists.

First of all, Tito's initiatives on collective work, leadership and responsibility must be included in the new Statute, as well as some changes in the procedural and organizational methods of Party organizations, which practical experience between the two congresses has imposed as a necessity.

All of these changes, that is, the proposals to change and supplement the statute, were drawn up and explained in extensive material prepared by the appropriate commissions of the LCY Central Committee and the Serbian LC, and they are being discussed right now in the LC intercommune conferences in Serbia.

More Precise Definitions of Democratic Centralism

At a meeting of the chairmen of the commune statutory commissions and the members of the statutory commissions of the LCY Central Committee and the Serbian LC Central Committee, which took place at the beginning of October in Nis, all of these proposed changes received wide support. It must be said right off that there were no problems with including Tito's initiatives on collective work, leadership and responsibility in the new party statutes.

Likewise, not much time or words were spent on the part of the discussion regarding the need to further strengthen and define more precisely democratic centralism, as the basic norm for party life and work. It was especially requested that the LC's responsibility for overall relations within our community be emphasized more. This applies not only to the implementation of the decisions made by higher agencies by lower ones, but also to the rights and responsibilities of the lower agencies to establish and prepare the decisions to be made "at the top."

In connection with this, a proposal was accepted that a change be made in the present statutory provision concerning the LC inter-commune conferences, which have up until now only been a place for agreement and coordination or the positions of commune party organizations from the same region. According to the new proposal, the LC inter-commune conference will be high-level LC agencies, links between the commune conference and the Centrl Committee. Their decisions are to be binding on all commune organizations, thus achieving greater unity within the region and breaking down divisions along commune borders.

According to the material prepared for these discussions, the most changes are to be made in commune LC organization, i.e. the commune conference. It is not very precisely defined in the present statute, but it has been the highest party agency in the commune, and a forum. According to the proposals for changing and supplementing the statute, which are supported in Nis, in the future it is only to be a forum. It will meet once during its mandate, when it will adopt a working program and elect the members of the commune committee. The committee will elect a presidium as its executive political body.

What Is Achieved By This?

First of all, as was stated during the discussions in Nis, it would increase the responsibility of the committee both to the commune organization and to the higher party agencies and forums, and it would make the work of the committee more efficient.

Accepting these additions to the statute, the participants in the talks proposed that the new statute provide for the possibility of having the commune conference hold an extraordinary meeting when this is indicated by special requirements, without having to wait for the next elective meeting. In addition to this, a request was also reiterated during this discussion to have this establishment of the commune Party leadership approved during the next elections through special decisions by the Central Committee, so that elections at the beginning of next year or after the congress would not be held by the old method, a few months later by the new method.

It was also proposed that the present action conferences for several local communities, which were defined at previous congresses as action forms of LC organization in the large communes, be transformed into permanent forms of organization, while the Nis communists are arguing for regional LC conferences.

Changes in the LC and Associated Labor

In spite of the tangible results from the action organization of the LC in the larger COURSs [basic organizations of associated labor], firms and companies, many weaknesses with respect to this were also encountered during the period between the two congresses. First of all, greater affirmation of unity, and united actions by several basic organizations [of LC], were lacking, and so a partialization of interests and a separation of the basic organizations within the OUR framework were substituted.

In order to avoid this, and in particular for democratic centralism, which has more and more often been pushed into the background here, to be more fully expressed, it is being proposed that permanent conferences be elected for all of the LC basic organizations from a single firm from the area of a commune.

It should be said at once that this change caused a considerable amount of discussion. It was first of all requested that the new changes and additions to the statute define more precisely the method and content of the work of the newly proposed permanent organizational forms, especially the rights and duties of its leading bodies, since a fear was expressed that an LC thus constituted within associated labor would reduce the independence of the basic organizations, especially of those who during the period between the two congresses became actively capable of operating in a new way.

During the discussion in Nis, it was proposed that party work and organization at all Yugoslav universities be uniformly regulated, and it was considered most appropriate for the university LC organization to have the rank of a commune LC organization. In accordance with this proposal, a conference with a committee and a presidium would be constituted at a university, as well as in a commune.

Also aired at this meeting were some more views on defining a quorum in the work of the LC basic organizations, ideological and political measures in the League of Communists, and other issues, but it was decided that the proposed material to change and supplement the statute would be supported, with the "main discussion" of it to take place in all commune organizations, when the Central Committee commissions draw up a complete proposal to change and supplement the Statute, which is to be adopted at the LC congresses.

LC DEFENDS DEMOCRATIC CENTRALISM AGAINST 'BOURGEOIS CONCEPT'

Belgrade KOMUNIST in Serbo-Croation 13 Nov 81 p 20

[Article by Petar Mandic: "The Bourgeois Concept of the Party"]

[Text] Since the beginnings of its formation, the Communist vanguard has been faced with tendencies of bourgeois thought that are trying to dissolve it ideologically and organizationally and thus make it incapable of fulfilling its historic role. The opportunism and reformism of the Second International have left a deep mark in the Communist movement, with recrudescences of which, although in various forms, we have been faced up until the present day. The central issue over which the battle with opportunists of all shades is being wage is democratic centralism. Challenging the value of this principle has always been closely associated with challenging the role of the party itself in the development of society.

We also encounter these ideas in the Yugoslav social democratic parties before the creation of the CPY [Communist Party of Yugoslavia]. The dilemmas over the role of the party, and the method of its organization and activity, including the resistance to building the Party on the basis of the principle of democratic centralism, which originated with the Second International, were manifested in these parties, especially in those under the influence of opportunistic Austro-Hungarian social democracy. The petty bourgeois and opportunistic ideological influences that flowed from these parties are, in fact, the ideological sources from which resistance has come for a long time to the organization and activity of the CPY on the basis of the principle of democratic centralism.

The Platform of the Liquidation of Democratic Centralism

We were also faced with anarcholiberalist ideas regarding the role of the CPY at the beginning of the 1950s, in the form of Djilasism and challenging the role of the League of Communists and its organization on the basis of the principle of democratic centralism. This challenge to the role of the LCY and the principle of democratic centralism, however, has deep social roots, and is closely linked to a misunderstanding of the essence of self-management and the possibilities for its development.

The class limitation of anarcholiberalist thought is manifested in its inability to perceive self-management as a historically new form of the organization of society and production relations; this does not endanger the unity of society, but rather consolidates it, and on democratic foundations, which gives this unity a special character. The anarcholiberalist concepts of self-management do not exceed the limits of the Proudhonist concept of socialism, in which the emphasis is put on the pluralism of interests of economic groups, while "workers' democracy" is based on principles that take most into account personal interests and the interests of one's own group, which, according to Proudhon, cannot be sacrificed at any cost to histocial interests of the working class and to the general interests of society.

Erroneously interpreting self-management as a spontaneous social trend and as ensuring "unlimited democracy for everyone," Djilas arrives at the idea that it is also necessary to give political expression to the changes that, in his view, are taking place in the everyday social life of socialism, i.e. that self-management, as a form of "economic pluralism," must also be given a political expression in the form of a multiparty system. Inspired by the illusion of a pluralist democracy, Djilas falls back on the positions of the bourgeois criticism of socialism, and doubts the possibility of a revolutionary transformation of society and the ability of the working class and the League of Communists to complete the socialist transformation of society. For the apologists of the bourgeois criticism of socialism, socialist revolutions do not bring anything new to the work class; they are authentic only during the revolt of the masses against the old authorities, but end in a blind alley when the bureacracy comes to power and when it constitutes itself as the "new class."

A corresponding concept of the League of Communists is also derived from the anarcholiberalist concept of the organization of society. This idea sees the way out of the "vicious circle" as removing the League of Communists from the political scene, feeling that it has completed its social and historical mission and that it has already become a conservative force and a factor that limits more rapid democratic development of society. As a matter of fact, anarcholiberals are fully aware that during all of the stages of the revolution, the League of Communists has been confirmed as the undeniable vanguard of the working class; that it still represents an ideological factor that has a crucial influence on the class nature of social relationships; and that without eliminating it, it is impossible to undertake any successful measures aimed at the restoration of a pluralistic system of bourgeois democracy.

In order to eliminate the League of Communists, anarcholiberalist thought is first of all speaking out against the LCY's organization on the basis of the principle of democratic centralism, expanding on the thesis according to which democratic centralism is the source of the LCY's bureaucratization. At the same time, a myth is being developed about the need to expand "absolute democracy" within the LCY. This, in fact, has been a platform for the abolition of democratic centralism and the legalization of factions and the coexistence of different ideologies within the LCY. It has been suggested that the League of Communists become a forum for expressing all idological currents, regardless of the class nature.

The Ground for a Restoration of Bourgeois Democracy

Demanding minority rights and the legalization of factions, anarcholiberalist thought is "pushing" the League of Communists into the position of an ordinary bourgeois party, since without democratic centralism, and ideological and organizational unity, the League of Communists would not exist as the true ideological and active vanguard of the working class. The liquidationist tendencies in regard to the League of Communists are especially expressed in Dijilas's positions on the role of the membership and the primary organizations of the LC. He sees the primary organizations of the League of Communists as groups of people "whose work and activity should not be controlled or directed by anyone, nor should they receive a [policy] line from anyone, but rather they, in accordance with their own feelings and through the theses and discourses that are discussed, should themselves determine their position toward the circumstances of the milieu in which they live and work."

For Djilas, democratization of the League of Communists consists of abandoning organized work and of a temporary, arbitrary, and nonobligatory gathering of the membership. He thus advocates a complete abandonment of permanent forms for the LCY's organization and activity, while he idealizes the method of spontaneous individual work by LC members as "free spirits" who act as they see fit. Everything is aimed a liquidating democratic centralism, in order for the League of Communists to cease in this way to act as the united and organized vanguard of the working class.

Djilas's version of LCY democraticization--based on overcoming democratic centralism--has the nature of a demand to convert the League of Communists into several parties or factions, of which "some could be less democratic and some could be more so." In this, the way is seen to "lead" society to a new "style of living" that would finally find its political expression in a bourgeois multiparty system. Dijilas is aware of the fact that nothing will come of his anarcholiberalist illusions if the League of Communists continues to retain its position as the ideological vanguard of society and if it acts on the basis of democratic centralism. This is why he is arguing so heatedly for an ideological and organizational weakening of the LCY, because this would at the same time mean removing the League of Communists from the main currents of the ideological struggle. In place of the League of Communists as the vanguard of development, social currents would surrender to the spontaneous relationship of class forces, whose main characteristic would be free competition in the economy, and political pluralism in politics.

We again encountered the ideas of anarcholiberalism at the end of the 1960's and the beginning of the 1970's. These were new attempts by the defenders of these ideas to participate in their own way in the processes that were initiated in the democratization of society and in the League of Communists. The approach taken by the protagonists of these ideas has the nature of ideological preparation for creating an anarchic situation in Yugoslavia under the guise of the struggle for self-managing democracy, and thus preparing the ground for a restoration of a plurlistics democracy with a bourgeois ideological content. The first step in this direction was attacking the League of Communists as a "bureacratized" social force that had to be repressed at any cost. For this purpose, the thesis is being presented that the LCY and its activity on the basis of the principle of democratic centralism are opposed to self-managing production relations, and that the League of Communists has for this very reason become a hindrance to the continued development of self-management.

In order to disguise the counter-revolutionary motives behind such slogans, a thesis was developed according to which self-management has already achieved such a level of development that is has made is possible to resolve all of the problems and contradictions of society without any intervention by the League of Communists. What is more, the viewpoint has also been defended that the less the League of Communists interferes in issues that are decided upon by self-managing agencies, the more rapidly self-management will develop.

This illusion has been used to justify abandoning the working class to the spontanous relationship of forces and to uncontrolled trends in society. It was desired that a "neutral" space would be opened up in society, without the ideological power of the LCY, thus making it possible for bourgois ideology to penetrate and to influence the main currents of social development.

TITO BIOGRAPHER DEDIJER INTERVIEWED ON LATEST VOLUME

Text of Interview

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1610, 8 Nov 81 pp 26-29

[Interview with Dr Vladimir Dedijer, historian and author of "Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita" [New Contributions to the Biography of Josip Broz Tito], by Milo Gligorijevic, NIN editor: "A Biographer's Confession"]

[Text] "Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita" [New Contributions to the Biography of Josip Broz Tito], this is a book which is being talked about, which has been denoted as a turning point in the writing of contemporary history. I see peace of mind in the face of its author, Vladimir Dedijer, member of the academy, since the second volume is already in the hands of the readers, and the third is at the printer's. Dedijer declares: "I owe boundless gratitude to the late president for having supplied me with the methodology of writing contemporary history. In the letter he wrote to me in 1952 he says that we contemporaries cannot render the final judgments of his life and struggle. This can be done only by future generations of historians. Tito expressed the same idea in the preface to his 1977 'Sabrana djela' [Collected Works]."

We conducted the interview at Dedijer's house in Belgrade, which is located in Kopitareva Gradina. Around us is furniture which might belong to some poor man's household and many books and notes and letters. Dedijer obviously does not use money to purchase the satisfaction of luxuries. In donating 500 million old dinars to humanitarian causes, money received exclusively from "Novi prilozi ...," he obtained a different and far greater satisfaction.

But before I put the first question, I have to copy down his credo as a scholar from the second volume of "Novi prilozi ...":

"As I write the first lines of a chronicle of the life and struggle of Josip Broz Tito, a man whom I loved and respected, it is my duty to constantly bear in mind his devotion to the idea of truth, justice and impartiality. I will adhere to that principle if I am able until I complete the very last line of this book, since I, too, have a duty to be governed by Tito's legacy as to the need to respect the truth and justice in every matter, including the writing of chronicles and histories."

And I will also copy these sentences:

"Accordingly, all of us who have been participants in contemporary events must be aware that the scales of history is our sole judge. It will determine what was accurate and what was not. I apply this sacred rule not only to my own writings, but also to those of all other contemporaries, including Tito himself."

Now the interview can begin.

[Question] For decades now you have been gathering material on Tito's life. I see that you have documents from the confidential Roosevelt Archives. Roosevelt's wife Eleanor, who had a great respect for Comrade Tito, released them exclusively to you. You obtained the secret wartime correspondence between Hitler and the Japanese leaders in which Hitler informed the Japanese about his operations against Tito. You have obtained pearls from the British Archives. You also have certain documents from Soviet Archives which have never been published in Yugoslavia. Finally, I see that just before his death Comrade Tito issued an order that all our archives be opened to you. How much of this material have you used in writing "Novi prilozi ..."?

The Theory of Distance

[Answer] Only one-fifth. The second volume was conceived as a book of 600 pages, but it has twice as many. Of course, it was not only the enormous amount of material that dictated refraining from publishing certain facts today. As an adherent to the theory of distance, I deliberately refrained from using those documents which on the basis of my conscience as a scholar I believe should remain under lock and key for some time yet.

[Question] Please give us examples of this restraint.

[Answer] In certain cases I felt that I dare not reveal certain facts for the sake of my country's security. I say this openly. And I add: this is not any reason of state, but an act of patriotism. I do not wish to publish a single document which would weaken the defensive might of my homeland. Those are motives which I think any honorable man will find sufficient.

[Question] And examples in which the provisions of the theory of distance had a part to play?

[Answer] I will tell you that 6,000 confidential documents passed through the hands of Josip Kopinic, a man with an exciting biography, a man who fought in Spain, and the head of one of the centers for the Comintern's communications with 8 communist parties. The documents are in Moscow and at one other place. It is not my business to ask Kopinic where. When he told me about the investigations against Tito in Moscow, about how Srebrenjak was after Tito's head, I was compelled--as an historian--to compare that testimony with other sources and information. I took my conversation with Tito in June 1951, when there was also reference to investigations and when Tito said to me: "The time has not yet come for that to be published." I concluded that Kopinic's account sounded rather authentic, but, intending to use it along with the original documents, I sent a researcher Vjenceslav Cencic to Moscow at my own expense. Cencic was very well received in Moscow and he obtained all the numbers and registers of documents concerning the investigation against Comrade Tito. When Kopinic found out about this, he became a bit testy. He said: So you don't believe me! I said: It is not you I doubt, but above all myself and everything I have written.

How Kalabic Ended Up

[Question] I have the impression that the fact that some participants are still alive has deterred you from a detailed description of certain events.

[Answer] Of course. That is also in conformity with the theory of distance. In 1950, on Rankovic's order and with Tito's consent, I wrote an account of the seizure of Draza Mihailovic on the basis of the most confidential documents together with Krcun Penezic. I delivered it to Rankovic, and he--in a gesture of confidence--gave me a copy. Even today I cannot publish the entire text of the account. It contains a description of the murder of Nikola Kalabic, the Chetnik general who betrayed Draza. An agreement had been made with Kalabic. Kalabic was given his life and offered a chance to go abroad, but that arrangement fell through because Draza Mihailovic related to his lawyer the circumstances under which he was captured. Then Kalabic was assigned a place where he was to stay in a village, but he liked to come to Belgrade, he liked carousing. According to the documents I obtained and the account of Krcun Penezic, one of the participants in Kalabic's murder is still among the living.

[Question] Are there also ethical reasons why a chronicler might pass over certain names and facts in silence?

[Answer] In two or three of his books Djilas has expressed an unfavorable opinion concerning the wives of certain high-level Yugoslav leaders whose politics did not agree with his in 1954. He wrote that two of the wives had been all but women of easy virtue before their marriage. One of them I have known since her youth and I know that Djilas' assertion is untrue. You know, in the West he could not have done this if it involved women in the West, he would not have dared to publish it! The laws there strictly prohibit that. But this is the Balkans, and Djilas was waging a political struggle which suited certain circles in the West, and so--in this specific case--he turned out to have been hasty and base.

Now I will give you a different example, a case of virtue, and at length I will answer your question. The late Bertrand Russell, a great philosopher, was married and divorced four times. He had some theories of his own about the relationship between men and women, but--as he himself says--they all broke down in his life. Never in the divorce proceedings did Russell wish to respond to the charges nor utter an unpleasant word about his former wives. Never did he reveal the reasons why the marriages broke up. With one wife he had a contract concerning complete sexual freedom, with the proviso that children were not to be conceived in extramarital affairs. However, it came to pass that the lady was incautious and became pregnant while he was away in the United States. How did the famous philosopher behave in this case? With chivalry. He obtained a quiet and dignified divorce, entrusting his feelings only to papers which will see the light of day only at some distant date in the future. Russell the humanist did not wish for ethical reasons to publish those sentiments of his. Had he delivered an attack on the peace of mind of his former wife, it is quite certain that he would have menaced the peace of mind of his progeny as well.

[Question] It says in "Novi prilozi ..." that you obtained a great many eyewitness accounts from people who hold high positions and from ordinary people. You call this history from above and history from below.

[Answer] You have to realize that "Prilozi ..." is not any kind of government book, not any sort of official book, but one of the 400 books about Tito. At one time I asked Tito himself that we assert this: that "Prilozi ..." is only one of the views of his life and struggle. And he concurred in this without hesitation. Such a book cannot, of course, be written without documents, and I therefore went to certain comrades as well as to those who had witnessed events firsthand, and I described those meetings and conversations. I was greatly helped by Edvard Kardelj, Vladimir Bakaric, Cvijetin Mijatovic, Milos Minic, Petar Stambolic, Jakov Blazevic, Dobrivoje Vidic, Stane Dolanc, Lidija Sentjurc, Aleksandar Grlickov, Bosko Siljegovic ... but there were also leaders who did not reply at all to my letter or to my question. That is their right. There were also certain comrades who agreed to see me, but when they heard what I was asking, they avoided meetings with me. They also have the right to behave in that way.

[Question] How do you interpret this difference in behavior?

[Answer] Ours is a pluralistic society, there are differing desires and differing interests in it. But, my lad, I prefer to speak about those who behave well than about the others. Bakaric, displaying a trait that sets him apart, wrote to me: "I will not interfere." One leader from Serbia, a member of the Presidium of the LCY Central Committee (he has asked me not to divulge his name), said: "Vlado, I will read your book only when it is published." And I therefore emphasize: I am very proud that I have written this book freely in my own country. I believe that I am the only person who has managed that and it is my desire that other authors win that same right.

Blows From Every Direction

[Question] In the second chapter of the second volume you speak about your apartment being broken into in Belgrade, you speak about abnormally frequent power failures and telephone failures in Istria, about a sudden flood, about missing documents, about threats you and your collaborators received. How do these facts fit into your story about writing the book freely?

[Answer] It is true that for a time the going was not easy for me and that the battle for this book was more difficult than the battle on Sutjeska. There we knew the positions of the German 369th Division and the 1st Alpine Division, where the enemy was taking cover and where he was firing from. But in this case the enemy would appear suddenly and from all directions, and I often had to exclaim: God save me from my friends, I will take care of my enemies myself! There were demands for the book to be banned because it was pro-Djilas, because it was anti-Kardelj. Glows began to come immediately after the publication of Tito's two telegrams in NIN, which contained the criticism of Hebrang's separatistic and nationalistic aspirations in Croatia. There were, then, attempts to censor Tito, to suppress the material about Hebrang. There were also blows that came from here in Belgrade. I was not able to depart from my basic view and Tito's legacy. I sent out letters, I explained that I was not writing this book in a coproduction with any official body or any individual, that I am respecting the laws of this country and that I am accountable to historical truth and to my reviewers. I must acknowledge that those arguments of mine were accepted by the top leaders in this country, and I finished the book in complete freedom and without pressures. I repeat that this only does honor to my homeland. Thanks to Vladimir Bakaric, a man of profoundly democratic leanings, I was given the occasion to shatter those accusations in an interview published in START.

[Question] Now that you mentioned the interview in START, I cannot but recall your statements that you asked Aleksandar Rankovic for his opinion about bugging Josip Broz Tito. In "Novi prilozi ..." you included Bakaric's hypothesis that Rankovic and Jovanka Broz eavesdropped on the president. Consistent with your basic position that all relevant testimony should be heard, you turned to Aleksandar Rankovic. What was heard from him?

[Answer] You're asking a great deal. Certain individuals, when they gave me responses, rightly asked that certain rules be respected. All I can say to you about this case is that I received from Rankovic's people a copy of the material on eavesdropping and the use of tapes. That response also contains the assertion that Rankovic himself was bugged. I have now gone to work with my researchers to find documents which will either confirm or refute this thesis of Rankovic's.

The Story About Jovanka Broz

[Question] In gathering material for "Novi prilozi ..." did you also call upon others who once held high positions of leadership?

[Answer] I certainly did. I would be a poor historian if I turned only to Rankovic as the witness of important historical events. For example, I will tell you in confidence, I also wrote to Jovanka Budisavljevic Broz and Stane Kavcic and certain other individuals. But some people, to tell you the truth, are afraid to make statements. Yesterday I met a great war hero from Serbia. When I asked him about his removal from office, he clammed up completely. I felt very sorry for this great man of our revolution.

[Question] We have arrived at a new question: history from below.

[Answer] I consider firsthand accounts of ordinary people to be most valuable sources. I will give as an example of such an account the one I received from a comrade, a Partisan, a man who spent 22 years alongside Tito performing a technical function. My telephone had been cut off in Sipar, where I work, so I went over to Opatija. I spent 5 weeks there shut up in a hotel, up on the top floor, and there I finished the book. They installed special telephones so that I would be able to communicate with archives in Yugoslavia and abroad. Every day I would go out to lunch in a restaurant, I would order stuffed peppers, and after lunch I would drink coffee and listen to the stories this interesting man told. He recounted to me, for example, a characteristic that does credit to Jovanka Broz. Mrs Broz was a good housewife, she oversaw everything. On the eve of Nasser's arrival on Brioni she made a last inspection to see that everything was in order. To her horror she saw that the oranges on the little plate were marked "Jafa"--Israeli oranges. Since she was a politically aware person, she immediately removed those oranges. I think that accounts like those that man gave me tell a great deal about people, about their characters. He also told me, I might add as well, who was the only individual to raise his voice in a conversation with Comrade Tito.

[Question] Who was that individual?

[Answer] Well, you see, here again the laws of the theory of distance are operative.

[Question] When we spoke last May in Zagreb, you said that Tito was a man of broad range, with passions and faults, but a man of noble feelings. How has your thesis about his magnanimity been confirmed now that you have studied the most recent historical material concerning Tito?

[Answer] Consider how Tito behaved toward the people who had tried him, who had arrested and beaten him. He did not go after their heads. He was not a man who sought revenge. To be sure, I did hear the opposite opinion from certain people who were not in power.

I think that Tito inherited the mildness I speak of from his mother. At one time I committed a major oversight in not having described that figure in closer detail, and I am now making up for that lapse. It was she who gave him gentleness. You know, as I once said, I was also trying to figure out which was predominant in his traits, decisiveness and firmness or mildness and warmth. But the more documents I gathered, the more of them people sent to me, the more I became convinced of his magnanimity. Take, for example, his love for Davorjanka Paunovic. Uninformed people have asked me if it was true that Davorjanka was murdered. Here, I am leafing through the case history of her disease, which is written in a physician s uneven hand. I see that all her crises where life hung in the balance have been described, and I know that Tito's letters reached her in the days before she died. Tito knew that there was no hope for her, but he wrote as though this girl would live a long life. He did not display this attitude solely toward poor Davorjanka, who was a Vlach from eastern Serbia, but also toward the other women he was close to. In this attitude of his he differed essentially from certain of his fellow warriors who after the war left their good wives, peasant martyrs, and abandoned their children, in order to marry ornamental little butterflies from the city.

The Bitter Fifties

[Question] What was Tito's relationship to comrades with whom he parted ways?

[Answer] Tito had said somewhere: "No one can ever charge me with having destroyed them." But a complete answer would require talking to all such people.

[Question] What was Tito's attitude toward you after 1954, after the Djilas case? And what were your feelings in the second half of the fifties?

[Answer] Here is what I wrote in "Novi prilozi ...":

"Often, even against Tito's wishes, Rankovic systematically organized ways of punishing me.

"I have left abundant material on this, a journal written day by day, especially concerning the sufferings of those closest to me, and even the parents of Olga [Dedijer's first wife, killed in the war], and of my wife Vera, who had rejected the demand that she leave me and five children because of my treason, as it was put to her in a party meeting.

"I was thrown out of the School of Philosophy, all employment was taken away from me, but I had to feed five children in the house and the three of us adults. All of my books had been withdrawn from sale, and for all of 13 years not a single book of mine was published in Yugoslavia, right up until Rankovic fell from power.

"However, those hours which were bitter for me personally and especially for my family did not create hatred toward Tito and the country, since I do not look upon their struggle and life from a narrow personal viewpoint. That is why now, in undertaking to write this book, I cannot forget that tortured period of my life, when I was in conflict with the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia even against my will, but neither can I allow one tree to block my view of the entire forest."

[Question] I do not know whether you are aware, Professor Dedijer, that "Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita" is at the top of the best seller list. How do you explain that fact?

[Answer] All books about Tito based on fact sell well, all those which do not resemble lives of the pharaohs, which do not have the tone and style of hagiographies, books in which facts rather than adjectives are strung one after the other. That sad book about Tito's funeral sold, I believe, 160,000 copies. Maclean's book has also sold well. Forgive me, but as one who has been tied to Tito, I must conclude on this basis that Tito's influence is growing stronger even after his death. You will say that that is a subjective view, and fine--so be it, it is subjective. My book is also subjective. This could be a fault, but at the same time a virtue. I must tell you that I have never concealed my subjectivity, not even in conversation about other people and other things. For example, when I was giving a lecture at Harvard this last time, a member of the audience asked me to give my objective opinion concerning Draza Mihailovic. I asked him: "How can I give you an objective opinion of him when I am carrying his shrapnel which I received at Milanovac? When the weather changes, I feel pain in my knee, so how am I to be objective? Another occasion, then, for me to mention the necessity of applying the theory of distance."

The Case of Gojko Djogo

[Question] Since I have finished the interview at this point, allow me to put you one more question which falls outside it. As Tito's biographer, as a truthful man, please tell us if you have ever been dissatisfied because of the use of Tito's name?

[Answer] I am dissatisfied with the temperature that has risen over Gojko Djogo's collection of poems "Vunena vremena" [Woolen Times]. Poets are the only ones who are awake in this unjust world crisscrossed with boundaries. They are oversensitive creatures, and every human trouble disturbs them. Just consider: never has there been more talk about peace, but since 1945 we have had more wars than in any other period of history. We are witnesses of disintegration both in the West and also (unfortunately) in the East, of many ideologies and structures we thought to have been eternal. Poland is in flames. The poets are the most accurate seismograph of people's anxieties. The court is no place to elucidate their creations, in a courtroom life is crammed into citations from the criminal code. If we set about politicizing poetry at this point, there will never be an end to it, we will pass into the world of Rashomon, everyone will have his own version of the truth.

I understand the concern of the public prosecutor to defend Yugoslavia's integrity in difficult times. It is true that assaults are being made on us from every side. But he has made a turn in the wrong direction. In giving his narrow and pragmatic interpretation of Gojko Djogo's poetry and finding in it insults addressed to Comrade Tito, he has not been mindful that he is speaking in a courtroom, before our own and the world public. And so the wire services from all four corners of the world have proclaimed that a poet is being tried because of Tito.

[Question] Were Tito alive, how would he behave in this case?

[Answer] When you read the third volume of "Prilozi ..." you will see how he behaved in a different case, but by reflecting on that different case you yourself will easily arrive at an answer. In 1950 Tito kept a diary for a short time, but unfortunately his undertaking as a chronicler came to naught. In one passage Tito describes an unpleasantness which occurred on the way back from a hunt: he met a peasant from Srem who publicly cursed him in front of his entire entourage. Tito protected him, shielded him from punishment, but in his diary he asked why the peasant had done this.

[Question] Finally, what does the author of "Novi prilozi ..." have to say to his readers?

[Answer] What his message has always been: criticize me, send me corrections, additions and clarifications. If you think it is not time to publish your eyewitness accounts, write them down and keep them. I would also like to say that I would be very unhappy if my book were used in our political struggles, especially in the skirmishing among the republics. This book is imbued with Tito's endeavor to preserve the country's integrity and the quality of the nationalities and ethnic minorities at any price, an endeavor which the late president stressed until the moment of his death.

One Reader's Reaction

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1611, 15 Nov 81 p 2

[Letter by Ljubisa Manojlovic, Belgrade, in response to Milo Gligorijevic's interview with Vladimir Dedijer entitled "A Biographer's Confession": "When a Confession ..."]

[Text] In the last issue of NIN Milo Gligorijevic, who is talented, demonstrated once again that he knows how to put interesting questions in an interview with an interesting subject. And that is one of the reasons why the interview given him by Dedijer (strong in every respect) proved to be exceptional in many ways.

Nevertheless, it seems to me, since the writer of "Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita" has also furnished in passing new contributions for his own biography, that Gligorijevic might have put one more question to Dedijer. In connection with the scholar's account of the unpleasantnesses which he experienced after his fall from power, when he was left even without a way to make a living, it would have been natural to ask:

[Question] Comrade Dedijer, when you were in power was there ever a case when you yourself persecuted someone, threatened his life, destroyed his means of making a living, left him without the means of subsistence, and the like?

I believe that Dedijer, given the broad openness and concreteness which are characteristic of him, would answer quite specifically. A man like him would thus be certain to furnish a worthwhile contribution to contemporary knowledge about the psychology of power.

I must mention that Vladimir Dedijer has never persecuted me, so the question, then, should not be taken as a personal question of my own.

ORIGIN OF FIRE AT PATRIARCHATE OF PEC REMAINS UNCLEAR

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian, No 1610, 8 Nov 81
p 33-35

[Article by Stevan Stanic: "The Frescos Recall Something Else"]

[Text] From Madrid, from the Prado Museum where our icons from the Pec Patriarchate and Decan and the frescos from the St George columns are presently located face to face with the great geniuses of painting, Velasquez, Goya, Surbaran, and El Greco, at the exhibit of "Art in Medieval Serbia from the XXIIth to the XVIIth Century," the news is arriving about the great discovery, and the amazement of art experts over the inscrutable secrets in the blue abysses of Byzantium, over that "marvelous higher symmetry, over that hierarchy of order over disorder until now unknown in world art..."

From Vienna, following the conclusion of the International Congress of Byzantinists, where what our experts say is, as in no other scientific field, listened to with the most attention, and resounds most authoritatively, the news arrives from one of the sections that the Pec Patriarchate is presently the greatest beehive for the preservation and restoration of medieval art...

From the Institute for the Protection of the Cultural and Historical Monuments of Serbia, a third report arrives: that the architect Marija Jovin has completed and submitted the design for the new residence at the Pec Patriarchate, in which she has brilliantly worked out a play of masses, each with its own size, while taking into account authenticity, in accordance with the old photographs; and that the cost of the new building will be about 2.2 billion dinars.

Here Comes the Joke

A very large and comfortable museum treasury is planned to be in the new residence, and until the building is completed, the old manuscript books and the "wounded church books" will be under treatment at the Belgrade National Library, while the icons have been distributed for cleaning to institutes in Pristina, Novi Sad, and Belgrade.

These three short reports a few days ago took us to the Pec Patriarchate, which really does resemble an actual beehive. Several workers are using lead sheets to finish covering the central cupola and the roof of the church of Saint Nikola.

Two curators with linked specialties, a brother and sister of Albanian nationality, the master in art history Afrim Etemi and the art historian Hidajeta Etemi, are skilfully using a new procedure by the Italian couple Moro, which, without the laborious scraping with a scalpel that results in [cleaning] one square centimeter per day, cleans and removes several square meters of the ancient fog deposited by saltpeter on the surface of the fresco. Under the effect of this emulsion and the cleaning, the frescos of the best of our painters of those days, master Radule, from 1673, which remind one of enlarged magical stories from the old Persian miniatures, come out into the light of the twentieth century under the hands of this brother and sister, in their full splendor. And while the policeman on duty, Inspector Mijat Roganovic, walks quietly and slowly by himself through the monastery churchyard, the nuns hurriedly move into the just completed residence, which was saved then from the fire, and which will be formally consecrated and inhabited according to the church rules on Saturday, 7 November... but almost 8 months have passed (since 16 March) since the great fire at the monastery residence of the Pec Patriarchate and the dramatic rescue of the great medieval cultural treasure from the burning treasury, and whether we wanted this or not, the hidden fire of suspicion, cast first toward one hearth of Kosovo nationalism and then toward another, is still smoldering. Is it really necessary to unroll again that almost amateurish film of clumsiness--from the initial suppression and postponement of the news about the fire, and through those hasty reports (before the reporters arrived on the scene) that the old electrical system was probably responsible for the fire, to conclude with how this fire was met with so much distrust and unpreparedness, and almost as a blow to our old benign tolerance?

Already now it is easier to remember, that when a little time passes, everything can be borne more easily, and the joke that remained after that event--"Arsenije Carnojevic forgot when he made the great move in 1960 to turn off the electricity and take the plug out of the socket in the Patriarchate's residence"--still manages to amuse even the most hardened "tragedians." Possibly only Bogdan Babarogic, an employee of the Institute for Urbanism in Pec, a highly skilled electrician and plumber who put in and installed this electrical system and to whom this joke directly applied, is still seized by a nervous shivering when he thinks of the initial conclusion about the cause of the fire. "Even though I knew that during the work I used the most solid materials, and even doubled it and gave it excess capacity, I began to doubt myself."

After only a few days, when the findings of one of the two experts were ready and above the expert signature of graduate electrotechnical engineer Gasi Seljam stood "the fire in the monastery residence could not have resulted from the electrical installation, because the electrical installation that was put in ten years ago with PP cables, with the appropriate circuit breakers, fully satisfies the technical regulations for this type of installation," a load was lifted from Bogdan Babarogic's mind.

What Judge Hoti Says

There remained, however, the opinion signed by the other expert, graduate construction engineer Tomislav Markovic, which states that "if the furnaces for heating the premises in rooms 5, 9, and 10 on the second floor of the monastery residence were used, a potential existed for a fire to break out in the building's attic because of the defective chimney."

An investigation was begun on the basis of these hypotheses and doubts. Since 16 March, when the residence burned down, over 7 months have passed, and thus there has been more than enough time for us to dare, with a certain unwritten right to accurately inform the public and to write down and establish how far the investigation has come. The word "dare" implies a quite understandable caution at a moment when a counter-revolutionary conflagration of Albanian irredentists has broken out, when any similar incident (and even that time was preceded by several fires, burned houses and burned forests) could easily and rashly be linked, as it also implies the political dilemmas of those peaceful and composed people with considerable and lengthy political experience and their comments "that this political moment is not that suitable" [for discussion of this subject].

Reminders of these scars are still fresh, and this journalist's fear of wounding, and of again inciting the disagreements which have shown their ugliest face once already have at least been dispersed in the secure, open, and friendly reception encountered among the people who worked on the investigation. In this case, this journalist was offered all of the existing investigation documents to examine and copy. This was possibly because one thing is clear to everyone--remaining silent means leaving it up to everyone to make use of this fire as he sees fit.

Let us turn then first of all to the investigating judge in Pec, Ibis Hodi:

"We have accurately determined that there is no question of any human involvement, and that the fire could not have come from outside, but rather that the fire occurred because of the furnace that was lit with sawdust that night, and [because of] the defective smokestack and the asbestos pipes in the chimney."

"Did you cooperate with the experts?"

"I worked with them before, during, and after the investigation. Here, look, their findings are typed out there in front of you on ten pages; they served to show which direction the investigation should take."

A Supposition Is Not a Conclusion

One of the nuns at the Pec Patriarchate, Sister Haritina, who was responsible for stoking the fire and with whom we spoke, says that that day was exceptionally warm for March, that it was somewhere around 15 degrees [Centigrade], and that there was no need to light the fire. She and the prioress of the Devic convent, Paraskeva Simeonovic, who was their guest for those evenings, remark that there was not just one center of the fire, but two, that they were at least 15 meters apart, and that they were not connected with each other by fire; and that the flame was sort of light and dark blue, and smelled of oil and gasoline.

But here is a statement from the interrogation of the old gardener, 76-year-old Djordj Kovic, who refutes the statements by the nuns and confirms the correctness of the investigation. The old gardener of the Devic convent, who accompanied the prioress Paraskeva here that day in order to teach the Pec nuns how to make hotbeds, stayed for the night in the very room of the residence in which, as the investigation asserts, the furnace was lit... "When the sister took me to the room, she did not stay very long; I can say that this lasted around 5 or 6 minutes. After she left, I noticed that the room was warm. I moved over to the furnace and saw that it was lit."

After this, here we are on the way to the Devic convent, along part of roadless Metohija that still furrows its agitated face, like some fertile paradisaical Biblical Egypt, with wild and unattractive gorges and ravines, shaky bridges across mountain rivers and impassible roads, and peasants, with a plow and oxen, on the last step of poverty. We could not have done anything more absurd than to urge this old gardener, Djordj Kovic--caught between an insecure existence within the shelter of the monastery, the interrogation at the investigating court, and the confused pictures of the frightful fire at the entrance to the Rugov ravine, in the darkness of the monastery cellar, where young wine is poured--to read again what he signed at the interrogation after the fire: "After the police came, around noon, one of the sisters told me that in case someone asked me about the fire, I should say that the fire had not been lit in my room and that there was no light... I could recognize this sister if I saw her..."

What and how much is a new assertion worth now, however, and how much can one trust this frightened man when he says: "They can write whatever they want, I did not say that."

What we were told by one of the experts--construction engineer Tomislav Markovic--contributes to the Rasomon nature of the story. He, clearly disturbed, rejects the possibility that his expert testimony could have served as a basis for the conclusion of investigating judge Ibis Hoti that the fire broke out because of a defective chimney.

"With my findings I requested laboratory tests, which should have been performed for the findings to be complete," says Markovic. "Without this, no supposition can be used as a conclusion, at least not on the basis of my findings."

News From Nerodimlje

Since for the time being there is officially no hypothesis of deliberate arson, let us then close the logical course of the investigation, which finally had to come to the author of the "suspect" chimneys, and thus to the Pristina urbanist Slobodan Mikic and the builder Andrija Kostic, who had worked, as designer and contractor respectively on the reconstruction and restoration of the roof structure and the roof covering of the old residence of the Pec Patriarchate. The investigating judge of the commune court received the criminal charges from the Pec police only around 1 July and a request that Mikic and Kostic be investigated, because they "acted contrary to regulations and thus greatly endangered human life and property because the necessary construction of the chimney was not included in the above-mentioned reconstruction..."

The focus course of this investigation thus stopped precisely with a twofold university graduate, lawyer and architect Slobodan Mikic, who as the recipient of a scholarship from the United Nations, after 10 years of study and acquired knowledge from India, Trinidad and Sweden, returned to his native Pec, to clean and straighten up his city as the commune urbanist.

In the spring of 1976, the Patriarchate in Belgrade contacted him with a request to propose a solution for restoring the roof on the old residence, because there was more and more leakage through the worn-out tiles. After the conclusion of the work, the church requested a technical review, and only after a commission, did it acknowledge the execution of the work according to the established legal procedure for construction operations. Unfortunately, the old chimneys, which had withstood so many decades, now restored, and some completely new ones, as the investigators suspect, have caused a fire after only five years of use.

The request for the investigation was returned from the district commune court and now everything depends on the commune investigating judge, Sadri Cosja. "So far, from 1 July until now," says Cosja, "I have had to open an investigation."

The news that has arrived from the small village of Nerodimlje near Urosevac, however, that the Orthodox church there was recently vandalized and defiled with nationalist and irredentist slogans, and the destroyed and uprooted orchard in the Devic convent, and the continual vandalism and arson at the Mark church in Koris near Prizren, which even the most objective people have a hard time not ascribing to the same vandals, will possibly accelerate or further expand this unfinished process.

And, while we stand once more in the courtyard of the old Pec Patriarchate before our departure, up above the cupolas, on the stone road that leads from Rugov, stand small elementary school children with linen school bags. Some stand, turn toward the church, and cross themselves. Others, they say, throw stones at the old monastery cupolas after night falls.

None of them know what the Pec Patriarchate is, and how many accumulated centuries of lofty spirit and art are here together in these small churches that are heaped up, as if some pure childlike genius were playing.

As nowhere else in the world, you can follow in one place, in these five churches, the development for five centuries in a row, from 1230 in St. Apostoli to 1680 in St. Nikola, of the mysterious and enigmatic world of Byzantium, which is no longer the spiritual inheritance of any one country, but rather of the great world of art. We doubt that on this occasion any of that art will be able to peep out through the depressing court records, the complicated investigation proceedings, and the small personal tragedies.

Still, is great art really so feeble? If it is, then why not continue with the same openness with which we have spoken in the last few months about much more crucial and unpleasant matters? Especially since the secretariat for internal affairs in Pec says that "this matter should still be considered open and unresolved."

CONSEQUENCES OF SHORTAGE OF TRACTOR FUEL SIGHTED

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1608, 25 Oct 81 pp 10-11

[Article by Scepan Rabrenovic: "White and Red Peasants"]

[Text] A cold rain was drizzling, and the numerous tractor drivers jamming the approaches to the gasoline station with their tractors were getting wet. The station operators did not reply, but only shrugged their shoulders when asked when the tank trucks would arrive with diesel fuel. It was already twilight, the rain was not stopping, but the tractor drivers were not going away. There had been a rumor that this was the station where there would be "diesel," and there were more and more tractor drivers. Three policemen were barely able to organize traffic on the highway past the gasoline station.

That was the situation a few evenings ago at the Jugopetrol gasoline station in Gornji Milanovac, but traffic jams and uncertainties of that kind have recently been occurring at all gasoline stations in Serbia. And not only in Serbia. Farmers tending field crops have suddenly found themselves in trouble: their fields need to be plowed, and this fall they need to plant more than 1.5 million hectares to wheat. But there is no fuel. On Monday there was a report from Leskovac that more than 4,000 tractors were standing idle in the South Morava region. Tractors are also standing idle in Stig, a fertile farming region.

A few days ago we were in the Valjevo area. In the village Slovac the peasants assured us that this fall many fields would go unplowed because of the shortage of tractor fuel and that they would plant much less wheat than they intended. Andrija Petrovic said: "No one any longer has oxen for plowing, but we would be glad to have them now."

On Monday we went to the Federal Executive Council building and visited engineer Milovan Zidar, chairman of the Federal Committee for Agriculture, and asked whether the Federal Executive Council was going to do something to solve this problem. This is his answer: "We have decided to put on sale certain quantities of fuel from the reserves of the Federal Directorate for Agricultural Machines so that the most important fall farm work will be done on time. In a telegram which we have sent to the republics and provinces we have requested that priority in supply be given to farmers. We have also called upon the republics and provinces to take steps to provide petroleum for farmers and to avoid all speculations. What we plant this fall will be what we reap next summer."

Petroleum is not in Milovan Zidar's "jurisdiction," and he was unable to explain to us all that had happened and how in general it could have happened that farmers be left without fuel for tractors and combines at precisely this time. After all, it is not just a question of planting wheat--the corn harvest is also approaching, and it is possible that all the combines will not be able to go in the fields. Along with all this, land that has lain fallow needs to be plowed up and prepared for spring planting.

Certain Old Divisions

In Vojvodina farmers tending field crops were given priority in the supply of petroleum even by the beginning of the week, and the provincial secretary for agriculture, engineer Petar Ilic, announced that everything had been agreed on with Naftagas concerning those priorities.

The fact that fuel rationing coupons have been distributed is evidence, though, that there will not be enough fuel for tractors and combines (that is, these coupons always make their appearance when shortages of certain products are altogether certain).

Our correspondent from Cacak, Rodoljub Petrovic, has informed us that the coupons have been introduced in that opstina as well. Farmers with tractors will be able to get 80 liters of fuel apiece at gasoline stations if they present coupons. That is, the view is that this is sufficient to prepare the land and for other planting operations on 2 hectares. Stanislav Tanaskovic, chairman of the opstina agriculture committee, told our correspondent that fuel would also be issued for coupons to those owners of tractors who prove that they will plow not only their own field, but also the fields of other farmers: "We will not make a distinction between associated farmers and those who do not belong to associations in distributing the fuel. We need wheat from both groups." But that is not the case everywhere. On Monday the Belgrade City Executive Council supported the proposal of the city's cooperative alliance that preference be given in the supply of fuel to associated farmers. News is coming in from other areas as well that such distinctions have been made.

Engineer Milovan Zider, chairman of the Federal Committee for Agriculture, made this comment: "If some farmer wants to operate as a liberal factor on the market, if he does not join an association, then let him bear the consequences."

So, once again we are in the midst of the old divisions which we thought had been forgotten. Back some 15 years ago the socialized sector was receiving a premium for certain of its products, but the private sector was not. The justification for this was that the premium, as an economic category, was supposed to stimulate the faster development of the socialized sector. But that was not the only justification: we believed that the peasant would in time "die out," that is, that in time the private sector in agriculture would also vanish. Peasants still comprise about 35 percent of our total population, nor have they been obstinately resisting "extinction," but in view of overall development, among other things, it could not have been otherwise. It was said at the time that there was "red" and "white" milk, that is, "red" and "white" agriculture. Later it turned out that granting premiums to the socialized sector did not stimulate its development as much as we hoped. How otherwise to explain that even now the private sector has 97 percent of the total livestock population and 85 percent of the total cropland?

But these were not the only reasons for abolishing the privileges of the socialized sector of agriculture. In time the view was adopted that the food is the same regardless of which fields it was produced on. The shortage of fuel for tractors and combines persuades us that we gave up those sectarian views only temporarily and that we still have an aversion to the private sector in agriculture.

The Reasons for the Existence of the Nonexistent

Now, it is true, there is no longer a division into the private and socialized sectors, but there is, there you have it, a division into associated farmers and those private farmers who are not members of associations.

What are all the things that give rise to divisions of this kind? First of all, the interests of those who are afraid that the private farmers will become economically independent and an independent "economic factor."

This view overlooks the fact that the private farmer himself, if he produces in large quantities for the market, cannot do "without socialism": How will he market his goods if not in collaboration with the socialized sector? And if the peasant is poor, the degree of his poverty is also a measure of how far he is "from socialism." And also of how long he will remain in that poverty.

In spite of all that the formation of associations is now being pushed forcibly in accordance with certain formulas devised in advance and usually suitable to only one side: usually that side which has been insisting on the formation of associations (read socialized sector). And the private farmers, lacking anything better such as the opportunity to organize on their own, have had no choice. As members of the association they have had the obligation to "deliver" only those products in which the other side is interested and the right to protest if that kind of cooperation did not suit them.

A meeting of the Presidium of the Cooperative Alliance of Yugoslavia, held on the 14th of this month, was specifically concerned with the reasons for this hasty formation of farmers' associations. It was stated at that meeting that some 20 or so cooperative members or cooperators have to support the same number of office workers, that self-management is not developed either in the cooperatives or in the organizations for cooperation, that the cooperative alliances are "oriented more upward than downward," and that given the inconstant economic policy we have, there is no way to motivate the private farmers to enter into associations.

It was also said at that meeting that we would have more associated farmers if we should leave the choice as to forms of association more to the farmers themselves. This is the nexus: the farmers are not opposed to association, they know that they cannot survive on the market individually, but the forms that have been prescribed do not suit them. That is why it is no accident that a question like this was put at that meeting: Why should they join associations if it is going to be worse for them than for those who do not join?

That is what is being said in the Cooperative Alliance of Yugoslavia. Incidentally, we have cooperative alliances at all levels, but yet we have very few cooperators. Perhaps because we first established the cooperative alliances and "commissioned" them to establish cooperatives or organizations for cooperation. Instead of the cooperatives establishing the cooperative alliances as their own organizations and assigning them tasks. And so that the cooperative alliances might now justify their existence, they are insisting on the division into "white" farmers (who are not members of associations) and "red" farmers (who are members). And now when there is not enough fuel for tractor and combines, the cooperative alliances see an opportunity to use such divisions to "boost the membership of farmers' associations."

Tired of the Potential

Ilija Ristanovic, a private farmer from Preljina near Cacak, whom our correspondent talked to at a gasoline station in that village, says that the private farmers are not at fault for the slow formation of associations: "So why should those who are not members be hurt in the distribution of tractor fuel?" But they will be.

The consequences of these current divisions will be evident in the fields even this fall. But those will not be so evident as the consequences in next summer's harvest. In Slovac we heard this kind of assessment from private farmers: "Those who stand to gain now are the ones who did not deliver wheat from last year's harvest. Not only because they will be assured of food for their households, but also because in a year's time they will be able to earn much more from that wheat."

The farmers are defending themselves against the uncertainties and pressures of monopolies by not taking to market any commodities they are not required to. That is the explanation as to why only half of the approximately 4.3 million tons of wheat produced this year has been purchased. For that reason we will have to import nearly 1 million tons of wheat, but if all the quantities harvested had been purchased, we would have enough wheat, there would even be some surplus.

So there will be no cause of amazement when this fall the corn ends up in barns instead of going to the market. The credit for that can be placed not only on the short-term economic policy, on high inflation, but also on the division into "white" and "red" peasants.

But we have already become tired of furnishing evidence on the kind of potential we have for food production. And of reiterating the assurance that our food is our petroleum.

[Box, p 10] The Impact of Shortages

As far as agriculture is concerned, this fall will be remembered for numerous shortages: there is not enough livestock feed, there is not enough manufactured fertilizer, nor enough chemicals for protection of plants and livestock against pests and diseases, nor spare parts for agricultural machines. Farmers have dealt with the situation as best they knew and could.

In the Business Community for Agricultural Machines they say that about $10 million are needed to import the most necessary spare parts. This money is lacking, so that the farmers are going abroad to obtain some indispensable bolt. According to certain estimates, about 200,000 farmers went to Italy this year precisely because of spare parts for their tractors, mowing machines or planters. A simple calculation could easily prove that more money was carried out than was necessary for the imports. And that is not even to mention the time that was lost.

Yet the situation is most difficult with chemicals for plant and livestock protection. If they are not furnished on time, the specialists say, the yields could be cut in half.

Not only did the farmers lack foreign exchange for imports, they also lacked the foreign exchange to enter into association with the importers. The reason: agricultural products are subject to export permits. Which means that they cannot be exported unless the permit is obtained. And the permits are rarely issued because of the fear that the country would be left without food.

BRIEFS

SLOVAK STUDENTS' FOREIGN SCHOLARSHIPS--Of the more than 1,200 scholarships available to Slovak students in foreign countries, almost 60 percent come from the USSR and represent 63 colleges in 13 cities. Almost half of the 695 students follow studies in technical fields, natural sciences and about one-third social sciences. About 180 students study technical subjects, social sciences and agriculture in Hungary. Over 146 students study at 11 colleges in 8 cities in the GDR, mostly in Leipzig, Dresden and Marseburg, attending mostly the technical faculties. In Bulgaria, more than 80 percent of Slovak students study agriculture and food processing. Following criteria must be met by applicants for foreign studies: less than 26 years of age, very good educational record, good moral-political profile, knowledge of Russian for the USSR study and German for the GDR study and completed compulsory military service for applicants from the industry. The scholarship subsistence amounts to 90 rubles in the USSR, 330 marks in the GDR, 2,340 forints in Hungary and 120 leva in Bulgaria. The students who maintain excellent and very good scholastic record are paid after their first year of the studies up to 20 percent of their subsistence money in addition to their basic subsistence. PROTECTIVE MEASURES AGAINST NEUTRON BOMB SUGGESTED

Sofia GRAZHDANSKA OTBRANA in Bulgarian No 10, 1981 pp 4, 30

[Article by Professor Doctor Ivan Nikolov, director of the Scientific Institute of Radiobiology and Roentgenology of the Medical Academy in Sofia, and Senior Scientific Associate Georgi Vasilev: "The Neutron Weapon and Protection From It"]

[Text] The decision of President Reagan's administration to include the neutron bomb in the U. S. military arsenal was announced at a time when the peoples were hoping for the initiation of talks on detente and disarmament. The proclaimed intention is to deploy this new mass destruction weapon in some Western European countries and eventually to use it in battle under the imaginary pretext that the neutron bomb is not a strategic but an ordinary tactical weapon for defensive rather than offensive purposes. This decision has been noisily publicized by the American mass information services, which depict the neutron bomb as just about the most humane weapon of this century.

Following are the views of two noted Bulgarian scientists from the Institute of Radiobiology and Roentgenology, who were asked by the editors to comment on the nature and effect of the neutron bomb and on protection from it.

The neutron bomb belongs to the so-called "third generation nuclear weapons, the first two being the atom and hydrogen bombs.

The neutron bomb has four main striking factors: the shock (explosion) wave; light radiation; penetrating radiation (gamma radiation and neutrons); and radioactive contamination.

Penetrating radiation -- neutrons and gamma rays -- can spread over a considerable distance, striking at living organisms which have survived the shock and heat waves. In the case of a 10 kiloton explosion, the lethal radius (the distance at which penetrating radiation is lethal), is about 1 km for gamma rays and 1.2 km for neutrons; in a 1 megaton blast it is about 3 km for gamma radiation and 1.5 km for neutrons.

The biological effect of gamma radiations and the neutrons is related to the ionization they create in living tissue. Both types of radiation are indirectly ionizing, i.e., they do not cause ionization directly. The gamma quanta take the electrons out of the electron shield of the atoms and it is these electrons that are the cause of ionization. The neutrons interact mainly with hydrogen, which is an important component of the biological tissue (about 10 percent). The strike propels the energy of the neutrons to the hydrogen nuclei, resulting in bouncing electrons and gamma radiation. The released protons are a direct tissue ionizing agent. The development of these processes depends on the energy of the neutrons.

Neutrons with a great variety of energy charges are released in a nuclear explosion, ranging from a few electronvolts to several megaelectronvolts. The characteristics of the structure of the biological tissue, the high hydrogen content above all, create conditions for the neutrons to have a considerably greater biological effect than gamma radiation. This is expressed in terms of the so-called "relative biological effectiveness." In the case of the neutrons, it varies from two to 10, depending on their energy. With equal doses, the biological effect of the neutrons is stronger by a factor ranging from two to 10. Thus, for example, the lethal neutron radiation doses range from about 2 to 4 Gray, i.e., they are considerably lower than in cases of gamma radiation.

Depending on the radiation dose, the radiation disease may assume various forms, raging from light, with 1 Gray (for gamma radiation) to death from radiation in a few days in the case of doses ranging from 6 to 100 Gray. With even higher doses the so-called ray death, i.e., death in a few minutes, takes place. In cases of radiation within the lethal range (2-8 Gray), the organism may survive and radiation illness may disappear gradually. Residual and latent consequences of radiation, however, are inevitable. They affect virtually all systems of the human body. The symptoms included headaches, loss of memory, general weakness, increased susceptibility to various diseases, intensive aging, development of sclerotic processes, endocrinal disturbances, permanent pathological changes of the skin, etc.

The sexual glands are severely damaged, leading to sterility, high incidence of stillborn children, deformities, and mental and physical degeneration of newborn children. The sharply increased likelihood of the development of malignant lethal tumors is particularly characteristic of radiated organisms. To this day, such effects are still noted and continue to cause casualties among the survivors of the Hiroshima and Nagazaki atom bombs and the victims of experimental nuclear tests conducted by the United States in the Pacific in the 1950s.

It is against this background that the Pentagon strategists are trying to present the neutron bomb as humane. The neutron bomb is a nuclear system whose main and essential purpose is the destruction of humans with a maximum preservation of installations, buildings and other material values. It attacks exclusively living organisms.

In the neutron bomb the blast and light radiation are greatly reduced at the expense of penetrating radiation -- neutrons and gamma rays. The latter account for 95 percent of the total energy released by the blast. A variety of engineering and physical solutions are used in order to achieve such results. Some synthesis and fission nuclear reactions yield a higher number of neutrons and gamma quanta, while the kinetic energy is reduced. Reactions with some heavy nuclei, such as Californium, are possible, or with a so-called "subcritical mass" with an additional source of neutrons for the purpose of maintaining the reaction. The blast wave may be reduced and radiation increased by reducing the thickness of the shield of the nuclear charge. The result is a bomb with a so-called "zero shielding" which is different from conventional nuclear systems in which the shielding is as strong as possible so that it may prolong the explosion time to the maximum and thus to gain more substance, raise the pressure and increase the shock wave.

Naturally, the press does not inform us of the precise reactions to the neutron bomb. It is known, however, that these reactions develop far more slowly than those caused by conventional nuclear systems. The neutron bomb is a relatively "quiet" weapon without the huge ball of fire and the huge mushroom. Naturally, there is fire and destruction, but on a very limited scale. The Western press has reported that nuclear neutron charges with a stre effect of about 10 square km are being prepared. This means that the lethal radius would be about 1.7 km. It has also been reported that in all likelihood, such a system would be used not on an isolated basis but in clusters of 24 bombs, which means that the lethal radius will be about 5 km. Despite the tremendous area which will be affected by the lethal radiation dose the destroyed and possibly burned down area will not exceed a few square meters. Buildings and installations remain virtually intact, while the people are killed.

The residual radioactivity in the area is relatively weak and is caused mainly by short-life secondarily induced radioactive isotopes. After a few days, radioactivity drops so drastically that the area is once again safe.

The term "neutron bomb" comes from the fact that about 80 percent of the striking effect of penetrating radiation is caused by neutrons. The bomb may be taken to the target by cruise missiles which fly very low above the ground and are difficult to hit by enemy defenses, or through other means such as air-to-ground missiles, artillery shells, aviation bombs and ballistic missiles. Like all nuclear weapons, the neutron bomb is a typical weapon for nuclear aggression, which can be used at all stages of a combat operation.

Protection from neutron radiation is based on the familiar principle of "screening defense." People must hide in shelters or other protective installations, whether special or adapted. The characteristics of the interaction among neutrons and the substances they go through must be taken into consideration in the selection of shielding materials. As we pointed out, neutrons interact particularly actively with hydrogen nuclei.

That is why hydrogen-containing substances, such as water, paraffin and concrete, are extensively used in protection from fast neutrons. In practical terms, protection from penetrating radiation in a nuclear exposion may be provided by moist dirt and concrete. For example, a 25 cm-thick concrete layer reduces the neutron dose tenfold; a 50 cm-thick layer lowers the neutron dose 100 fold. The addition of bits of iron or iron ore to the concrete substantially improves its shielding properties not only in the case of gamma radiation but of neutrons as well. A two-layer shield consisting of a 25 cm layer of packed dirt and 25 cm-thick concrete wall reduces the neutron dose by more than a factor of 1,000. The shielding property is improved by adding boron or boron compounds to the protective materials, because boron can capture the slow neutrons. Twin-layer screens consisting of paraffin and lead or paraffin and steel are particularly effective against the neutron flow. They may be used in the building of special protective equipment and screens.

Naturally, the introduction of the neutron bomb will face the Civil Defense System with major medical, organizational and tactical problems, which must be studied extensively with a view to the organization of effective protection. The best defense, however, is the energetic struggle and opposition on the part of progressive peace-loving forces aimed at preventing the production and use of the neutron bomb, which would inflict indescribable suffering to millions of people.

MEASURES TO IMPROVE CIVIL DEFENSE TRAINING OUTLINED

Sofia GRAZHDANSKA OTBRANA in Bulgarian No 10, 1981 pp 6-9

[Article by Lt Gen Dobrin Dimitrov, deputy chief of Civil Defence of the Bulgarian People's Republic: "Practical Skill Is the Main Feature of Training"]

[Text] The decisions of the 12th BCP Congress are the new embodiment of the party's April line. They apply to all areas of life of the party and the country, and call for creativity and daring in reaching new heights in the building and defense of socialism. After assessing the difficult international situation, the congress decided that in the future steady concern and attention must be devoted to means for strengthening the country's defensive power as well. This means above all that the combat power of the Bulgarian People's Army must be increased and, along with it, the readiness of civil defense as an inseparable part of the complex set of defense and protection measures necessary at the present stage in the development of means of warfare and military concepts.

The expediency of this party requirement was confirmed even more strongly lately, after the decision of the U. S. President on the production and stockpiling of the neutron bomb. This sinister weapon, whose purpose is mainly the destruction of people, is now being rattled by the warmongers. The plans to use it in a "limited nuclear war" are essentially an attempt to lower the nuclear threshold, i. e., to bring the world closer to a new world war.

That is precisely why the party's efforts to increase the defensive power of the country, manifested in improving army training and civil defense, are fully justified. In recent years, as a result of the party's concern, many successes were achieved in the training of staffs, services, formations and the population in carrying out defensive assignments under difficult circumstances. The leading and command personnel and the staffs and services are organizing the training process with increasing skill and efficiency. The ways and means of training are being improved at all civil defense levels.

Thousands of manages, chiefs and commanders attended courses and received proper training at interokrug civil defense schools. The personnel of the various formations, part of the population and the students improved their practical training as a result of tactical-drill training and exercises and in comprehensive exercises conducted by enterprises and obshtinas. The "Prepared for Civil Defense" review dedicated to the 1,300th anniversary of the founding of the Bulgarian state and quiz shows for students and population training groups proved to be effective practical training methods.

More effective methods, such as demonstration exercises, explanations with subsequent demonstrations and exercises, practical training classes and others, are being applied in instructing the various categories and groups of trainees.

There has been a considerably improvement in training activities as a result of the increased methodical skills, better material support facilities, and effective political, ideological-educational, agitation and propaganda work. Managers, chiefs, commanders, specialists and the thousands of fighters in the formations and working people in cities, villages and national economic enterprises have changed their attitude and are making greater efforts in civil defense training. Such training is becoming an imperative of the time in which we live and is developing as a responsible nationwide project.

This year, many collectives organized their civil defense training effectively. Training within the civil defense system of entire departments, such as the Ministry of Public Health, Ministry of Light Industry, Ministry of Public Education and others is being successfully carried out. Positive results were achieved in this direction by entire okrugs such as Plovdiv, Varna, Stara Zagora, Pleven, Sofia City, Gabrovo, Pernik and others. High training results were achieved by the Stara Zagora, Kazanluk, Pleven, Svishtov, Plovdiv and other obshtinas. Good training achievements were scored by many enterprises, which are making skillful use of ways and means leading to greater practical results. This applies to the Lenin SMK [Construction and Installation Combine] in Pernik, Vitosha DIP [State Industrial Enterprise] in Sofia, G. Genev VTK [Foreign Trade Combine] in Gabrovo, G. Dimitrov OTsZ [Consolidated Cement Plants] in Kurdzhali, D. Blagoev KTsM [Nonferrous Metals Combine] in Plovdiv, APK [Agroindustrial Combine] in Slivo Pole (Ruse Okrug) and others. These successes are a good beginning and a base for raising the standard of the civil defense training process even higher.

Nevertheless, shortcomings are still allowed to occur in training work, hindering the acquisition of lasting practical skills and the ability to organize defense work and the training of staffs, services and formations for operations under complex conditions, the use of mass destruction weapons by the enemy, natural disasters and major industrial accidents.

In the case of many staffs, services, formations, training groups and other units this is not achieved mainly because the most effective ways and means of training are not sufficiently used; training is not sufficiently aimed at practical results. In some areas, the implementation of tasks and steps for training formations and the population suffers from formalism. In many civil defense courses training consists of lectures or talks. Training problems are not sufficiently related to resolving practical problems of the defense of the population and the national economy, mastering the ways and means of individual and group defense and training for SNAVR [Rescue and emergency damage repair work] under complex wartime circumstances and in the case of natural disasters and serious industrial accidents.

The inability of some okrugs to make effective use of facilities and equipment in the conduct of rescue operations and the unskillful and imprecise use of many formations in such operations became apparent in the struggle against natural disasters at the start of the year. This proved that the practical training of the formations was insufficient. The same fact was confirmed by the many comprehensive obshtina target exercises and the review-competitions in civil defense activities among secondary school students.

Instructors in civil defense courses, chiefs, commanders and heads of training groups are not always able to direct the trainees properly toward acquiring practical skills in the course of their training.

Unquestionably, the formations, the population and the students we re able to acquire the required minimum of theoretical knowledge of basic defense and SNAVR problems during the preceding training stage. A certain level of training and readiness of staffs, services, formations and the population in conducting successful rescue operations in the case of enemy attack has been attained. However, this training does not meet current requirements, when the formations and the population may be asked to operate under very difficult circumstances such as areas of combines strikes.

The only way to upgrade the training standard is to reorganize the training system and to make decisive changes in it above all by intensifying the practical aspects in all types of civil defense courses, and in formations, population training groups, schools and VUZs. This calls for improving the training process mainly from the qualitative viewpoint. This is entirely possible, for the necessary prerequisites to this effect already exist. Considerable organizational and methodical experience has been acquired. Civil defense courses have been strengthened. The instructors' skills have been improved and they are able to set the tone in the struggle for following a practical direction in student training. Training facilities have been enlarged. They are being steadily improved and make a practical orientation in training the various units possible. In this respect rich experience has been acquired by the USSR Civil Defense System, as reflected in the periodical VOYENNYYE ZNANIYA, an experience we too could use.

What must be done in order to follow a practical direction in the overall training process during the new school year?

Above all, the command-teaching personnel in civil defense schools must improve the organization and implementation of practical work in such a way as to help in the overall training of staffs, services and formations through the leading cadres they train. The substance of each topic or exercise must be found, for it has a definite value in improving defense and gaining the practical ability to act in difficult circumstances.

In the forthcoming instruction-methodical rallies which will be organized by staffs and services at all levels, the training must be such as to contribute to the greatest extent possible to the practical interpretation of the topics to be covered. This will make it possible to master most thoroughly the ways and means of doing successful work in a stricken area and under difficult peace-time circumstances. This method can be used not only at the beginning of the school year, for staffs and services in all departments, economic trusts, plants and obshtinas will have the opportunity to organize and guide chiefs, commanders, heads of training groups and instructors throughout the year in setting up displays and providing instructions on how to chose topics and training themes and how to ensure their best possible coverage in order to reach the best possible practical results.

The assessment of each training class attended by formations, training groups and students must be based on its contribution to the practical activities of the trainees and to their ability to carry out defense assignments and to engage in rescue operations. In assessing the results of the socialist competition, it would be expedient to take into consideration mainly the ability of troops and commanders to carry out practical assignments in defense and rescue work. Naturally, lectures and talks will be given on some theoretical problems. However, they must be used skillfully and must encourage the trainees to work harder to acquire the necessary practical skill.

Meeting the norms for various activities offers great opportunities for developing practical skills during training. Both the meeting of the norms and the preparations for meeting them during the training period create conditions for work on a number of practical aspects related to seeking shelter, use of personal defense kits, giving first aid, decontamination, putting out fires and many others. It would be expedient for the command personnel to plan such training and to struggle for the full implementation of the plans.

Available training facilities will have to be used even more fully and efforts will have to be made to ensure their expansion and improvement, so that the training of any unit may feature practical aspects and help the troops, students and working people to acquire the skills they will need in organizing defense work or operating in a stricken area.

The creative work which staffs, services, chiefs. commanders, managers and instructors must do to support and direct the training process must be developed to the maximal extent. Such an approach will enable them to implement the urgent task of giving a practical direction to training and to achieve new successes in civil defense training and preparedness within a short time.

PROFILES OF LOCAL CIVIL DEFENSE LEADERS

Sofia GRAZHDANSKA OTBRANA in Bulgarian No 10, 1981 pp 24-25

[Report: "Rewarded for Services to the GO na NRB [Civil Defense of the Bulgarian People's Republic]"]

[Text] Most of the life of Boris Ivanov Nichev, chairman of the Vratsa Obshtina People's Council has been inseparably linked to the development and strengthening of the economic stability of the city and the conurbation system. This has been consistent with his training. After completing a construction technical school he attended the Karl Marx Higher Economic Institute, where he majored in industrial economics. He attended the 2-year Higher Party School in Moscow and successfully defended his thesis for candidate of economic sciences. He then spent several years in responsible positions in industrial projects and at the Vratsa Okrug BCP Committee and the trade unions.

Boris Ivanov Nichev

For the past 5 years, Boris Nichev, chairman of the obshtina people's council has also been head of the obshtina civil defense system. This is a responsible and difficult duty which requires the use of the knowledge acquired in the specific area of preparations for the protection of people and material values under critical circumstances. He did not fail. He brought the conurbation system to a leading position in the okrug and deserved the high award presented by the GO command.

It is a pleasure to discuss GO problems with Boris Nichev, bearer of the "For Services to the GO na NRB" badge, first class. He can describe the course of the competition in the various services and formations, the active role he plays in resolving some problems, moral incentives and the methods used to develop a high feeling of duty in troops and commanders, in detail and knowledgeably. In this city of the chemical industry particular attention is paid to readiness for rescue operations under difficult circumstances caused by industrial accidents or the elements. Boris Nichev has frequently faced the obshtina people's council with this perennial problem and made the necessary decisions on improving the readiness of the staffs and formations for action under such circumstances. Suffice it to recall last year's natural disasters, when torrential rains were followed by floods and interruptions of water supplies and electric power. Skillfully headed by the chairman of the obshtina people's council, the civil defense formations did their duty. He names the Gavril Genov Machine-Building Combine, the Vratitsa State Cotton Weaving Combine and the chemical and cement combines among those which proved their high ability to act under critical circumstances.

Boris Nichev's example as GO chief has enthused the mayors within the conurbation system, who are also working actively for its defense. That is why GO activities have reached a high standard in the Vratsa conurbation system which has maintained a leading position in the okrug for a number of years. In recent years, the red challenge banner of the okrug staff has been awarded to the Vratsa conurbation system on several occasions.

On the initiative of its chairman, the executive committee of the obshtina people's council has adopted a system for encouraging champions in GO training. This may be one of the reasons for GO successes and for the high-level activeness of the people.

Aleksandur Videnov Bozhilov

The regular training of the formations in an enterprise took place at the GO training grounds in Sofia's Kirkovski Rayon. The excellent simulation conditions were made as realistic as possible. Fires broke out, bomb explosions shook the rayon, victims moaned and called for help. People in GO uniform, wearing gas masks, could be seen through the smoke. Medical unit personnel carrying first aid bags hurried to give first aid and save the lives of those buried under the "wreckage."

Aleksandur Bozhilov, rayon GO staff inspector in charge of communications and announcements, confidently operated the panel from which all of these effects were controlled. Everything here has been made according to his own design, including the building and electrical engineering facilities. His long experience in the GO system helped him to implement a long-planned idea. Today, the training grounds have an area perfectly fitted for the psychological training of the personnel. Sound effects were very difficult to achieve. However, with the help of specialists from the feature films studio in Sofia this difficulty as well was successfully eliminated. Now, in addition to sound recordings, the simulation control panel can generate more than 25 different types of action in various parts of the grounds. A simple push of a button (depending on the purpose of the training) can generate fire or smoke and the sound of an explosion in front, behind, on the side or under the feet of the soldier. It is also possible to simulate a nuclear strike area, something which considerably facilitates the work of officials in command-staff training or exercises. That is why this area, which is the result of his persistent searches, ambition and creativity, can make a great contribution today to the development of mental firmness in the rayon personnel on the level of modern requirements.

Aleksandur Bozhilov properly realizes that regardless of the accuracy of decisions made by chiefs and commanders, nothing can be accomplished properly unless they are related promptly. That is why he makes sure that the communications equipment is always ready and that the people who handle it are perfectly trained. Bozhilov considers malfunctioning equipment anywhere an exceptional event.

A restless and curious person, together with Vasko Vasilev, his colleague in Mikhaylovgrad, Bozhilov undertook to create a radio transmission center. This improved the quality of rayon communications considerably. Currently, he is at work on a system for the remote control of equipment through a radio channel. All of this -- from idea to implementation -- is carried out during the time which remains after checking the sites, giving instructions, teaching class, and helping performers. It is thus that, day after day, for 20 years, this respected GO worker has been dedicating his work and knowledge to the highly noble and responsible GO work.

People who hate stagnation may be found in any labor collective. They live and work in such a way as to be always among the leaders. Such is Petur Shishkov, civil defense chief of staff at the Todor Kableshkov Plant in Panaguyrishte. For the past 20 years he has held this position with legendary zeal and love. The noble feeling of responsibility which guides all of his actions is worthy of emulation. He may have inherited the devotion to his work, order and obedience from the old people of Panaguyrishte of whom he is the worthy heir. Or else, these may be the qualities and habits he acquired in the border troops, where he spent his army service.

Petur Shishkov has been employed at the plant as an accountant since 1957. Shortly after his appointment, the plant management became aware of his qualities as an organizer, his ability to lead people and his high personal discipline. He was entrusted with the duties of plant civil defense chief of staff.

Petur Delchev Shishkov

It would be hard to determine the number of problems resolved under Petur Shishkov's tenure as chief of staff. However, the successes which were achieved in maintaining the state of readiness of the formations are quite visible. The formations are structured on the basis of plant shifts on the initiative of the chief of staff. This has increased the effectiveness of the training process sharply.

If you were to ask Petur Shishkov which are the leading formations at the plant he would unhesitatingly mention the fire-fighting crew headed by Atanas Karakonchev and the medical units headed by Anka Uteva and Penka Ogurelkova. They regularly take part in city and okrug competitions and always end up in leading positions. The other formations also train conscientiously. It was no accident that last year the Todor Kableshkov Plant took first place in the city and second in the okrug in civil defense training.

A while back, when downpours flooded the Luda Yana River bed and the plant was threated with flooding, the formations responded to the alarm signal and mounted an uneven struggle against the elements, in which the will power, skill and preparedness of troops and commanders were tested. The prevention of the disaster and the rescuing of valuable property proved that the efforts invested in regular good quality training and concentration on practical results had paid off. The confidence of the chief of staff was given practical confirmation. His efforts were properly appreciated by the plant, the party committee and the management. Petur Shishkov has received many moral and material rewards for his dedicated work. He is the bearer of the badge "For Services to the GO na NRB" second and third class.

According to engineer Angel Dimitrov, director of the Plovdiv Okrug Communications Service, in civil defense training and exercises the other services can simulate actions while the communications system must always function in real terms. Perhaps that is precisely the reason for the successes achieved by the okrug's Communications and Announcements Service he heads. For many years, this service has remained the champion in the civil defense socialist competition. This year, once again the service was named okrug champion.

Angel Ivanov Dimitrov

GO personnel from various parts of the country and from some fraternal socialist countries frequently visit engineer Angel Dimitrov with whom they share progressive experience. What new things can they see here? The shelter in the building where the service is located serves also as a civil defense training center. It includes modern and fully equipped classrooms where the trainees may hear a lecture, study a specific topic, or watch a training film or slides on formation activities under critical circumstances. Helped by the creative spirit and initiative of Ivan Denev, chief of staff of the service, Comrade Dimitrov has given his full cooperation to the making of thousands of color slides and several GO training motion pictures with the help of the local formations. The premises also include a shooting range of the OVTPN. In one of the premises visitors may note the ready individual kits of every employee. Each kit contains the carefully packed equipment which the GO worker will have to carry in the case of sudden alarm.

The center is visited and used by a number of enterprises for GO training purposes.

Engineer Dimitrov takes great care to maintain the equipment and the siren-notification system in the okrug in order and in a state of constant readiness. Regular training and exercises are conducted with a view to improving personnel training. By virtue of the nature of their work, the personnel of the communications formations are in contact with all okrug enterprises and establishments and enjoy general respect. That is why everyone was sincerely glad and presented their congratulations when the solemn announcement was made that they had been declared the winners of the okrug GO socialist competition and that engineer Angel Dimitrov, head of the okrug Communications and Announcement Service, had been awarded a high distinction: the honor badge "For Services to the GO na NRB" second class. Today, everyone takes the Communications and Announcements Service as a standard, which imposes even stricter obligations on its chief.

HERBICIDES -- EFFECTIVE MILITARY WEAPON

Sofia GRAZHDANSKA OTBRANA in Bulgarian No 10, 1981 pp 32-33

[Article by Engineer Ilich Efremov: "Herbicides -- Helper or Enemy of Man?"]

[Text] The American imperialists used herbicides as a chemical weapon for the elimination of farm crops during their aggression in Vietnam. The nature of the active agents they contain, methods of delivery to their targets and means of use make them very similar to classical war poisons. The only difference is in the target -- in this case the vegetal organism.

Like any other chemical weapon, herbicides are a factor which must always be taken into consideration, for they can be used in a variety of ways, depending on the enemy's targets.

The public's insufficient familiarity with many phenomena related to the use of herbicides in military operations calls for supplying some information on this problem.

Combat Properties of Herbicides

In terms of characteristics and possibility of utilization, herbicides may be classified among the means for mass destruction of plants. However, their direct effect may also result in manpower losses or substantial drops in efficiency.

According to a group of world-famous specialists, who were asked by the United Nations to conduct extensive research in this area, a substantial number of herbicides may be used as war chemicals for the destruction of plants -- as defoliants and dessicants. They cause the fast defoliation of forests and are an excellent means of detecting personnel and combat materiel concealed in forests or among other vegetal species.

At the time of their use, the herbicides are disseminated over wide areas, water surfaces and animal and human production facilities. This may cause mass poisoning in humans.

A characteristic of herbicides is that they can remain in the air, on the ground or on various objects for very long periods of time. Most of them settle and last 2-3 months or, in the case of some of them, years, for which reason areas treated with herbicides remain contaminated for long periods of time. Herbicides may be classified into two groups according to the nature of their influence on vegetation: total (general), which destroy all vegetation, and selective, which destroy a specific species only.

The division of herbicides into total and selective, however, is arbitrary, for depending on the amount used they may have either a total or a selective effect.

Under peace-time conditions, total herbicides are used when the destruction of all vegetation becomes necessary, such as on roads, yards, landing strips, embankments, canals, abandoned sites and railroad tracks.

According to their effect, herbicides are classified into contact and translocation types.

Contact herbicides destroy only the area exposed to them. For this reason, in some cases plants may survive, new shoots appear and the vegetation is renewed.

Translocation or systematic action herbicides penetrate the plant's organism through its circulatory system. Such herbicides, regardless of whether they have affected leaves, stems or root only, rapidly circulate throughout the surface and ground parts of the plant and cause its destruction.

The struggle against perennial weeds would be inconceivable without such herbicides.

In some cases, the chemicals used as herbicides are known as sylvicides -- used in the destruction of forests; arboricides -- used to kill trees and bushes; defoliants -- which cause leaves to fall before the harvest; algicides -- used for the destruction of harmful weeds; and dessicants -- used for dessicating plants.

Defoliants and dessicants are similar to contact herbicides. Contact herbicides frequently act as defoliants and dessicants. Either can be used in combat operations for the purpose of locating enemy camps and targets.

Based on chemical stability, herbicides can be classified into very stable -- with a breakdown time into nontoxic components of more than 2 years; stable -- with a decomposition time of 6 months to 2 years; moderately stable -- from 1 to 6 months; and unstable -- decomposing into nontoxic components within 1 month.

Herbicides can be classified into four groups according to toxicity and average lethal dose: first group: LD_{50} = 1-50 mg/kg; second group: LD_{50} = 50-250 mg/kg; third group: LD_{50} = 250-1,000 mg/kg; and fourth group: LD_{50} = 1,000-5,000 mg/kg.

Toxicity is one of the most important characteristic of the effect of a specific herbicide on living organisms. Toxicity depends mainly on the property of the herbicide to react to various biological substances.

A substantial number of initial data must be available in assessing herbicide toxicity, due to their varying effects. The effect of herbicides on the respiratory system depends on their concentration in the air and the duration of their contact with the organism. This dependence can be expressed with the formula in which c is the concentration of the herbicide in mg/m^3, and t is the exposure time in minutes or hours.

The effect of the herbicide on the human organism depends on the volume of inhaled air. It can be determined roughly on the basis of the following criteria: in a state of rest, 8 l/min; in walking, 30 l/min; fast walking, 40 l/min; running 200 meters, 70 l/min.

Therefore, the actual amount of herbicides inhaled by a person may be computed with the following formula:

in which c is the concentration of the herbicide in mg/l; t is the time of exposure in minutes; and v_z is the average speed of replacement of the air in the lungs in l/min.

In the case of unprotected people, the herbicide usually settles on their clothes, shoes, weapons or hands, from where it can pollute the body itself. Herbicides may enter the organism through the consumption of polluted food or water.

Depending on the absorbed dose and on a number of other factors, herbicides can cause severe illness, damage vitally important parts of the body or cause death (loss of hearing and hair, drying the milk in nursing mothers, increasing the frequency of spontaneous abortions, etc.).

There are data showing that some herbicides (such as 2.4-D and 2.4.5-T) have teratogenic or mutagenic effect on the offspring. Cases of increased number of newborn children with congenital defects have been noted in Vietnam as the result of such influences. Experimental tests have shown that absorbed in a dose of 100 mg/kg live weight, the commercial chemical 2.4.5-T was lethal in 80 percent of the experimental animals.

In the case of mass use of herbicides, specialized GO formations and facilities must be used for decontamination operations. In all cases, it must be remembered that herbicides do not destroy material objects but that they penetrate into various facilities, buildings and shelters with the polluted air and cause not only poisoning but negative mental reactions as well.

The medical formations must be properly familiarized with the toxic effect of herbicides used as chemical weapons. They must apply specific antidotes and measures based on symptoms in treating human and animal casualties.

A surprise destruction of farm crops in an area in which population and animal nutrition has not been organized in advance with a view to dealing with critical situations may have catastrophic consequences. All of this proves that in an eventual war the use of herbicides as weapons would create a number of problems because of their toxic effect not only on people but on domestic animals, game, birds and fish. In the final account it is the human organism that faces the biggest threat.

IMPLEMENTATION OF SOCIAL AGREEMENTS ASSESSED

Warsaw TRYBUNA LUDU in Polish 7 Sep 81 pp 1, 3, 4

[Information received by the Polish Press Agency (PAP) from the Council of Ministers Committee for Trade Union Affairs]

> [Text] Through PAP we have received extensive information from the Council of Ministers Committee for Trade Union Affairs which discusses implementation of social agreements: the understandings from Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab, as well as many others

The information emphasizes that the total costs of fulfilling the commitments that were made will amount to over 1,400 billion zlotys by 1985, of which 607 billion zlotys will have to be expended in the immediate future. In the part pertaining to wage regulations, changes in collective contracts, and shortening of working time, there is a reminder that as of November 1st, last year, all employees received wage increases. At the same time, the basic minimum wage was increased to 2,400 zlotys a month. On January 1st of this year family allowances for working families with minimum incomes were increased.

Working time was shortened. This year, the government is to negotiate a 40-hour workweek with the trade unions.

Work on the preparation of new collective contracts is going on. They will go into effect after January 1, 1982 and in some occupational groups changes in these contracts have already become effective.

The chapter pertaining to social services emphasizes that the retirement age for certain employment groups has been reduced. The number of persons belonging to category 1 employment will be greatly increased and the retirement age for persons employed under conditions that are particularly unhealthy and arduous will also be reduced.

The first stage of increases in annuities, disability pensions and family pensions has already begun. It is expected that in the future the "old file" benefits, annual increases in benefits paid, etc., will be eliminated.

In discussing problems of health and social welfare, the information from the Council of Ministers Committee for Trade Union Affairs emphasizes that in 1981 outlays for this purpose will increase 36 percent.

Further on the information deals with activities relating to improvement in working conditions, housing construction problems, market supplies, and particularly food articles. Separate chapters deal with matters relating to the activities of the independent, self-governing trade unions and commitments of a general nature.

The information from the Council of Ministers Committee for Trade Union Affairs emphasizes that "the broad democratization of public life and the consistently conducted process of social renewal, in their scope go beyond the liberally formulated agreements--and were acknowledged by the Polish United Workers Party at its Ninth Congress to be a lasting achievement of the working people in Poland".

The actual execution of the provisions of the "social agreement", however, will require a reversal of the crisis events in the economy and the active support of the government in these activities on the part of the trade unions. "Yet," we read in the text of the information given to us, "despite various declarations, including declarations made at the time the agreements were signed in Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab, the government has not really obtained understanding and active support for economic activities. During the entire past year a state of tension has existed as a result of the various pressures and demands, protests and campaigns, conducted by elements of "Solidarity". This has a very negative effect on the socioeconomic stabilization of the country and on the ability to fully implement the agreements."

(The full text of the assessment of the implementation of the social agreements is given below.)

At the turn of August and September 1980 in Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab, representatives of the government and representatives of the striking workforces signed a protocol of understanding acknowledged to be a social agreement.

At a later period, commissions acting upon the authority of the government or the individual ministries, signed a series of understandings regulating wage and social conditions in the subsectors. Due to the breakup of the union movement and the complex social situation, several detailed understandings and protocols of decisions of a local nature were signed in the ministries with the trade unions or the strike committees. The central idea of the subsection and local understandings complies in principle with the protocol from Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab, or is a detailed extension of the protocol. In addition to the protocol from August 1980, the understandings in Rzeszow and Ustrzyki Dolne and the March 30, 1981 declaration are of national importance.

The talks between the government and the working contacts between the Council of Ministers Committee for Trade Union Affairs and the headquarters of the trade unions fulfill an important role in the implementation of social agreements and the shaping of the relations between the government and the trade unions. The government, in all of these talks, has demonstrated good will, the will to concentrate all social forces to bring Poland out of the socioeconomic crisis. The obligations resulting from the social agreements are being implemented, and in a number of matters they even go beyond these agreements. In view of the state's deteriorating economic situation the fulfillment of these obligations is becoming more and more difficult and their effects in the sphere of wages or an increase in free time do not produce the proper social satisfaction.

In accordance with the agreements signed in Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab, a decision was made to increase the wage fund by 260 billion zlotys. This sum included a wage increase for all workers and also in annuities and pensions. Other social benefits were also increased and the working time was reduced. The total cost estimate for the agreements made shows that their implementation will cost over 1,400 billion zlotys by 1985. Part of these costs, something like 800 billion zlotys, especially those pertaining to housing and social construction, will be spread out over a 5-year period, however the costs of bonus increases, social benefits, and private farmers incomes, amounting to about 607 billion zlotys, will fall in the immediate period.

Thus these are serious liabilities, whose repayment will require a reversal in the crisis occurrences in the economy. An improvement in society's standard of living is dependent simply and only on economic results--the results of the work of all the people.

The agreements in Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab were in the nature of bilateral obligations. They were signed taking into account the declarations of the strike committees and counting on the fact that the new social climate, the idea of social agreement, will bring an increase in production efficiency and labor productivity, and a growth in the national income.

Unfortunately, it happened otherwise. Production fell, and especially dangerously so in the extraction industry, and the national income is shrinking rapidly. The compliance with social and wage commitments is more and more difficult, and at the expense of a deceleration in the development of the economy which is a threat to Poland's future. Social tensions, the intensifying crisis phenomena in the economy, jeopardize Poland's reliability as a partner in economic cooperation. They undermine our international position and limit the freedom of the government's economic maneuvering. The Polish People's Republic (PRL) authorities have also undertaken a series of measures to implement agreements in the social sphere. The broad democratization of public life, the consistently conducted process of social renewal, in their scope go beyond the liberally formulated agreements--and were acknowledged by the Polish United Workers Party at its Ninth Congress to be a lasting achievement of the working people in Poland.

The independent and self-governing trade unions are freely developing their activities. Their active support in the difficult work of leading the country out of the crisis is anticipated. However, despite the various declarations, including the declarations made during the signing of the agreements in Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab, the government has not actually obtained understanding and active support for economic activities. During the entire past year a state of tension has existed as a result of the various pressures and demands, protests and campaigns, conducted by elements of "Solidarity". This has a very negative effect on the socioeconomic stabilization of the country and on the ability to fully implement the agreements. Contrary to the agreements in Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab and to the union's statute, "Solidarity's" bulletins, leaflets and posters sometimes undermine our allies, the party's leading role in the state, and the PRL's political principles. Campaigns undertaken by some elements of "Solidarity" bear the mark of a deliberate attack on state institutions and economic and administrative authorities. They limit their ability to function, therefore they are aimed to weakening and paralyzing the authorites. This cannot help but affect the efficiency of their operations, their efforts to overcome the crisis, and by doing so, to improve the living conditions of society.

The government has assumed a partnership relationship with the trade unions, a relationship in which there is place for a difference in opinions, even for protest actions, but in which the primary goal can only be the good of all of society, the good of the People's Republic. The Polish people have placed and continue to place great hopes in the social agreements. The government wants to fulfill these expectations. But this is possible only if both sides implement the social agreement and focus all their efforts on solving the most important economic problems, on the constructive cooperation of all social forces in the country. The obligations ensuing from the social agreements concern the following groups of problems:

1. Wage regulations, working time, and changes in collective working contracts.

2. Monetary social benefits.

3. Health protection and social welfare.

4. Working conditions.

5. Housing construction.

6. Market supplies, and particularly food articles.

7. Activities of the independent, self-governing trade unions.

8. Obligations of a general nature.

The material contains an assessment of the implementations of decisions of national importance embodied in the Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab agreements, according to the accepted record, and also an assessment of the financial results ensuing from implementation of subsector agreements.

I. Wage Regulations, Changes in Collective Contracts and Problems Relating to Working Hours

1. Wage Increases

The decision was made to institute gradual wage increases for all working groups and above all for those earning the minimum wage. In accordance with the agreements signed at the Gdansk Shipyard, the government is obliged to make an analysis of wages in all subsections and present, by October 31, 1980, a program of wage growth from January 1, 1981, as agreed-upon with the trade unions, for those at the minimum wage level, taking into account families with many children.

In the Jastrzab agreement the date for beginning the implementation of general wage increases was determined to be the fourth quarter of 1980. In the Hard Coal Mine (KWK) "Manifest Lipcowy" agreement it was also determined that beginning with January 1, 1981, a ceiling for minimum and maximum wages will be designated.

Detailed recordings on wage increases are contained also in ministerial and subsector agreements.

Implementation

Council of Ministers Resolution No 81/80, dated September 6, 1980, specified the date and amount of wage increases for all those employed in the socialized economy. As of November 1, 1980 all workers were covered by the increases. At the same time the basic minimum wage was increased to 2,400 zlotys per month.

On January 1, 1981 family allowances for low-income families were also increased.

Proposals for further changes in the system of family allowances are, since January 1, 1981, in the hands of the trade unions for consultation.

On the basis of the preliminary analysis of the establishment of a social minimum, the Ministry of Labor, Wages and Social Affairs has prepared a proposal fixing the lowest remuneration for normal working time for workers in the socialized economy. The draft of the Council of Ministers Resolution in this matter is, as of January of this year, being coordinated with the trade unions.

As to maximum wages, it is proposed that their level be regulated by means of an equalization tax. Proposals on this are being discussed with the trade unions. The spread in the workers' earnings was decreased as a result of past wage regulations, which allowed for an increase in the lowest wage rates while the highest basic wage rates of workers paid monthly remained unchanged.

2. The Social Minimum and Compensation for Growth in Living Costs

It was agreed in Szczecin that by December 31, 1980 a social minimum will be determined and announced publicly. According to the Gdansk agreement the government was committed to prepare, by the end of 1980, the principles of compensation for an increase in living costs, taking into account the problem of a social minimum. These principles should be submitted for public discussion and, after agreement, put into effect.

Implementation

In January of this year drafts of Council of Ministers Resolutions on the following matters were sent to the trade unions for consultation:

-- on determining and examining changes in the social minimum, and

-- on compensating for increases in living costs.

After consultations with the trade unions, on August 10 of this year the Council of Ministers passed a resolution on the principles of determining and examining the social minimum. At present work is going on on determining the social minimum for working families as of the third quarter of this year and for families of private farmers. The calculated social minimum will be helpful in making decisions on wages and social benefits as well as on compensation for growth in living costs.

3. Travel Allowances and Separation Supplements

The Szczecin agreement provides that beginning January 1, 1981 the travel allowance will be increased. The government will present a proposal on this matter by September 30, 1980. It was also agreed in Gdansk that the separation supplement will be increased, with the date for submitting a proposal to be no later than October 31, 1980.

Implementation

After several months of consultation with the trade unions, on April 17, 1981 the Council of Ministers passed:

--resolution No 78 on benefits for workers who are temporarily transferred, in which the supplement for separation was fixed at 100 zlotys for each day at the place of temporary employment;

--resolution No 79 whose most important provisions are an increase in the travel allowance to 100 zlotys per day, and in the lump sum payment for hotel accommodations (outside of Warsaw) to 70 zlotys, and equalization of fare entitlements.

4. Working Time

It was agreed in Gdansk and Szczecin that by December 31, 1980 the principles and the method of implementing a program for introducing free paid Saturdays or another method of regulating the shortened working time will be prepared and presented. The records in Gdansk show that this program will provide for an increase in the number of free [nonwork] paid Saturdays as early as 1981.

However, in Jastrzab it was determined that all free Saturdays and Sundays for miners will begin with January 1, 1981, The principle of voluntary work on the statutorily free days will be unconditionally observed, beginning with September 1, 1980.

Implementation

As a result of the agreement by the government and the NSZZ Solidarity National Consultative Commission (KKP) concluded on January 30th of this year, the following principles and methods of shortening the working time were accepted:

a. A 40-hour workweek and an 8-hour workday are accepted as the ultimate standard for shortening the working time and as a general standard. Workers who now have a shorter work schedule will retain that schedule, with the exception of workers employed under conditions that are injurious to health and are arduous, whose working time will continue to be gradually reduced.

Separate principles apply to miners, in accordance with the agreements signed in Jastrzab.

b. The time for reaching the 40-hour workweek standard will be negotiated by the government with the trade unions this year.

c. For 1981, the introduction of a 42-hour workweek was agreed-upon and this working time standard can be applied, after coordination with the trade unions, to the detailed subsector problems dictated by the specific nature and type of work.

5. Collective Labor Contracts (UZP) and Industrial Subsector cards

The Gdansk and Szczecin agreements provided that changes will be made in the cards of the dockworker and health service worker. As a result of subsector agreements made later, it is expected that changes will be made in collective labor contracts and subsector cards in most sectors of the national economy.

Implementation

In talks with KKP NSZZ "Solidarity" it was agreed to postpone the application of new collective labor contracts until after January 1, 1982. This principle has not yet been finally coordinated with the remaining trade unions. Preparatory work for changing collective labor contracts in the ministries is going on. Despite the earlier agreements with certain occupational groups (longshoremen, printers, teachers, woodworkers), both "Solidarity" as well as the other subsector unions demanded that changes be made in collective contracts as early as this year.

Such changes were made in relation to certain occupations (most recently in August of this year), determining, at the same time, that no further wage movements should occur this year.

In the protocols for collective labor contracts, the nightwork differential in most subsectors was increased from 15 to 20 percent for persons working permanently on a shift schedule. For persons working mostly only on the night shift (e.g., bakery workers) the night differential was increased to 30 percent. In most subsectors a differential amounting to 10 percent for two-shift work was also instituted.

Comments

The combined effects of the increase in social benefits remunerations and the shortened working time are estimated to cost on the order of 225-260 billion zlotys annually. This amount includes the sum of about 77 billion zlotys resulting from ministerial agreements.

The basic problems resulting from agreements in the area of wages have been settled. Further wage increases will be dependent upon economic results and the management of funds after January 1, 1982, as the longterm program of wage policy and changes in collective contracts are implemented. Economic reform will create the conditions necessary for greater independence of enterprises in this area.

As pertains to health service workers, there has been no agreement on working time for doctors. The trade unions are demanding that the workweek be reduced below 40 hours.

II. Monetary Social Benefits

1. Lowering of the Retirement Age

The government commission decided that it was not possible under the country's present demographic and economic circumstances to fulfill the demand made by the Inter-Factory Strike Committee (MKS) in Gdansk that the retirement age for women be lowered to 50, and of men to 55, or after 30 years service in the PRL for women and 35 for men, regardless of age. At the same time it declared that this matter may be brought up for discussion in the future.

The MKS in Gdansk demanded that this matter be examined by December 31, 1980 and that the possibility of earlier retirement (by 5 years) by workers employed under arduous conditions (age 30 for women and 35 for men), and in the case of particularly arduous conditions, by at least 15 years, be considered. This should take place at the request of the worker.

However, the government commission in Jastrzab accepted the demand of the MKS that the retirement age of the miners working underground be lowered to 50 years and the retirement age of the remaining miners be lowered by 5 years. Also the principle of allowing full retirement to workers who have worked underground for 25 years regardless of age was accepted. These demands will be submitted to the PRL Sejm [parliament].

Implementation

On December 31, 1980 the Council of Ministers' decree on the retirement of drivers of certain mechanical vehicles, which provides for a gradual lowering of the retirement age for truck drivers, bus drivers and streetcar motormen, as well as drivers of vehicles that have the right of way. However, the demand made in Jastrzab by MKS on lowering the retirement age for underground mine workers from 55 to 50 cannot be met in one stroke, for this would cause a very great reduction in mining employees (by about 43,000 miners). Therefore, the Ministry of Mining has proposed a gradual reduction in the retirement age for miners. Based on this proposal and after consultation with the PRL Sejm commissions and the trade unions, a draft of a Council of Ministers resolution has been prepared which is now being coordinated in all its particulars.

A draft of a Council of Ministers' decree has been prepared and submitted for consultation which changes the decree relating to the first category of employment. The change will add about 200,000 persons to category 1. On July 1, 1981, a draft of a Council of Ministers' decree was submitted for consultation which deals with the retirement age of certain groups of workers employed under conditions that are injurious to the health or arduous.

Furthermore, the material prepared by the Ministry of Labor, Wages and Social Affairs (MPPiSS) titled: "Fundamental Directions of Change in the Annuity-Pension System", contains a proposal on making it possible to obtain early retirement in particularly justified social situations. It pertains to a further reduction (to age 55) in the retirement age of workers whose work demands particular physical and mental efficiency (e.g., divers, flyers), for workers in category 1 with long years of service, and for group 1 and 2 disabled persons.

This material was sent to the NSZZ Solidarity National Consultative Commission (KKP), the Consultative Commission of the Subsector Trade Unions, and the Autonomous Trade Union (AZZ) Executive Committee. Thus far a joint position has not been worked out.

2. The Size of Annuities and Pensions

In Gdansk, in reply to the demand that the annuities and pensions from the new and old files be equalized and the increase in livings costs be considered, the government commission's declaration was accepted, which stated that an increase in minimum annuities and pensions will take place each year in conformity with the country's economic cabilitity and that increases in minimum wages will be taken into account. The government will present an implementation program by December 31, 1980.

The government is preparing a proposal to raise the minimum annuities and pensions to the so-called social minimum, based on research conducted by the appropriate institutions, made available to the public, and submitted for inspection by the trade unions.

The Szczecin agreement stated that after the state's budgetary capability is examined, the minimum annuities and pensions will be raised to the proper amounts effective January 1, 1981.

Implementation

On January 1, 1981, by Council of Ministers' decrees dated September 6, 1980 and December 16, 1980, annuities, disability pensions, family pensions awarded before January 1, 1976, and benefits not exceeding 3,000 zlotys awarded to the end of 1979, were increased 500 zlotys (the first stage of the increase); benefits awarded during 1976-1979 amounting from 3,000 to 5,000 zlotys were increased by 300 zlotys, or 400 zlotys. Farm pensions awarded before January 1, 1978 were raised by 400 zlotys, or 300 zlotys. Supplements for wives of annuitants and pensioners in families with incomes up to 2,000 zlotys per person were increased to 400 zlotys. Supplements for children of annuitants and pensioners were increased on the same basis as family allowances for workers.

In the "Fundamental Directions of Change in the Annuity-Pension System", prepared by the Ministry of Labor, Wages and Social Affairs, provisions are made for eliminating the benefits from the "old file", instituting the statutory principle of annual increases in benefit payments, adapting the closest benefits to the changing social minimum, and reducing the disproportions in the level of benefits.

3. Equalization of Family Allowances

On the matter of the demand that family allowances be equalized for all occupational groups, it was agreed in Szczecin that this equalization should occur in three equal annual instalments, and that the first instalment should be implemented effective January 1, 1981. However, in Gdansk a target date was established by which the government is to present a program of action on this matter, the date being December 31, 1980.

Implementation

The Council of Ministers at a meeting on September 6, 1980, passed Resolution No 80 on conducting a reform in the system of family allowances which was to equalize, by 1983, entitlements in this area for all socio-occupational groups. The first stage of this reform was instituted on January 1, 1981. It provides for increased assistance to families with relatively low incomes, particularly those with more than one child. In addition, directional proposals were prepared for further changes in the family-allowance system, which established the assumptions for the next two stages of increases in this allowances and to attain, in 1983, the demanded equalization for all socio-occupational groups. These proposals were sent to the NSZZ Solidarity National Consultative Commission, the Subsector Trade Unions Consultative Commission, and the Autonomous Trade Union Provisional Cooperation Committee. At present, consultations are taking place with the trade unions on these long-range solutions.

4. Paid Maternity Leaves

Regarding the Inter-Factory Strike Committee's demand in Gdansk that a 3-year paid maternity leave be introduced, it was decided that by December 31, 1980, in consultation with the trade unions, an analysis will be made of the national economic capability and a time-period and amount of monthly benefits will be established for women taking advantage of the now-unpaid maternity leave for bringing up a child. In the Szczecin agreement the time for drawing this benefit was set at 3 years, and it was further agreed that by December 31, 1980 the government will present to the Sejm a draft of an applicable modification of article 187 of the Labor Code.

Implementation

The proposals to increase the state's assistance to mothers who interrupt their work to raise a child were sent to the trade unions on September 1, 1981. They were also discussed at the meeting of the Sejm Commission on Labor and Social Affairs on February 13 of this year.

The Council of Ministers' decree of July 17th of this year, dealing with upbringing leaves, became effective on July 1, 1981. It contains the following provisions:

1. An allowance for fathers or mothers who interrupt their work for a period of 18 calendar months from the end of a maternity leave. In the case of twins, or more children born at one birth, or a child that is crippled, or a female worker who is bringing up the child alone, the allowance will be paid for 3 years.

2. The upbringing allowance is from 100 percent of the lowest basic monthly remuneration, if the income does not exceed 2,400 zlotys, to 50 percent of the lowest basic monthly remuneration of the worker, if the income is higher than 3,000 zlotys but does not exceed 3,600 zlotys, paid monthly.

3. The allowance for mothers who are bring up their children as single parents is 100 percent higher than that calculated by the rules given above.

In addition, in the draft for the updating of the Labor Code it is proposed that the maternity leave be gradually extended while maintaining the right to a maternity allowance amounting to 100 percent of the remuneration.

III. Health Protection and Social Welfare

The Szczecin agreement considered the further improvement in medical care in Poland, and particular in medical supplies and equalization of payments for medicines by the insured, to be indispensable. The Gdansk agreement regarded an immediate increase in the performance efficiency of investment, an improvement in supplies through additional import of raw materials, wage increases for all health service workers, and an immediate preparation of a program to improve the state of the people's health, to be indispensable.

Implementation

The method and the specific dates for implementing the Gdansk and Szczecin agreements were concretized in the protocol of understanding signed on November 16, 1980 with the delegation of health service workers organized in NSZZ "Solidarity" and in the attachments to this understanding, as well as in the agreement, signed December 16, 1980, with the National Council of the Health Service Workers' Trade Union.

In both agreements, 450 detailed decisions were made jointly, of which 279 contained specific accomplishment dates. Mixed working teams were appointed to prepare the concepts for executing the specific items in the agreements.

The matter which is fundamental to the development of the health service is the assurance of appropriate funds for this purpose and the implementation of investment tasks. For 1981, financial outlays that are 36 percent higher than in 1980 have been allocated for health protection and social welfare. At the same time, 2 percent of the state's investment outlays for development of the material resources of the health service and social welfare has been secured. Hospital construction is treated in investment activities on a par with housing construction. To improve the materials base more rapidly, 177 administrative buildings have been allocated thus far for health service purposes, of which 32 of the installations have already been outfitted.

According to a decision by the Government Presidium on May 15th of this year, begining with 1982, health service and social welfare investments can be financed out of the National Health Protection Fund (NFOZ) beyond the amounts envisaged in the National Socioeconomic Plan (NPSG). On February 20th, this year, the Council of Ministers approved agreements pertaining to deliveries of medicines indispensable for uninterrupted treatment, priorities in imports for basic medicines, and systematic analyses of deliveries of medicines and medical supplies. The release of foreign currency cash in accordance with the decisions of the Council of Ministers Presidium on May 15th made it possible to intensify the import of medicines.

The Ministry conducts analyses of deliveries of medicines as they are received, based on the "basic medicines register". A draft of a program showing the minimum needs of the health service was prepared.

Work is being done on a new edition of a government program in the field of health protection and social welfare for 1981-1985. The Ministry of Health and Social Welfare has prepared a long-range program for development of the pharmaceutical industry.

Implementation of the items recorded in the agreements pertaining to health service and social welfare is, on the whole, proceeding in a timely manner.

The items in the area of wages and extension of social entitlements may eventually require revision, in view of the fact that their financial results will amount to over 10 billion zlotys.

IV. Working Conditions

1. Equalization Allowances

In Szczecin, agreement was reached on the principle that those who lost their health in connection with performing their functions in the workplant, should receive earnings no lower than those received in the previous position. The Government has committed itself to present the Sejm with a proposal of a new text for articles 217 and 218 of the Labor Code, by September 30th, 1980, in accordance with the principle agreed upon.

Implementation

The draft update of the Labor Code contains a change in articles 217 and 218. The update envisages equalization allowance payments for workers who were injured on the job or who suffered occupational illness during the entire period they remained in the employ of a given workplant. On December 23, 1980 a letter on this matter was sent to the NSZZ "Solidarity" National Consultative Commission and the Consultative Commission of the Subsector Trade Unions. On February 6th of this year a draft of the law changing the Labor Code was sent to the trade unions, ministries, voivodship offices, scientific circles and organizations and other institutions, and on May 7th a second version of the law was sent out on which talks began on May 20th with the trade unions on the professional level. At the motion of NSZZ "Solidarity" these talks were postponed to a later date.

2. Occupational Diseases

In Jastrzab a demand that anthracosis of the lungs be added to the list of occupational diseases was accepted. In addition, the principle was accepted that the inclusion of other illnesses as occupational diseases will be dependent on the opinion of the trade unions.

Anthracosis of the lungs in workers who in their work are in contact with the agents that cause anthracosis is, in accordance with the binding regulations, considered to be an occupational disease.

As a result of the many demands to add new diseases to the occupational diseases list, the Ministry of Health and Social Welfare prepared a draft of a Council of Ministers' decree on this matter. A team of experts from research institutes has been appointed for this purpose. This team will verify the demands to determine that those diseases that have a direct causal relationship with working conditions are approved for inclusion in the occupational diseases list.

The draft of the Council of Ministers' decree on occupational diseases will shortly be sent to the trade unions for coordination.

3. Training at the Expense of the Workplants

The principle was accepted in the Szczecin agreement that only workers who have distinguished themselves in their jobs and those who by reason of loss of health are forced to change their jobs, may be sent to schools for leading workers and for professional courses at the expense of the workplant. The trade unions will delegate workers to these schools and courses in consultation with the plant managers.

Implementation

The government is of the opinion that the professional qualifications of the workers must be raised in an efficient and planned manner in accordance with the needs of the workplants and that the trade unions have an appropriate role in deciding who should be sent and to what types, directions and specialties. This position is expressed in a draft of a Council of Ministers' resolution pertaining to changes in the system for training and improving workers. The new regulations will give the workplants a great deal of freedom in choosing the number of persons sent for training and also in establishing the scope of entitlements for these persons. It will also provide for the participation of the trade unions in the fair distribution of funds for this purpose. This draft is now in the hands of the trade unions for their opinion.

Because of the importance of the subject, the consultations became prolonged. To develop its position, the trade unions reached out widely for the opinions of the local elements.

At present there is a difference in positions on two matters, i.e., training that is totally separate from the work and the limits on the amounts of financial assistance granted to the worker. This matter will require further consultation with the trade unions.

4. Assignment of Personnel to Public-Service Work

It was decided in the Jastrzab agreement that effectively immediately no workers who hold permanent positions in a specific workplant may be delegated to any kind of work outside the workplant.

Implementation

This demand is in accord with the position of the Ministry of Labor, Wages and Social Affairs. Functions and tasks of a social nature may not be fulfilled at the expense of the workplant. This position was also expressed in a letter on the implementation of agreements, in the part pertaining to the right to work, which was sent to the NSZZ "Solidarity" National Consultative Commission and the Consultative Commission of the Subsector Trade Union on December 23, 1980.

V. Housing Construction

It was decided in the Szczecin agreement that the government will submit a program for solving the question of housing, with the guarantee that the waiting period for housing will not be longer than 5 years. The problems of housing construction were also covered in the Gdansk agreement, but the Szczecin provisions went further.

Implementation

An inter-ministerial group prepared "Crucial Problems of Housing Policy in Poland During 1981-1985" which contained a quantitative program of housing counstruction and changes in the principles of implementing and financing housing construction, as well as in the allotment of dwellings.

Considering the country's difficult economic situation, the preliminary housing program specified 1,200-1,300 thousand dwellings, i.e., the level achieved during the past 5-year period. This program was developed on the assumption that during 1981-1985 about 900 billion zlotys will be allocated for housing.

The PZPR Ninth Extraordinary Congress resolution states that the share of outlays for housing construction and community and technical infrastructure should amount to at least 30 percent of the total investment outlays over a long-term period, thus making it possible to gradually increase the number of dwellings built.

The government accepted the above decision for implementation.

Present investment potential does not permit, as had been envisaged, availability of dwellings during the current 5-year period to members waiting for housing at the end of 1980. Nor will it be possible to reduce the waiting period to 5 years. Housing construction is being restricted by a lower production of cement, caused by shutdowns of cement plants due to lack of coal.

The government is taking action to thriftily manage the funds designated for housing construction. Increasing the powers of the local authorities and ensuring them greater independence will assist in achieving this goal. In a situation where the possibility of enlarging the housing program is limited, an effort is being made to make maximum use of all kinds of existing reserves and local and social initiatives undertaken implement housing construction in all its forms.

In order to make the housing policy more effective, legal acts were issued defining new and more advantageous principles of implementing and financing socialized construction and financing single-family housing, and allotment of dwellings.

In view of the fact that the basic form of satisfying housing needs will continue to be cooperative construction, to prevent an increase in the indebtedness of the population by reason of obtaining dwellings, important changes have been made in the principles of financing this construction. The bank credit amortization granted for construction of cooperative tenant dwellings has been increased from one-third to one-half of the debt. The principle has been applied that additional costs arising from construction of housing on sites that have been damaged by mining, and, in some cases, the additional costs arising from having to build special foundations for buildings, will not be included in the membership's costs for housing construction.

In addition, the forms and conditions for the state's financial assistance in supplementing the money invested in housing and for reducing the payments on the credit granted for cooperative tenant housing, have been expanded and made more flexible. At the same time much more favorable credit requirements have been established for financing single-family construction--by increasing the amount of credit granted the persons involved.

Consultations are now taking place on the drafts of the principle of having the workers conduct single-family construction, as submitted by the Consultative Commission of the Subsector Trade Unions.

In addition, the principle of allotting allocated-quarters and functional housing was defined, at the same time calling attention to the application of the principle of openness, thorough examination of the comments and observations that are made, and on increasing social control in the allotment of dwellings.

VI. Improvement in Market Supplies With Special Consideration to Food Articles

The Gdansk and Szczecin agreements accepted a settlement on improvement of meat supplies as of January 1, 1981, resulting from an increase in the profitability of production, a restriction of export to an indispensable minimum, and an increase in the importation of meat. It was also agreed that by December 31, 1980 a program will be developed for improving meat supplies, taking into account that a ration card system may have to be introduced. Furthermore, it was agreed that all scarce, domestically produced, commonly used articles will be withdrawn from the PEWEX (Domestic Export Enterprises) shops. In the Jastrzab agreement it was decided that special-privilege coupons for desirable commercial goods will be eliminated and that also supplies of these goods would be increased.

Implementation

The government's activities concentrated on making it possible to increase the profitability of farm production, give agriculture more means of production, and to better develop the land. Activities in this area both at the turn of 1980-1981 and recently as part of the implementation of the settlements from Rzeszow and Ustrzyki Dolne and settlements made before the Central Union of Agricultural Circles and Organizations (CSKiOR) Congress, will not bring positive results until the next few months and years.

The drop in deliveries of many basic commodity groups essential to the population defines the market situation.

This is the result of poor harvests of farm crops in 1980, and thus of the drop in farm animal population and also a serious drop in industrial production.

Emergency steps were taken to lessen the social burden of the deteriorating market supply situation, particularly as to distribution of food articles; however, despite the application of a meat rationing system it has not been possible to provide deliveries at a level which would fill the rations completely and at the required times. This made it necessary to temporarily reduce the ration by 20 percent. The following principle measures were taken to stabilize the market:

Meat deliveries from imports during the first six months of this year totaled 25,000 tons. For the second six months foreign-exchange funds were ensured to import 108,000 tons, of which 50,000 tons came from PEWEX funds. Supplies of flour, groats, flakes, noodles and rice, both from domestic sources and from import, were increased. The increase amounted to 230,000 tons as compared with 1980. Domestic supplies of fats were supplemented by imports, for a total amount of 86,000 tons, of which 6,000 tons was from PEWEX funds, tons was from PEWEX funds, making it possible to obtain a 1980 level of supplies. The lower supplies of animal fats and butter were compensated by deliveries of margarine and oil-- higher by about 20,000 tons. As the market situation deteriorated, and especially the supplies of food items, it was decided to expand rationing.

Decisions on rationing were first consulted with the broadest possible circles of society and the trade unions, as well as with the Sejm Commission for Domestic Trade, Small-Scale Production and Services.

Although the application of a rationing system ensures equal distribution of the commodity mass across the entire country, it does not eliminate the difficulties in obtaining basic food articles in the amounts specified in the ration standards, particularly of meat and poultry.

In order to ensure the indispensable amounts of food for children and youth in summer camps, great organizational efforts were made to guarantee the participants the necessary food supplies and articles of personal hygiene.

In previous years the trade unions gave far-reaching assistance in organizing and financing the summer camps and scout camps. This year, in view of the much lower interest in this subject by the elements of NSZZ "Solidarity", the burden of organizing and financing the camps fell to a much greater degree on the state administration.

However, it was not possible to ensure such supplies for the workers' vacations. Supplies of unrationed goods were transferred from the large urban centers to tourist areas.

The following additional measures should be mentioned:

-- The decision made by the Government Presidium on June 5th of this year designating all of the foreign-exchange receipts from PEWEX for interventionist purchases of market goods and components for the production of such goods. Out of these funds the market will receive 50,000 tons of meat, 6,000 tons of butter and bacon, 1,000 tons of cheese, and personal hygiene articles.

--The anticipated increase in sales in PEWEX, facilitating further imports for the market and, in accordance with the agreement with the trade unions, returning to the PEWEX network by the end of 1981, sales of appealing, domestically produced, nonfood items.

-- The coordination, irrespective of the exchange realized on the basis of annual protocols, of the purchase abroad of food articles with a market value of about 1 billion zlotys, in exchange for industrial articles.

To improve market-goods management and to more effectively protect the interests of the public under conditions of inadequate supplies of market goods, the government has appointed an extraordinary commission to combat speculation. Its tasks is to coordinate the activities of the proper organs so as to quickly reduce the occurrences of speculation. The controls over distribution of goods and free-market sales have been strengthened. The increased operational competence of the institutes appointed for this purpose together with the help of the trade unions and social organizations should bring perceptible results in the struggle against speculation.

VII. Activities of Independent, Self-Governing Trade Unions

In the social agreements it was regarded as advisable to appoint new, self-governing trade unions which would be genuine representatives of the working people. The agreements did not question the right of anyone to remain in the present unions, and it was envisaged that in the future cooperation between the unions would be established.

The agreements stated that new, independent, self-governing trade unions will observe the principles defined in the PRL Constitution. They stated that the trade unions will defend the interests of the workers and do not intend to fulfill the role of a political party. They will stand by the principle of social ownership of means of production, which is the basis of the socialist system existing in Poland. It was acknowledged that PZPR fulfills the leadership role in the state, and it was acknowledged that the unions, without undermining the established system of international alliances, strive to ensure the working people the appropriate means of control, to express their opinion and defend their interests. It was stated that the government will guarantee and ensure full respect for the independence and self-government of the new trade unions, both as to their organizational structure and their functioning at all levels of activities.

It was also stated that the government will ensure the new trade unions full ability to fulfill the basic functions of defending the interests of the workers, and in implementing the material, social and cultural needs of the workers. It was also guaranteed that the new trade unions will not be the object of any discrimination. It was acknowledged that the formation and the activities of the independent, self-governing trade unions comply with the International Labor Organization conventions, ratified by Poland: No 87 on union freedom and protection of union rights, and No 88 on the right to organize and bargain collectively.

Because many union and workers' organizations exist, it was acknowledged that the government will undertake the legislative initiatives pertaining particularly to the law on trade unions, the law on workers' self-government, and the labor code. It was agreed that the new strike committees may transform themselves into plant organs representing workers, such as labor committees, workers' committees, labor councils, or founders' committees of the new, self-governing trade unions.

It was decided that the founders' committees will function until the statutory election of new leadership. The government committed itself to make it possible for the new trade unions to be registered outside the register of the Central Council of Trade Unions (CRZZ). It was agreed that the new trade unions should have a genuine opportunity to publicly express themselves on key decisions determining the living conditions of the working people, the principles of the division of national income for consumption and accumulation, the division of the social consumption fund for various purposes (health, education, culture), the basic principles of remuneration and directions of wage policy, and particularly the principles of automatic adjustment of wages for inflation, long-term economic plans, directions of investment, and price changes. A commitment was made that the conditions for fulfilling these functions would be ensured.

It was agreed that a center of socio-occupational work would be formed whose task would be an objective analysis of the work situation, the living conditions of the working people, and a method of representing the interests of the workers. The center will also prepare professional reports and publish the results of its studies.

It was agreed that the new unions will have their own publications. The right to freely organize into trade unions was also ensured.

It was agreed that representatives of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee or founding committees of the self-governing trade unions, and other workers' representatives would be ensured participation in the preparation of laws on trade unions.

It was agreed that the right to strike will be guaranteed in the law being prepared on trade unions. It was acknowledged that this law should define the conditions for proclaiming and organizing a strike, methods of settling disputes, and responsibility for violations of the law. The strikers and the persons helping them are guaranteed their personal safety and retention of present working conditions.

In the April 17, 1981 protocol in Bydgoszcz it was agreed that private farmers will have the right to organize into trade unions under the same principles as workers in the socialized economy.

Implementation

The Council of State issued a resolution dated September 13, 1980 on registration of newly organized trade unions. It was confirmed by a law dated October 8, 1980 which changed the law on trade unions. The Supreme Court registered NSZZ "Solidarity" on November 10, 1980. By August 15, 1981 the Voivodship Court in Warsaw had registered 84 trade unions. The government sent a draft law to the Sejm on private farmer trade unions, on the registration of the Central Union of Agricultural Circles and Organizations, and on the registration of inter-union organizations. The laws were passed on May 6, 1981. On May 12, 1981, NSZZ Private Farmers "Solidarity" and Central Union of Agricultural Circles and Organizations were registered.

In accordance with the agreements the new trade unions are able to fulfill their statutory obligations, express their opinions on key decisions pertaining to the living conditions of the working people.

At the ministerial level organs have been appointed to oversee the implementation of the agreements made with representatives of the workforces. The procedure for examining and taking care of workers' demands and propositions by the organs of state administration has also been established. The status of implementation of the concluded agreements is periodically assessed by the government. The chairman of the Council of Ministers has informed the PRL Sejm on the program of governmental action which is to ensure implementation of the agreements.

The government's report on the status of the implementation of the Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab agreements was presented at a meeting held on July 21, 1980. In its resolution the Sejm accepted this report, expressed its approval at the actions taken by the government aimed at fully executing the commitments contained in the agreements and on the motion of the chairman of the Council of Ministers it appointed a minister for trade union affairs and day-to-day coordination of the activities of the organs of state administration in this field.

On February 20, 1981 the Council of Ministers appointed a Council of Ministers Committee for Trade Union Affairs directed by the vice chairman of the Council of Ministers.

Based on the Council of Ministers Resolution work was undertaken to prepare a new law on trade unions. Representatives of NSZZ "Solidarity", representatives of the subsector and autonomous unions, and representatives of learning and practice were ensured participation in the group which was to prepare the draft of the new law.

The draft of the law on trade unions prepared by the group was submitted to the public. This draft was sent to the PRL Sejm and is the subject of deliberations in Sejm commissions. Drafts of laws on a state enterprise and on a workers' self-government were also sent to the Sejm.

Drafts of the basic decisions concerning working people's important problems are submitted to the trade unions for their opinions. The consultations also take place by way of direct meetings of members of the government with trade union representatives. Opinions on decisions pertaining to a series of wage increases, increases in family allowances, annuities and pensions, price controls, and application of a rationing system had also been sought.

Many drafts of decisions have been submitted for opinions, including assumptions on reform of family allowances, annuities and pensions. Proposals involving economic reform, the law on trade unions, the law on a state enterprise, and the law on workers' self-government, were referred to the trade unions for opinion and were submitted for public discussion. A center for socio-occupational work was formed in the "Solidarity" National Consultative Commission. This center, using the printing facilities of the union and the publishing institute of the trade unions, publishes professional reports and other work.

The new trade unions have been given the opportunity to publish a union newspaper. A weekly, "Solidarity", with a print run of 500,000 copies is appearing and is available through the regular press distribution network. Regional offices in Szczecin, Jastrzab, Jelenia Gora, Koszalin and Plock, publish their own newspaper. The individual inter-factory founding committees of NSZZ "Solidarity" and the organs of subsector and autonomous unions publish their own information bulletins. The activities of the union and the statements of its activists are widely published in both the central and local press.

As a result of talks held in February and May of this year, NSZZ "Solidarity" matters can now be widely covered on the radio and television.

Information on current events related to the union movement has been given over Polish Radio in the programs with the largest listening audiences.

"Signals of the Day" presented from 7 to 11 items monthly. "Four Seasons of the Year" devoted one of its editions a month entirely (2 hours, 40 minutes) to such problems as: the right to strike (with the participation of union and government experts), the struggle against speculation, the possibilities of increasing food production, and social control over production.

The central programs of Polish Radio and the Warsaw Radio-Television Center present an average of 65 programs monthly on problems relating to union matters, mainly those relating to NSZZ "Solidarity" activities. These items do not include the daily reports on union actvities in the Polish radio and television news programs. Union problems are also widely shown in television programs.

For example, during a 20-day period in August during the main news program statements from NSZZ "Solidarity" were broadcast seven times. In almost all programs of the "Economists Forum" series, experts from "Solidarity" and the subsector and autonomous unions take part. It is the same in the program series "Open Cards" and "Letters on the Economy".

Opinions of trade unions, including the regional ones, are presented in IMPULSY [IMPULSE], the union magazine.

Union activists, including those from NSZZ "Solidarity" broadly participate in "Studio 2" programs and programs of the Cultural Publicity Editorial Offices.

NSZZ "Solidarity" problems and the statements of its activists are widely broadcast on local television programs. The difference in opinions from NSZZ "Solidarity" stems not from lack of the union's access to the mass media, but the desire of "Solidarity" to form, in reality, its own structure, separate from the Polish Radio and Television.

Strike problems were contained in the draft on the law on trade unions. This refers to methods of settling collective conflicts, proclaiming and organizing strikes, responsibility for violating the law, etc.

The government, in accorance with the March 30th declaration, fully observes the principles for settlement of disputes as formulated in the draft of the law on trade unions. Unfortunately, elements of NSZZ "Solidarity" have frequently violated the principles specified in their own statute. A series of strikes was organized almost daily, without exhausting the means of negotiation. Protest actions and strikes were organized that had nothing to do with union activity, e.g., the protest campaign on freeing so-called political prisoners, street marches, etc. "Solidarity's" statements and publications often contain articles attacking the party and organs of state authority, demanding the removal of deputies and councillors, or changes in the electoral law for elections to the Sejm and the people's councils. The interference of "Solidarity" in filling leadership positions in enterprises and local state administrations became very common. Some union bulletins, leaflets and posters are damaging to our alliances and undermine the reliability of Poland as a member of the Warsaw Pact and CEMA.

There are cases of intrusion into the jurisdiction of the economic and state administration (for example, the blocking of goods for export).

Elements of "Solidarity" have undertaken activities which actually would have placed their activists above the law. In "Solidarity's" draft program and in many public statements by members of its leadership, a number of theses have been presented which constitute a flagrant contradition of the social agreements, the union's statutory principles, and the recognition by its leadership of the party's leading role in the state.

VIII. Agreements of a General Nature

1. The Law on Control of the Press, Publications and Spectacles

The Gdansk agreement provided that within 3 months the government will submit to the Sejm a draft law on control of the press, publications and spectacles. Censorship should protect the interests of the State. This means protection of economic and state secrets, state security, important international interests, religious beliefs and also the nonbelievers, and prevention of dissemination of texts dealing with immorality. The draft law should include the right to appeal the decisions of the organs on control of the press, publications and spectacles, to the Supreme Administrative Court.

Implementation

The draft law on control of publications and spectacles was published and a number of discussions on the draft were conducted. The Consultative Committee of Creative and Scientific Associations, the Consultative Committee of Subsector Trade Unions, and the NSZZ "Solidarity" Consultative Committee, participated in the work during the consultation stage. Representatives of the Episcopate were also consulted. As a result of the discussion, a new version of the draft law was prepared.

The PRL Sejm passed the law, to be effective on October 1, 1981.

2. Use of the Mass Media by the Denominational Unions in the Field of Their Religious Activities

The Gdansk agreement provided that use of the mass media by the denominational unions as part of their religious activities will be implemented by way of coordination of problems of a substantive and organizational nature between the state organs and the trade unions involved. It was decided that the government will provide for radio transmission of the Sunday mass within the framework of a specific agreement with the Episcopate.

Implementation

The Joint Committee of Representatives of the Government and the Episcopate undertook its activity as a forum for the normalization of relations between the state and the church in the interests of the country's development and the unity of its citizens. Radio transmission of the Sunday mass and transmission of a Sunday mass for mariners at sea was ensured.

The mass media widely reported all of the major church ceremonies and important events in church activities.

3. Mass Media Activities. Access by the Press, the Citizens and Their Organizations to Documents Prepared by the Government and the Administrative Organs

The Gdansk agreement provided that radio and television, the press and publications, should express the various thoughts, opinions and judgments and should be subject to social control.

It was agreed that the government will substantially expand its scope of socioeconomic information and that the press, as well as the citizens and their organizations, should have access to public documents, socioeconomic plans, etc., issued by the government and its subordinate administrative organs. It was also agreed that exceptions to the rule on the administration's overt actions will be specified in the law on control of the press, publications and spectacles.

Implementation

The diversity of thoughts, opinions and judgments has been widely expressed in the activities of radio and television, as well as press and publications. No one in Poland today needs to be convinced of this. The independence and initiative of the individual editorial offices and journalists has grown. New newspapers have sprung up (e.g., the union ones) presenting various viewpoints. The various opinions of political, social and economic activists, as well as representatives of the world of science, are widely presented on important social topics. Frequently church ceremonies and statements of representatives of the Catholic clergy are presented.

The deliberations of political, social and union organizations are reported regularly. Direct television transmission from the PRL Sejm sessions has become the rule and the deliberations at the Ninth PZPR Congress were transmitted directly.

The scope of the government's, and its subordinate organ's, information for the press, society and organizations, concerning different social and economic problems, has been expanded.

The reports published by the Main Statistical Office and other forms of economic information help in serving this purpose. A report on the state of the economy has been published. Materials on the work of the government are regularly sent to the press.

A weekly "Government Monitor" is broadcast on Polish Television. It describes the major subjects on which the state organs of administration are working. The press conferences of the government's press spokesman are also devoted to these subjects.

The union's management and the socio-occupational centers receive complete statistical information so as to enable them to competently express themselves on matters within their statutory rights and obligations.

The PRL Sejm passed, in accordance with the Gdansk agreement, a law on control of the press, publications and spectacles, which had been widely discussed. Work is continuing on a law on the press which will lawfully regulate the principles of activity of the press, radio and television, and also the principles of social control over them.

4. Job Dismissals After the 1970 and 1976 Strike and the Matter of the Arrested Persons Named in the Agreement

It was agreed in Gdansk that the grounds for the dismissal of workers from their jobs after the 1970 and 1976 strikes will be investigated without delay. It was agreed that in all of the reported cases, where dismissals were found to be improper, the workers, with their consent, will be immediately returned to their jobs, taking into account any qualifications that they may have acquired in the meantime.

It was agreed also that this will similarly apply to students who were expelled.

The agreement also states that the Minister of Justice will investigate the validity of the cases of the persons arrested and named in the agreement and the annex to the agreement. It was agreed that there will be complete observance of the freedom to express one's convictions in public and in professional life.

Implementation

The Ministry of Labor, Wages and Social Affairs has defined the rights of the persons returned to their jobs, who had been dismissed for strike activities during 1970-1980. The rights of the workers dismissed for strike activities have been defined more broadly than would appear from the literal interpretation of the Gdansk and Szczecin agreements. Not only are the rights of the workers who expressed an intent to return to work defined, but also the principles of reimbursement for damages to those who do not intend to return to work at the plants from which they were discharged, and those workers who sustained losses as a result of the disciplinary penalties assessed against them. On the basis of the above rules, workplants have accepted the returned workers and paid out the benefits that were due.

As to the matter of students, four cases of former students who had been expelled were investigated. Students rights were restored to two persons and the previous decisions to expel the other two were upheld because their expulsion for political activities had no relation to the union. The persons named in the agreement and the annex to the agreement remain at large.

As pertains to the full observance of the freedom to express one's conviction, it should be said that the freedom to express convictions in public and professional life is being fully observed, and the citizens of the PRL are also obliged to observe the law in accordance with the PRL Constitution.

5. Work on Economic Reform and Expansion of the Scope of Socioeconomic Information

It was agreed in Gdansk that work on economic reform must be greatly accelerated. It was stated that during the next few months the authorities will define and publish the basic assumptions of this reform. It was envisaged that there would be broad participation in public discussion on reform with broad participation of the trade unions in work on the laws on socialist economic organizations and on workers' self-government.

The demand that leadership cadre be selected consistently on the basis of qualifications and competence, from among members of the PZPR, other political parties, and those belonging to no party, was also accepted.

Implementation

In compliance with a resolution of the PZPR Central Committee Political Bureau and the Government Presidium, in September of last year a Commission for Economic Reform was appointed, which is composed of representatives of different circles, including trade unions. This Commission prepared a draft of a reform program which was published last September and submitted for public discussion. Taking the results of this discussion into consideration, "Directions of Economic Reform" was published which was accepted by the PZPR Ninth Extraordinary Congress and in July submitted by the government to the PRL Sejm.

As of July 1st the principles of economic reform were applied in the State Agricultural Farms (PGR) and small-scale production. The Council of Minister passed a resolution on changes in supply prices to be effective January 1, 1982. Work is now going on on a program to change retail prices and the principles of compensation as an integral part of economic reform. The application of new retail prices for bakery goods and grain products created the indispensable conditions for introducing new economic principles in the grain-milling and bakery industries. The principles of enterprise functioning in this field, in accordance with the approved directions of reform, envisaging independence, self-government and self-financing, will go into effect on October 1, 1981.

The first stage of changes in the management system has been applied, accomplishing a reorganization of the central economic administration.

A detailed schedule of work on economic reform has been prepared. It is based on the assumption that reform in the basic sectors of the national economy will go into effect on January 1, 1982.

A report on the state of the economy has been prepared, as well as the government program for overcoming the crisis and stabilizing the economy, passed by the PRL Sejm in July.

Both in work on applying economic reform and in current activities, a great deal of attention is given to the qualifications and competence of the cadre and social control over its work. This is shown by the principle of having the managers of enterprises express their opinions through the workers' self-government, the principle of enterprise independence, and thus also the broad competence of its managers. Changes in cadre were made in recent months at all levels of management, resulting in new people with high qualifications, both PZPR members, members of other political parties, as well as unaffiliated persons, in the elements of management.

The government is also concerned with providing the cadre working conditions and is against the unwarranted attacks on the cadre. The PZPR Ninth Congress has defined both long-range tasks and those arising from everyday needs, in the area of cadre policy, in compliance with public opinion.

One year's experience has shown that it is necessary to take a new and closer look at the agreements signed thus far. The multiplicity of the concluded, difficult-to-control subsector and local agreements, the social tensions connected both with their signing and their implementation, make it difficult to concentrate on the most important matters--leading the country out of the economic crisis and stabilizing social life, and creating the indispensable conditions by which the Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab obligations may be fulfilled.

Instead of the improvement in the economy that the people have been awaiting, the past year has brought a further deterioration and thus has made the daily life of the citizens even more burdensome. It has therefore become necessary to reconsider the accepted agreements and adapt them to realistic economic potentialities and also to the new conditions arising from economic reform--to subordinate the subsector and local agreements to one, superior general agreement. The obligations agreed upon in Gdansk, Szczecin and Jastrzab were two-sided. The government is waiting for the Independent, Self-Governing Trade Union "Solidarity", which was formed as a result of the social agreements, to fully implement its obligations--to observe the statutory principles which it freely accepted.

The government is counting on being able to cooperate with all the trade unions on a partnership basis in solving today's difficult problems, and on their cooperation with each other.

Once again the government confirms its willingness to cooperate as a partner, in the spirit of policy of social agreement and socialist renewal accepted at the PZPR Ninth Congress.

GOALS, ACTIVITIES OF PEASANT PARTY OUTLINED

Bydgoszcz GAZETA POMORSKA in Polish 19 Nov 81 pp 1,2

[Interview with Roman Pstrong, member of the secretariat of the Supreme Committee of ZSL and chairman of the ZSL voivodship committee in Wloclawek, by Aleksander Lewandowski: "We Need a Political Program and Faith in Our Own Strength"]

[Text] On the 17th of this month, at the sixth plenary session of the Supreme Committee of the United Peasant Party, Wloclawek peasant activist Roman Pstrong was elected to the secretariat of the Supreme Committee (NK) of ZSL. Yesterday we talked to him about current rural problems and the activity of the party.

[Question] ZSL members are calling for the immediate convening of an extraordinary congress of the party. What views on this matter were presented during Tuesday's deliberations at the Sixth Plenary Session of the NK of ZSL?

[Answer] Actually among the members at the plenary session there was a difference of positions and views on setting the date for calling a congress of the party (part of them were in favor of shifting it even a year, stating that we needed to focus our attention on the current problems of the country), but what won out was the concept assuming that we would combine such important goals as those which we had come to recognize, such as the creation of a front of national understanding, the comprehensive introduction of laws concerning the rural areas and agriculture, and a law on people's councils and regional self-government, with a reporting and elections campaign. While it is going on we intend to discuss thoroughly the drafts of the declaration of ideas for the political program and statute of the party and at the same time to discuss all the economic and sociopolitical issues going on. The plenum decided to call a congress during the second quarter of next year. Here it must be emphasized that for a long time the Wloclawek organization has been calling for good preparation of congress documents and a well thought out concept for waging a reports and elections campaign in ZSL, and for the congress to be convened in relatively short order.

[Question] What is your assessment of the drafts of the congress documents accepted by the plenum?

[Answer] The documents are still imperfect, too broad. In this connection they should be treated merely as material for discussion. Their final shape will be determined by all the members of the party and by the congress. We are inviting all members of ZSL and of ZMW, which we consider one of the links in the peasant movement and also as our allies, to discuss the drafts. The content and rank of the declaration of ideas of the political program and statute will depend upon all of us.

[Question] The society is placing great hopes in the creation of a front of national understanding. What is your view of this idea?

[Answer] The party is calling for the immediate creation of political conditions for the formation of a front of national understanding. I think that all front participants should have equal rights, regardless of the size of the their social constituency. In the party's view, there should be guaranteed in it representative participation for all genuine social forces standing on constitutional principles. Corresponding preparations have already been undertaken in the rural community. We see the need for the speedy creation of an initiative group at the voivodship level. Today's session of the Voivodship Commission for Cooperation Between the Party [PZPR] and [Other] Political Parties in Wloclawek will surely take up such an initiative. Taking into account the existing rural breakdown, in Wloclawek we have developed actions to integrate the community, conducting partnership talks with all the trade unions of private farmers operating in rural areas.

[Question] In your opinion, which of the farm problems needs to be solved most quickly?

[Answer] The rural community is waiting for the solution of two basic complex issues: from the sphere of agricultural law, which requires no material outlays but merely the acceleration of legislative and economic-production work, the weighing of price ratios and levels and the assurance of the means of agricultural production. Decisions in this area should have the nature of systems solutions. It is difficult to consider decisions on the introduction of related sales to be such.

Such solutions of a systems nature to stimulate the level of production are being drawn up, with the intention of introduction as of 1 January 1982. The party also considers it essential that there be constitutional guarantees concerning the lasting nature of private farming.

[Question] An in the activity of the party?

[Answer] They consider the most urgent matters of party work to be the consolidation of our own ranks, actions to integrate the rural community, and meeting half way all efforts to eliminate local conflicts. At the level of the Supreme Committee it is essential to accelerate our own legal work in the sphere of rural areas and agriculture and in economics and systems. The breakdown of the peasant-worker alliance and the related conflicts related thereto caused by a shortage of foodstuffs in the towns and of industrial goods in the rural areas are leading to the disintegration of society. There is an urgent need to undertake actions binding the society together through the commitment of all social forces and to expand appropriate propaganda efforts presenting rural living conditions and everyday problems of urban residents. Nonetheless, the basic condition to all this is the restoration of the economic bond between town and country. This requires an increase of production on both sides. The past level of implementation of the guidelines of the Politburo of the PZPR Central Committee and the presidium of the NK ZSL concerning the key problems of farm policy is inadequate. We must pass from discussions of the "green light" for agriculture to concrete actions, finally assigning certain plants to produce the means of production for agriculture. Wloclawek Voivodship has not yet noted visible results on this issue.

[Question] How would you assess the party's position at the Sixth Party Plenum?

[Answer] The ZSL is moving slowly, but it is ever more clearly becoming the real party of the peasants. We need our own political program, faith in our own strength, and the full commitment of all members, because this is where the party's strength lifes.

CREATION OF YOUTH HOUSING COOPERATIVE PROPOSED

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 14 Oct 81 pp 1,2

[Article by Andrzej Roginski: "Youth Cooperatives -- One's Own Roof Over One's Head"]

[Text] "I am writing to you, because I do not know whom to turn to anymore, and the question concerns my nightmarish housing conditions..." "Dear Editor: Help me! What am I to do? How am I supposed to go on living under such conditions? We are living in a place 37 square meters in size, and there are eight of us... We beg you. Help us. I have been a member of the "Young People's Housing Block" Cooperative since 1968..."

Among the hundreds of letters which come into SZTANDAR MLODYCH from our readers, those which predominate are the ones which express most painfully the writers' lack of a corner of their own, those which portray terrible housing conditions, and those which describe the many years a married couple with children must wait for an apartment. What comes through in these letters is the helplessness, the lack of hope.

Meanwhile, the line for housing of one's own is getting longer. Most of those waiting are young people paying extortionate rents for a room in somebody else's residence. The housing cooperatives have 600,000 members and 1.2 million people applying for membership, all of them waiting for housing. The number of those waiting is getting bigger. In a short time it will reach 2 million, and 60 percent of them are young people. The shortage of housing is found both in the cities and in the rural rea areas. The ways the housing problem has been solved in the past are proving to be inadequate. It is no wonder that the state has neglected its duties by waging a poor housing policy, inasmuch as the construction program has collapsed.

In a situation where there is a shortage of housing, we have recently noticed such manifestations of the country's economic crisis as the drastic decline in the production of cement and other building materials, finishing materials, and so on. There is going to be some wait before we see the results of the economic reform, but the housing needs are there now.

Are we to sit with our hands folded? But one can make demands knowing full well that Solomon himself cannot get something out of nothing. Can one expect us young people to replace the state in its functions? Are we to pay rent for years for housing for our families? There is only one answer to these questions: NO!

Then what can we do? How can we shorten the time spent waiting for our own roof over our head? What sort of way can we make apartments come into being?

The editors of SZTANDAR MLODYCH and WALKA MLODYCH, together with the main board of ZSMP are proposing the creation of Youth Housing Cooperatives. We are treating this proposal as one of the ways to effectively get out of this blind alley. A Youth Housing Cooperative can be established wherever young people want one, in both large and small towns, as well as in the rural areas. Such possibilities already exist at present, because of the conditions created by Resolution No 22 of the board of the Central Housing Construction Cooperative Union (CZSBM), dated 6 April 1981, concerning additional cooperative housing construction carried out through the use of social initiative, and decisions by the presidium of the ZSMP main board dated 11 July 1981, concerning the creation of young people's building cooperatives and associations and patronal construction of single-family dwellings.

Of course the road before us is not an easy one: to establish cooperatives, find a location, obtain or produce the necessary materials, and find the best way to build our apartments, our houses. We think that there is the real possibility of obtaining housing within 3-4 years, and perhaps even more quickly. All we need is determination and consistent action.

There are already those people who have succeeded. In Wesola near Warsaw a dozen and some single-family dwellings were built in a year. They are the work of ZSMP members who created the Patronat-2 Cooperative Single Family Home Building Association. Before long we will be writing about how they managed it and about the absolutely unbelievably low costs. New cooperatives are already going up, for example, in Szczecinek. It is enough to have even ten people to set up a housing cooperative.

You will not remain alone. SZTANDAR MLODYCH will present the scenario for founding a Youth Housing Cooperative, facilitate contacts between interested parties, popularize the best experience,

give assistance in breaking down barriers.

We shall public the details shortly.

On the other hand, ZSMP will give organizational and legal assistance related to the creation of a Youth Housing Cooperative and execution of cooperative tasks, that is, mainly in building an apartment or house. Even today one can ask for help and advice from any ZSMP board or go directly to the Main Board.

On your correspondence we ask you add the words "Youth Housing Cooperatives."

GRLICKOV INTERVIEWED ON LCY CONGRESS PREPARATIONS

Zagreb START in Serbo-Croatian No 332, 10 Oct 81 pp 16-22

[Interview with Aleksandar Grlickov, member of LCY Central Committee Presidium, by Jelena Lovric]

[Text] START: One of the key points in the strategy of the 11th LCY Congress is the assessment that the democratic relations of self-management cannot undergo further effective development in society without deeper and broader democratic transformation of the League of Communists, that is, that society will not be democratized unless the party is democratized. (Thus it is that this congress confirmed not only that well-known truth that democracy lies at the very basis of our vision of socialism, but also that situation, which has several times recurred in our party's postwar activity, in which the observation that society finds itself in critical difficulties--social, economic and political--is followed by the assessment that the way out is to develop socialist self-management and to democratize society. Put more simply, that democratization is not a luxury to be left for easy times.) Certain changes in the bylaws were made along those lines at that time, and certain preconditions were achieved for more democratic activity. What can be said about the realization of those intentions and conclusions today when the preparations have begun for the 12th Congress of the League of Communists?

Grlickov: I agree with you that these stands taken by the 11th Congress of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia are not being carried out satisfactorily. There is good reason to inquire into the causes, both objective and subjective. LCY documents are not the limiting factor, whether they are programmatic, deal with the bylaws, or whatever. On the contrary. They are inspiring enough to encourage democratization of relations in the League of Communists and to initiate an extensive process of its democratic transformation. This is true of the LCY Program, for example. Nor is the structure of the membership, that is, its social composition, a hindrance either. By and large this applies to the leadership structure, to the forums of the League of Communists at all levels, though we would have to be frank about them and say that they do not correspond to the present-day needs and goals we are speaking of either in their composition with respect to age or with respect to certain other criteria. We must also alter the state of consciousness, that is, come to an awareness that self-reproduction of socialist self-management is not possible without a broad process of democratic transformation of the League of Communists. As the leading ideological force within the system, the League of Communists requires a greater effort by the rank and file and leadership bodies in achieving democratic relations and methods within the League itself and especially in society as a whole. Stopgap measures, especially the issuing of commands and imposition from above and a one-way flow of directives do not ensure unity--wherever they are dominant--in either action or political ideology within the League of Communists as the core of the revolutionary movement, nor do they tend to improve its effectiveness. There are many causes of the underdevelopment of democratic relations and of the democratic atmosphere in the League of Communists. There are the old habits we have spoken of as well as the insufficient willingness on the part of members of the League of Communists to wage a struggle for the policy and program of their party and to win that struggle with the weapons of political ideology in a democratic atmosphere. If the 11th congress goes down in history, then it will be precisely because it issued the demand for broad democratic transformation of the League of Communists as an essential prerequisite for the democratization of society, which in turn signifies development of the fundamental principles and goals of socialist self-management. Any attempt to skirt around them will inevitably lead us astray. The 12th congress ought to go further in developing the democratic platform and its content. An assessment must, of course, be made of the present state of affairs and a more decisive course adopted toward democratization of relations and the entire internal life within the League of Communists.

START: It is an essential function of the League of Communists, together with the other subjective forces, to promote the development of self-management. If it is to be up to that task, the League of Communists must institute itself as a critical force, and to do that, it must encourage an intellectual effort, an intellectual commitment, an exploration, it must insist on its own democratization.... However: someone said at a recent meeting that it was a bad thing for the opposition to be the only critic of the system, that it was a bad thing for the League of Communists to set itself up as that entity which is supposed to defend the system, when its priority task is to develop it, to change it and to improve it.

Grlickov: I cannot agree with all the judgments contained in your question. I do not think that it is an accurate judgment that the League of Communists is defending the system (insofar as this applies to the system's mechanism, since what I mean by the system is the constitutional order--socialist self-management, and various laws, decrees and other things represent only mechanisms). If we are speaking about the system as a mechanism, the League of Communists is in my opinion the strongest critic whether we are talking about individual party members or official organs. If there is criticism which can be justly addressed to it, then it is that no organized study of what is happening in real life stands behind that weighty everyday criticism and self-criticism, nor is there always a readiness to abandon certain specific solutions which have been unsuccessful and to offer new, better and appropriate ones. Why is it that a fetish is made of some specific solution, even when it is yielding bad results? Of course, I am not insisting on haste, I respect the need for adaptation, nor do I preclude cases of resistance and inconsistency. But I think that certain very poor solutions are often defended one-sidedly, and this relieves the subjective factors of the obligations to constantly get down to the real reasons for the gap between the solution "which embodies the system" and real life. Take, for example, the case of legalizing two means of payment (dinars and dollars) within the country, with inestimable consequences for our development, not only our economic development, but our political development as well. Prolonged insistence on specific solutions which reality does not accept, as well as insistence that the difficulties be reduced to nothing more than the inconsistency of those implementing the solution, objectively creates a distorted social consciousness to the effect that everyone is against some solution except those who worked on it and those who find some specific material benefit of their own in such a solution--whether it is a question of industries, sectors, or a republic or province. Making a fetish of every specific mechanism does not result in effective guidance of the economy, just as every specific solution does not always have to be proclaimed as the only one that conforms to self-management. This closes off the opportunity for nurturing the process of democratic reconciliation of the plurality of interests within self-management. In this domain there is room for criticizing members of the League of Communists for not having fought more decisively against the tendencies of this kind which exist. Finally, the truth is that whatever survives effectively in practice leads toward progress.

START: Some judge that the activity of the League of Communists within the framework of self-management is insufficient, that the League of Communists tends to be top-heavy in its activity, that it occupies a monopoly position vis-a-vis other participants in the sociopolitical process of decisionmaking, that it not only is not adhering to its own decision on abandonment of its directive role, but under the weight of the problems the forums of the League of Communists are beginning to operate on the principle of transmission, they are tending toward the dangerous practice of making decisions that belong to others, that they are derogating others....

Grlickov: Unless broad room is opened for expression of the plurality of interests in self-management and still broader room and an atmosphere for their democratic reconciliation, then certain powerful groups march onto the political scene, from various quarters out of a desire, in which they sometimes succeed, to impose themselves on behalf of their own interest, which is political-bureaucratic, technobureaucratic and particularistic. Members of the League of Communists are not immune to these tendencies, since they are also an integral part of the plurality of interests, and as such they themselves, in spite of the joint goals and ideals, naturally group and regroup as a function of interests. In my opinion, party members are not people who live some separate life of their own, apart from their interest and the interests of their environment. Nor are they people who have ready-made answers for everything. They experience and share the fate of society as a whole, above all that of their own community, and they are compelled to join with it in resolving the issues that are encountered. Separation from the community leads them into isolation, and that means that they are left without the opportunity to exert influence. It is here that we enter the relevant area and arrive at the realistic assessments of the monopoly of the League of Communists in the system of self-management. Wherever the monopolies actually exist, the goals and tasks of the League of Communists are not being altogether realized or are not being realized in a satisfactory way. There are monopolies, but we would be closer to the phenomenon if we referred to them by another name--cases of usurpation. There are various types of usurpation, by various individuals and groups within the League of Communists who usurp what they can, impose themselves forcibly wherever they can. But this is not a monopoly position of the League of Communists as a whole, but a lack of democratic relations wherever such things exist. And that in turn has an impact on development of democratic relations in society and on the functioning of socialist self-management. I agree with you that in that context top-heavy activity through forums becomes the principal form of activity, and other sociopolitical mechanisms become like transmission belts. But still you cannot confidently dispute the fact that the LCY, as an organized political force, though often it is "contradictory" by comparison with other parties, has been constantly insisting on "disenfranchising" itself, on its becoming the leading political force, and not a force which commands and directs, on development of the Socialist Alliance and on a democratic dialogue within it between party members and other socialist and self-management forces. The League of Communists rightly fears its own monopoly and strives to combat that. If that endeavor is not always successful in all places and at every point and with respect to each specific case, that is only a sign that certain of its parts are not capable of mobilizing people with a socialist and self-managing orientation, since they themselves are not prepared to fight for the authentic policy and program which the LCY is offering. I see the way out through a broad democratic transformation of the League of Communists and of the entire social structure, which by a cause-and-effect relationship will guarantee a process whereby everyone would not "wait" for democratization as a "gift." Operating within the system and through it, the LCY and every member individually will themselves undergo change on the road toward their own democratic transformation. No political and intellectual energy should be spared in pursuit of those goals, but an intellectual and concrete exploration should be organized and encouraged so that members of the League of Communists and the League of Communists as a whole are always at the head of the column, furnished not only with diagnoses, but also with offers for specific solutions, strategic or tactical, technical or embodying the system.

START: Assessments concerning the situation in the League of Communists differ mainly in the degree of dissatisfaction expressed. Even the highest leaders of the party say that there is "quite a bit of failure to understand the current situation, ideological confusion, contentment with oversimple responses to very complicated questions," while others speak of "an abundance of routinism and complacency," and still others are calling for suppression of "indolence and a return to enthusiasm".... As though this dissatisfaction does not originate exclusively with that characteristic so inherent in us that we are never satisfied with what we have achieved.

Grlickov: I think that we are not talking any longer about dissatisfaction with what we have achieved, which is a constructive trait of ours. This kind of dissatisfaction has been, is and will be a surge of energy for further development and progress. Our present dissatisfaction is the result of the compacted difficulties our society has been confronting in the economic, social and moral domains. The elements of crisis and the electrical charges they possess have rightly made us concerned and indeed disturbed. Statements can be uttered in several ways as to a diagnosis of the situation, but it is the essence which is important. Accordingly, our present dissatisfaction is the result of the difficult economic conditions in the country: chronic inflation with all its political, economic, social and ideological problems; exhaustion in material development on the basis of intensive conduct of economic activity; displacement of socialist self-management by exaggerated government interventionism and a gradual penetration of statist socioeconomic relations, while quite a few moral problems have also piled up in society, problems which usually are oversimplified. And in the context of all of this we are slow to build an integrated conception--a positive program of long-range and short-term goals which would correct the shortcomings that have been discovered in our development to date and would propose the necessary changes and adaptations. A positive program which would open up more reliable prospects and would be a factor in mobilizing the working people and indeed the League of Communists itself. That is how I conceive the recently formed commission of the SFRY State Presidency in conjunction with the federal councils. We cannot merely call for sacrifices by the workingman and not open up to him a clear perspective as to when various things will be resolved. The degree of dissatisfaction varies in intensity from issue to issue and from one place to another, but dissatisfaction is characteristic today of the social and political consciousness of all of us. Is it possible for these difficulties to bypass the LCY? No, it isn't. The LCY is a part of society, it is woven into the entire fabric of life. The question that arises in this connection is this: What is it that we are carrying to the 12th congress? What do we expect of it? Is this just some "routine" or "peacetime" congress? Is it merely a congress of continuity, as is sometimes said, or a congress of renewal, of construction of a positive program to solve these accumulated problems in order to restore confidence and assurance that, as in the past, we will successfully extricate ourselves from the difficulties which now face us? This is not a mere desire, but a realistic estimate of our overall conditions, social, material and social, and also a judgment to the effect that our working people have always been ready to make sacrifices if the goals are clear and the means offer guarantees. The 12th LCY Congress should also be a congress of renewal of the League of Communists itself, a reminder of the exceptional responsibility which it has in our present situation.

START: On one occasion you said that the democratization of society depends on the "balance of power among the social forces." What does this specifically mean today? Is democratization of the party and society at all possible in view of the present lineup of forces?

Grlickov: It is always true that the balance of power of the social forces determines the content and rhythm of individual processes. Power is not abstract; it depends above all on who possesses the surplus value of labor; after that the superstructure is self-evident in our context. I take a fundamental factor as my point of departure, and this is that there is no full democratization without complete and total self-management, and the latter in turn is impossible without its material foundation. We have a phrase for that in our political dictionary--that the direct producers must take possession of the entire surplus value of labor. If that is not altogether the situation, that means that there are also other centers of power which possess the surplus value of labor and are thereby forming a different balance of power among the social forces, and those conditions are not optimal for the quality and rhythm of democratization of society. At this point we might seek an answer to the question, among other things, of which strategies are those which speed up that process? In so doing, of course, I am not underestimating the role of the political system and of other political organizations in society. But they are derivative. They would have a different quality of influence if they did not possess material power, either directly or indirectly, if they did not have a powerful influence through the government administrative measures through which power is still very much possessed and the surplus value of labor and national income are shared out and redistributed. We have been concerned with this issue for a long time, there have been many cases of vacillation and many anemic mechanisms, and so our results are unsatisfactory. Defensive mechanisms are ineffective, and the power is settling where we do not want it, and people are becoming "powerful" even though objectively perhaps they do not want that. It is always easier to rule than to reconcile pluralized interests by democratic means and always attain the point of equilibrium in society. Nor am I underestimating the state of the spirit, of social consciousness as a whole. Translated into the language of practice, we need to fight and win a victory for our rights, and thereby our duties as well, if this process is to proceed naturally and normally like all other social processes. To wait for a "gift" means acknowledging the right to power, to usurpation, and various forms of privatization and manipulation. And the old generations, who have had their revolution, will also have to experience and carry out another one, the shaping of a democratic socialist self-managing society, which is not to mention the young people who are to carry out their own revolution in giving shape to a democratic socialist self-managing society. If we are dissatisfied with the results of the democratic transformation, and we are, that means that aside from the objective reasons, the balance of power, the state of consciousness, is not satisfactory either.

START: The principle of democratic centralism is most closely bound up with the topic of democratization of the League of Communists. You have spoken about that principle rather often: at times you have mentioned that it should be "refined," on another occasion you called for its "rehabilitation in the face of undemocratic methods and forms of activity and in the face of one-sided interpretations." On the eve of the 11th congress you said that "democratic content should be incorporated" into democratic centralism "by virtue of preparedness of the League of Communists in two directions: to tolerate both a majority and a minority within itself and a readiness on the part of the League of Communists, when it offers an alternative or specific solution, to enter into a dialogue with noncommunists to see if a better solution can be found in that dialogue." What would you say today about realizing those intentions of the 11th congress?

Grlickov: There are no new social conditions which would require abandoning the principle of democratic centralism. That is why I insisted on its "refinement," on "rehabilitation" of the democratic content as opposed to the centralistic content. In so doing I was guided, and I am guided even now, by a minimum of two positions. The first is the content of that principle, which was formulated at the 11th congress in the LCY Bylaws. I feel that democratic centralism in the LCY has been defined in the most democratic way, better than in other communist parties. It is similar to and more democratic than the definition of certain communist parties in western Europe, who in practice do have a satisfactory degree of democratic atmosphere in relations within the party. Our problem, then, does not lie in formulation, though I do not preclude the possibility of certain additional touches, but in practice and methods of operation, in the behavior of all members of the League of Communists. And of course in the behavior and methods of leadership bodies as well. Without practice and appropriate behavior formulations may be window dressing for a practice that is quite the opposite. We have had quite a few such cases in the development of the communist movement in the world up to now, and we also have some bad experience of our own. Our views on democratic socialism make democratic dialogue possible. Practice, however, is not satisfactory. The bylaws allow for existence of a majority and minority in the League of Communists in the process of debate of party policy on all issues of social and party life. The member of the League of Communists is not required to renounce his opinion, but he is required to carry out the decision of the majority. This is the optimal political space for a democratic dialogue. But it should be recognized that neither habits nor practice are yet up to the level of the formulations, and in practice the view taken of the minority is not exactly well-meaning. There are cases when people are given a hard time. That kind of practice and the atmosphere it gives rise to are one reason why in certain communities and cases the League of Communists is not operating within the system, but as an external factor. Then the dialogue is halted, the interlocutor must listen to directives, or the dialogue becomes a monologue. And when there is dialogue, there are frequent cases of intolerance, arguments are replaced by pejorative epithets and labels. Let us return to democratic centralism. As I have already mentioned, there perhaps exists a certain room for replenishing its democratic content, but I do not see the need to transform it into some other content, as is the case, for example, with the proposals that the principle of democratic centralism be replaced by the principle of self-management or by democratic unity. In our context democratic centralism is a strong cohesive factor both of the LCY and of society as a whole. Other ideological and political forces are also concerned with the problem of the effective functioning of political parties. Of course, they do not proceed from the principle of democratic centralism as a form, but as a content; that is, they strive for the policy adopted democratically to become the obligation of all members of those parties, not just leftwing parties, but bourgeois parties as well. This is imposed by the extremely rapid development of the material productive forces, by exacerbation of the class struggle in the context of various methods which the new conditions impose, by exacerbation of the ideological conflict between the forces of capitalism and socialism and by the ideological and doctrinaire polarization within them.

START: You recently made the observation that we "seem to have exhausted ourselves in dialogue and in social criticism within the League of Communists." Why is there no dialogue? Is its dying out only a symptom, or a consequence? And what are the consequences of its nonexistence? (The poet says: Where only one wind blows, even the pines grown crooked.) What are the preconditions for establishing a dialogue? Is it sufficient for there to be two well-intentioned men, is goodwill sufficient, is it just a question of the habits not existing?

(Dialogue--someone else has said--is a test of the system, a test of its ability to confront the truth and untruth, to defend itself in a democratic way.) What do you think about the assertions of certain circles to the effect that our dialogue fell silent after 1971/72?

Grlickov: I would not say that dialogue fell silent after 1971/72. Those years were preceded by nationalistic and liberalistic euphorias in our development. Nor do I consider that a period of democratic atmosphere, either in the League of Communists or in our society. That was a period when one group in the League of Communists, in the various republics and provinces, imposed itself as a usurper in a struggle for power and domination. The thought that the nationalists were called upon as allies in the fight against unitarianism and the anarcholiberals called up in the fight against dogmatism is sufficient indication in itself that this was not a positive program for democratization either of the League of Communists or of Yugoslav society. In the history of the communist movement such alliances have always been against the communists, and our practice in those years was also against the development of socialist self-managing democracy and democratic transformation of the League of Communists. Regimentation was compulsory, and members who had their own integrity were not exactly welcome. Amalgams of tendencies of this kind have not been altogether overcome even yet, which accounts for various cases. That was a period of name-calling, of labeling, of removing the people of an opposite opinion. That was a period when a more aggressive minority dominated the majority. Finally, this was a period which took us backward on the road of democratic transformation of the League of Communists and of dialogue within it, which, though slow, had already begun. This dramatic period in our life enhanced the lack of belief in the necessity of democratic dialogue, since that kind of dialogue--a monologue such as was imposed by those groups, created the belief that dialogue is something which monopolizes, which corrupts, which usurps, and which shatters the unity of the League of Communists. Perhaps that is the reason why we are still moving slowly in this area, in spite of the other objective and subjective limits, why caution has become a characteristic of this process, why conformity has been welcome, and it has not paid off to "stick out." Objectively this has played into the hands of the dogmatic forces in suppressing dialogue within the League of Communists in society, in contesting and jeopardizing any dialogue that did occur, if not publicly, then through various ambiguities, qualifications, and even linguistic tugs-of-war. I believe that you yourself have encountered in our press public objections to and reservations about a dialogue, and that signifies opposition to the resolution of the 11th congress. I do not need to have to convince you that we suffered a lapse in the pace of opening up a dialogue. The key existential issues of our life are not at the focal center of our preoccupations, they are being skirted, or a defense is made with name-calling or simply on the basis of narrow particularistic interests. And even in that area where we have been successful--and I must say that we have achieved quite a bit as compared to what we had in the past--a democratic spirit and tolerance have not yet been incorporated. Words may be harsh, provided there are arguments behind them, and not labeled, and provided they do not attack personal integrity. The point of departure here, I think, is that there is a legitimate right to mistakes and errors. You ask me why there is no dialogue, is that a symptom or a consequence, and what are the preconditions? I would not say that there is no dialogue. It does exist, and that against the broad background of our entire life, in the context of our highly politicized consciousness. It does not exist at places where it should--in forums, in the competent bodies. Their monologue is still the distinguishing feature, and the dialogue is so convoluted that it resembles a monologue. The situation has to be "abnormal" for a dialogue to exist as a need, since without it there is no way out. The case of Kosovo and the discussion of economic difficulties in the recent past are the best illustration of this. But a dialogue is not worthwhile only for "abnormal" situations, but also for "peacetime" situations, for making breakthroughs toward progress. In that sense the revolution is a book that always stands open, a search concerning all issues, at all levels, and in all milieux.

START: In talking about a dialogue you have spoken about people who "take care not to commit errors and mistakes"; hasn't fear been mentioned rather frequently in a debate concerning dialogue?

Grlickov: When the topic is the absence of dialogue, I feel as though the criticism is addressed exclusively to political forums. Why would the political forums bear sole responsibility for our dissatisfaction with dialogue? Is it they who have halted it, have they failed to create the institutional basis? Not that the grounds are lacking for criticism of forums and for their dialogue concerning ways of resolving particular issues, as though they were not weighed down by monologue. But let us also put the question in another way: Why is it that party members, members of the Socialist Alliance, and every last workingman does not fight to secure what has been afforded him by the constitution or the LCY Bylaws or the bylaws of the Socialist Alliance? You say, there is fear. I do not say that there is none and that at times it is not justifiably motivated, but fear has never been an instrument in the struggle for one's rights, for the goals for which a man fights, for changes of the status quo, especially for the goals in developing socialist self-management. If every generation has a right to desire its own revolution, the younger generations have a great moral goal of shaping self-management socialism, of building into it democratic content and relations.

START: You have spoken about "mild dogmatization"; and others thereafter continued concerning the "desperate pressure of the dogmatic bureaucratic consciousness," of "huge sediments of dogmatic consciousness," and that in statements by hundreds and thousands of leaders who appear to be advocating what is "constructive," but are actually "rather conservative," about the dogmatic consciousness which is derived from "absolutization of one's own particular interests...." Who are all these people and what are all these things that favor a mild or less mild dogmatization?

Grlickov: First, to answer your question about my initial conceptions concerning the content of dogmatism. Departure from the dialectical mode of thought and enforcement of Marxism as a set of canonized norms are the basis for shaping dogmatism as a mode of thought in general and of Marxists in particular. When I spoke about a mild process of dogmatization of our social consciousness, I was thinking in concrete terms of the absence of an ongoing process of adaptation and improvement of parts of the mechanism of our economic and political system which have not "taken" in reality, which it has rejected; those which are not serving the goals of social development. When the mechanisms of the order are proclaimed to be something sacred embodying the system, a barrier is thereby set up before creative thought, since no one wants to tilt against the order, against the system of socioeconomic relations of socialist self-management. Not only is it necessary to distinguish these two concepts, this is an objective need. Mechanisms of the system may be well conceived, yet practice does not verify them; some are even yielding the opposite results from the imagined general conception, as is the case with foreign exchange transactions, for example. This process of adaptation must be an ongoing one. The process of dogmatization goes in the opposite direction, requiring that something be imposed by force on reality which is contrary to the capabilities and goals of society, both material and social. The process of mild dogmatization adds an additional burden to the overall panorama of the problems we confront. Edvard Kardelj kept those processes open, and he therefore managed to bring the mechanisms into conformity with reality and with the goals through constant improvement and adaptation. He did not "dig in," he did not "wed himself" to any mechanism of the system. That is why he cannot be tied to a single technical solution. He remains bound to his thought, as he should. To bind him to the aspiration of desiring and of having constructed a system that was entirely rounded out and contained the answers to all questions is to make a dogma of his thought itself. Not a single theoretician who has striven to build a statically closed system containing the answers to all questions has ever lasted very long. There has been vacillation about our returning to an open and ongoing process of adaptation, and we ourselves are falling into the traps of absolute and final solutions. Which accounts for the unforeseen meeting with dogmatism--be it mild or not--and with dogmatic consciousness. This exists in other domains, and in the ideological sphere as well.

START: What does the inadequacy of the democratic dialogue within the framework of the League of Communists and of the dialogue between those who are and those who are not members of the party mean for the conception of the pluralism of interests in self-management? That is, without a critical dialogue it is difficult for differing interests to be fully articulated, much less reconciled....

Grlickov: I agree with you that there is no full articulation of the plurality of interests in self-management without their open democratic confrontation in all spheres of our social life and at all levels. Without confrontation and without democratic dialogue, and without democratic reconciliation of interests in self-management, it is not possible to establish the foundation for self-reproduction of socialist self-management. One of the essential prerequisites for that is the democratic transformation of the League of Communists. It has a special place as the leading ideological and political force in society. Through its internal democratization, and that means through democratic confrontation and dialogue, it should encourage and stimulate ideas and incentives, it should offer specific solutions to the problems of social development, and that means that it should be open to all the other forces oriented toward socialist self-management, to the entire social base of society. It will become an integral part of the working people by virtue of its offering alternative possibilities, by its readiness to accept other specific solutions which are better, by its readiness to honor and maintain criteria based on ability in personnel policy conducted in all spheres of social life, by its readiness to make itself an equal partner within the front of all the socialist forces, within the Socialist Alliance, a partner that is energetic and creative, that is capable of offering solutions for the development of society and for development of its specific milieu. Insistence on equality is also a condition for its (I am referring to the League of Communists) effective self-reproduction. Setting it up in the opposite way would be favorable to at least two shortcomings: the League of Communists opens up the process of self-isolation, and it pushes its ability to conduct political action out to the margin if not into indolence and inactivity. This process is going slow for us. We are dissatisfied, and we need to step up the pace. There is failure to understand, there is resistance, there is exhaustion, and there is even wandering afield. When you speak about politicization of interests and a policy of compromise, I believe you were referring to this situation. Not only are party members faced by a great challenge, but they also confront a responsibility, and, if I am not exaggerating, that is even a historical responsibility, if they fail to turn these adverse tendencies to their own use.

START: What we have become accustomed to call Tito's legacy insists on democratization of forums and of the League of Communists as a whole. Do the solutions adopted so far and the actions undertaken fully express Tito's idea about collective work and decisionmaking? Isn't there a danger of going round and round at the same level, without operating in the vertical direction? Isn't this indicated somewhat by the judgments (supported even by scientific research) that party members have become passive, that party organizations have become exclusive and bureaucratized, that the hierarchical model of administration has been established, in short, that party organizations have become incapable of tackling the problems of their own surroundings?

Grlickov: The system of collective leadership is only one segment of the entirety of the system and of the process of democratization of intraparty life within the League of Communists. If this is taken as our point of departure, an effective system of collective leadership presupposes democratization, and vice versa. I therefore think that reducing Tito's idea exclusively to the practice of the 1-year term of office is an oversimplification of the idea itself. If that idea went no further than that, we would have no guarantee of being able within the framework of the system of preventing collective work and decisionmaking from being bypassed, from being usurped, from the actual decisionmaking being "issued" from the forums or concentrated within them, not in the hands of all the members of the collective leadership, but in the hands of smaller groups. If this is taken as a closer and more authentic interpretation of Tito's idea of collective leadership, then the 1-year term of office has a different specific gravity. As for differences in enforcement from one republic or province to another, they do exist. In my opinion, they should in fact exist, since the conditions are not the same everywhere either. In its most recent history the League of Communists has never insisted on everybody getting organized in the same way, but has insisted that the organizations express the real conditions and needs of each. There is a danger that the idea of the system of collective leadership will be bypassed and evaded. I am referring to your observation and fear of horizontal shifts of personnel. At the present moment, as I see it, it is more essential to introduce and "instill" an authentic democratic consciousness in the League of Communists and the idea and spirit of collective leadership. To free ourselves of those--wherever they exist--who carry out various types of usurpation and privatization, or put pressure on them, force them to adopt democratic content in practice in the system of leadership within the League of Communists. To make gradual and fundamental personnel preparations for more comprehensive deprofessionalization--I do not believe this can be complete, and I do not know whether that is possible and necessary--and that means easier achievement of the system of collective leadership, along with elimination of the adverse tendencies which have kept us company up to now. The various solutions which have now been adopted in our country will be of use to us. Passivity, silence, exclusiveness, hierarchical tendencies in the sense of a one-way flow of positions--directives, sectarianism of all types, inability to express the problems of one's own surroundings, are, in my opinion, the result of truncated democratization in the system of leadership, of a lack of democratic consciousness. I am aware of the complexity of all these questions which you raise and also of the danger of oversimplification in the answers which I am giving you in telegraphese. But even hints can be beneficial to reflection about the directions of movement, to avoiding one-sidedness in the great expectations which because of their one-sidedness could result in great disappointments. It is a question of ongoing processes, processes which already have their "start" in our overall constructive experiences and efforts to guide them toward the desired goal, in accordance with needs and objective possibilities. But for that reason party members should not await democratic transformation in the League of Communists as a "gift" from the forums, but should see it as their right and obligation.

START: Personnel policy in the League of Communists? One hears assessments to the effect that there is negative selection to leadership bodies. There is more liking for people who agree to everything than for those who can't hold their tongue. A satirist has said that the dossiers of certain successful people are full of negative opinions about others....

Grlickov: There are manifestations of negative selection in personnel policy within the League of Communists, in other sociopolitical organizations and in other organizations of the social structure. Which reasons are objective in nature, and which are subjective? How is it that selection is negative when the League of Communists is insisting on socialization of personnel policy, and the appropriate social mechanisms for achievement of that goal have been built in? Why is it that we still rightly notice manifestations of negative selection? I would not like to approach this complicated issue from only one angle, and I do not have the space to express my opinion with any thoroughness. But I still must say something. Socialization has not achieved satisfactory results, nor has it eliminated the tendencies toward negative selection--precisely because of the unsatisfactory level of democratization in overall relations. Amalgams of usurpation and privatization are still present to various degrees of strength in various milieux depending on the level of democratization achieved in the League of Communists. Were this an incidental or transient phenomenon, we would have no reasons for great concern. However, if this orients the younger generation toward taking advantage of the insufficient socialization and the inadequate democratization of personnel policy, that is, toward using privatization as a means of getting ahead quickly and easily--that in itself should disturb us. An atmosphere is then created to the effect that one can get ahead easily by belonging to some "powerful" milieu, from an organization of associated labor to sociopolitical structures, instead of the constructive ambitions of individuals being realized through work, through knowledge, through activity and otherwise. We must part company with this as soon as possible for the sake of the future. People must be evaluated according to criteria of ability and activity. In modern society, with the goals and pretentions to the values of a new civilization, of socialist self-management, has no need for those who agree with everyone and everything, but it does need those who can be of benefit to society in progress thanks to their effort, their learning, their knowledge and their real abilities. Democratic relations are inherent in people like this, they have a large amount of tolerance and openness toward the conceptions and interests of others, and they are also ready to wage a struggle against all the forms of counterrevolution. People like that lead toward progress. Those who adapt to the "powerful" are actually in favor of the status quo. We are encountering these problems in work organizations and in the structure of society.

START: The problem of shaping authority is related to this. Is authority acquired on the basis of one's place in the hierarchy, on the basis of social power, on the basis of the (revolutionary) past, or on the basis of knowledge and ability?

Grlickov: Authority is acquired from one's place in society, but authority based on position is short-lived unless the virtues of knowledge, progress, and moral attributes stand behind it, though it is possible to exert a strong influence on social developments. A revolutionary past is worthy of respect. Great men are indeed born at the important turning points. This should not be questioned. Our practice has constructed experience of various kinds. Hierarchical evaluation of people's opinions should not be rejected a priori, though in a democratic atmosphere it must not be proclaimed an absolute; on the contrary, it should be subject to the verification of practice, which would include critical opinions. I think that capable authorities are needed by every society, including our own.

START: You have said that without practice and appropriate behavior formulations may be window dressing for a practice that is altogether the opposite. And even otherwise the conclusion is inescapable from this conversation that, to put it simply, we are strong when it comes to words, but weak when it comes to deeds.

Grlickov: It is a good thing that we are strong at least when it comes to words. Imagine what it would be if we were weak here as well, that is, if we lacked an insight into the real situation and had no visions as to possible and probable solutions for the development of our society. However, it is not a good thing when words differ from deeds, especially when this is a chronic tendency. The League of Communists of Yugoslavia has been constantly insisting on narrowing that gap. It has not yet overcome it. But that does not mean that we should not be energetic in doing what is necessary to narrow the gap, and that means that the goals, the means and the methods should be realistic and should mobilize all factors toward their optimal achievement.

START: You constantly emphasize that democratization should not be awaited as a gift from forums, but that it should be fought for and won. What does that actually mean? Have we ceased to be combative enough as a society as a whole and also individually?

Grlickov: There can be no one-way streets in complex social development. All the goals of society have to be fought for and won. Progress has never been presented to anyone as a gift. The working class and all the working people have to fight for those goals and win them. We do not lack militance; we are well known for that; but we are excessively passive. As to why this is so, the answer would have to be more thoroughgoing. In my opinion, the goals should be formulated in a truly democratic way so that they belong to everyone. Then passivity becomes a problem exclusively of personal inclination, and not a social phenomenon.

BELGRADE OFFICIAL DERIDES POLITICAL CLICHES

[Letter to editor by Zivorad Kovacevic, unidentified here but known to be president of the Belgrade City Assembly: "Words, Words"]

[Text] I once read in START about an experiment, presumably facetious, by Polish students. They listed parts of sentences, which otherwise sound entirely normal and even highly intelligent, in several vertical columns and arrived at an astonishing conclusion: no matter how you mix them up and combine them, you get a whole phrase that you do not immediately realize to be devoid of any sense. In other words, we have become accustomed to reading (or skipping) whole sections of text, either not reflecting on their actual significance or regarding them as entirely natural. Il'f and Petrov [classic Soviet humorists] attempted something similar.

Resolutions are now being drafted for LCY congresses. It has been said, and rightly so, that the demands of the times are sharper and seek different political documents. Let us try something different from the Polish students' experiment: let us eliminate certain words, let us write resolutions without them. I am certain that it will be immediately clear whether or not we have, and whether or not we wish to have, something really important and specific to say.

For the time being, I nominate the following words:

1. Still more persistently, consistently, decisively, fully, principledly, organizedly, rapidly, openly (or in this combination: with still greater persistence, consistency, decisiveness, principled activity, organization, openness).

2. Has still not run its course, been completedly achieved, been realized to the full.

3. Further buildup, development, strengthening, affirmation.

4. This requires the existence of conditions, activity, practice.

5. It is vital to make efforts (still greater), advance, promote, enrich, restructure.

6. Of special, vital, decisive, particular significance.

7. To devote great, particular, exceptional attention to tendencies, manifestations, trends; and to resolving, overcoming, and superseding.

8. The presence of problems, difficulties, weaknesses, practice, aspirations, shortages.

This is not just a question of good and readable language. Many of these words are entirely in order and cannot be avoided, but in these sentence structures they obfuscate substance, are frequently untruthful, and evade an answer (ought to do more, still is not, further develop).

Of course, the words themselves are not at fault.

I ask myself what would remain of the following two sentences, taken from one draft resolution (in a group in which I work), if the above-nominated words were to be eliminated: "The League of Communists must make efforts still more organizedly and more intensively toward the further affirmation and development of the system of self-managing consensus-seeking and social negotiation so as to contribute to the perfecting of all forms of self-managing decision-making, to the better definition of their substance, to fuller involvement in the system of decision-making concerning social duties, to the faster elimination of difficulties that arise in work, and to the cultivation of self-management consensus-seeking as a social relationship.... In the accomplishment of this task, ways and means must be sought with still greater persistence and decisiveness so as to resolve faster--and overcome in practice--the difficulties and weaknesses that occur in the functioning of the system."

CATHOLIC BROTHERS ACCUSED OF LINKS TO EMIGRES, DISSIDENTS

Sarajevo OSLOBODJENJE in Serbo-Croatian 21 Nov 81 p 4

[Article by Djuro Kozar: "What Has Been Concealed Behind NASA OGNJISTA"]

[Text] The Links of Ferdo Vlasic and Jozo Krizic, [Catholic] Brothers From Duvno, With Extremist Ustasha Emigres Abroad and How That Link Came About

When certain members of the clergy concern themselves in a tendentious way with sociopolitical issues in the church, in religious periodicals or "otherwise," when they pass over into clericalism--they inevitably inflict great damage on the faith, on believers, on themselves and thereby on society as a whole. If in addition they have links with the fascist emigre community in this matter, then this can and usually does result in hostile activity and ends up before the competent courts.

Abuse of Freedom

That is exactly what happened to Ferdo Vlasic, a brother in the Franciscan Monastery in Duvno who is editor in chief of the religious newspaper NASA OGNJISTA, and Jozo Krizic, a brother in the same monastery who is secretary of that periodical. To go back a bit, they were found guilty by the District Court in Mostar of having committed the crime of participating in hostile activity and were sentenced as follows: Vlasic to 8 years in prison and Krizic to 5 years and 6 months in prison.

The nature of their hostile skulduggery is such that on behalf of a broader circle of the working people and citizens and of our public it needs to be publicly stated what these brothers were up to in the Franciscan Monastery in Duvno, in NASA OGNJISTA, and elsewhere, and how they went about it.

These officers of the church have had every opportunity for free expression of their faith and for publication of their newspaper within the limits of what the law allows, but unlike most clergy of all faiths they did not wish to concern themselves solely with religious affairs, but--abusing that freedom--they falsely portrayed sociopolitical conditions in our country in a perfidious, ironical and negativistic way, pursuing hostile goals and thus sailing into the waters of cleronationalism. They had ties with Ustasha emigres, who continuously and generously sent material and other aid for publication of NASA OGNJISTA. Vlasic and Krizic declared themselves to be opponents of brotherhood and unity and of socialist community spirit of our nationalities and ethnic minorities in their verbal expression and in the publication of certain articles.

Collaboration With Emigres

On the basis of correspondence, money orders, addresses and pseudonyms in letters and in NASA OGNJISTA, as well as statements made by individuals, it has been irrefutably established that Vlasic and Krizic had constant contacts with the most sinister Ustasha underground, even with those proclaimed to be war criminals, with the members of emigre organizations, those same ones which have been sending individuals and groups for subversive activities, sabotage and terrorism, and other criminal activities against our country and its citizens.

Which emigres are we referring to?

Brother Lucijan Kordic is a sworn enemy of Yugoslavia, and Ustasha ideologist during the war, now an emigre in Zurich, one of the founders of the emigre publishing house Ziral, well known for its hostile content, and the author of a large number of pamphlets against the SFRY. It is this same Kordic who has been glorified in NASA OGNJISTA: a favorable article was published on the occasion of Ziral's 10th anniversary, and there was also a separate article on the "greatness" of this inveterate Ustasha emigre along with his photograph. He expressed his warm gratitude in a letter from Zurich, offering his own suggestions as to the editing of the newspaper, accompanied by his good wishes that NASA OGNJISTA would fulfill its task with the greatest success. We know what kind of task he was referring to--a mission aimed against the greatest achievements of our socialist revolution. It is evident from the subsequent correspondence that Kordic and Vlasic agreed that Brother Lucijan would use a pseudonym in NASA OGNJISTA.

A link was also established and maintained with Milenko Barbaric, an emigre in the United States of America, a member of the emigre organization Croatian Liberation Movement (HOP), who was also an Ustasha during World War II; Josip Kasic, priest, emigre in Australia, a member of the terrorist organization Croatian Revolutionary Brotherhood who has participated in sending terrorist groups into our country; Ivan Jolic, an emigre in Canada, a member of the HOP and the Croatian Revolutionary Alliance (HRS), master of ceremonies of the radio program entitled "Dr Ante Pavelic" in Toronto; Berto Dragicevic, a Catholic brother, who during the war was an Ustasha commander, a well-known war criminal, and an emigre in Canada; Grga Raspudic, Catholic brother, author of several pamphlets against Yugoslavia, who is now living in Chicago and whose article was published in the anniversary issue of NASA OGNJISTA; Ivan Bradvic, member of the HOP and a founder of the "Stepinac" emigre organization in Montreal; Stipe Bagaric, an emigre in Sydney [Australia], a member of the HOP as well as the HRB [Croatian Revolutionary Brotherhood], and so on. Some of these names, together with 10 or so names of other Ustasha emigres, were published in NASA OGNJISTA in a list of donors, that is, of those who were financing its publication and its hostile activity against our country with their money contributions. Dollars, marks, francs and other currencies were received by the editors, and welcome they were, since obviously both the donors and the editors of NASA OGNJISTA had the same goals.

Vlasic's "Pilgrimages"

When all this is borne in mind, then it is no accident at all that Ferdo Vlasic also had links with the previously known nationalists and "mass movement" figures Vlado Gotovac, Franjo Tudjman and others. Tudjman's written defense at a recent trial in Zagreb was even found in Vlasic's possession, which best illustrates the tie-up between them.

Once we are aware of these things, Vlasic's efforts to organize "excursions," "entertainment" and "pilgrimages" for young people are clearly exposed. One such pilgrimage was devoted to a visit to the graves of certain priests who as members of Ustasha military units and as collaborators of the occupiers died in armed combat against units of the National Liberation Army during the mopping up operations in the final liberation of our country. In addition, Vlasic and Krizic have been visiting area schools and exerting pressures on teachers to postpone regular instruction in order to teach "religion," and among other things they distributed NASA OGNJISTA to the children. Note was also taken of several of Vlasic's attempts to give "advice" to members of the League of Communists concerning invigoration of religion.

Vlasic also confirmed his orthodox hostile activity in Medjugorje, where he has been helping Brother Jozo Zovko in "pointing out the Madonna." Vlasic has also come into conflict with members of law enforcement agencies, reacted arrogantly, insulted our system and threatened a physical attack on policemen, for which he was sentenced at the time to 50 days in prison, and thereafter another 60 days in prison because he hindered law enforcement officers in conduct of their official duties. When we add to this that Ferdo Vlasic was sentenced back in 1952 to 16 years in prison for crimes against the people and the state, then the portrait of this sinister man is more complete.

Pamphlets in Toronto

Jozo Krizic, secretary of the board of editors of NASA OGNJISTA, who shares Vlasic's opinions and is his closest collaborator, prepared for the priesthood in the Federal Republic of Germany. Immediately upon graduating from the seminary in 1978, he was chosen by Vlasic and appointed secretary of this newspaper. There is no need to guess about who has exerted the decisive influence on Krizic and what aside from the priesthood he was trained for abroad.

Back in the latter half of 1979 Vlasic prepared and sent Krizic to Canada and the United States on behalf of NASA OGNJISTA on the invitation of Ustasha emigre organizations there, so as to check out "on the spot" what had been written in correspondence. There across the ocean Krizic was welcomed as "one of their own" by the Ustasha extremists Danijel Crljen, Ivo Jolic, Jozo Mihalj, Marinko Sopta and others, who put themselves at his service. In their company the secretary of NASA OGNJISTA visited several cities in Canada and the United States, performed masses, and made hostile statements against the SFRY in sermons delivered in church and in speeches delivered in Ustasha clubs. He sought and obtained financial aid for his newspaper in which, he promised, to write how "fighters for a free Croatia abroad" live and "how they are preparing to liberate Croatia."

During his visit in Toronto Krizic also participated in a meeting of emigres gathered together on the farm of the Croatian emigre club "Croatia." From a stage which was "decorated" with fascist symbols, Krizic, following Jolic and Crljen, delivered a speech in which among other things he said that "life is hard in Croatia, the power is in the hands of the Serbian hegemonists, and the liberation of Croatia is looked forward to"--and so on in the same style, full of lies, odious and chauvinistic. That same evening he delivered a speech of similar content in the club "Croatia."

Condemnation of Cleronationalism

NASA OGNJISTA, then, has been pursuing the goals of the extremist Ustasha emigre community, which is guided by the most inveterate opponents of our country. That is why the indictment against Vlasic and Krizic was full of arguments. It also stated that the editors of this religious newspaper had adopted the following messages: from Kasic (to the effect that "we are one and should be exclusively one and nothing more" and "the religious front should be united against the antifront"); from Bradvic (to the effect that "our newspaper NASA OGNJISTA rally everyone together"); and that of Jolic (to the effect that "if there is more belief in God and in our Croatian people, the poskok [highly aggressive and poisonous snake] will not lie on the slab of Ante's [Pavelic's] grave" and "we will remain industrious and aware until the new revival of our freedom").

It is said of Lucijan Kordic, a well-known Ustasha, that he is a "Croatian poet," accompanied by the note of the editors that "so long as we have such missionaries, we will not fear for our future."

During the investigation and in the court Vlasic and Krizic became "forgetful," "ingenuous" and "ignorant." But their attempts to deny irrefutable facts were not successful, there were too many arguments, too much material evidence and too many witnesses which unambiguously expose their hostile activity. They were not tried as priests, as some would like to present it, but as enemies of Yugoslavia, just as have been tried or will be tried all those who work to undermine our SFRY, which is based on brotherhood, equality, self-management and nonalignment, regardless of what profession they are in.

So, such individuals exist even in the ranks of the priests in our country, people who by abusing their calling as priests have among other things tried to foment dissent and religious and ethnic enmity among our nationalities and ethnic minorities. Their colleagues, however, in meetings of clerical associations in Mostar and Sarajevo, have said that people like Vlasic, Zovko and Krizic only cause them harm and condemned such hostile activity against our society. These cases have also been examined in many meetings in the Socialist Alliance, especially in the Duvno and Citluk opstinas, and in them religious believers and atheists declared their opposition to the misuse of religion for political purposes, condemning such behavior by these Catholic brothers and the religious newspaper NASA OGNJISTA and those individuals in other religious communities who have also made use of religious services to attack the greatest achievements of the National Liberation War and the socialist revolution.

All of this, as well as certain other cases we have written about, indicate how far individuals are ready to go as participants in hostile activity against our country and its fundamental values. However, our working people and citizens, regardless of whether they are believers or atheists, have made a clear declaration in their reaction that there is no place for this kind of behavior in our communities. Although the enemy operates perfidiously, the hearing of our people has now been made acute for rapid recognition of hostile tendencies and those responsible for them and will effectively oppose them through the system of defense and protection.

TENANTS, OWNERS OF HOUSING ARGUE OVER DRAFT LEGISLATION

Zagreb START in Serbo-Croatian No 332, 10 Oct 81 pp 10-11, 83

[Article by Ratko Boskovic: "Democracy at the Door of the Apartment"]

[Text] It seems almost as though a new political party were being created in Yugoslavia: the "Tenant's Party" or perhaps the "Landlord's Party." The reference is to a group of individuals organized around a common position concerning one of the most important social issues. And an interest group, when it systematically advocates a position of this kind, grows to become a political party.

Very rarely has our public been so fiercely aroused as after recent publication of the "Proposed Version of the Draft of the New Law on Housing Relations." Passions have flared up because of the changes which the new law would make in relations between the owners of private apartments and houses toward their tenants, those who hold the right of tenancy in those apartments and houses. In short: under the present law it is possible for an owner to make his apartment vacant by evicting the tenant provided that the tenant's housing conditions are not essentially worsened thereby. But under the new law, the owner could move his tenant to any housing unit which suits the tenant and his family with respect to floor area and the number of rooms. In essence the purpose of these changes would be to introduce into "private" housing relations the criteria which apply in allocation of "socially owned" housing.

The reaction has been tempestuous: embittered tenants have buried the newspapers in an avalanche of letters. Why? Because they see the proposed version of the law as a threat to their own vital rights? Owners of housing, foaming at the mouth, have been answering that this merely corrects the injustice they have suffered for long years.

Thus a profound social conflict previously unknown to the general public has broken to the surface with full force. Its true weight was known only by the courts, on whose shelves there lie thousands of suits between tenants and landlords, suits which involved thousands of family dramas and even tragedies.

But in this "war of letters," two letter writers have aroused particular attention: the Association of Tenants of Privately Owned Apartments and Houses in the City of Zagreb, and its mirror image the Republic Association of Owners of those same apartments and buildings.

We have not until recently been accustomed to aggressiveness of this kind. After all, what sort of group of citizens is it whose "constant complaints and petitions" bring about a change in the Law on Housing Relations itself, as is stated in the supporting argument for amendment of that law?

The right of tenancy came about in the postwar years of scarcity as an application of the principle of socialist solidarity in the entire policy of the new Yugoslavia, so therefore in housing policy as well, as the only possible way at that time of resolving the huge housing problems when the rich owners of several dwellings had been disenfranchised. For 40 years those who held the right to tenancy and their families assumed that they had solved their housing problem permanently, and that status of theirs was guaranteed by law. After means of production, the dwelling is today the most valuable social resource, and that is why socialist legal principles, among which the right of tenancy is basic, are enforced most consistently in housing relations.

How is it, then, that some association of private individuals publicly and fiercely advocate that that principle be abolished? Is it also fighting to abolish other fundamental socialist principles which are indissolubly bound up with recognition of the right of tenancy? Might this association be some counterrevolutionary bourgeois party?

In the meantime tenants and their association have achieved their first partial victory. Following the debates in the newspapers, in the belligerent mood created in the public (incidentally, these are categories which in our context are difficult to assess from a political standpoint), before the proposed version of the new law reached the stage of public debate, the proponent of the law soon toned down the basic position which brought about the conflict: only those landlords (or their heirs) who were owners of the property before nationalization will have the "right to evict a tenant." In other words, people will not qualify who purchased an apartment which could not be occupied, people who now wish to enrich themselves overnight. The purpose of this ad hoc measure, which is typical of us, was to prevent possible abuses which tenants had warned about.

If the landlords' association has only partially brought about an amendment of the Law on Housing Relations, and if the tenants' association has succeeded in just 20 days or so, before the public debate began, in radically altering the law by exerting its influence, then these are two very powerful institutions!

The association of tenants of privately owned dwellings in the city of Zagreb, whose headquarters are at 3 Bosanska Ulica, "came into being as a reaction to the existing association of landlords, who had been haranguing against the legislation on the books," the secretary of the association says. It was established by a group of citizens in a founding assembly in 1972. Today it has several hundred members who regard themselves as representatives of the 15,000 holders of the right of tenancy in the city and suburbs. There are similar tenants' associations in Rijeka and Split. Incidentally, there are 53,779 such tenants in Croatia (according to the results of the 1970 Census) and about 175,000 in Yugoslavia.

When we were in the offices of the tenants' association, only a few elderly citizens were there at the time. Meetings are held once a week. One gets the general impression that this is a club of lonely elderly people and not any significant social force. Their program is this: to defend the interests of tenants of privately owned dwellings before the authorities. How? By grievances. But do they also influence the government in some informal way, with the help of acquaintances, friends or influential relatives? "No," the secretary of the association answered resolutely, "though if someone has problems with a landlord, and if he knows someone who has influence, he will certainly complain...."

The secretary does not personally have any problems at all; he regards his position as secretary of the association a civil obligation urged upon him by his socialist views which he has held since he was young as well as by the feeling that tenants are being found guilty of something which they did not bring about: "These housing problems began back in 1941, during the period of the Ustasha terror, when Jews, Serbs and many others in Zagreb were no longer able to freely dispose of the dwellings they owned...."

The association of tenants in privately owned dwellings and the association of owners of those dwellings are two typical sociopolitical groups endeavoring to realize their goals by concerted action, by influencing centers of political power. Their emergence is an important political phenomenon because the reason for their political activity is antagonism related to very profound social foundations: man's basic need for housing, a need which is not easy to satisfy in our society, which is not all that rich.

Aside from that, property and ownership have always been the most potent sources of discord and conflicts of differing interests. The conflict between landlords and tenants involves only 10 percent of the housing stock, but this still carries over to the mental outlook of every person "tragically stretched between the natural necessity to be civic minded and egocentric needs to merely use that civic-mindedness to build one's own private world" (J. Miric: "Interesne grupe i politicka moc" [Special-Interest Groups and Political Power]). Should we add to this that the issue of ownership is a fundamental issue in any political system?

Many "bourgeois" political scientists are almost unanimous in their belief that the freedom of groups to form and carry on activity is the heart of democracy. There are those who think that the freedom to create groups is more important than all other political freedoms, though there are also people who believe that democracy is guaranteed by norms and the system of institutions which express the general will. It is obvious that even the mere existence, but even more the freedom of public and open action--that is, freedom of political activity on the part of the tenants' association and the landlords' association--shows the high degree of democracy of our society and is confirmation of the view that Yugoslavia's political system is not based on a fictitious premise concerning a unity of interests.

Thus acceptance of the existence of differing interests and carrying them over into the sphere of politics does not constitute a tacit acceptance of any deviant situation or behavior, but is the natural pattern of our political system. "The normal state of society is not harmony, but constant conflicts of interest. These interests do not disappear with the development of socialist society, but their number on the contrary increases. The higher the level of a society's economic and social development, the greater the degree of its differentiation, and that accounts for the increasing number of potential conflicts among individuals and social groups" (Miric).

Though they symbolize such important principles, the members of the landlords' association, though something else might have been expected, give the impression of a group of pensioners devoted to chess. Its offices are at 3 Masiceva Ulica in Zagreb, and the association has 1,884 members who pay a token rent--for the space and to cover the electricity. By contrast with the city tenants' association, the landlords' association is at the republic level, with a chapter in Split (committees in Rijeka and Dubrovnik have been dwindling, so that only individual "delegates" arrive from there for meetings).

The landlords are better organized and more enterprising than the tenants. But there is not the frenetic activity the tenants warned us of. Only an immoderate word here and there and signs of an anger indicative of the depth of the conflict and the value of the property in dispute. The tenants also warned us about landlords who pay lawyers between 5 and 10 million and tell them: "Make my apartment vacant any way you can" (since this is profitable for them: a vacant apartment is worth as much as 150 million), but they speak as though they are not members of that association.

The landlords tell us about their tenants who do not want to vacate the apartment "which is not theirs," though they have built real villas in the neighborhood (the words are backed up by photographs). They also tell about tenants who for a long time have not been living in their apartments, but have registered minor children so as not to lose the right of tenancy; about fictitious exchanges of apartments and sales of the right of tenancy; about threats and blackmail; about landlords living in housing not fit for human beings though they are the owner of apartments which they may not enter; about how the problems are already being passed on to the younger generations....

They also complained about the courts and SIZ's [self-managing community of interest], they spoke about their ties with similar associations in other republics and about efforts to abolish the "private" housing front once and for all together with the right of tenancy. In every sentence they appealed to their socialist convictions.

These people obviously believe in socialism and its institutions (since it is to them that they appeal). They believe that their feelings as landlords are not something unfamiliar to socialism. Both of the associations, it seems, do indeed avoid noninstitutional ways of influencing forums and the public, and they do not wish to become any sort of "pressure groups" fighting with political abuses. But though they have an elaborate system of social values--and thereby a rudimentary ideology as well, a clear tactics and strategy concerning one of the most important social questions, one which is bound up with a number of political consequences, and though they have legalized associations, the republic association of owners of apartments and houses and the association of tenants in private apartments and houses in the city of Zagreb are a very weak social force. It is somehow difficult to believe that these are actually those landlords whose "frequent inquiries and petitions" account for amendment of the Law on Housing Relations. These civic associations are more an embellishment of our political system than a real part of it.

Though the landlords' association has existed since back in 1972, its members have never had occasion for a full-fledged visit and talk with any representative of any public organization. Their activity does not go beyond grievances, petitions, pulling people by the sleeve and importunity. The republic committee for construction and municipal service affairs, which is the sponsor of the new law, seems not to know that there exists any group of citizens which has devoted 40 years of debate to the topic covered by the law, consuming in the process enough nervous energy for several thousand entire lifetimes. These individuals learned about the proposed adoption of a new law on housing relations from the newspapers.

The tenants' association is in a similar position (though the members of each of the associations believe that that other association is the cause of every evil). Grievances and suits before constitutional courts, assemblies at all levels and dozens of various commissions have gone from one desk to another for decades now. The Socialist Alliance keeps orderly statistics on these associations.

So who, then, are the landlords "whose constant questions and grievances" led to instituting procedure to amend the law? While on the basis of "all extra-institutional initiatives and activities we can follow the process of transformation of our political system from a rigid and closed regime into an increasingly open and more democratic system of a plurality of interests" (Miric), specific examples leave us rather confused both as to practice and theory, and the general interest is not created by an actual unification and reconciliation of the interests and needs of all the participants in some activity, but by the logic of bureaucratic intermediation.

Unfortunately, the epilogue of the story about the right of tenancy, which for some 30 years has been ignored on the basis of that same logic, is a sad one. The proposed version of the law we have received is full of shortcomings and contradictions, and it is unacceptable both to private landlords and to tenants. It has given us a belligerent public debate which has diverted attention from the real problems of housing policy, those problems which concern associated labor, socially owned housing units and the catastrophic situation in public housing construction. Moreover, the debate has been conducted by the wrong people, and the right people, the organized socialist forces, have been waiting for the formal public debate. In spite of the good intentions of eradicating disagreements and unsocialist principles from society, what we have achieved is many new back doors by which those principles can find their way into society.

In conclusion, instead of harmonious unification of the needs of the two social groups--between which there does exist a potentially dangerous social antagonism--we have gotten new feelings of the old legal insecurity, new antagonisms, new interests, and the climate for creation of new belligerent groups. Instead of a debate of the program for abolishing ownership, the debate that has come to the foreground concerns affirmation of the landlord's ideology of the egoism of that real extra-institutional power which has this time hidden behind legal associations of people whose personal need to resolve housing problems cannot be denied.

'RUDE PRAVO' SCORES IMF AS NEOCOLONIALIST

Prague RUDE PRAVO in Czech 14 Nov 81 p 6

[Article by Ladislav Alster in response to question of a reader: "The International Monetary Fund"]

[Text] Our reader, M. Bobek from Kladno, asks: What is the IMF [International Monetary Fund] and what is its mission?

There is not a simple answer to this question, because the officially proclaimed mission of the IMF is one matter and its actual activity, as this has developed and manifested itself over the years, is another matter. Moreover, the sphere of activity of the IMF covers not only the fields of finance and economics, but likewise the area of politics. This activity is hidden, disputed, and one may say that it is underhanded, but it is very significant.

The IMF was established during the World War II, in 1944, on the basis of an agreement reached at Bretton Woods in the United States, for the development of international monetary cooperation and to support international trade. The fund is based in Washington. Along with the IMF, 1944 saw the founding as well of the IBRD [International Bank for Reconstruction and Development], which is referred to, more concisely, in economic circles as the World Bank. Both organizations complement each other in their activities and merge together in what amounts to a single unit. The IMF currently has 141 member countries. Every member country is required to contribute to the IMF a financial share, which is established individually by means of a so-called quota. This quota, or the size of the share, influences the possibility for drawing credits from the fund as well as the extent of the voting rights granted to a member country. But there is already a "cloven hoof" hidden in this provision, because the capital provided by the United States and its allies has absolute predominance in the capital of the IMF, and the United States exploits its influence in the fund aggressively.

Through this process the IMF, which had been formed as an affiliated organ of the United Nations for the development of the world economy, came in the course of time under the one-sided influence of the United States.

The history of the IMF may be divided, in terms of time, into two stages. At the beginning was the formation and the accounting for international monetary reserves on the basis of the so-called gold standard, and because the great majority of world inventories on monetary gold had been accumulated in the United States after World War II, the American dollar became the primary reserve currency for the entire system. This in and of itself has led to the hegemony of the United States in international monetary relations.

The financial difficulties of the U.S. Government, especially its huge outlays for armaments and for various imperialistic wars and intervention, have however led to a gradual drain of gold from the United States and, as a result, to the breakdown of the Bretton Woods system.

In August 1971, the U.S. Government unilaterally terminated the convertibility of the dollar into gold, and in 1973 the capitalist world was forced to renounce the second fundamental principle of the system--fixed currency-exchange rates. There arose an unrestrained system of flexible exchange rates, creating the free play of supply and demand, often without regard for the actual economic situation. Speculative outbursts soon followed on the currency exchanges as well as chaos in the currency area, which may be described as a permanent currency crisis. In this situation as well, the IMF helps in maintaining the dominant position of the dollar, and thereby the United States and American monopolies in the capitalist world economy, this time however by other means. One of these means is the granting of credits. The IMF, at the same time, often intervenes in the internal financial and currency policies of debtor countries, forcing them into what are for them unfavorable ties to private American financial capital, and resisting changes in their economic structures which would lead to a loosening of the economic dependence of these countries on the major imperialistic powers, above all the United States.

When, for instance, the IMF advances currency credits to a certain country, it also dictates to this country harsh measures for stabilizing its balance of payments. Typically this is a matter of lowing down the speed of economic development, freezing or slowing down growth in wages, increasing taxes, limiting budgetary outlays for social needs, of limitations in the area of credit (including consumer credit), the elimination of import controls, currency devaluations, etc. These measures forced on debtor countries often lead to an increase in unemployment and to increased prices for basic consumer goods.

The destructive consequences of this kind of "assistance" may be illustrated with the case of Turkey. In recent years, the Turkish pound has been devaluated on the average of once every 3 weeks, on the basis of IMF recommendations. The result has been a huge increase in inflation. While in the middle of the sixties the average annual increase in inflation amounted to less than 10 percent, in 1980 it had already risen to 100 percent! Real wages of the workers of the country declined 41 percent between 1976 and 1979. In 1979, the IMF even required that Turkey limit its bilateral trade relations with socialist and developing countries, which are completely transparent conditions of a political character.

Currently in the IMF, credits are granted in so-called special drawing rights. This is an artificial accounting and payment unit, the value of which is currently calculated on the basis of a basket of five currencies--the American dollar, the West German mark, the French franc, the Japanese yen, and the British pound sterling--and which, as of 30 September this year, had a value of $1.144 American. Since 1970, when this unit was introduced, a total of 21.4 billion have been issued and loaned. The IMF, however, also grants credits in national currencies, especially in dollars. I might add that the dollar in no way replaces special drawing rights, on the contrary, these form, figuratively speaking, a kind of protective wrapper for the American currency.

The IMF, however, also grants a large amount of credits in conjunction with large capitalist, mainly American, banks, or the banks "mediate" the granting of these credits. The debtor country, then, must pay the bank usurious interest rates--20 percent and more--and at the same time accept the harsh conditions of the IMF. Experience with this so-called parallel granting of credits teaches that this guileful IMF mechanism has succeeded in creating, in a number of countries, an economic regime favorable for the penetration and strengthening of international capital, even at the price of supporting fascist regimes. A fine example of this is Chile, as a study group of the publication ISSUES OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM recently concluded. The analysis conducted by this group led to the conclusion that the IMF is an instrument of the class policy of monopolistic circles, an instrument of imperialism.

A similar conclusion was reached last year by an international conference on the role of the IMF which took place in the Tanzanian city of Arusha. Delegates from 24 countries, most of them developing countries, agreed on the position that the IMF has already lost the justification for its existence and must under no circumstances merely be reformed, but must be fully replaced by a new international monetary institution. It was stated at this conference that the current conditions for the activity of the IMF are "foreign and unacceptable" for most countries. Quite recently, the UN Decolonization Committee sharply criticized the IMF for its cooperation with the racists of South Africa.

This year's anniversary session of the IMF in Washington at the beginning of October bore the clear stamp of the United States, which forced on the entire session an orientation toward the economic policy of the Reagan Government. President Reagan, right in his opening address, set himself sharply against an increase in loans and credits for developing countries and suggested that the poor countries "put their own economic houses in order."

It is then possible to advance the conclusion that the IMF acts above all as one of the most important instruments of neocolonialism, discriminates against progressive countries and movements and, on the contrary, supports reactionary and terrorist regimes. This fund is one of the sustaining bastions of capitalism in the struggle against socialism and progress.

"What is good for the United States is also good the the IMF," cynically declared an American representative in 1946. This "principle" continues to apply today just as before.

Czechoslovakia was one of the founding members of the IMF, contributed its membership quota of $125 million, but never derived any benefits from membership. On the contrary, the IMF applied discriminatory measures against Czechoslovakia and required--during the cold war--full information concerning our national economy, the publication of which would have affected the security of our state. Because it proved impossible to overcome the incessant pressure of the pro-American voting machinery of the IMF, Czechoslovakia resigned from the fund on 4 May 1955.

MAJOR GENERAL INTERVIEWED ON MODERNIZATION OF TROOP TRAINING

Budapest NEPHADSEREG in Hungarian No 36, 5 Sep 81 p 8

[Interview with Major General Istvan Narai, the general mechanized gunner and tank-crew training department head and deputy inspector general of the Hungarian Army, by Gabor Szakaly; date and place not specified]

[Text] We are facing a test period for both officers and enlisted men. The test is represented by converting to 18-month military service and by modernizing troop training. For a unified explanation of the joint tasks and of the everyday tasks of execution, Gabor Szakaly, columnist for our newspaper, spoke with Major General Istvan Narai, the general mechanized gunner and tank-crew training department head and deputy inspector general of the Hungarian Army.

[Question] After studying the experiences, ideas and documents that form the basis for the modernization of troop training, many persons raised the question: What brought it about, what made it possible to reduce service time and to modernize training?

[Answer] The experiences of the military leadership, including of course those serving with the troops, have clearly shown that the general education level of the drafted soldier has increased and is increasing, his military defense knowledge is increasing and his preliminary military training has improved. Entering youth obviously are capable of learning military knowledge in a shorter time than before and of acquiring the everyday practice necessary for carrying out various assignments. At the same time, according to earlier experiences, the greater preliminary military training of our enlisted men is accompanied by greater industry and discipline, and these two together may serve as the basis for fulfilling higher level tasks. The preparedness of the officers and cadres in our army has fortunately increased as well; in addition their practical experience is constantly growing. The combat techniques of our army have constantly developed, and the training bases to promote everyday preparation have increasingly more modern means available. As a result of all these things, we can report constantly improving training achievements and the soundness of our subunits and troops. The grounds are given for work of a higher level.

[Question] In these days, the manuals describing troop training have been delivered to every military organization, inclusively to the units, and include primarily the general inspector's training instructions and the new training programs. What kinds of major tasks do the troops face, Comrade Major General, and to what training branches and areas do you call attention?

[Answer] First, I would like to emphasize several circumstances and certain organization principles. In weighing the tasks and duties, every commander must consider that we need to realize the conversion to 18-month service together with maintenance of combat readiness at a high level and continuous modernization of combat techniques; that is to say, preparation and training modernization. But in no way does the shorter service time mean a reduction in the preparation requirements. Our commanders and the participants in training must well understand that the requirements have remained, and in fact in some cases have even been raised. Moreover, it is a primary requirement that the subunits and the outfits should ensure combat preparedness at a high level, learn to handle and use the means of battle technology and acquire the capability and readiness that assure success in combat. In respect to the comprehensive and proportional quality of our army, this represents no small task for our commanders and soldiers. This is particularly true since the shorter period of military service is accompanied by reduced training time. And we must also take into account that the costs that can be expended on training cannot be significantly increased while the requirements are unchanged or increased.

Considering all these things, our troops can assure their preparation for successful modern warfare by correctly interpreting tasks deriving from the modernization of training, by organizing and executing these tasks more effectively and at a higher level and by intensifying our party political work. This, however, is possible only if we all perform higher level work than before. Our young soldiers must learn their military knowledge with greater application and devotion and acquire practice. Our officers, on the other hand, must more effectively organize training and everyday life, do more for the wider circulation of good experiences and not least of all struggle with all their strength to eliminate possible errors, particularly weaknesses in planning-organizing work.

Our officers may receive information on the modernization of troop training from many sources--at various lectures, party and KISZ [Hungarian Youth League] membership meetings, staff meetings and the military press. Two matters of basic importance are the improvement of general military training and making planning-organizing work more efficient.

In enumerating the list of concrete tasks, let me start with the very important principle, or requirement, that the individual soldiers, or the subunits, must be taught, or must learn, all those things that soldiers individually and the subunits and units collectively must do for successful combat. To this end, an obvious solution was the omission of superfluous materials according to our experience. We did in fact omit these from the training program. But this is only the first step. There is, at the least, need to assure that the instructors do not burden the soldiers, with superfluous learning matter not germane to the goal. Another warning example is this: they should not seek to instruct the soldiers at a college level in the operation, composition and maintenance of the radio, the tank, the artillery shell, the chemical materials and so forth but to the degree necessary for the young soldier in a given assignment. And this must be taught perfectly, or learned perfectly--learned by practice!

On the basis of the foregoing principles we studied the general military training that is obligatory for every soldier and subunit and we decided on the requirements. On one hand, we concluded that as a result of the introduction of school defense training, or even more as a result of the pretraining work of the MHSZ [Hungarian Sport Federation for National Defense], we could omit certain phases. For example, rifle range training does not unconditionally need to be started with aiming the rifle, and it is not necessary to explain to the recruit what is the "front" of the gas mask. Thus, among other things, the time available for technical training, defense against weapons of mass destruction, health protection and the knowledge of war provisions is somewhat reduced.

Experience dictates that we strengthen our training in other areas. With a number of weapon types, chiefly with specialized units, it was evident that general military training had been neglected. But now preparation for modern warfare requires that the soldiers in specialized units devote greater attention to the use of their individual weapons and means of defense, to the defense of collective combat and other technical means and to their positions or to acquire adequate practice, among other things, in combat mobility on the terrain, in defense against diversion and in the devices of hand-to-hand combat, in fighting military helicopters and the better use of their weapons in the defense of their military equipment. The most modern technology and the best professional knowledge is worthwhile only if coupled with many-sided preparation. Therefore, the task is still valid: we must continue with high-level, acknowledged professional work, but we must raise our general military training and preparation to the same level.

Better general preparation is also served by the fact that hand-to-hand combat in physical training has become an independent subject area. The officers have already been prepared for teaching this; in the training period now beginning it is the turn of the enlisted men to learn the basic holds and to use these in specialized training activities. It is, for example, only the question of a command decision whether in establishing a radio station, ship, warehouse, or in occupying an area they should arrange for diversionary action or its prevention.

Firing range practice must also be adjusted to the new demands. For example, the number of firing exercises has been reduced, accompanied by a savings in time and energy; at the same time we made practice more complex and effective. It simplifies the planning and execution work since in a given training period every soldier within a subunit must carry out the same number of individual weapons, group firing exercises with the goal, for example, that the commander of a piece of ordnance be capable of directing a subunit to defend itself or annihilate the enemy. We also thought of such characteristic tasks as this: the soldiers of the commandant (komendans) and guard subunits must have particularly great practice in impromptu (kapas) firing. We are introducing into the program drill training in the interest of the enlisted men's physical preparedness. There is a great deal of opposition in various places, but we cannot permit the subunits to go to a practice field, which is only 2 kilometers opposite the barracks, in vehicles only because they are so-called mechanized artillery. We must strengthen their legs, improve their physical condition. At the end of their basic training the new recruits, for example, must be able to march 13 to 15 kilometers, which subsequently can be increased to 25 to 30 kilometers.

Among the tasks an expanded role has been given to the new "Service Regulation and Rule Information," which has given an increased number of hours to state security, accident prevention, work and fire protection, environmental protection, transportation and mobility instruction.

Even in working out the program there were complaints that the time allotted for formal (alaki) training was too little. That is true if certain commanders think of such activities only literally. Everyone should regard formal in a broader sense and would add to it reveille, clothing inspection, command announcement activities and other formations and parades.

In concluding, I would like to emphasize that general military training must be raised to the level of specialized training in the interest of everyone and of the results!

[Question] Comrade Major General, you emphasized planning-organizing work as the other essential area of ideas. Let me precede this subject with an opinion expressed among the subunit commanders. They would like to have greater independence in determining what and how much instruction should be imparted in a given period of time to the subunits they know well.

[Answer] Your conversation partners are knocking on an open door in various aspects. Let me quote from the pertinent prescriptions of the training inspection measures, which state: "The number of hours set in the training programs for training branches and subject areas are guidance numbers that the unit commander may rearrange excepting the number of hours set for basic training, political instruction, physical training and the days prescribed for combat exercises." In the final analysis those who raised this question can decide how much time they will give for instructing their soldiers--the subunits they know well, to use their words--in the prescribed subjects. Beyond the procedural guides there are hardly any strict limitations even in the manner of execution, only a possible version. The essence is this: the fulfillment of the prescribed requirements should be in the most effective and purposeful execution possible.

A very important condition, requirement of this effectiveness, purposefulness--in a word, its base--is purposeful and circumspect planning and organizing work. There has been no essential change in the order of general planning as compared to what preceded. However, the new tasks, the modern technology and the additional and better-equipped training bases require more careful planning for their solution. This is eased on one hand by the unified system of enlistment and discharge, and on the other hand by the fact that the measures of the training inspector, which are valid for a number of years, are available to the units. This basic manual, which has been prepared for everyone, reduces the need for preparing training documents from the divisions down to the subunits, and it eliminates the practice whereby in many places "books" were prepared instead of measures taken, which were then passed down and frequently repeated literally with inexact content.

The new measure makes the task--their explanation and application by commanders at every level--more clear, concrete and simple. The task agreement also excludes variations from the central requirements.

Let me add another thought here. Assistance to the economy and troop training will continue also as the task of the units. The old practice, to be sure, has disturbed the preparation of the subunits in many places in that it "lifted" the specialized workers from the squadrons and sections, and the remaining defective subunits could not be successfully welded together. A certain artillery unit defended itself against this, for example, by assigning as turret gunners only soldiers without specialization and with less than 8 years of general schooling, saying "these won't be taken away, they will surely remain at their jobs." All this is helped on one hand by the fact that the training program makes it possible from the outset--plans, that is--the modification of the 2-week or 1-month training to the extent necessary in the interest of the economy. On the other hand, a chief-of-general-staff measure allows, for the unit troop training and barracks maintenance tasks, placing in the individual subunits the trained soldier with specialized training in their second of third phase. Of course, so-called "form-maintenance" training should be conducted also in these subunits. Frankly, we expect a great deal from the fulfillment of this measure for making training a smoother process in the other subunits.

[Question] In recognition of the tasks and the expectations, we may conclude that, with the introduction of the 18-month service time and the modernization of troop training, the burden will be even greater on the officers and noncommissioned officers. To what extent do you, Comrade Major General, agree with this view?

[Answer] The concern is justified only at those places not adequately using the prescribed training time--on the basis of our experience, the use of activity time is 50 to 60 percent--in places where the time spent on practice fields and rifle ranges is not intensive enough; where the reserve officer candidates and the noncommissioned officers are not trained as rapidly as possible for the practical carrying out of assignments that can be fulfilled in the subunits; and where the troops are not brought into everyday life--and I could continue in this way. I have already given the answer to your question: I do not agree that there will be too great a burden. One thing will certainly grow: the professional work and the intellectual work that accompany the demand for higher-level, every day activity. If the comrades you mention are thinking of this additional work, indeed the requirements have been increased for higher-level, more effective and therefore more successful work. The general and professional preparedness of the officers--as I have already said--is increasingly of a higher level. I take this opportunity to wish all the troops strength, health and success for the work that means a new test.

[Question] Comrade Major General, I thank you for the interview.

THIRD EXTRAORDINARY ZSP CONGRESS REPORTED

Report, First Conclusions

Warsaw WALKA MLODYCH in Polish 3 May 81 p 2

[Text] The 3rd Extraordinary Congress of the Union of Socialist Polish Yough [ZSMP] began its deliberations on 23 April, preceded the day before by a closed procedural session. Originally, the conclusion of deliberations was envisaged for Saturday, 25 April. However, the discussion became drawn out and at the moment when this issue is going to press (Monday, 27 April), deliberations are still continuing. Representatives of the highest political and state authorities practicipated in the opening of the Congress including Stanislaw Kania, Henryk Jablonski, Wojciech Jaruzelski, Stanislaw Gucwa and Edward Kowalczyk. Introductory remarks to the discussion were delivered by the outgoing chairman of the Main Board--Andrzej Koltek. Stanislaw Kania spoke on behalf of the party leadership. The program discussion was heard by representatives of the leadership of youth unions as well as trade unions including the Independent Self-governing Trade Union [NSZZ] "Solidarity." Upon the request of the delegates, the discussion proceedings were observed, during all the days of deliberations, by members of the Political Bureau and Secretariat of the Central Committee of the Polish United Workers' Party [PZPR], members of the government and by representatives of individual ministries. On the third day of deliberations, Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski made his appearance; while on Sunday, an "hour of sincerity" was held during which members of the leading party and government authorities including Kazimierz Barcikowski, answered questions submitted by the delegates. The Statute Commission worked hard in preparing a new ZSMP statute, which was subsequently agreed upon in detail and passed by an overwhelming majority of delegates. The Commission for Resolutions and Recommendations spent its days working with equal diligence. The Congress accepted, among other things, a new plan of action for the ZSMP; a position on economic reform, on the issue of shaping the environment and policies in regard to rural communities and food management; the rights of young people to participate in culture and international matters as well as in matters of education and upbringing. A resolution was also passed in regard to cooperation between youth unions and also on the matter of youth branches and press, which until now were subordinate to the Federation of Socialist Unions of Polish Youth [FSZMP]. The Congress held an election of the supreme authorities. The chairman of the Main Board, elected directly by the delegates, was Jerzy Jaskiernia from Krakow who until now was the chairman of the Main Peer Court and a science employee at the Jagiellonian University.

Resolution of Congress

Warsaw WALKA MLODYCH in Polish 10 May 81 p 2

[Text] The substance of the August protest of the working [labor] class was dissension towards the occurrence of the dismantling of moral values, falsification of reality, dominance of egoism and the separation of words and deeds.

The driving force behind "Polish August" was the resolve and determination of young people including many members of our Union. The organization structures did not keep pace with the active participation of ZSMP members, thus, causing the general demand, proceeding from the rank and file, for the calling together of an Extraordinary ZSMP Congress.

The basic task of the 3rd Congress was the complete merging of the organization into the mainstream of changes occurring in the country, laying out the principle directions of activity, reforming the work style in accordance with the need at the time and the expectations of the young generation. We have learned a lot at this Congress, although, it did not come easily. However, we had to go through this difficult lesson on democracy with many hidden dangers.

The Congress was decidedly in favor of strengthening the ZSMP as a political and militant, open, multiregional [wielosrodowiskowej] organization, bringing up youth in the spirit of socialist ideals.

We act in ideological unity with the Polish United Workers' Party [PZPR]. In a strong party and authenticity, we seek out the important element for the successful development of socialist Poland and, therefore:

--we turn to our members, who are in the party ranks, for the effective dissemination of the idea that the future of the party and the nation lies in the upbringing of the new generation,

--in acknowledging the need for improving cooperation with the PZPR, we favor independence, mutual trust and honest criticism,

--the Congress obliges the ZSMP Main Board [ZG] to submit to the Ninth PZPR Congress, a catalogue on matters concerning youth, which need to be be solved in party and national policies,

--the Congress obliges delegates--members of the PZPR--to carry over the content of the Union's output to the forum of meetings, conferences and the party's Ninth Congress.

We favor cooperation with the entire trade movement--Independent Self-governing Trade Union [NSZZ] "Solidarity," branch unions and autonomous unions. We seek our ally in trade unions in the fight for the interests of rural and urban youth as well as a partner for initiatives, which serve the social good and improvement of living conditions.

We feel that cooperation between all youth organizations lies in the interest of the young generation.

We turn to the members of these organizations for the creation of a joint fighting front for our common concerns.

The Congress recognizes these accepted, basic documents:

--Ideological Declaration--which describes the socialist and open character of the Union,

--Program Declaration--which favors the full utilization of rank and file program initiatives and a militant character of the ZSMP,

--The Statute together with the Regulation of the Main Audit Commission and the Main Peer Court as the guarantee of the democratization of Union life.

The most important problems of youth and the attitude towards the methods of solving them are contained in the adopted positions, decisions and resolutions:

--The position of the ZSMP on the issue of a young family's living conditions,

--position on the issue of policies towards rural communities and the food economy,

--declaration and position on the issue of basic assumptions of economic reform,

--position on the issue of the shaping and protection of the environment,

--position on the issue of education and upbringing,

--position on the issue of the right young people to share in culture,

--position on international issues,

--resolution of the 3rd ZSMP Congress on the matter of cooperation between youth unions,

--resolution of the 3rd ZSMP Congress on the issue of youth branches and press, which until now were subordinate to the Federation of Socialist Unions of Polish Youth [FSZMP].

In actively joining the renewal process of the Union, the Congress resolves:

--to conduct a report-election camapign in Union elements and echelons directly following the conclusion of the Congress,

--to perform a detailed evaluation of the leadership and work of ZSMP echelons on all levels and to conduct an analysis of the causes for the increase of errors and weaknesses in our organization,

--to introduce the principle of tenure employment for all full-time political ZSMP employees, in order that they fulfill an ancillary role towards social bodies and Union authorities,

--to obligate the ZG ZSMP to promptly and effectively regulate the principles of according positions [employment] in places of employment and in basic echelons of our union.

An important mission of the Union is to assume comprehensive activity for the benefit of creating ZSMP circles in all work, science and residential communities.

Work in post elementary school communities of all types as well as in rural areas and urban communities, requires our particular attention.

The Congress acknowledges the need for the urgent examination of the content and methods of political instruction, recognizing the full truth about the history of the youth, labor and national movement as an important condition for a more complete formation of social awareness. Regional programs resulting from the initiatives of circles and echelons, will be elaborated by regional councils while maintaining the principle of observing program directions passed by the Congress.

The 3rd Extraordinary Congress acknowledges that:

--recommendations made during the pre-Congress session, remarks and recommendations made during the plenary discussion of the Congress;

--the report of the Presidium of ZG ZSMP;

--positions and recommendations of all problem solving teams;

--all essential recommendations presented at the 3rd ZSMP Congress constitute the material of the Congress.

This material makes up the integral part of the resolution, which is the basis for the finalization and enrichment of the Union's program activities.

The Congress notes the low participation of youth--including representatives of our Union--in the practical conducting of authority and influence on solving young people's problems.

For this reason:

--we affirm the necessity of creating an institutional form of cooperation with the government;

--we oblige all echelons of ZSMP to fight for their share in authority and to conscientiously use their acquired authority in the interest of youth;

--the Congress obliges the ZG ZSMP to propose to young delegates to come out with the initiative, before the Sejm, of creating a Circle of Young Delegates;

--the Main Board will call together a Team of Delegates, who are ZSMP members, as a platform to serve the elaboration of the Union's position on issues presented for deliberations of the Sejm.

The Congress favors the active participation of young people in the shaping of cadre policy.

The 3rd Extraordinary ZSMP Congress establishes the institution of the honorary member of ZSMP and obliges the Main Board to elaborate the principles and procedures of according it.

The Congress obliges ZG ZSMP to take up all activity, which has for its goal, to turn over to youth and its socialist unions--the J. Krasicki Center in Limanowa and to initiate and conduct activity in it, worthy of the name of the hero of Polish youth.

ZSMP Program Declaration

Warsaw WALKA MLODYCH in Polish 10 May 81 p 3

[Text] We unite voluntarily in the Union of Socialist Polish Youth (ZSMP], without placing ideological and regional barriers before anyone.

The ideals of socialism unite us: freedom, equality and social justice. Common interests and goals bring us together.

We are deeply aware of our joint responsibility for Poland's future and present. We want to take the matters and fate of our generation into our hands; to fight for the right to dignified work and a good life; the right to equal opportunity for advancement and development.

We want to shape our nation's life, to create a better tomorrow in our socialist Homeland and to decide about our own matters.

We speak clearly about our goals and our program:

--we do everything possible in order to live in peace today and in the future; in an atmosphere of recognition for good work, respect and tolerance in interpersonal relationships;

--we develop activity for the benefit of patriotic and defensive upbringing of youth;

--we take action against every case of human injustice, the breaking of the law and order and the accumulating of wealth at the expense of others;

--we fight all signs of waste and mismanagement, which diminish the effects of our work;

--we create a plane of socio-political instruction, the exchange of opinions and mutual support, in such a way as to find ourselves and our place in life.

We must indicate, take on and solve matters that have a fundamental meaning for the young generation, more actively and effectively.

WE FIGHT FOR:

--the elimination of unjust social disproportions;

--equal rights for all Poles;

--decreasing differences between living and working conditions in the city and in rural areas;

--the spreading of moral values and the forming of a sense of responsibility for one's own words and actions;

--the whole truth about our nation's history.

In striving for a solution to the most important social problems we shall fight for:

--the rapid implementation of complete economic reform, the staffing of positions in accordance with professional qualifications and organizational abilities;

--the equal rights development of all agricultural sectors with the guarantee of the profitability of agricultural production;

--proper land management;

--the recognition of the family peasant farm as a stable element of the socialist economy;

--the observance of the right of honest and reliable people to work;

--suitable working conditions, which are safe for life and health;

--truly equal access of youth from working-class and peasant families to all school and learning institutions; the raising of teaching standards in rural areas and in small towns;

--the shaping and satisfying of the socio-professional and cultural aspirations of working class and peasant youth and of young people living in small towns.

WE FIGHT FOR:

--the right to housing for young people;

--the right to family happiness.

WE FIGHT:

--for the creation of conditions for full participation in cultural life and the development of the amateur artistic movement;

--for the creation of conditions for the general relaxation of children and youth, particularly, from rural areas; the development of various forms of team sports and recreation;

--for the effective protection of man's natural environment;

--for the expansion of health and preventive care;

--against social plagues: drunkenness, hooliganism, corruption and the causes of such phenomena.

We consider it to be our duty to express ourselves on vital issues of the young generation, at all levels of representative and self-governing bodies. We will create conditions for the representation of our interests on their forum, specifically through:

--the presenting of candidates to representative organs on the basis of equal rights with the remaining members of the National Unity Front [FJN];

--the active participation of our representatives in the work of these organs;

--presenting to society and to the proper national organs--opinions, expertise and proposals for the resolvement of specific issues concerning youth.

In improving the work style of the Union, we will:

--strengthen the rank and significance of social forms of planning, guidance and control of Union life;

--strengthen the work of circles, which should independently seek program solutions and their own forms of activity;

--observe the principles of the ancillary role of echelons and full-time cadres in regard to circles and basal organizations;

--maintain complete openness of organizational life;

--strengthen solidarity among Union members as well as friendship and mutual trust.

We look for ideological inspiration for activity, based on the above Declaration, in the program of the PZPR. We cooperate with the United Peasant Party [ZSL] and the Democratic Party [SD].

We declare cooperation with the trade movement of the Independent Self-governing Trade Union [NSZZ] "Solidarity," branch unions and autonomous unions. We seek our ally in the trade unions, in the fight for the interests of youth and a partner for initiatives, which serve the social good and improvement of living conditions.

On behalf of the foremost interests of the young generation, we confirm our readiness to cooperate with all youth organizations, on the basis of respect for our goals and plans of action.

ZHP SUPREME COUNCIL PLENUM REPORTED

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 5 Oct 81 pp 1, 2

[Article by Magda Rulska: "Unity Demands Tolerance"]

[Text] The current situation in the ZHP was the principal topic of debate during the 2-day plenary proceedings of the Supreme Council of the Polish Scout Union [ZHP] (3-4 Oct 1981).

In his address introducing the discussion period Andrzej Ornat stated that in many respects the ZHP is a different organization than it was one year ago. He said that these differences are manifested in the mood that prevails within the organization, in the repudiation of offensive, politically inspired propaganda campaigns, and in the focusing of attention on programs of an educational nature. Commenting on the recent initiatives made by the A. Malkowski Scoutmasters Caucus [KIHAM], the commander-in-chief made the following statement: "What we wanted to do was to learn how to work together to publicize our most outstanding accomplishments. And no one had any illusions about the fact that the road upon which we had embarked would be strewn with rose petals. But this is the road we decided to follow. But the realization of this goal was and still is predicated on putting our minds to it, making a sincere commitment in this direction, and, most importantly, displaying a spirit of mutual tolerance.... An independent policy line is not synonymous with a willful disregard for the decisions made by the congress. The unity of the ZHP," said A. Ornat, "has never been in such great danger as it is now. And we ourselves are the prime source of this danger. There is no need to go looking for it outside the organization. ...However, we cannot afford to lose our patience. It is most important that we join our many forces into one force...."

A great deal has happened to our organization since the last plenum of the Supreme Council. The ranks of the Independent Scouting Movement have grown. Solidarity declared its support for the independent movement in its congress draft resolution. On 13 September the KIHAM Consultative Council published its own text of the scouts oath. The Supreme Council and its presidium have already taken a stand in response to the first two of the above developments. The members of the Council were very much alarmed by the KIHAM decision, which runs counter to the provisions of documents currently in force (the statute, the official version of the scouts oath, and the resolution of the Seventh Congress of the ZHP).

There were two dominant themes during the debate. The first of these themes amounted to an expression of alarm over this--as it was described--act of insubordination. Marek Wardecki said that scouts must be united by something beyond the fact that they all wear the same uniform. If they really want to stick together in one Union, they must reach a consensus on a single ideal of civic education that is acceptable to everyone. In this case the index of the strength of this consensus is, among other things, and this in fact is the crucial issue, the text of the scouts oath. To tolerate the validity of several such oaths, said the next discussant, the commander of the Lodz Troop, would in effect lead to sowing the seeds of dissension among our children. The unity of the ZHP is based on the dedication of all of its members to goals that are grounded in matters of principle. And this in fact is the conclusion that was reached a mere 6 months ago by the supreme forum of the ZHP.

In many of the statements that were made suggestions were raised to the effect that, at such an important moment in the history of our organization, an effort should be made to solicit the views of rank-and-file scoutmasters. Several of the discussants asserted that consideration should be given to the possibility of convening an extraordinary congress or perhaps moving up the date for the convening of the next regularly scheduled congress. But it is absolutely certain, said the members of the Supreme Council, that we cannot regard the things which we have accomplished up to this point as being representative of the best that we could do. It is necessary to carry on with our debate, to give careful heed to the views of ZHP members, and to look upon these views as representing the raw material for the drafting of future official documents. But for the time being we are all obliged to respect the decisions made by the last congress, and nothing or no one has released us from our obligation to implement these decisions.

A radically different position was advanced by Andrzej Jaczewski. The situation in the scouting movement, he said, is a reflection of what is happening in society at large. Young people are impatient, militant, and desirious of change. We are not going to get anywhere by entrenching ourselves in positions based on a literal interpretation of the law. It may yet come to pass that the governing bodies of the scouting movement will survive, but maybe there will no longer be any scouts left on whom these bodies can exercise an influence. He concluded by noting that we should quit being so inflexible, for, if we fail to do so, it may happen that the scouting movement will go on to experience a revival in which we will play no part.

As for the wording of the scouts oath that was adopted by the scoutmasters who belong to KIHAM, it was acknowledged that this decision was motivated by the word "socialism" which appears in the text of the oath approved by the ZHP congress. It is no wonder, said A. Jaczewski, that the Malkowski-ites repudiated this word. I myself--and I do not think of myself as being some kind of nitwit--do not understand the meaning of this word....

The idea proposed by A. Jaczewski (legalizing activities not sanctioned by the ZHP statute for the sake of ZHP unity) was not endorsed by the majority. What actually happened was that a resolution was passed which reads as follows: "The situation in which the organization now finds itself requires that a concerted effort should be made by all forces within the ZHP and by those who wish it well to give everyone who so wishes an opportunity to play an active role in the scouting movement and make whatever contribution they can to shielding children from the consequences of the current crisis.... Independent policy-making practices, the principles of self-government, and tolerance for the beliefs of others must be respected by everyone who cherishes the values of the scouting movement. The multiplicity of world views represented within the ZHP has to mean that all of its members have a duty to learn how to be tolerant. The social values of socialism are one of the sources of the scouting ideal of civic education.... There is room within the scouting movement for diverse movements that espouse different policies and different methodologies as long as they respect the ZHP statute. The decision made by the KIHAM Consultative Council is incompatible with the provisions of the ZHP statute.... This is the reason why we are appealing for a revision of this decision and for a commitment to forego any actions which might be interpreted as an attempt to break up the ZHP."

In addition, on the strength of a resolution passed by its presidium and by the appropriate subcommittee, the Supreme Council also committed itself to holding talks with the KIHAM Consultative Council for the purpose of resolving the problems presented by the present situation.

The Supreme Council plenum went on to adopt a new set of organizational rules and regulations, a six-grade system of scout and explorer scout ranks, a code of rules and regulations governing the display of scout banners, rules governing the merger of scout troops, and a code of rules and regulations on scout uniforms, badges, and insignias.

COMPETITION BETWEEN NZS AND SZSP DISCUSSED

Warsaw STUDENT in Polish 8-21 Oct 81 p 4

[Article by Marek Siwiec, chairman, SZSP District Council, Krakow: "Is There No Third Choice?"]

[Text] The beginning of a new year prompts one to summarize the past 12 months and to conjecture about the future. In restrospect, the fundamental question is: Did the students and their organizations take advantage of their opportunities in the renewal? They hardly did.

In the struggle over self-government, the school employees dominated. True enough, at the time of the strikes, the fundamental school conflict between teachers and students receded. (The conflict does not concern the purpose of the study, but it does cause the course of studies to be treated different.) Nonetheless, when self-government wins in the schools, everything will return to traditional norms. On the one hand the students, and on the other the school authorities and employees, will wish to tighten discipline and increase the effectiveness of studies. The sugarcoated relationship with the academic cadre is not a long-term situation.

Students have been forced into a system with two poles--the NZS [Independent Association of Students] and the SZSP [Socialist Union of Polish Students]; most of them do not wish to choose any organization. We may stop to consider what really divides the NZS and the SZSP. The experiences of the past year have shown that the question at issue is the relationship to authority. Public opinion views the matter simply; i.e., it sees the NZS as an antigovernment organization and the SZSP as a progovernment organization. Obviously, the public perception of these organizations changes according to the popularity of those in power. Both the NZS and the SZSP have been searching frantically for an identity. The NZS has devoted nearly all its energies to supporting the activities of Solidarity. The mystery of the NZS continues to be how to reconcile the independence of the organization with an uncritical relationship to authority over the long term. History teaches us that sooner or later something must be abandoned.

The character of the SZSP's relationships with other organizations, and particularly with the PZPR, is much more complex. The SZSP does not identify itself a priori with the program of action and [text illegible] the ideology of any party. This fact results from the principle of the total self-government of the union, as adopted at its congress. Of course, the SZSP can enter into alliances, support the actions of some organizations and criticize other organizations. The PZPR should seem the natural ally of the union, since the statutory goal of both is the building of socialism. In practice, however, the understanding of the regulations issuing from the principles of socialism is often at variance in the PZPR and the SZSP. The union recognizes the constitutional structure of Poland and implements its program within the framework of this structure. Perhaps the SZSP, in its candid criticism of both the PZPR and Solidarity, risks standing alone. However, what are most important are one's own identity and the credibility from this identity.

What will the new academic year bring? If we survey the entire student milieu, two scenarios come into view. Which will actually take place depends primarily upon the development of the national situation.

The Moderately Pessimistic Variant

We may envision that the clinch in the social situation will still hold fast. The confrontation will shift from the base to the superstructure. Higher schools are a particularly enticing testing ground. The NZS will concentrate on the battle with the SZSP. According to the scenario of the past year, it will build its position on the total negation of all that the SZSP implements and proposes. We may also expect restitutive demands concerning SZSP property. Such action will probably elicit the same reaction from the SZSP. Unfortunately, the effect of such a situation will be the total disintegration of students and the real (and not merely the formal) antagonism of member groups. What makes such a situation even more pathological is the fact that it would set up a system of endless confrontation, devoid of any opportunity to determine even the most important common interests of students. In the event of direct consolidation between the NZS and Solidarity, the trade union might use this student association in an action that it would find awkward to perform. A resolution of the NZS Congress concerning the prohibition of cooperation with the SZSP, the past year's activities and several vacation resolutions of the NZS National Coordinating Commission all speak for the possibility of this variant. He who rejects any sort of understanding negates the existing partners and aspires to dominate the environment. It is a bad omen.

The Moderately Optimistic Variant

We may envision that instead of the model of permanent confrontation we will have the model of organizations competing with one another or simply complementing one another. This sounds like utopia and is rather unrealistic for the near future. However, it would be the optimal situation. What is necessary to bring it about? Above all, the existing organizations must recognize the existence of the others. No organization's activities should be based merely upon a program of negation. If constructive programs emanated from the real needs of students, they would have several points in common. Such programs should designate areas of indispensable cooperative action among organizations. Successful communication would make possible the representation of student interests in general to state authorities. No self-government will be able to fulfill this role, since its actions will be limited to the school grounds.

Given this situation, let us look at the prospects for the SZSP. The nature of this organization's tasks will be contingent primarily upon whether the milieu accepts the program and political proposals of the union.

Since its creation, a peculiar union-political dualism has characterized the organization. The organizational formula has been criticized by some as a base compromise of spirit and matter, while others have admired it as an opportunity to reconcile vitality and strength with their political realization. As we consider the future of the SZSP till the Fourth Congress (which will take place during the current academic year), we must analyze two tendencies currently represented in the union; i.e., the conservative and the reformist tendencies. The situation is complicated by the fact that the SZSP, in its activism, is trying to cover the center and the left of the student milieu. The reformists believe that effective political action and union action are not possible under a common banner. They propose a model of a union headquarters and a political organization (perhaps several organizations) joined under a perpetual pact of cooperation. The common origins of both unions could be acknowledged in statutory regulations; e.g., concerning the possibility of dual membership. Such a situation, the optimal one from a theoretical viewpoint, could be implemented if the "political side" of the alliance represented the ideas (the political interests) of the majority of students. The SZSP has not yet attained this status with its program.

The most reasonable solution apparently will be to continue the line of action developed at the third congress. This consists of a total union offering, open to the whole milieu, but it is also comprised of moderate involvement in political activity in accordance with the expectations and the needs of members. The creation of informal structures for discussion and political education, existing side by side with statutory structures, seems necessary. Such structures could become a forum for the activism of those students for whom politics is the primary field of activity in the SZSP. These considerations could turn into fruitless argument when the internal conditions determining the situation in schools take an unexpected course. However, we may assume that schools and students will be successful in determining that their existence will be characterized by the priority of a spirit of tolerance and dialogue.

RESULTS OF SZSP SUPREME COUNCIL PLENUM REPORTED

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 16 Nov 81 pp 1, 5

/Article by Jerzy Godula: "We Are for Accord"/

/Text/ Meeting with Deputy Premier M. Rakowski, Resolution on the matter of the Front of National Accord. Law on higher schools. Conflict in the Higher School of Engineering /WSI/ in Radom. Socio-living conditions of students. Verification of SZSP /Socialist Union of Polish Students/ members.

On Saturday, the 14th of this month, the Fifth Plenum of the Supreme Council /RN/ of the Socialist Union of Polish Students took place in the Warsaw club "Stodola." The deliberations were led by the chairman of the Supreme Council of SZSP--Tadeusz Sawic.

The meeting with participants of the deliberations was attended by Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski. The Deputy Premier presented the current situation in the country. He stated, among other things, that the constant strikes are causing the destruction of the economy. This results in economic losses but their psychological effects are considerably more dangerous. Strike action, often taken for trivial reasons, does not permit the resumption of normal, regular work. Time and peace are needed in order to come out of the crisis.

M. Rakowski informed that on Monday, the 16th of this month, the draft of the law on the higher school system will be the subject of deliberations of the Council of Ministers. The social draft, prepared by the commission of Z. Resich with attached remarks from the government will be presented to the Sejm. At the same time, the Deputy Premier stated that the conflict at WSI in Radom should be resolved in the school. This results from the binding principle of self-government of higher schools.

The Supreme Council of SZSP passed a resolution on the issue of the Front of National Accord:

The Supreme Council of SZSP, in accordance with its previous declarations and positions, welcomes with satisfaction and hope, efforts on behalf of creating a Front of National Accord--a new form of socio-political life as well as giving it a permanent legally-constitutional character.

The Front of National Accord should bring together all those, who accept the foundations of the socialist system of the Polish People's Republic /PRL/ and especially the social ownership of the means of production and international alliances of the state. The SZSP believes that the calling together and further activity of a Front of National Accord is difficult but the only road to social peace, stability and progress. The Supreme Council of SZSP accepts the proposal of participating in the creation of a Front of National Accord. The Supreme Council of SZSP believes that it is necessary to begin discussions on the goals, structure and activity of a Front of National Accord in the student community. It obliges executive echelons to take up discussions on this subject with other youth and student organizations. The Supreme Council of SZSP supports all rank and file, civic initiatives which lead in this direction.

Subsequently, following the disucssion on the subject of the current situation in the academic community, the Supreme Council of the SZSP accepted a declaration on the issue of the law on higher schools. From the beginning of the academic year--we read in the declaration--an atmosphere of distrust and social tension has been mounting in the academic community. Controversy surrounding the comprehension of democracy and school self-government continues to grow in higher schools. Democracy and self-government, not sanctioned by law, are bound to give rise to conflicts while their solutions lead from a rational plane to an emotional one.

The expression of the academic community's striving for a rapid as possible normalization of the legal situation of higher schools--it is stated further on in the declaration--is the social draft of the law on higher schools passed by the Certification Commission on 11 June. From that time, the minister of Science, Higher Schools and Technology, committed himself a number of times to the immediate presentation of the draft for deliberations of the Sejm. On 18 August, at the meeting in Umiejow, Minister Jerzy Nawrocki--in withdrawing the corrections to the social draft introduced by the Ministry of Science, Higher Schools and Technology /MNSzWiT/ --stated that the basis for the work of the Sejm, before the beginning of the new academic year, will be the social draft of the law /on higher schools/. Two months have already passed from this meeting. Again, work on the law is being postponed by the MNSzWiT.

We decidedly oppose--state the members of the Supreme Council of SZSP in connection with this--these kinds of practices. We are treating the announced fixed date of the 16th of this month for the session of the Council of Ministers on the issue of the law--as final. In case it is not kept, the RN SZSP obliges echelons to take up nationwide protest action from the 18th of this month.

At the same time--it was emphasized in the latter part of the declaration--the Executive Committee of the RN SZSP is being obliged to take up discussions with the Sejm Commission on Science and Technological Progress and with delegates from the academic community for the purpose of presenting the draft of the law for deliberations of the Sejm during its next session, taking advantage of the delegate initiative /as published/.

In the next part of deliberations, the chairman of the SZSP School Council /RU/ of the Higher School of Engineering in Radom--Krzysztof Pietrzykowksi presented the course of events in his school and also the position taken on the 4th of this month by the RU SZSP, regarding the evaluation and methods of settling the conflict. In connection with this, the Supreme Council of SZSP decided--in a special resoltuion--to give its full support to the activity of the RU SZSP WSI in Radom, stating concurrently that false information is being disseminated in the country about the nature of the conflict.

In order to preserve the principles of full autonomy and self-government of all Polish schools, we maintain the position--it was emphasized in the resolution--that the Radom issue must be resolved within the school itself without any kind of interference from the outside.

Several documents were accepted, which should become the basis for discussion in the academic community. These are: draft of a system of state financial assistance for students, a position on the issue of a new system of employment, a plan of action for the securing of conditions of health protection for the academic community, a stand on the issue of the student family, a stand on the issue of student nourishment and a stand on the issue of student housing books.

Two documents concern working students--nourishment and lodging as well as student discounts and services as specified by government resolutions.

The subsequent part of deliberations was devoted to the problems of student work and economic activity of SZSP. Documents were accepted pertaining to student work cooperatives, the work cooperative of higher school graduates, student housing construction and a position on management activity of SZSP.

In connection with the frequent interference of the authorities of some schools into the activity and cultural base of the organization--a particularly striking example is the matter of the RU SZSP club "Akant" at Silesian University--the Supreme Council of SZSP has accepted a position in the matter of a base for cultural activity.

In this document, it was recalled that, in accordance with the April settlements of the Commission for Contacts with Student Organizations, all controversial issues, which concern the school base used by student organizations, should be settled in direct contacts between the interested parties--without the administrative interference of school authorities.

A substantial part of the deliberations was occupied by economic conditions of higher studies. A comprehensive program report on this subject was presented by a member of the Executive Committee of the RN SZSP--Krzysztof Pietraszkiewicz.

Furthermore, a declaration was accepted in the matter of the Student Labor Bureau "Student-Service." We are demanding--state the members of RN SZSP in their declaration--prompt and effective action of the ministries concerned, so that by the end of the current year, the bureau will be set in motion.

In the final part of deliberations, a series of decisions was made--interorganizational in nature. Among these is the resolution in regard to the verification of SZSP members and in the matter of the report--election campaign in departmental organizations of SZSP.

Eighteen persons were dismissed from their duties as members of the Supreme Council of the SZSP and 22 persons were accepted into its membership. Andrezej Kaczanowski--at his own request--was relieved of the function as member of the Executive Committee of RN SZSP.

A few words of commentary: the Fifth Plenum of the Supreme Council of SZSP was the most effective plenary session of the current term of office. The Council assumed an attitude, towards all current social problems of the academic community, of specifying the methods of solving them and at the same time, it accepted many--prepared by problem solving commissions--documents, for which students have really been waiting including SZSP members. We will refer back to the accomplishments of the Fifth Plenum of RN SZSP yet many times in our columns.

SCOUT UNION LETTER TO NSZZ SOLIDARITY PUBLISHED

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 14 Sep 81 p 2

[Letter from the Supreme Council of the Polish Scout Union to the First Solidarity Congress]

[Text] The presidium of the Supreme Council of the Polish Scout Union [ZHP] has had an opportunity to familiarize itself with the draft resolution of the First Solidarity Congress on the sponsorship of an "Independent Scouting Movement" by the NSZZ Solidarity. We were very much surprised by this draft resolution, especially so in view of the fact that--as is well-known--more than 6 months ago, while talks were under way between the National Coordinating Committee of the Solidarity NSZZ representing teachers and educators and a delegation representing ZHP Headquarters, a communique was signed in which both sides expressed a willingness to work toward raising the standards of the civic education programs run by the ZHP in the interest of the welfare and future of Polish children and young people. This draft resolution surprises us all the more in that it advocates the breakup of [our] organization without any attempt to come to terms with those who would be most affected by such an outcome, notwithstanding the fact that a couple of weeks ago the Commander-in-Chief of the ZHP sent a proposal to the chairman of your union's National Consultative Commission in which an offer was made to meet and carry on with the dialogue that had already gotten under way. We take this opportunity to renew this offer.

It seemed to us that in the wake of these negotiations we had reached agreement as to the fact that the strength of the scouting movement had always resided in the notion of unity in diversity, in the longstanding tradition and longevity of the scouting method. It is thanks to these values that the ZHP has always given a good account of itself through all of the difficult periods of our history to the benefit of the country and its people.

We read in the draft resolution of the First Congress of the NSZZ Solidarity that, "the philosophical and methological achievements of the scouting movement have of late been invalidated and frittered away." We cannot accept this. The genuine rebirth of the traditional activities of scout troops and tribes that is now taking place attests to the fact that the scouting ideal is still very much alive, and the ZHP will succeed--as it always has done--in finding within itself many of the forces that are needed to meet the demands that are part and parcel of modern life by returning to its rich, historical traditions. The only thing that is required in order to accomplish this is time. This is because when dealing with a process as sensitive as that of civic education and with an organization as unique as that represented by the scouting movement, in which various generations, ranging from the youngest to the oldest, play an equal role, no changes are going to be made without difficulty. Such changes are normally made as part of an evolutionary process. Hasty and ill-considered actions could easily cause a great deal of harm both to the spirits of the young people in our charge and also to the spirits of those who are responsible for imparting the values of our society to these young people.

We also read in the draft resolution that, "in spite of the numerous initiatives that have been launched with a view to breathing new life into the meaningful work done by the scouting movement...there is no reason to expect that any changes are going to be made within the framework of the scouting movement that will be responsive to the expectations of the public at large." Neither can we accept this assessment, since the scoutmasters themselves have done most of the talking about the changes taking place within the ZHP. Ourside forces have had nothing to do with initiating those developments within the scouting movement that are still going on and helping to improve the work done by our organization. What we are dealing with here is a parallel voicing of expectations calling for improvements in the work done by the scouting movement both within its own organization and within the context of society at large. These expectations boil down first and foremost to issues having to do with the relevance of scouting programs, the independence of the scouting organization, secularism and tolerance for different outlooks and creeds, and a return to the 70-year old legitimate history and traditions of the scouting movement in Poland, to the kind of civic education that is geared toward the child and his needs. At the last ZHP congress all of these demands were appropriately reflected in the new ZHP statute and in the congress platform.

The congress came out in favor of encouraging a multiplicity of world views among ZHP members, and so it follows that it came out against instilling in its members any one particular world view. As the cornerstone of ZHP programs the congress endorsed the notion of "Scouts in Service of the Homeland"--to whatever extent possible based on its resources and capabilities and in keeping with the scouting ideals set forth in the Scout Statute, Charter, and Oath. Acknowledging the inspirational ideological role played by the PZPR, the ZHP congress stressed that--in addition to the ZHP's own traditions--the scouting ideal of civic education also derives sustenance from the social values espoused by socialism: equality, justice, self-sacrifice and a desire to make a better world. While realizing that we subscribe to diverse philosophical beliefs, in a spirit of mutual tolerance, we want to work toward the realization of the common social goals advocated by socialism.

A great many things have already happened in the life of our organization since the end of the Seventh Congress. But it is still too early to assess the meaning of all these changes. The new school year has just begun. It is only now that the resolutions of the Seventh Congress of the ZHP are beginning to be implemented in their entirety. We believe that it will not be before the end of this year that educators in the scouting movement will be able to come up with a responsible assessment as to whether the ZHP has lived up to public expectations.

The ZHP is the heir to a 70-year tradition and it carrys on as the torchbearer of the ideals and history of the scouting movement. This forges a bond between the ZHP and certain of the hopes and emotions that are shared by society at large. Attempts to break up the ZHP are an educational error committed by adults to the detriment of children and young people. This is because we believe that in the difficult situation in which Poland now finds itself what our country needs are fixed points of reference. Especially when it comes to civic education along patriotic lines enormous importance must be assigned to the continuity of national symbols and moral values, and--notwithstanding the severe and often valid criticisms that are voiced from various quarters--we believe that our organization is in fact a standardbearer of these values.

Even so, our cubs and scouts have already been witness to a great many controversies within our nation. Let us try to avoid widening these controversies to include that area of activity which is dearest to our children and young people. Within the ZHP itself there can be room for diverse movements espousing different programs and methodologies that can be practiced in a spirit of respect for the ZHP statute. Scoutmasters from various walks of life, including many members of Solidarity, can and do play an equal role in the running of this organization.

The governing bodies of the ZHP that were elected at the Seventh Congress want to act as quickly as possible to restore the meaningfulness of our organization, an organization which over a span of several generations of Poles has been known as the ZHP.

We believe that in the near future we will be able to sit down around the same table with the leaders of the NSZZ Solidarity so that we can consult on cooperation between your union and a single scouting organization--the ZHP.

STUDENT PAPER INITIATES SERIES ON RELIGION

Bucharest VIATA STUDENTEASCA in Romanian 11 Nov 81 pp 6, 7

[Article by Milena Mihaescu]

[Text] In this issue we inaugurate a comprehensive investigation aimed at revealing the factors in the persistence of the religious phenomenon, the social and individual causes and conditionings that foster one of the most anachronistic forms of awareness -- religious awareness. The contradiction between the scientific spirit that governs our era and the fundamental traits of socialist society -- on the one hand -- and the maintenance, even isolated, of religious feelings and manifestations -- on the other hand -- needs to be resolved by the uncovering of all the fluctuations of the religious phenomenon, by direct, persuasive, scientific action on the causes, by conducting of a complex activity of dissolving the society's religious remnants in the scientific reality of the epoch, in the prevailing spiritual climate of our socialist society.

By focusing on this important goal, which is necessary from all points of view for the multilateral development of human individuality as our society has planned, we hope that the opinions which VIATA STUDENTEASCA journal will carry starting with this issue will help to clarify the avenues and courses of action in this significant component of student associations' activity which is scientific-materialistic education.

We feel that the questions below are sufficient to cover the problems of this section and will structure the entire publicity campaign of our journal.

1. What is the relationship between social relations and social awareness in the socialist society and how does this relationship reflect on the maintenance (disappearance, proliferation, assertion) of religious awareness?

2. In terms of types of religious community, what are the similarities and differences between "sect" and "denomination?" As it considers itself a form of "protest" against some traditional religious precepts, can we state that the sect actually opposes religious faith?

3. What are the major psychological and social consequences of sect practices? (with examples).

4. What are the sources of supply to the protest manifested by sects against culture and civilization -- a protest whose extreme form is predicting the end of the world?

5. What is the mechanism of influencing of social awareness, of appearance of religious awareness especially among young people? How can we explain the adherence of young people, in the context of the scientific spirit that governs our times, to sectarian practices and concepts?

6. In what manner can the intervention of the collectivity, of youth organizations toward eliminating religious persuasions of some young people become efficient?

1. People's liberation from religious prejudices cannot be achieved outside the process of revolutionary transformation of society. The elimination of private ownership of means of production, the establishment of a society free from exploitation create the objective premises for the removal of economic alienation and -- as a corollary -- for the removal of the ideological alienation of human essence in religion. These objective conditions were created and are upgrading continuously in our country in the process of building a multilaterally developed socialist society. The favorable objective conditions that result from the basic features of the socialist society and the increasingly active and efficient impact of the new in people's minds generate the permanent process of their emancipation from religious alienation. That is why the molding of the new man, with a high socialist awareness, with a broad cultural horizon, the multilateral development of human individuality, the transformation of the entire way of work, life and thought of working people in conformance with the principles of socialist ethics and equity, of humanism and the revolutionary concept of the world and life -- dialectical and historical materialism -- are in the center of our party's concerns and represent the supreme goal of our society.

Romania's experience fully confirms the Marxist thesis according to which the building of the new society is the most important factor in the transformation of the people's awareness and their gradual liberation from mystical-religious concepts. In the practical work to build socialism and communism people while transforming nature and social relations, transform themselves. Many sociological studies conducted in this country in recent years point out that the revolutionary changes that have occurred in Romania's social life, the broad access of the masses to education, science and culture, the intensive political-ideological and cultural-educational activity conducted by the Romanian Communist Party have produced essential changes in the spiritual profile of working people, the decline in the intensity and proliferation of the religious phenomenon contributing to the liberation of a large part of the population from the influence of religious concepts. It is an indisputable truth that our socialist society, having established new economic and social relations, full equality of people, direct participation of working people in running society ensures the complete assertion of the human individuality, the liberation of the creative aptitudes of all citizens and in this manner, their emancipation from religious prejudices.

Under these conditions it is natural for us to ask ourselves: "Why do religious ideas still exist in the concepts of people and even young people?" As a rule one answers this question by invoking the lagging behind in social awareness, a force that preserves religious traditions and customs, the poor scientific-cultural standard, education in the family, and so on. Without minimizing these motivations we feel that it is necessary to point out that the persistence of religious concepts must be explained not only by ideological, educational factors. Although in our society the basic social causes that generate and foster the religious phenomenon were eliminated, this does not mean that all the social causes have disappeared. The economic, social-political and cultural changes, the abolition of the social-material basis that generates social inequities do not automatically result in the disappearance of religious ideas, of the religious feeling. The building of the new society is an extremely complex process in whose context we need to overcome many difficulties, lags, to resolve many contradictions, to overcome many obstacles. The ignoring, by some people, of the possibilities for resolving the contradictions, for removing the shortcomings can foment the religious states of mind. Moreover, following some repeated failures in life, when confronted with material difficulties, relating to integration and adjustment some people, including youngsters, try to seek compensation in religion. Man's incapacity, under certain conditions, to satisfy by real means his material and spiritual needs pushes some toward sham solutions, looking for support in a religious community. Hence, for the purpose of proselytism, the sects take advantage of mishaps in people's lives, the bureaucratic, unconcerned behavior of some bodies or persons entrusted with social duties.

2. In the Romanian language the notion of religious cult is used with the meaning of religion, denomination or with the meaning of the totality of rituals of a religion. Hence if by cult we mean religion, the religious faith, it goes without saying that the sects also are religious denominations. Moreover, in the Constitution of the Socialist Republic of Romania and in other laws of this country when there is a reference to religious denominations the reference also includes the religions that have the character of sect, hence those religious communities that developed as a result of breaking away from another traditional religious grouping.

An atheistic, scientifically substantiated propaganda must take account of the characteristics of the various religious denominations and especially of their evolution in this stage.

In terms of the essential features that define religion, the sects do not differ from the other cults. Ideologically every cult represents a distorted, false and illusory concept of the world, man and society, advocating in one or another form faith in supernatural forces. The antiscientific, dogmatic, social-retrograde, antihumanistic functions are common to all cults -- hence also to the sects. Speaking of sects, we may state that by their dogmatism and practices they enhance the negative traits of religion: bigotry, fanaticism, isolation from social life, a refractory attitude to culture and civilization, intolerance in relation to other creeds or life concepts. The sects proclaim as "untrue," "corrupt," "heretical" the religion from which they derive, with each of them claiming to be the carrier of the genuine faith. The so-called "protest" against traditional religious precepts only means replacing one religious creed by another in which the religious concept takes on exacerbated, virulent forms. Moreover, we must take into consideration the fact that the traits, the characteristics of sects are not common in an absolute way, with each of them having its own specific feature and individuality. These differences are even more evident in neoprotestant cults that operate legally in our country(the Baptist, Pentecostal, 7-day Adventist, Evangelic denominations) and the anrchical, illegal groupings that have a markedly antisocial character, are hostile to the socialist system, prohibit the participation of their believers in civic projects, in political-educational and cultural-artistic events.

3. In the psychological area there is a unilateralization, a nonutilization of the personality of the believer, a hampering of the multilateral and harmonious development of the human individuality, the assertion of man in the fullness of his physical and spiritual aptitudes. Moreover, psychosociological studies conducted in Romania and other countries have indicated that religious dogmatism prevents the development of creativity, fosters mistrust and doubt in the power of science. In the social relations the members of sects tend toward isolation and are not enough involved in social life. The persistence of mystical, retrograde concepts in the thinking of some people prevents their full assertion in the life of society, is in contradiction with the new nature of socialist relations, with the humanistic essence of our system, with the scientific spirit of our times.

Quite alien to the socialist way of life are the fanatical, antihuman practices (rejection of medical means in curing diseases, incredibly cruel mistreatment of children and adolescents for the purpose of driving out the devil, antistate leeds, and so on) promoted by illegal religious sects.

4. Each headway in the field of culture and civilization has meant a heavy blow to religion. The fundamental opposition between scientific knowledge and religious belief also involves sectarian ideology. In order to survive, various denominations have attempted to subordinate culture to religious dogmas or, at present, to conciliate science with religion along the line of so-called "modernization." The sects elected the path of ignorance, minimalization, and some reached a refractory attitude of contempt and rejection of all that means science, culture because of absolutization of the literal meaning of the Bible. Such an attitude is motivated by the fact that the Bible contains all that a believer needs to know, without the need for culture, science. Science is considered as true only to the degree that it does not contradict the Bible.

Proceeding from some biblical texts, ignoring the modern scientific achievements, the sects propagate apocalyptic concepts on the close end of the world and judgment day. Such ideas generate among the members of the sect a climate of depression, demoralization, impotence in face of the inevitable destiny. Worthy of note is the fact that such predictions about the end of the world are noticed on the eve of natural cosmic events, which moreover are scientifically predictable and explainable (comets, eclipses, and so on) or during times of crisis experienced by mankind in one or another period.

Life has confirmed the absurdity of biblical predictions, the world continues to exist, and the earth, even though it has slowed down its motion around the sun by one fraction of a second, nevertheless is turning.

5. The mechanism of the religion's influencing the individual's mind is extremely complex. Petre Datculescu, in an interesting psychosocial survey conducted among young people, points out that religiosity is an instrumental-functional attitude generated in the process of interaction between subjective internal conditions and objective external conditions, consisting of affective and behavioral cognitive relations unified by belief in the existence of the supernatural and orientated toward illusory compensation, by means of a religious system of reference, of some real or assumed inadequacies and disharmonies on the subjective plane and in the social life of the individual.

It follows from this that the formation of religious awareness is not only the outcome of ignorance and lack of knowledge. Consequently, to the religious concept we must oppose not only science but also all our outlook on the world and society. The activity of materialistic-scientific education must be conceived multilaterally, the transmission of scientific knowledge must be followed by materialistic philosophical conclusions. Only in this way atheistic propaganda will transmit not only knowledge, but will also form beliefs, attitudes, ideals. The advances of modern science, the spectacular leaps in human knowledge cannot be fully understood if one leaves out the Marxist philosophical outlook, the laws of materialistic dialectics; specialized knowledge is not sufficient in itself and does not spontaneously lead to a scientific outlook of the world. It must be sown on the fertile field of the dialectical and historical materialist outlook of the world and society.

The adherence of some young people to religious activity is also explained by the refined means used by sects. The propagation of relations characterized by solidarity and mutual assistance, material aid among the members of a denomination, cultural and artistic events (songs, choirs, musical bands, trips, classes for learning how to play musical instruments) are aimed at drawing young people into sects, especially when in the microcollective to which these people belong the material and spiritual needs of the young people are neglected.

6. The major objectives of the activity of atheistic education must focus on reinforcing the scientific, dialectical materialistic concept of the world and life, the upgrading of the overall level of knowledge, the systematic cultivation of philosophical, social and human values central to our society, combating of retrograde, mystical-religious manifestations.

For the elimination of religious concepts and prejudices it is necessary to conduct a constant, systematic work, by using the method of scientific persuasion and argumentation. Practice has proved that one cannot fight against religious ideology with general phrases. Young people must be persuaded with philosophical, scientific and practical arguments. This, on the one hand. On the other hand, more attention must be paid to human relations in the work and study collectives, to the creation of a communist climate of work and creation, of genuine human solidarity. The principles of socialist ethics and equity must be everyday occurrences. Receptivity in terms of the needs of young people must be a concern of all managerial and decision-making factors. The student collectives, the Union of Communist Youth organizations have all the conditions for creating this climate in which young people would feel the comradely support of their colleagues for weal or woe. Socialist humanism involves the achievement of personal happiness in the context of the happiness of all the people. The spirit of humanism, a trait characteristic of the ethics of our people, is imperative as a prevailing feature of the relations among young people.

BRIEFS

CEAUSESCU RECEIVES U.S. BUSINESSMEN--Bucharest, 14 Dec (AGERPRES)--President Nicolae Ceausescu received on December 14 Milton Rosenthal, president of the administration board of the "Enghelhard Minerals and Chemicals", chairman for the U.S. of the Romanian-American Economic Council, and Charles Frank, vice president of the administration board of the "Salomon Brothers" of the U.S., now paying a visit to Romania. Possibilities for developing the Romanian-American economic exchanges and cooperation were discussed. Some aspects of the world economic situation as well as of the international political life were also approached. It was assessed that the current interest rates in the international financial market were an obstacle in expanding economic exchanges and cooperation, and that measures were required for interest rates to be lowered to a rational level. Likewise, the necessity was stressed that action should be taken for halting the arms race, for the establishment of a climate of peace, understanding and collaboration among nations. The interview passed in a cordial atmosphere. [Text] [AU142025 Bucharest AGERPRES in English 2000 GMT 14 Dec 81]

NEW SLOVENIAN CULTURAL REVIEW EXPECTED SOON

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 19 Nov 81 p 9

/Article by Vlado Zagorac: "The Journal, at Last"/

/Text/ A recent decision by the publishing council of the Cankarjeva Publishing House in Ljubljana to approve an act establishing a new journal, the origination of which was proposed a year and a half ago by a group of sixty Slovenian cultural workers, has in effect provided the essential basis for the public appearance of the new journal.

The uncertainty and impatience of the originators, which has lasted for several months and has frequently developed into nervousness, has thus been brought to an end. In the near future, the public can expect to see in kiosks and on the shelves of bookdealers the title page of the new journal, the name of which is not yet known, although it is known that it will have the format and size of the existing journal SODOBNIK.

In addition to this, the precisely defined concept behind this literary and critical innovation is also well known. Its authors will deal with cultural, cultural-artistic, literary and critical issues, but under no conditions with philosophical or sociological issues, as they themselves desired, and, on several occasions following the agreement that was reached, tried to secure permission to do.

A year and a half of waiting for the birth of a new literary and critical journal is really not a short period. If one, however, takes into account the fact that this started with a letter, that was vague and full of contradictions, from the sixty signatories to Mitja Ribicic, who in their opinion could approve the initiation of such a publication himself--then this period takes on another dimension. This was the sometimes stubborn insistence on their own position, on the basis of which it was demanded that the journal be for philosophical and sociological (social) issues, with a "bicameral" form of self-management of the journal, in which one house would be composed of the interested parties, and the other would be formed under the publishing council.

Time "wasted" in this way on creating a public tribunal, which cannot reflect the interests of the originators alone but rather the interests of the broader social community, as well as those for whom the journal is intended, cannot, however, be considered lost time.

Unfortunately, Dimitrij Rupel could not hold out, and on his own initiative, in the middle of October, sent an open letter to Tone Pavcek: it was published several days ago. He is in effect trying to deal with all of the nonsympathizers, obstructionists, and authorities who are "deliberately delaying or even questioning again the possibility of initiating the new journal." Tone Pavcek has thus found himself playing a triple role: as the editor of the Cankareva Publishing House, as the president of the Society of Slovenian Writers (sixty members of which were among the originators), and as a writer who is a colleague of the originators (for all of this he has to bear the brunt of the public accusations enumerated by Dimitrij Rupel).

One is left with the impression that Dimitrij Rupel has turned his previous dissatisfaction with the fact that the journal has not yet appeared against everything and everyone.

CONTROVERSY BETWEEN SERBIAN, MACEDONIAN ORTHODOX CHURCHES OUTLINED

Scopje NOVA MAKEDONIJA in Macedonian 10 Oct 81 SABOTA Supplement p 5

[Article by Pande Kolemishevski: "Wall of Separation"]

> [Text] What are the stipulations for recognizing the autocephalic nature of the Macedonian Orthodox Church by the Serbian Orthodox Church? Is this unresolved question of a strictly clerical nature or does it have broader political aspects?

It is safe to assume that those who have followed more closely the development of relations between church and state and between churches themselves in Yugoslavia, particularly the area of relations between the Macedonian and Serbian Orthodox Churches, have not ignored two aspects of this question. Specifically, this applies to the announcement by the session of the Presidency of the Socialist Republic of Serbia which, among others, discusses relations between the two churches, and, secondly, the interview granted by Angelarij, archbishop of Okhrid and Macedonia, head of the Macedonian Orthodox Church, to the Tanjug news agency, which describes and analyzes the essence of the "misunderstandings" briefly and quite openly.

Let us repeat that the communication stresses that the "quicker settlement of relations between the Serbian Orthodox Church and the Macedonian Orthodox Church and the recognition of the autonomy of the Macedonian Orthodox Church would be of great importance in the further successful development of relations and cooperation between church and state."

In an effort to learn more details on the view of the presidency of the Socialist Republic of Serbia, we had two discussions of several hours each on this matter in Belgrade with Zhivomir Stankovik, chairman of the Republic Commission on Relations with Religious Communities in the Socialist Republic of Serbia, who gave our newspaper an official statement. The statement, which also answers most of the questions, is printed here in its entirety.

Position of the Socialist Republic of Serbia

The clear conclusion formulated by the presidency of the Socialist Republic of Serbia on the question of the recognition of the Macedonian Orthodox Church on the part of the Serbian Orthodox Church accurately expressed the view of the state organs and the public of the Socialist Republic of Serbia on the matter. The autonomy of the Macedonian Orthodox Church is an unquestionable fact. This is confirmed also by our good relations and cooperation with the Macedonian Orthodox Church. Let me cite as an illustration of these relations my presence at the installation of the new head of the Macedonian Orthodox Church Angelarij, archbishop of Okhrid and Macedonia, at which I presented the congratulations of the Commission on Relations with Religious Communities of the Executive Council of the Assembly of the Socialist Republic of Serbia, with wishes for very successful work. My speech contained our familiar views regarding the autonomy of the Macedonian Orthodox Church.

The unresolved problems between the two churches have caused widespread displeasure not only in the Macedonian Orthodox Church but also beyond it. Let us point out that this matter is of political significance as well and that its faster resolution is in the interest of the entire Yugoslav community, the strengthening of fraternity and unity among our peoples and nationalities and our community.

The pertinent authorities in the Socialist Republic of Serbia have insisted that the problem be resolved in the past as well. In presenting our viewpoint, we have always stressed that the positive solution of the problem of the recognition of the Macedonian Orthodox Church is in the interest of the entire country. As a result of our united insistence, talks were held between members of the church commissions of the Serbian and Macedonian Orthodox Churches in Prokhor Pchinski and Kalishta in 1978 and 1979 at which these problems were discussed. However, these meetings did not fulfill the hope that the process of normalizing relations between the two churches would be speeded up.

Bearing in mind that the problem of the autocephalic nature of the Macedonian Orthodox Church is important to our entire public, we have always insisted that this matter must be resolved on a national level. A meeting of chairmen of republic and area commissions and of the Commission on Relations with Religious Communities of the Union Excecutive Council was held in Topola at the beginning of last year, at which suggestions and conclusions were adopted, which stipulated that in addition to the authorities of the Socialist Republic of Serbia and Socialist Republic of Macedonia, the authorities of the other republics and areas and of the federation should become involved in the resolution of this problem.

It is a fact that the Serbian Orthodox Church and the Macedonian Orthodox Church can resolve this problem between themselves. However, we must point out that this matter will have not only domestic-political but international consequences, presenting an opportunity for a variety of political intrigues and speculations. For this reason as well, the quick settlement of relations and the recognition of the Macedonian Orthodox Church is of particular importance. All of this indicates that this matter must be resolved strictly on domestic grounds and that no other side factors should become involved.

In the future as well the authorities in the Socialist Republic of Serbia will continue to work on the successful solution of this problem on the basis of the common public interest on the basis of proper findings and public positions.

However, responsibility for settling these relations and ensuring the final solution of the matter falls on the Serbian and Macedonian Orthodox Churches. It is the responsibility of the Serbian Orthodox Church to take the public interest into consideration and to recognize the Macedonian Orthodox Church on the basis of its position and role in this matter.

In my view, this would be facilitated by the fact that in the discussions of this matter, the representatives of the Serbian Orthodox Church have shown their respect for our statutory decisions regarding the national question and have not questioned the national individuality of the Macedonian people and their equal status among the other nations and nationalities in Yugoslavia, concluded Zhivomir Stankovik.

We feel free to quote a few statements made by our interlocutor without his preliminary agreement, made at the meeting of the presidency, a statement which was not classified "for internal use only," "confidential" or "strictly confidential." "Bearing in mind the political significance of the matter," he states, "we shall continue to do everything possible for the resolution of the problem by pointing out in our direct contacts with the Serbian Orthodox Church the broad political significance of the recognition of the autocephalic status of the Macedonian Orthodox Church and the negative consequences which appear and may worsen as a result of the attitude of the Serbian toward the Macedonian Orthodox Church."

Although not in the context of this problem, let us cite another excerpt from Stankovik's statement: "In Serbia," he said, "acting on the basis of great-Serbian nationalism among the Serbian Orthodox Church would be most damaging and most dangerous to us. This is especially noted among a rather compact group of conservative theologians whose destructive activities are influencing the leadership of the Serbian Orthodox Church in following a course of worsening relations with the public."

Position of the Churches

The Serbian Orthodox Church considers the recognition of the Macedonian Orthodox Church exclusively from its own viewpoint and interests. Its representatives emphasize that the question of granting autocephalic status to the Macedonian Orthodox Church will be considered at the next ecumenical council.

Whereas those unfamiliar with church relations may view this as the possibility of recognizing the church, according to the Macedonian Orthodox Church this has not occurred in the case of most orthodox churches and of the Serbian Orthodox Church itself, for the ecumenical council did not grant its autocephalic status which it acquired from the patriarch in Constantinople, under whose jurisdiction it was. Macedonian Orthodox Church circles interpret the insistence that the question be resolved at the ecumenical council as a categorical refusal to grant autonomy. The explanation is quite simple: an ecumenical council is held once every 1,000 years if at all.

It is a known fact that Patriarch German, head of the Serbian Orthodox Church, has repeatedly answered accusations that the Serbian Orthodox Church is not recognizing the Macedonian Orthodox Church for nationalistic reasons by stating that the Serbian Orthodox Church recognizes the existence of a Macedonian nation and respects the statutory decisions on the national question. The Macedonian church and others consider this statement as a mere formal declaration, for the very nonrecognition of the church clearly conflicts with such statements and with the basic views of the Serbian Orthodox Church according to which orthodox churches are national churches.

Angelarij, Archbishop of Okhrid and Macedonia, pointed out in the Tanjug interview that the essence of the "misunderstanding" is found in the national character of the church. "As an individual nation," he said, "the Macedonian people have all the canonical and historical rights of an autocephalic church. The Serbian Orthodox Church is the autocephalic church of the Serbian people, and as such, there are no canons, church rules and state norms or stipulations in the Yugoslav constitution according to which it is also the church of the Macedonian people who are not a national minority within Yugoslavia but a nation with its national state."

Position of the Socialist Republic of Macedonia

In discussing this topic, Dr Gorgi Tsatsa, chairman of the Socialist Republic of Macedonia Republic Commission on Relations with Religious Communities, stated that the respective agencies in our republic are categorical in their position to the effect that the question of the autocephalic nature of the Macedonian Orthodox Church can be resolved within Yugoslavia, thus asserting in this matter as well the unity among Yugoslav nations and nationalities and cut short hostile speculations in Yugoslavia and abroad on unsettled problems between the two churches. The Macedonian authorities are also confident that this question will be resolved, as was the case with the national problem in Yugoslavia, in its entirety, on the basis of national autonomy and fraternity and unity among nations. Hence the summoning of an ecumenical council is totally unacceptable to us, Gorgi Tsatsa stated.

Reasons for the Dispute

The clash between the Serbian and the Macedonian Orthodox Churches has deeper roots and a longer history. A very long explanation would be required if we were to cover all aspects of this extremely complex matter. Let us only point out briefly that the foundations of the Macedonian Orthodox Church were laid as early as the 10th century. In May 1767, by decree of the Turkish Sultan Mustafa III, the Okhrid archbishopric, which had been active for 800 years, was illegally abolished. Since then, the Macedonian church has been under several jurisdictions. The root of the argument between the two churches dates from 1919-1920, when the Macedonian church fell under Serbian jurisdiction. Macedonia raised the question of an autonomous church as early as World War II, in 1943, and particularly immediately after the liberation, in 1945.

The decision to restore the old Okhrid archbishopric, to be known as the Macedonian Orthodox Church, was passed at the Second Macedonian Church-People's Council which was held from 4-6 October 1958. The decision and, therefore, the autonomy of the Macedonian Orthodox Church was accepted at the May-June 1959 session of the Serbian Orthodox Church Council. The council documents stipulate that Macedonia has its own orthodox church. A resolution exists stipulating that the bylaws of the Serbian Orthodox Church will no longer apply to the parishes and prelates (territories and clergy) in the Macedonian People's Republic. The Macedonian Orthodox Church retained the status of sister church of the Serbian Orthodox Church by acknowledging Patriarch German as its official head but without granting him any greater power. Patriarch German confirmed the autonomy of the Macedonian Orthodox Church repeatedly by celebrating mass in Skopje in 1959 and in Okhrid in 1962.

The real "war" began before 1967 but developed particularly after that, when in July of that year the Macedonian Orthodox Church passed a resolution on the renovation of the autocephalic nature of the Okhrid archbishopric and when the now-deceased Dositej was crowned head of the Macedonian Orthodox Church and archbishop of Okhrid and Macedonia. It was as of that point that the Serbian Orthodox Church undertook to do everything possible to negate that which it had already actually recognized. It was since that time that most frequently relations between the two churches have been rated as "typically cold and extremely tense."

A Historical Fact

The Macedonian Orthodox Church and Macedonian state and political organs have made repeated attempts to resolve this question but have been repeatedly rebuffed by the Serbian Orthodox Church although no canonical or other church obstacles to the recognition of the autocephalic status exist. If the existence of the Macedonian Orthodox Church is a historical fact and if it has been recognized by all other churches, religious communities in Yugoslavia and the Yugoslav Orthodox clergy, with whom it has cooperated well and it maintains good relations, the Serbian Orthodox Church seems to be ignoring the changes which have taken place in the past and disregarding the will of the Serbian people who today live in a state of unbreakable fraternal union with the Macedonian people and with the other nations and nationalities in Yugoslavia.

Hence the question: Is it that the Serbian Orthodox Church does not have the Christian and the moral obligation to contribute to the further political stabilization of Yugoslavia through the recognition of the autonomy of the Macedonian Orthodox Church, which would put an end to all political speculations at home and abroad concerning international relations within the country? This is expected both by the Macedonian Orthodox Church and the Macedonian and Serbian peoples. They expect of the Serbian Orthodox Church to honor all the other recognitions, particularly in the light of the statement made by its own representatives on having good relations with the state. Unquestionably, it takes two to have good relations.

Obviously, that is how the Serbian Orthodox Church will prove its Christian love for and the desire for a peaceful life among the people, to which it is bound by the church canons, thus practically confirming the familiar old thesis that the church is a "community for love, forgiveness and justice."

'SPRAWY MIEDZYNARODOWE' REVIEWS BOOK ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Warsaw SPRAWY MIEDZYNARODOWE in Polish No 5, May 81 p 166

[Review by A.Z. of book "Teoria Polityki i Stosunkow Miedzynarodowych" [The Theory of Politics and International Relations] published by the Central Methodological Institute for Political Science Studies, Warsaw, 1979, 297 pages]

[Text] This work comprises 11 studies on the theory of politics and international relations. One article, by W. Szczepanski, attempts to present the general methodological relations and assumptions which exist between the theory of politics and the theory of international relations. Szczepanski proposes the thesis that in Marxist studies on politics two approaches can be distinguished: the procedural examination of political experience; and the behavioral or subjective-behavioral formulation. In another study by Szczepanski, one can find a reconstruction of the basic political goals of de Gaulle concerning the French vision of European development. W. Kostecki presents the main research directions in the Polish study of international relations in the 1970's. He shows the development of the study of international relations as a social process which permits a gradual passage from ignorance, everyday knowledge and a superficial view of political phenomena occurring in the international experience to genuine knowledge based on coherent canons of scientific cognition. E. Palyga defines three concepts which are used--most often interchangeably--in the study of international relations: foreign policy, international policy and external policy.

ENVOY IN BANGKOK DENIES WALESA ARREST

BK160915 Hong Kong AFP in English 0856 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] Bangkok, 16 Dec (AFP)--Polish Ambassador to Thailand Jan Majewski today categorically denied reports that Lech Walesa, leader of the Polish Independent Trade Union Movement Solidarity, was under house arrest. Mr Walesa is in Warsaw "having talks with authorities," the ambassador told a news briefing here.

The situation in Poland, he maintained, is "under control." "Order is being slowly restored" and the Military Council that came into power after a "state of war" was declared would cease to function when normalcy is regained. The state of emergency, called Sunday, was not directed against Solidarity, he said. The move was intended to quash "groups," inside Solidarity and elsewhere, that had caused "disorder," he added.

The suspension of trade union activities was "only a temporary measure," he said. "Democracy and freedom cannot be introduced through disorder and lawlessness," he added.

The ambassador at the same time stressed "we want to solve the problem by ourselves." He said the Soviet Union had sent food aid and ducked questions on any other Soviet role.

The ambassador maintained that no one had been put under arrest. An unknown number had been "interned" and strict orders had been issued to "avoid any use of violence," he added.

Meanwhile, the ambassador announced that Polish Deputy Foreign Minister Tadeusz Olechowski had postponed a scheduled visit to Thailand as well as a trip to Vientiane. In an interview with AFP earlier today, the envoy had (?been) unclear about the deputy minister's plans for Vientiane where he was to attend a 2-day gathering, due to begin today, of deputy foreign ministers of Indochinese states and their Soviet-backed allies. Mr Olechowski was to fly in here Friday, after the Vientiane meeting, to return a visit to Warsaw late last year by Thailand's Deputy Foreign Minister Arun Phanphong.

In a related development, Thai trade unions have announced plans to stage a demonstration outside the Polish Embassy here tomorrow.

CRITICISM OF COMMEMORATION OF U.S.-SERBIAN TREATY REBUTTED

Belgrade POLITIKA in Serbo-Croatian 14 Nov 81 p 10

[Article by Radivoj Cveticanin: "Far From the Piedmont"]

[Text] Our public is not accustomed to the type of article on Yugoslavia's foreign policy which speaks about it in critical terms. To put it simply, they are rare, if they exist at all. That is why every such piece of writing, even though it may be concerned with the secondary details of that policy, arouses particular attention when it appears. With respect to certain of its elements the comment by Jako Stular entitled "The Other Side of the Coin of a Centennial," published in the Ljubljana newspaper DELO the Saturday before last, falls in that category. It will certainly be interesting to examine it.

Stular was motivated to write the comment "The Other Side of the Coin ...," it seems to us, by the following TANJUG news item on 26 October: "A meeting of American and Yugoslav historians opened today in Belgrade in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of establishment of diplomatic relations between the SFRY and the United States." Stular extracted from the TANJUG item, which obviously was somewhat longer, only another few lines to the effect that "Charles Jelavich's paper on American views of Serbia in the 1870's and 1880's was particularly interesting...."

What the commentator in DELO wanted to emphasize was that he had listened to what the "Voice of America" had had to say about the same event--that is, the 100th anniversary of establishment of diplomatic relations between what at that time was Serbia and the United States. In developing the entire matter he has as a rule given preference to the "Voice of America" over the meeting of historians--preference, that is, in having understood the event correctly.

Nowhere does Stular mention that he had undertaken anything at all detailed in connection with the meeting of historians: neither that he had attended the meeting, nor that he had informed himself about the papers delivered at it. But this did not stand in his way from blowing up the importance of the centennial to unnatural proportions and from deriving certain far-reaching conclusions concerning the meeting. For example: that relations had existed between the United States and the people of Yugoslavia before the Serbia-American agreement--which supposedly had been well noted by the "Voice of America," but had not been seen by the historians at the round table in Belgrade. What is more,

35 years after World War II, as he puts it, they were trying to sing the melody of the "Staatstragender Nation," that is, of a nationality seeking statehood, on "Piedmontese strings." At the end of his article Stular referred to the historians as "historians" and emphasized once again that this was an attempt at "parading ... Piedmontism on the worn-out velvet of the Obrenovic monarchy."

There are other lessons in political history in and among the key conclusions: that the Serbia of that time, which signed the treaty with America, was Obrenovic Serbia and that its "sole program" was Garasanin's "Nacertanije" [Conception], with its project of creating Great Serbia, and that Garasanin's conception was destroyed at Jajce in 1943 (!), and further, that in the last century, when the treaty was signed between Serbia and America, most of what is today Yugoslavia was under another monarchy, which also had regularized relations with the United States (from which it perhaps should follow that we could also celebrate establishment of relations between Austro-Hungary and the United States), and more along that line.

The round table was held in Belgrade 26 and 27 October and was sponsored by the Institute for Contemporary History. Its organizers were interested in emphasizing that this round table was to some extent a continuation of the cooperation between American and Yugoslav historians which commenced in a similar form a few years ago at Plitvice when scholars from the two countries discussed American-Yugoslav relations in the National Liberation Struggle. D. Zivojinovic spoke about the independence of Serbia in the policy of the United States in the 1878-1881 period, Charles Jelavich spoke on the topic already mentioned, M. Bulajic spoke on establishment of diplomatic relations between the Kingdom of Serbia and the United States, Barbara Jelavich on the implications of Balkan movements for national liberation, I. Cizmic on Yugoslav emigres in the United States at the end of the last century, and John Lampe about Belgrade and Washington in the light of modernization of cities. The discussion offered two interesting contributions on volunteers in Serbia's war with Turkey in 1878 and on economic relations between Serbia and the United States before World War I.

It is evident even from this that this round table was not very wide ranging, which is perhaps in line with the organizers' ambition that the historians confine themselves to treatment of the event which occurred in 1881. D. Zivojinovic made the assertion that "establishment of Serbian-American relations represents an episode in Serbia's struggle for political independence." Nothing more than that; it probably would not have been possible to say less.

There was, then, no singing on Piedmontese strings concerning a nationality seeking statehood.

It seems, however, that Stular was not so much bothered by the historians, not even as "historians" (the devil take them!), but by certain others and something else. Stated in the terms of the adage: Stular was scolding his daughter-in-law, but his words were meant for his daughter.

The idea emerged more or less clearly that the treaty between Serbia and the United States is looked upon as a "Serbian" matter and not a "Yugoslav" matter by any means. Following that line, it is then clear why the illusion of former times about "Serbia as a Piedmont" and about the Serbian nation as a people seeking statehood, which existed at one time and has today been forgotten, was revived. Stular himself was to say this (and we will join him in that): this group of ideas about Serbia as a pillar of Yugoslavia has long and definitively belonged to the arsenal of the absolute past. Nor does the issue lie in agreement on that point; the issue is whether retrograde ideas have emerged concerning celebration of the 100th anniversary of diplomatic relations between Serbia and the United States, and that here and now.

Dr Milan Bulajic is a man who holds a competent position in the Secretariat for Foreign Affairs. He says: "Intergovernmental relations ... on the basis of continuity of international obligations, were carried over from the Kingdom of Serbia to the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, from the Kingdom of Yugoslavia to the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia."

Nor is it difficult to discover from reliable sources that the entire task of celebrating the 100th anniversary of diplomatic relations between Yugoslavia and the United States traveled from the Secretariat for Foreign Affairs, the Federal Executive Council and the SAWPY to the Federal Bureau for International Cultural Cooperation, that is, through governmental and political organs and institutions at the federal level. It is obvious that this matter was not illegal in the least.

Far be it for us to wish to put a gag on Stular; we fear only that the facts we have presented themselves do that ineluctably. We understand that it is easier to strike a blow at a meeting of historians than any of the institutions mentioned. Easier it is, but not more gracious.

KOSOVO EX-LEADERS ALLEGED TO HAVE COVERED UP SCANDALS

Belgrade DUGA in Serbo-Croatian No 198, 26 Sep 81 pp 20-21

[Article by Viktor Cikes: "Punishment for Dedication"]

[Text] Some members of the provincial leadership in Kosovo have covered up many incidents for years. One of them was malversation, which was discovered by market inspectors in the housing enterprise in Pristina and because of their work they have experienced many difficulties.

What happened in 1975 and 1976 when Dzevat Berisa, Velibor Adamovic and Dimitrije Ljiljak, having examined the records of a Pristina housing enterprise, found that it had acquired a profit of 14,614,722.57 dinars in an unlawful manner? Here, briefly, are the stories, which can be confirmed by numerous documents.

In Pristina, as well as everywhere in Yugoslavia, within the scope of normal supervision and on the basis of instructions from the Federal and Provincial Inspectorate, at that time prices were being controlled in several work organizations. The market inspectors of the Pristina Federal Committee then examined the records of the housing enterprise mentioned above.

Here is what Velibor Adamovic says about the work he was doing at that time:

"Disregarding the threats that we would be released from our duties, the arrogant behavior of representatives of the enterprise, and the continual resistance encountered in the obtaining of records, we concluded our work after 4 months and established beyond a doubt that the collective had realized a difference in value of 14,614,722.57 dinars by unlawful actions during the period of 1972 to 1975."

Along with an extensive explanation of all of the findings, the decision was made to take away the unlawful profits, and the inspectors believed that with this action their part of the job was finished. The various means of public communication reported the results of their work, along with the blessings of the president of the Executive Council of the Pristina Federal Committee.

"Witch-hunting"

Immediately after the appearance of the information concerning the findings of of the inspectors, the Executive Council of the Pristina Federal Committee held a meeting in which they protested against giving this information to the public. On this occasion the deputy of the secretary of the Municipal Committee appraised the work of the inspectors as being destructive and contrary to the judgments of the Municipal Committee. Desiring to protect the inspectors from this unexpected attack, the Federal Market Inspectorate interceded in writing on their behalf to the president of the Executive Council of the province, the president of the Pristina Federal Committee, and the president of the Executive Council of the Pristina Federal Committee, evaluating the work of the inspectors in the housing enterprise as very professional, based on the law and in the spirit of the 10th meeting of the Central Committee of the LCY.

"However," continues Velibor Adamovic, "it did not stop some people from the Municipal Committee and the Pristina Federal Committee from forming a commission with the task of refuting our findings in the housing enterprise from a professional point of view. This commission worked in secret, and we knew nothing of its existence or its activities. This commission, as we were to find out later, was discontinued because of the conviction of its members that it was not competent to evaluate our expertise."

In the meantime, the housing enterprise submitted a complaint for a decision concerning the return of the unlawfully acquired profits. The Provincial Secretariat for Economic Matters, as a secondary organ, exempted the collective from all findings of the market inspector's report, except for the part in which the enterprise was obliged to return 119,509.60 dinars for charging and obtaining a higher rental fee for office space. On this occasion the decision concerning the obligatory return of the rental fee for the office space to the level prescribed in November 1971 was confirmed. The director of the housing enterprise at that time was Maksim Krdzic, and his deputy was Zuhra Bakali, wife of Mahmut Bakali.

Dissatisfied with this decision, the Secretariat for Inspection Affairs of the Pristina Federal Committee appealed in writing to the president of the Executive Council, the president of the Presidency and the president of the Parliament of the Socialist Autonomous Province of Kosovo. In the letter to these forums, he called attention to the decision of the Provincial Secretariat for Economic Matters and sought a response to the question of who the person was who had processed the secondary decision. However, there was no response. Instead, the Municipal Committee formed a commission which had the assignment of determining the political position and the motives for the inspection of the housing enterprise of the market inspectors Dzevat Berisa, Velibor Adamovic, and Dimitrije Ljiljak, as well as of the secretary of the Secretariat for Inspection Affairs of the Pristina Federal Committee Mentor Jakupi.

The commission was composed of the deputy of the president of the Municipal Committee of the League of Communists, Jusuf Zejnulahu, the president of the Executive Council of the Pristina Federal Committee, Bora Vasic, the president of the Supreme Court of the Socialist Autonomous Province of Kosovo, Riza Fazlija, and the editor of Radio-Pristina, Saban Hiseni. The last person mentioned was later in several responsible positions, and after the disagreeable events of March of that year in Kosovo, the name of Saban Hiseni was linked with the removal of the slogan "Our Tito, yesterday, today, and tomorrow." Of course, Hiseni's political orientation is clear today, but when he, as a member of the commission, evaluated the moral character of the inspectors, it was known that by verdict of the Military Court in Skopje he had been sentenced to 3 months imprisonment for evading his military obligation. Remembering the hearing before this commission, Velibor Adamovic says:

"I can't present the manner in which the hearing was conducted in detail, but I can tell you that what was presented was quite false and was directed at fabricating completely different motives for our work in the housing project."

The commission concluded that the inspectors had worked outside of their authority, creating chaos and discord, discrediting the work of the League of Communists and individual officials. This information was received by the Municipal Committee, and on 30 March 1976 the inspectors were expelled from the League of Communists, and information about all of this was provided to the public news media.

Without the Proper Responses

While the commission was establishing the political orientation of the inspectors, the Supreme Court of Kosovo got to the complaint filed by the Secretariat for Inspection Affairs concerning the secondary decision. In a closed session on 7 May 1976, the Court rejected the complaint and instructed that the matter be decided in the District Economic Court. The president of the Supreme Court of the Province was also on the commission which discredited the work of the inspectors!

After they were expelled from the League of Communists and were relieved of their duties, Dzevat Berisa, Velibor Adamovic, Dimitrije Ljiljak, and Mentor Jakupi appealed to Comrade Dolanc, presenting all the details of the case.

"It was indeed quite a trying matter," continues Velibor Adamovic. "In Pristina I lived in an apartment whose owner was the shock-absorber factory, where I had worked at one time. As luck would have it, after the events at the housing enterprise Maksim Krdiz was transferred to a new position, right in the shock-absorber factory. While I was staying in Belgrade, he broke into my apartment with several uniformed persons and threw out all my belongings. I tried to find out by whose order this had been done. In the Ministry for Internal Affairs I was told that the police did not take part in forced evictions. Then I found out that verbal permission for this action had been given by the judge of the Municipal Court in Pristina Spasoje Komatina. Allegedly he had heard that I had moved out and that some other person had moved into the apartment by force, so he had approved a request to remove the belongings of the illegal tenant. In this type of situation, where our existence was threatened from all sides, we had to appeal to Comrade Dolanc. When they found out about this letter, comrades from the Presidency of the Political Committee of the League of Communists called us in for a talk. On this occasion there was no reprimand directed at our work, except for one to our former secretary which referred to the manner of informing the public about the work of market inspectors. We had some talks with the Commission for Statutory Questions of the Municipal Committee of the League of Communists of Pristina, and at that time we were told that there was no proof which would endanger our political standing. At the end, the president of this commission told us that he would annul the decision concerning our expulsion from the party. Unfortunately, nothing came of this.

Having realized that it was futile to seek confirmation of the truth on the provincial level, the inspectors turned to the president of the Republic on 18 January 1977. The Presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia-Commission for Petitions and Complaints, at a meeting on 28 October 1977, took the position that the entire dossier of the case be sent to the Presidency of the Socialist Autonomous Province of Kosovo, with the request that it examine the case, and that the inspectors be informed about the position adopted. The case has not been considered to this time from the point of view of the authorized commission. The inspectors, however, have been freed from guilt, and the new Statutory Commission of the Municipal Committee of the League of Communists in Pristina has returned them to membership in the League of Communists.

Unfortunately, there is not an appropriate end to this entire story, because it still remains unclear as to whether or not the inspectors were mistaken in their examination of the books of the housing enterprise. If they were not, what happened to those 14,614,722.57 dinars?

PRISTINA OPSTINA LEAGUE OF COMMUNISTS FORMS NINE CENTERS, DECIDES ON ELECTIONS

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 25 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by M. Antic]

[Text] Elections are not merely a statutory obligation.

A resolution has been approved on the formation of nine regional centers for organization for the LCY opstina organization. The opstina elective conference will have 263 delegates, who will elect an opstina committee of 55 members that will constitute the highest LCY agency in the opstina.

Pristina, 24 November. Delegates of the Pristina LCY opstina conference today approved a resolution for ordering an election, which will be held from 1 December of this year to the end of March 1982. Another resolution was approved that spells out the nature, method of election and structure of the opstina elective conference, as well as the procedures to be followed in the election.

The Pristina LCY opstina conference also approved a resolution on the formation of regional organizational forms for the LCY in the opstina. According to this resolution, the Pristina LCY opstina organization will be formed into nine regional centers, with three in the city itself and six in the surrounding communities or villages of Kosovo Polje, Obilic, Devet Jugovica, Kacikolo, Novo Brdo and Gracanica.

It was essential that that form of organization of the Pristina LCY opstina organization be adopted, because the organization has 21,000 members organized into 567 basic LCY organizations, and it would be difficult for a single committee to maintain constant contact with the total membership and all the basic LCY organizations.

According to the resolution approved today, the Pristina LCY opstina election conference will include 263 delegates, each representing 80 communists. The opstina election conference will select an opstina committee of 55 members as the highest party agency in the opstina. From its membership the opstina committee will elect a 13-member presidium as the collective executive-political agency; its work in turn will be directed by a president, who will be elected for 1 year.

The tasks of the communists in the Pristina opstina during the election process were addressed by the executive secretary of the Pristina LCY opstina committee, Daut Jasanica. He noted that the point of departure for the overall activities of communists during the election process should be the LCY Central Committee Platform regarding Kosovo, and the Kosovo LCY Province Committee's Action Program, as well as the determination that the Pristina LCY has not been functioning at the level of the circumstances in which it finds itself. This fact was demonstrated last summer, when Albanian nationalists and irredentists organized counterrevolutionary demonstrations. Further causes of counterrevolutionary activities have been cited in the Platform and Action Program mentioned above.

In closing the session, Nebi Gasi, president of the Pristina LCY opstina committee, warned that the elections would be held under complicated political circumstances, in which the enemy continues to be active. That will require a higher degree of caution and readiness from all communists.

Finally, he warned of the need for greater vigilance from all working people and citizens who are communists during the coming days and the coming holiday of 29 November, Day of the Republic, for there are indications that the enemy wishes to cause disorder and uncertainty among the populace. To that end, new hostile actions have been announced. Gasi concluded: "We must be prepared and must resist every provocation."

LCY LEADERSHIP ELECTORAL PROCEDURES UNDER DISCUSSION

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1611, 15 Nov 81 pp 8-10

[Article by Stevan Niksic]

[Text] Many topics in the domain of "internal relations" within the party have come up for discussion in the recent past: disagreements about interpretation of the principle of democratic centralism; differing assessments of possible directions and the pace of democratization in the League of Communists; dilemmas about the way in which the leadership should be elected and organized....

In a meeting of the LCY Central Committee next week there will again be discussion of the preparations of the 12th LCY Congress, which is to be held next summer. During this past week topics concerning the congress were also dominant at several political meetings all over the country as well as at those in federal forums.

Encounter With the Truth

"It is high time that the League of Communists be concerned with itself, with its behavior, since this is an obligation of ours on behalf of the prestige which it has among the working people," observed Milan Pavic, one of the participants in last week's meeting of the LCC [League of Communists of Croatia] Central Committee. Several significant judgments expressed in that meeting are a good illustration of the temperature of the preparations for the congress.

Petar Sitvuk, for example, advocated that the party "be purged of its weak members, the riffraff"; Jakov Sirotkovic expressed the opinion that the strategic lines of development should be examined once again; Cedo Grbic expressed the assessment that for a long time the League of Communists has been on the defensive with respect to the development of self-management and socioeconomic relations; "The most essential thing for us is to turn our dissatisfaction into constructive social action," Jovo Ugrcic believes; Nada Radosevic called attention to the attacks which distinguished leaders have been making upon one another through the press and public statements, noting that this indicates "insufficient coordination" among leadership bodies in the republics. She noted that the leaders in the Federation and the republic sometimes say one thing (about prices and shortages, for example), and the very next day it happens otherwise, which "causes confusion at the base" and "distrust of leadership personnel"; "The people and the working class have confidence," Ljubo Braski judges, but he nevertheless noted that "we should not be excessively carried away with this. Let us not run from the truth," he said.

On that same occasion Milka Planinc, president of the LCC Central Committee, spoke among other things about democratization in the League of Communists. For understandable reasons related above all to performance of the role of the League of Communists in society and in the political system, that role which was set forth in the positions adopted by the 11th LCY Congress, but which has not been performed with sufficient consistency in the general judgment; that topic is again coming up in many debates concerning the congress. The program for democratization of society cannot be created, nor carried out, unless a democratic spirit and democratic relations are developed within the League of Communists, M. Planinc observed. But at the same time she criticized "certain of our comrades" for "advocating an open and free dialogue concerning all the strategic issues of society on behalf of some different democracy," charging them with "losing sight of criteria and perspectives."

Dialogue

It has become possible even now to speak about an entire panorama of differing opinions concerning the role and importance of dialogue in the context of the process of democratization within the party and of democratic centralism, opinions uttered since commencement of the precongress "summing up." Aleksandar Grlickov, member of the Presidium of the LCY Central Committee, for example, indicated another aspect of the same problem a month ago in an interview (START, 10 October 1981). Noting "that we have flagged in the pace of opening up dialogue," he expressed the opinion that it plays into the hands of the dogmatic forces to suppress dialogue in the League of Communists and in society.

From the rostrum of the Marxist Center of the Belgrade City LC Conference one of the participants in last week's debate (D. Draskovic), declaring himself in favor of creating an atmosphere of frank critical dialogue within the League of Communists and in society ("but not for us to speak about not having a headache"), expressed displeasure that one distinguished official (D. Kosovac) referred to another (S. Vukmanovic "Tempo") in public as amoral. If the people who hold high positions in society address one another in that fashion, what will then be the case when the debates take place in everyday life about income and similar matters, he said. A similar opinion is held by Ratko Butulija, secretary of the city committee, who said that in many quarters there is no true democratic atmosphere in which views are exchanged in a reasoned manner, that often epithets are uttered hastily and unthinkingly....

The debates on dialogue are just one part of a much broader and far more significant topic, the issue of democratic centralism, which has set the tone for the precongress discussions to date. In the report of the Commission of the LCY Central Committee for Organizational Affairs and the Bylaws, which was created in the context of the preparations for the 12th congress, there is mention inter alia of misunderstanding, of a one-sided conception, and even of questioning the value of the "current importance of democratic centralism. There are tendencies," the report says "for the LC to introduce the principle of federalistic relations in LCY organs instead of democratic centralism, for democratic centralism in the LCY to be set up in antagonistic opposition to conclusion of social compacts and self-management accords, for democratic centralism to be broken down into its components....

In the discussion already mentioned in the Marxist Center in Belgrade the judgment was expressed (by Balsa Spadijer) that the decisions and views adopted in the League of Communists are not being consistently taken up precisely because their preparation and adoption were not carried out in a consistently democratic way. One consequence of this mechanically created unity is the frequent observation that we have good positions, that we are not carrying them out or that we are not united in carrying out what has been agreed on.

How are the members of the LCY Central Committee elected, and to whom are they accountable? A highly compounded tale hangs on this apparently simple and, one would say, purely technical problem. Its nuances reflect all the complexity of the dialectical relationship between the LCY as a unified organization and the leagues of communists in the republics and provinces which make it up but which are at the same time independent organizations.

Recalling the fact that members of the LCY Central Committee are elected in the republics and provinces and that their election is only verified in the LCY Congress ("There has never been a case when someone was not verified"), Ivan Laca expressed the opinion last week in the Marxist Center in Belgrade that this was "very hard" evidence of the existence of elements of federalism in the League of Communists. Just 1 day later this topic was discussed in a meeting of the commission of the LCY Central Committee which is preparing proposals for amendment of the present party bylaws. Opinions of the corresponding commissions in the republics and provinces were also gathered in advance.

The report of the commission of the LCMo [League of Communists of Montenegro] Central Committee suggested among other things the possibility that practice up to now in this regard might be changed somewhat: that the republic congresses and provincial conferences could merely nominate candidates for the LCY Central Committee, but they would be elected in the true sense at the Yugoslav congress. It was emphasized that the motive was not a desire to correct the present situation with respect to independence and accountability of the republics and provinces, but the need to strengthen the role of the LCY Central Committee.

In the meeting of the commission this proposal was expanded and substantiated: Stanka Glomazic-Lekovic (LCMo) proposed that members of the LCY Central Committee be nominated in the republics and provinces, but the slate of candidates would have to contain more nominees than were to be elected, and then, for the Executive Committee of the Central Committee to be elected in the LCY Congress by secret ballot. To be elected, according to this proposal, a member of the Central Committee would have to receive at least two-thirds of the votes of the delegates at the congress. A similar suggestion (secret ballot, broader list of candidates) was also made in connection with election of the members of the Presidium of the LCY Central Committee.

It is interesting, however, that concerning many of the characteristic elements of these proposals the members of the Central Committee's commission did not hold an altogether identical view on whether balloting should be open or secret, on whether the slate should contain more nominees than positions; on who shall elect members of the Central Committee; or on who the members of the Central Committee are accountable to. A lively debate was conducted, but some of these have been left "open" even now.

The present LCY Bylaws are not altogether consistent in those provisions which have to do with the secret or open ballot. In election of political executive organs in the LCY, for example, a secret ballot is explicitly prescribed only for opstina organizations; this is not required at the "higher levels" in the republic and the Federation. The opinion was expressed in the commission that a uniform principle should be enforced everywhere. But when the discussion took up election of members of the future Presidium of the LCY Central Committee, noticeable differences became evident: certain members of the commission felt that a secret ballot was not necessary in this case.

Undisputed Diagnosis

Similar differences came to the surface in the debate of the principle of requiring more nominees on the slate than positions to be filled in an election. In his address at the 11th congress President Tito explicitly advocated such procedure, and his address was adopted as a document of the congress. So, with the principle of democratic centralism taken as the point of departure, it is a question of a rule which would have to be mandatory. Marija Zvekic-Miskolci (LCV [League of Communists of Vojvodina]), however, expressed the opinion that "Comrade Tito was not thinking just of the League of Communists" and that application of that principle in ethnically complicated communities might bring about certain undesirable consequences. A similar opinion was held by Bora Denkov (League of Communists of Macedonia [LCMa]), who noted that "we must be realistic" and that as to election of organs in the LCY, it would be "very difficult to carry out." The question was put: What happens if a candidate to a federal forum of the LCY does not receive the necessary number of votes? Does that automatically mean that lack of confidence has been voted in that republic or provincial organization which nominated him?

The bylaws commission did not adopt altogether definitive positions. Many proposals were stated in the form of alternatives.

To whom is the member of the LCY Central Committee accountable? Advocates of the idea that nominees would be voted on in the congress and that at least two-thirds of the votes would be required for election to the future Central Committee, feel that this would eliminate all the dilemmas about whether the member of the Central Committee represents only his parent (republic or provincial) organization or enjoys support in the entire LCY. Incidentally, in one working group of the commission for the bylaws mention was made of a possible elaboration of the principle of decisionmaking on the basis of consensus in meetings of the LCY Central Committee, but it was concluded that there was no basic justification for this, and that idea was abandoned.

Some of the proposals in this debate were interpreted in the meeting of this commission as "a return to the period of 8 years ago," to debates about the character of the entire organization of the League of Communists and of the way it is organized.

Nevertheless, in spite of certain differences over details, the dominant conviction was that several elements should be incorporated into the bylaws in order to emphasize the "cohesive role of the LCY," as stated by Hrvoje Istuk, secretary of the Presidium of the LCBH [League of Communists of Bosnia-Hercegovina] Central Committee.

The assessment that individual members of forums of the League of Communists "abstain" and "have difficulty deciding" to send out critical observations concerning what is happening in other quarters (the republics, the provinces and communes), i.e., outside their own constituency, was significant in this light. Similar judgments have also been heard at many political gatherings in the recent past. That practice, it has been said, is harmful to real unity and effectiveness of efforts as a whole. In this sense last week's meeting of the LCC Central Committee offered an encouraging example. After the criticism of the press expressed in the address of M. Planinc ("The weeklies and especially the popular magazines are more and more becoming points of support for liberalistic tendencies in society"), M. Rakas provided the additional interpretation "that this judgment does not pertain solely to periodicals whose founders are in this republic."

In the analysis of the topics and dilemmas which have been raised so far in the precongress discussions, one inevitably concludes that the diagnosis of the true state of affairs in society, and the LCY is a part of society in every respect, is beyond dispute, that there is complete consensus on this point. The debate about the ways and methods of changing that state of affairs, of improving it, has only now flared up. It seems that the essence of all the precongress discussions lies in this.

The Top Level of the Party

Those provisions which had to do with Comrade Tito and the function of the LCY president will be omitted from the future LCY Bylaws. There is agreement that in future the post of LCY president should not be reestablished. As in the past, the highest organ of the League of Communists would be the congress, which will be held every 4th year and will be similarly instituted as in the past. There is the sole possibility that the number of delegates will be somewhat smaller at future congresses than in the past. The supreme forum of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia in the interval between congresses is still the Central Committee. It is not yet known whether a permanent chairman of the Central Committee will be elected (with a term of office of 1 year) or whether the meetings will be directed by a working presidium which would be elected separately on each occasion.

According to one proposal, the chairman of the Central Committee might at the same time preside over meetings of the Presidium of the LCY Central Committee, similar to current practice in the central (provincial) committees of the republic or provincial organizations. However, it seems that in all the discussions of this topic to date the majority has favored that organizational structure which is in effect at present on the basis of a temporary decision concerning the bylaws: that the Presidium be elected from among the members of the Central Committee and that the Presidium elect its chairman (for 1 year) and its secretary (for 2 years) from among its own members.

Other proposals have also been mentioned. For example: that the pattern of the top level of the party which was in effect before the 10th LCY Congress be reinstated. Then the Presidium would be somewhat larger than at present and there would be a separate and smaller executive body, the Executive Bureau. The conclusions of the Commission for Organizational Affairs and the Bylaws, which was commissioned to prepare a proposed version of changes in the bylaws which will be decided upon by the next congress of the LCY, will be the subject of preliminary debate in a meeting of the LCY Central Committee. Finally, this topic will also be a matter for public discussion, as envisaged by the party bylaws. It is not precluded, then, that certain new and different proposals than those mentioned so far might be forthcoming.

Original Attack From 'OSLOBODJENJE'

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1609, 1 Nov 81 pp 2-3

[Article by Petar Jovic originally published in OSLOBODJENJE on 22 October 1981 and reprinted in NIN, followed by response: "An Aggressive Attack by Bourgeois Consciousness"]

> [Text] Petar Jovic's article entitled "An Aggressive Attack by Bourgeois Consciousness," which is mostly concerned with the writing in our magazine, was published in OSLOBODJENJE on 22 October 1981. We are reprinting this article in its entirety, followed by the response of NIN's editors.

Marxists have never underestimated the definite contributions, breakthroughs and range of bourgeois consciousness. In its description of the nature and pattern of things, this consciousness has been and remains at its own level. Whereas its "neutralism" in the arts has still been able to serve as the basis for a humanistic commitment, in its theory it has neither wished nor been able to conceal its conservative ideological and political stand.

The Offering of a Formula

In proposing solutions and strategies for overcoming a particular social situation (especially if it is complicated and difficult and involves conflicts and crisis) the representatives of bourgeois consciousness abstain and hang back, without offering any excuses. They offer nothing new, their desire is to justify and revive the old, to frighten individuals, what is more, with what the new might mean, and at the same time try to subject the new to ridicule, to doubt and to hesitation. This is what Lenin would call the "genre of the trivial," to which one might add malicious--"annoyance."

What is our behavior in the present situation? Everyone is, of course, seeking an answer to the main question--What are the reasons for the situation, how are the shortcomings to be overcome, and how are the hotbeds of the crisis situations to be eliminated? It would be natural to expect that everyone would endeavor to make a constructive contribution (except those who hold positions contrary to socialist self-management) to resolving and overcoming society's contradictions and difficulties.

A certain Nenad Kecmanovic, so it would appear in a series of articles in NIN, and critics and diagnosticians of our situation like him, are very outspoken, persistent and even aggressive in presenting their views and offering their formulas. There can be no dilemma whatsoever about all the meanings and significations of their writings: they have the best knowledge of everything--the why, the who, the when and the how; they have an answer to all possible questions. Society is at fault for not having taken those admonitions seriously and for not having taken up the dialogue. As though the absence of dialogue, the existence of taboo topics and the like are the causes of the present situation!

Operation Rescue

We must be led to reflection and concern by the fact that the advice being offered can today be placed before public notice. After all, such individuals are taking advantage of the present situation in order to call into question even those most important principles on which this community of ours is based, on which it successfully navigated the troubled sea of world events and problems after World War II and made a tremendous contribution to calming the storms of the world and to preventing a new catastrophe.

Now these freethinking critics and "saviors" obviously would like to point the ship in some other direction, to have us take shelter in some bay, to "spare" us further "troubles." But that is not all there is to it. The discrediting of everything we have so far achieved and have been achieving along our way is also an integral part of Operation Rescue.

These aggressive and brave "benefactors" have laid the blame [on the handling of] those most delicate questions of our cohesiveness and have begun their dirty work as inspectors and strategists. The relations among the nationalities--and pushing the argument that all nationalisms are not equally dangerous. Personnel policy--these relations among the nationalities also bother them, since the quota system is an obstacle to the most capable people!

Social welfare policy--the radical critics want to institutionalize not social inequities, but even class differences! Relations in the Federation, the issue of our community consensus--all the problems come from the greater independence of the republics and provinces. Thus N. Kecmanovic in an article entitled "The Logic of Republic Statism" (NIN, 6 September 1981), examining at length the causes and types of "expansion" of republic-provincial statism, asserts that "the insistence that both statisms (federal and republic-provincial) are by definition equally dangerous is a case of bookish theorizing or cynicism on the part of those who represent that form of it which is currently dominant."

On the face of it, all this is done in the context of the struggle to democratize society. But it is interesting and--as the statisticians would say--significant that nowhere in these long-winded analyses is there any mention of the constitution, of the Law on Associated Labor, of the LCY Program, or even of scholarly and theoretical writings of our distinguished Marxists. (Examine N. Kecmanovic's other articles in NIN, for example, "Democratization or Decentralization" and "The Temptations of the Political Profession at Election Time.")

Imposition of the "Truth"

All the answers of critics of this kind which for the sake of consistency I have had to reduce to their ultimate consequence, bear not only the aroma, but also possess the firm construction--of liberalism, unitarianism and hegemonism. This is the policy of laisser faire, laisser passer--that everyone do as he wishes, and let everyone follow their own course, or, to be even more succinct and in our own idiom--anything goes!

These critics want to impose the "truth" that the competition of the able, inventive, experienced, gifted and the like has been thwarted, hampered and made impossible in our system by democratic procedure and considerations! They wish to return the entire problem, then, back to where our society stated a resolute "no," and in milder form--to that period, and we do not deny it, aware as we are of both its shortcomings and its--necessity--when political office and positions of leadership in sociopolitical organizations and communities, organizations and institutions were--decisive.

There are at least two important things which these "benefactors" of ours do not see: first, the results which have been made possible by self-management and its inherent democratic and freedom-loving atmosphere, and in particular implementation of the principle of the equality of the nationalities and ethnic minorities and of all the parts of our community; and second, they do not see that our problem is not primarily or exclusively in adopting this or that method of choosing those who will lead, but above all in the further struggle to strengthen the socioeconomic position of associated labor in self-management and to achieve the rule of the working class.

In so saying I do not, of course, wish to join in the current campaign which seeks "one key cause" of all our troubles. But I am convinced that there is very little talk today about this cause, i.e., inconsistencies and shortcomings in achievement of that goal, something that Tito often warned about.

Dubious Meditations

In confronting criticism of this kind and the soul-saving attitude of individuals, there is no way to avoid the question of responsibility of periodicals which so frequently and regularly offer extensive space for the full spread of dubious, malicious and extremely unpleasant meditations of self-styled theoreticians. It is simply amazing that an editor whose commitment must be beyond all doubt would give the green light to such articles. One needs to show a great deal of patience and goodwill to rid himself of the impression that such articles have not perhaps been written to order. The words recently uttered by Rodoljub Colakovic in connection with the content and messages of a feature article can be applied to them: "I am writing because I feel like a man who has drawn into his nostrils something slimy and repulsive--cold; it does not prick or nip, only slips along through the nostrils, but you know that one day, if you do not pluck it out as soon as possible, it could inflict a fatal sting in the heart itself...."

What are those factors, interests and elements which bring about the frequent forgetting of communist commitments, the commitments of self-management socialism, of the publication on behalf of dialogue--and dialogue we do need--of something which calls into question the very basis of our common existence? Is it possible that the motivation here is on the basis of "the worse it is, the better it is"? Is it possible that in this kind of situation calculations could be made after the pattern: only for someone, those over there, the others and so on, will it be worse? What a horrifying illusion!

No one needs to have it spelled out that the in-basket of every editor is always overflowing and even more than that given the shortage of newsprint. In such cases the question inevitably arises: What was thrown out when such articles were accepted? Such a selection could not have been made in the name of democracy, freedom of the press and the nurturing of dialogue and the like. That is more than obvious.

Response From Targeted Periodical

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1609, 1 Nov 81 pp 3, 6

[Response by NIN editors to the OSLOBODJENJE article by Petar Jovic on 22 October: "The Nature of an Aggressive Attack"]

[Text] An article like "An Aggressive Attack by Bourgeois Consciousness" (OSLOBODJENJE, 22 October) leaves a man speechless. Is it possible that in 1981, in self-managing socialist Yugoslavia, a newspaper article could appear which accuses an author and a newspaper of nothing less than:

i. calling into question the most important principles on which our community is based;

ii. justification and revival of the old, moreover from the positions which are set in opposition to self-management;

iii. a forgetting of communist commitments;

iv. belittling of everything we have achieved so far;

v. the aiming of our ship in some other direction, into some other bay;

vi. deprecation of achievements in international relations, in personnel policy and in social welfare policy;

vii. the calling into question of our common existence;

viii. activity based on the slogan "The worse it is, the better it is";

ix. evasion of the constitution, the Law on Associated Labor, the LCY Program and scientific and theoretical writings of our distinguished scholars;

x. opposition to the relations in the Federation established by the constitution and also to the independence of the republics and provinces;

xi. liberalism, unitarianism and hegemonism....

... And some dozen similar charges. And all of them were made without a single argument.

What are we to say about articles of this kind except they make all dialogue impossible before it has even begun! That is why we do not intend to engage in an analysis of Jovic's attacks. We are presenting his considerations for the reader's scrutiny, convinced that the reader himself will best know how to evaluate what period of time and what school of thought Jovic's reasonings belong to.

But still we must put a few questions explicitly. How do we account for the need--so evident in Jovic's article--for every unconventional manner of investigation in our society, whose vitality has always been based on reassessment of the functioning of its institutions and on an exploration for more perfect and better solutions, to be proclaimed an attack on the very foundations of the system? How do we account for the desire to prevent even reflection about alternatives, and that at a moment when this society confronts major difficulties in which it is imperative to seek a way out? Who has the right to proclaim criticism of republic statism a grave heresy, when the flowering of that statism has been assessed in the highest bodies of the Yugoslav party and by the public at large as one of the principal reasons for the troubles we confront?

Finally, how do we account for the presumption of the periodical in which Jovic has published his article in constantly and repeatedly delivering lectures on ideological orthodoxy to this and that Yugoslav newspaper with the severity of some political commissar and in passing out grades in moral and political fitness? To what ideological front should we assign that need to have apparitions of opponents of this system constantly appearing in the pages of other newspapers? Can it be that in our present situation there is no more urgent business than settling accounts with imagined enemies?

Attention should also be paid to the way in which Rodoljub Colakovic, a collaborator of NIN for many years, has become involved in the criticism of our newspaper. To take the words of an old revolutionary written in connection with a feature article on a Chetnik and to suggest to Colakovic that he might have similar words to say about the editorial policy of NIN is at the very least an act of rudeness toward this worthy man.

Finally, a point to reflect on: Dr Nenad Kecmanovic has been writing in NIN as a nonstaff collaborator for more than 5 years now. He lives in Sarajevo, he is active in civic life, he is a professor at the School of Political Science of Sarajevo University in the department called "Theoretical Foundations of the Political Sciences." Until recently he was the editor in chief of OPREDJELJENJA [COMMITMENTS], a journal concerned with the theory and practice of a self-managing socialist society which is published by the Marxist Studies Center of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Bosnia-Hercegovina as well as a member of the Sarajevo City Committee of the League of Communists. Kecmanovic is also author of distinguished writings such as the book "Ideologija i istina" [Ideology and Truth] (published by Mladost, Belgrade, 1978) for which he received the "Veljko Vlahovic" Prize, and then the textbook "Marksizam i samoupravljanje" [Marxism and Self-Management], and so on. Had Comrade Jovic not imagined it, would it yet not have been "significant" for a party member and scholar so quickly in the pages of NIN, that is, under the full scrutiny of the public, to turn into a dangerous "opponent of the system" as he portrays him? Of course, Dr Kecmanovic's academic and political qualifications do not make him infallible by any means. On the contrary: his often polemical views have been a subject of dispute even in the pages of this magazine. But a reasoned debate is one thing, and the method of political discreditation used so freely by the author of the article "An Aggressive Attack by Bourgeois Consciousness," which is unsuitable to our system, is something else.

Rebuttal From 'OSLOBODJENJE'

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1611, 15 Nov 81 pp 7, 10

[Rebuttal by Petar Jovic: "Arguments"]

> [Text] The editors have received a large number of letters concerning the article by Petar Jovic entitled "An Aggressive Attack by Bourgeois Consciousness," published in our newspaper, and the response of NIN, which was entitled "The Nature of an Aggressive Attack." Some of them we have been publishing in abbreviated form. We are also publishing the rebuttal of Petar Jovic, also somewhat abbreviated, since its original length was altogether out of proportion to the size of our piece. The editors have tried not to detract from the spirit and thrust of Jovic's article. NIN has expressed its own attitude toward the subject of the dispute in its article "The Nature of an Aggressive Attack," published in No 1609. Petar Jovic's article follows below.

If the author of the response entitled "The Nature of an Aggressive Attack," which the entire editorial staff stood behind (though I still doubt this, since--to use NIN's "argument" in the response to the criticism addressed to that newspaper by an official of the League of Communists of Vojvodina--see NIN, 7 June 1981--that is even technically unfeasible), did not find in my article a single argument, then obviously this is a dispute of large proportions.

It honestly is difficult to understand how an exceptionally able editorial staff like that of NIN--I say this quite seriously and advisedly--can be "left speechless" in a situation as complex as the one in which the country finds itself when an individual and a newspaper come forth with an opinion that does not agree with the views of one of NIN's numerous nonstaff collaborators. What kind of freedom of opinion is that, and what, then, are the opportunities for overcoming the situation, if we do not allow someone to have a different opinion? And, still more definitely--what kind of presumption is that on the part of the editorial staff of a magazine when in such a situation it aspires to the role of a supreme and infallible diagnostician and arbiter? Is it possible to claim a responsible and constructive role if one offers only his own vision as the only truth? This complacent and narcissoid position of infallibility has been demonstrated even by certain earlier comments of NIN's on criticism addressed to it.

On what basis and with what arguments, for example, can N. Kecmanovic assert that we are "today witnesses of what appears to be an extremely democratic atmosphere in our society" (NIN, 6 September 1981) or that "one has to wonder when and on what subject he can speak out freely without them gagging him with some admonition" (NIN, 19 July--the quotations that follow from NIN in 1981 are designated only by the day and the month of their publication).

Let the editorial staff of NIN explain as much as it likes whose propositions those are, but it is quite clear that this is the most commonplace lie and insinuation, while it is actually the author of those articles and his increasingly recognizable "assault" group of like-minded fellows who have the ambition to put a gag on others.

Without any sort of explanatory arguments, Kecmanovic uses the terms "the pathology of our political life" (18 October), "the overwhelming bureaucratic antisystem" (19 July), "full-fledged regional ideologies," "the caprices of the irrational behavior of portions of the regional bureaucracies," "the voluntarism of the regional bureaucracies" (6 September), and the like. Yet the titles which he wears so conspicuously so that no other public figure who has appeared in our periodicals in recent years can compare to him, impose on him the obligation of acting with greater propriety and offering at least the minimum clarification of the terms which he uses.

NIN did well to spot that N. Kecmanovic has experienced a kind of turnabout, and since it is documentation that is requested, here are some of the facts which have come to light and which might not have been taken note of, since we are referring to an author whose frequent appearances are unfailingly accompanied by always the same photograph. (This symptom is of interest not only to psychologists, but also to those who follow the birth and development of certain social phenomena. N. Kecmanovic and those like him, that is, desire to fascinate the public with the photograph which they select and on which they obviously insist to the editors!)

After having written several panegyric essays and reviews of books of our distinguished politicians in journals and other periodicals, pieces which were pearls, in late 1979 N. Kecmanovic "came to his senses" and published in KNJIZEVNE NOVINE (3 November 1979) an extremely adverse and sarcastic piece entitled "Even Politicians Write Books."

In the meantime, depending on whether his otherwise unbridled ambitions have been realized, Kecmanovic has been changing his attitude toward politicians, finally in his most recent articles subjecting all of them, in Yugoslavia generally, to malicious and even very primitive critical analyses which are not witty in the least. Though the general impression, reported on in the article entitled "An Aggressive Attack by Bourgeois Consciousness," cannot be illustrated by mere quotation, these characteristic phrases of Kecmanovic's, which we now see are NIN's as well, are sufficiently eloquent: the essence of political ability (lies) in having good nerves, and one can get them even with sedatives; "the blame needs to be put on others for all the difficulties, failures, shortcomings, voluntarism, nepotism, privileges, primitivism, and stupidities, and the grousing of the people is justifiably redirected toward someone else" (6 September); regional leaders; local fanatics; the parent bureaucracy; "teams of regional standard-bearers in good form"; "a vertical train in which everyone refuses to react within the limits of his own powers and responsibilities" (19 July); "the election fever ... at least every 4th year affects a large number of political personnel and--as the malicious tongues would have it--display a symptomatic fear that some faux pas will spoil the outcome, a defensive keeping up of appearances or even a hastily contrived activism in order to offset bad impressions if only at the last moment ..." (18 October); "the criterion of ability ... figures as only one criterion no more important than the others in politics" (18 October); "... Is there any reason to be surprised at the preelection insomnia" of politicians; "... Professional hypocrisy requires ... that one exclaim even publicly that actually he would like to lose ..." (18 October); "Many leaders take an 'everyone help himself' attitude toward socially owned property ...," and so on and so on.

As for NIN's puzzlement as to what era we are in and as to whose "school of thought" (?) is anachronistic, instead of offering my own line of argument, I will quote another author whom I do not know personally, so that there is no possibility whatsoever for the agreements and "arrangements" at which some of our brave cavillers have achieved perfection! In KNJIZEVNE NOVINE (18 June 1981) Lj. Kljakic has the following to say in an article entitled "The Beeeg Little Town: Shot in the Dark":

"Fortunately, critical social consciousness has increased--since there is fertile soil for this in the dialectics of our fortunes and misfortunes--so that the conformism of the little town sounds more and more like a distant echo from the past. Even when a provincial opinion seeks a theoretical foundation after the pattern of Dr Prof Nenad I. Kecmanovic and his 'egalitarianism of the sickbed' (recently in NIN), the result is nothing other than farce...."

Or, need we refer to the kind of sharp reactions to Kecmanovic's article in NIN concerning the initial silence of the news media about the events in Kosovo? In an article entitled "Who Is Planting 'Cuckoo Eggs' on Us" POLITIKA EKSPRES (23 April 1981) responded that those who "are now 'playing the hero'" in criticizing the press which was silent and who "back up" their assertions "with academic titles in front of their first and last names," who "always want to reap some personal benefit for themselves," while KNJIZEVNE NOVINE (7 May 1981) concluded a longer critical essay on the same article (in NIN) with these words: "A man simply gets upset when a professor, a Ph.D., in reflecting on television, did not arrive to help his colleagues in NIN, and in that same issue they published photographs of cars which were burned in Brickston...."

Kecmanovic's articles are the most vivid illustration of how individuals are formally in conformity with the positions of the LCY, but in actuality they are working--persistently and aggressively--to destroy and corrode the stands taken and role performed by the LC. For example, he overemphasizes the ability of politicians and the selection from among a plurality of candidates to such an extent that the following conclusions are necessarily imposed, conclusions which are false, to put it mildly:

i. that there are certain organized cases of resistance and all but plots against the able and against having more than one candidate;

ii. that in the past and all the more recent elections the best and most competent people have not been elected and even, to go further, that those holding office at the present are mostly incompetent;

iii. that after all it is not true that there are able people in every milieu, in every ethnic minority and so on;

iv. that we do not have many able people at all. And so on and so on.

His prattle becomes more comprehensible only when one understands that he--having plunged into those unpublic affairs (he himself explicitly admits this--"as malicious tongues would have it," he mentions the underground, and the corridors and marketplace are, of course, represented as the sources of his information)--his speaking and writing from the standpoint of an investigation, or, more accurately, from the standpoint of creating opportunities for the nomination and election of a certain number of personnel who for various reasons are not now on the political scene. In actuality he is afraid that these people, and he himself first of all, will not perhaps be able to get a suitable place in the next election.

In any case, let us listen to Kecmanovic himself and his key idea about elections, on which he plays numerous and extensive variations:

"... The interest in a career, the spirit of competitive rivalry, the fight for prestige ... (is) something altogether normal" even for the political profession! (18 October) It is evident that these are not oversights and lapses committed in haste from the fact that he nostalgically notes that "in our system it is unknown ... for a man to rise politically on the basis of mass support and popularity" (1 November). What was that you said, professor, doctor? Was it not precisely on such waves of "popularity" that the prestige and influence of the leaders of the mass movement and liberalism grew to mythical proportions?

There is no doubt whatsoever where this society would be led--and not only the multinational, but also the mononational (if there are any) milieux--the personnel deemed capable according to Kecmanovic's criteria, and that very quickly and perhaps irrecoverably!

Is there any difficulty in reading these meditations to spot the petty agitation, demagogy, factionalism and careerism and all those illusions related to them; doesn't this lead to a still greater alienation of politics, something which the professor and doctor shown in the photograph appears to have no idea of?

Is it not clear that people with such "abilities" and ambitions in all systems, and this must be still more forcibly in our context--are unscrupulous about the means they use in achieving their goals, trample upon all objective criteria, so that intrigues, deceit, easy promises and grave deceptions and tricks are the inevitable concomitant of a personnel policy which would be based on such propositions?

Everything which Kecmanovic has hastily scribbled in this serial of his might somehow have been understood provided all the articles carried the common title of an analysis in the field of sociology or political science of the current arguments and themes of the political underground. I am not referring here solely to oppositionist views, but also to what the sociologists have termed the "unpublic." Does anyone have to be convinced that the arguments, judgments and views from that unpublic sphere, from outside the system, and so on, must be even more the subject matter of scientific, political and in general public, or serious, critical debates, since in that way we will fight more effectively against everything that is deviant, oppositionist, and so on.

In an exhaustive interview on current politics which N. Kecmanovic has given and which has largely been published in the journal OPREDJELJENJA (No 7-8, September 1980) and peddled out in several other periodicals as well (NIN, Radio Sarajevo--Third Program, SVIJET), he actually expounded in responding to cleverly composed questions his theory of relations among the nationalities, which--to put it mildly--differs considerably from the policy of the LC. (For more on this, see my article entitled "'Brave' Questioning by a Newsman," OSLOBODJENJE, 10 October 1980.)

This long narrative has been necessary to demonstrate the following:

i. that the arguments of N. Kecmanovic are even more problematical than depicted in the article "An Aggressive Attack by Bourgeois Consciousness";

ii. that I am neither the first, nor the only, nor the most severe critic of those arguments.

I will not enter into the other aspects of this group of problems, for example, that Kecmanovic is obviously bothered by something else, that in the end he is both insincere and timid, so that his "true" theses must be openly "elaborated" by other members of his informal group; that his aim is to cause a scandal, to put himself at the center of attention at any price, to represent himself as a victim.

CROATIAN OFFICIAL CITES RESURGENCE OF BUREAUCRATISM

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1608, 25 Oct 81 pp 12-13

[Interview with Vjekoslav Koprivnjak, director of the Center for Ideological and Theoretical Work of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Croatia, by Stevan Niksic; date and place not specified]

[Text] [Answer] "I think that we have frequently approached nationalism as something that is an element of an alienated part of the social consciousness; we have reacted insufficiently to what we are now calling economic nationalism, and we have even tolerated it as natural national interest! And this is now backfiring on us.

"In practice we have had more in action a Kavcic conception of the national economies, than the conception established by the Second LCY conference in 1972," says the director of the Center for Ideological and Theoretical Work of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Croatia, Vjekoslav Koprivnjak.

Among other things, the events in Kosovo have also influenced the fact that the problem of internationality relations in Yugoslavia has again entered political life as a "burning" issue. The public has sometimes almost treated this problem as an "inconvenient" and "ticklish" one. This is possibly why so many errors and myths have accumulated, that are still burdening this area in the life of contemporary Yugoslav society.

[Question] Can what happened in Kosovo in 1981 be compared with what took place in Croatia in 1971?

[Answer] There is no doubt that there are some similarities between these situations. First of all, in both cases the broader dimension was lost, the dimension of the class interest, the workers' interest. Nationalistic interests came predominantly to the forefront. One should not lose sight of what was pointed out at the 21st meeting of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the LCY and in the Letter--everything that happened then in Croatia was not any kind of Croatian specialty. This was something that was taking place in all of Yugoslavia, while a dramatic expression of nationalistic euphoria took place in Croatia, and it was expressed there in its most acute form. Similarly, it could also be said today that nationalism is not reserved only for the Kosovo area, but is also present elsewhere.

Although our attention is most frequently and almost exclusively, in accordance with the traditional concepts, concentrated on two nationalisms, Croatian and Serbian, it has been shown that in fact all nationalisms are equally dangerous and that they latently arouse all of the other nationalisms. But Yugoslavia, as we are building it, is a community in which the Croatian-Serbian-Slovenian axis is not making the decisions. Any nationalism can thus set off great crises.

Federalist Tendencies in the LC

[Question] People are talking again about an increase in federalist tendencies in the League of Communists. Why?

[Answer] The League of Communists was undoubtedly confronted very sharply with this tendency at the beginning of the 1970's. One of the reasons for the 21st meeting and the Letter was in fact the tendency toward federalization within the LCY. This is why the 10th Congress and the 2nd LCY Conference took a very precise position against such a development. The fact is, however, that even after that we had certain practices that contained within themselves tendencies toward federalization of the LCY, and some blockage of the federal party center.

I think that our theoretical position in regard to this is very clear, but that we are forgetting it. The basic problem is how to keep the LCY from growing into a supranational organization, but without being a mere alliance of republican and provincial organizations. This fundamental dilemma has been repeated practically since the founding of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia, and this should be kept in mind, but in every stage it requires an adequate method of organizational resolution.

We have forgotten that the League of Communists can be dissolved not only through sectarian politics, but also equally if everyone is in the party. We have today the problem of the identity of the Communists, not on a theoretical level, but in concrete action.

I think that today we also have a fairly unsatisfactory personnel situation. We even have people in very responsible positions who are simply not ready to participate in the implementation of a program as extensive and significant as the one we have drawn up. And now we are again blocked a little because everyone is waiting for a redistribution of the personnel solutions, and no one will rush ahead; especially some who cannot even rush ahead because they do not know what is really going on. Things are going well for them personally and they only think about how to preserve what they have, without really caring too much about what is taking place in society. I see this as one of the most crucial problems.

Unitarianism Is Not a Solution

[Question] Some controversies associated with the concept of unitarianism have lasted since the time when this phenomenon was publicly criticized for the first time, at the Eighth Congress of the LCY. What do you think of unitarianism today?

[Answer] To put it simply, the same as I did yesterday. It is equally dangerous, and we must be clear on this. We cannot solve the problems of Yugoslavia with a unitarian position. It was precisely on the basis of a criticism of what was entailed by a unitarian conception that we arrived at the present concrete solutions in the political system. At this time, when we are facing difficulties, it may seem that we should turn things back, but this would mean having the same problems again after a certain period of time. This leads us to a conclusion that in my opinion is exceptionally significant, and to something that Vladimir Bakaric stressed on one occasion back in 1971: the nation should be based on self-management, and not on the state.

The Strong Position of the Bureaucracy

[Question] Some old problems have become exacerbated again. Doesn't this indicate that the new system created after the reform of the Federation has in fact not been very productive either?

[Answer] This new system was not fully implemented. I think that this was the main problem. Consultation and agreement were too frequently carried out between the various working bodies of the executive agencies of the Federation and the republics and provinces, which was undoubtedly a new step, but insufficient in view of the essence of the concept of the Yugoslav federation. On the other hand, this direction of having the nation based on self-management was not developed to a sufficient extent. What happened was precisely what the action through the 21st meeting and the Letter was initiated against: the bureaucracy has again come into a fairly strong position. This raises the question of how this was possible.

[Question] Really: how?

[Answer] A few years ago, before Kosovo and the other things that have happened in the meantime, we and many others warned about this. The consultation and agreement of the republics and provinces, in the way in which it is done, is a great step, but an insufficient one, because delegate assemblies and associated labor are the only ones who can be the main participants in this process. If the role of these participants is taken by someone else, in the long term a crisis is unavoidable.

Yugoslavianism Under a Mortgage

[Question] The concept of "Yugoslavianism" is also one of those which still cause many misunderstandings. How do you interpret this?

[Answer] It seems to me that the problem is not in the theoretical approach to this matter but in something else. There is no doubt that here Yugoslavianism is burdened with a certain mortgage of unitarianism. Some narrower interest has frequently been known to hide behind a defense of Yugoslav interests. We, however, have at any rate fallen short in not sufficiently affirming the positive aspects of Yugoslavianism in the sense of belonging to the Yugoslav community.

Yugoslavia was not united by a myth about the Slavs or Yugoslavianism, but precisely by the interests of its peoples. But in practice we have not presented an operative concept that would demonstrate this to a sufficient extent. In general, except when certain urgent situations arise, we avoid discussing internationality relationships. We are frequently inclined to believe that everything is all right in regard to this, but we do not wish to verify this assertion. The cause of all this is probably a collective consciousness that it is better not to tinker with this, and possibly also because we have had such terribly difficult and bloody historical experiences.

The Croatian "Model"

[Question] The Italians who live in Croatia and Slovenia have their own united organization, along with the members of other nationalities in Croatia. Such organizations do not exist in other republics and provinces, and it even seems that they would not be desirable. How do you interpret these differences?

[Answer] The differences have arisen from historical circumstances. To be precise, the unions of nationalities in Croatia were mostly formed during World War II, and today they are operating exclusively within the framework of SSRN Croatia. One of the characteristics of Yugoslavia is precisely the fact that in our country the same goals can be achieved in different ways in different republics and provinces.

[Question] Our citizens abroad also gather, with the blessing of Yugoslav political authorities, on a national basis. Let us say, the members of some nationalities abroad, for example Albanians from Kosovo, have their own clubs, while others do not. Can't an agreement be reached in Yugoslavia on a uniform policy regarding this?

[Answer] This practice is acceptable to me solely under the condition that citizens of exclusively one nationality are located in a given place, and that moreover the active goal of building Yugoslav unity is not lost in these clubs.

[Question] There are still many disagreements over the symbols of a nation and national statehood. Is the fact that Croatia is the only Yugoslav republic with its own anthem that is played on official occasions causing some misunderstandings in practice? From the standpoint of standard protocol, it might possibly be logical to have "Lijepa nasa" played when some official of Croatia comes on an official visit to another republic. But this is still not done. Why?

[Answer] You should first of all answer the question of whether you are possibly excited by the playing of the hymn "Lijepa nasa," and how it excites you... But the fact that it is not played as a matter of protocol on the occasion of a visit by an official of Croatia to other republics and provinces indicates that all of us together still perceive Yugoslavia as a united community, and not as a collection of republican states.

One Should Not Put Everything Into the Same Basket

[Question] Where are those young people today who were subject to nationalist euphoria in Croatia at the beginning of the 1970's? What happened to them later on?

[Answer] Some of them are still showing themselves to the nationalists; others are doing their jobs and trying to rehabilitate themselves; and some have already rehabilitated themselves. I think that those who are trying to rehabilitate themselves should be offered the opportunity to do so, and I think that society has given them a fair amount of chances. Most of those people, nevertheless, have realized what this was all about. The problem, however, is that some of the ideologies have not renounced their ideas. It would be difficult to believe that anything is possible that way. They are continuing to act as they used to.

I think that society should first of all act in a cultured manner, and that this is the field where we are in fact giving concrete expression to the humanity of our society. In accordance with this, I think that with respect to punishment, one should differentiate those who did the manipulating and those who were manipulated. It is really harmful and dangerous to put everything together into the same basket.

CHURCH-STATE CONFLICT OVER MILITARY SERVICE INTENSIFYING

Zurich NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG in German 4 Feb 82 p 4

['Abroad' feature article by 'sk', datelined Berlin, 2 February: "Growing Tensions Between Church and State in GDR." Translations of Hamburg DER SPIEGEL articles on church-state conflict over peace movements in GDR and church's proposal for 'alternative military service' are published under the heading "Goals of, Reactions to Pacifist Movements Reported," in JPRS 79971, 28 Jan 82, No 1969 of this series, pp 6-14]

[Text] Results of the Synod in Herrnhut

The synod of the League of Protestant Churches in the GDR dealt with questions of church canon and church policy during its meeting in Herrnhut from 29 to 31 January. Because of a prohibition on reporting by Western correspondents imposed by the GDR Ministry for Foreign Affairs, the meeting took on a special political accent. The deliberations of the synod were marked by the growing tensions between state and church which since the Polish crisis and the GDR's campaign against NATO's rearmament resolution cannot be ignored.

Regret About the Prohibition on Reporting

In his welcoming address, Wismar merchant Wahrmann, president of the synod, went into these tensions when he regretted the prohibition by the state on reporting and at the same time established that the church had no influence on this decision by the state. Rather, the church was interested in comprehensive reporting about the synod whose plenary sessions were public. Bishop Krusche of Magdeburg, reelected president of the League's synod, became even clearer when, in view of the apparent tendency on the part of the state to impose a ban of silence on the church in the GDR, he expressly warned of a "silent church," yet at the same time pleaded for a "policy of reasonable interaction" between church and state.

In this, the Protestant church in the GDR is referring to a 6 March 1978 conversation with National Council Chairman Honecker in which a limited respect between church and state in dealings with one another was agreed upon. This course, which in subsequent years was pursued with a grain of salt, however, cannot obscure the existing opposition between the Christian claim of the church and the atheistic ideology of the state. The gulf has become wider again since the Protestant church is publicly asserting its Christian claim in respect to the communist education of youth and in the question of the decision of conscience in respect to military service.

Claim to "Social Peace Service"

The discussions of the League's synod in Herrnhut have made it clear that the Protestant Christians in the GDR, even in a situation which has become more difficult, do not intend to back off in their Christian concerns in respect to the atheistic state. This is especially true of the demand for establishing a "social peace service" as a substitute for military service in the GDR People's Army. Of course, all efforts by the church in this matter have thus far been unsuccessful.

In front of the synod, reference was made to the fact that Gysi, GDR state secretary for church questions, had affirmed "clearly and unmistakably" the denial by the state of the present suggestions by the church for establishing a social peace service. Also, the suggestion by the church, "within the context of the constitution," to develop service without weapons in the National People's Army's construction troops in such a way that these units would be used for urgent social tasks which would have no military characters, was likewise rejected, as was the request for a review of the current regulations in the case of service by reservists and in premilitary training from the point of view of the freedom of faith and conscience which is guaranteed in the GDR constitution.

In view of this "disappointing" attitude on the part of the state, the League's synod urged the young Protestant Christians in the GDR not to become resigned, but at the same time warned them against demonstrative actions. The Protestant churches in the GDR, of course, do not want to let the thread of discussion with the state be broken, but at the same time they have made it unmistakably clear that in the future they also want to take into consideration the anxiety of young Christians which is caused by the growing militarization of the social life in the GDR.

With great determination the synod objected vigorously that the negative attitude of young people toward military service is suspected by the state as being "hostile to peace." With that, the synod again clearly took a position against a statement by Walde, director of the SED in Cottbus Bezirk. At a meeting of the SED Central Committee in November of last year Walde had characterized social peace service as a "phrase" and advocacy for this request as "hostile to peace, socialism and the constitution."

With the same persistence as in their advocacy of a social peace service, the Protestant churches in the GDR at the synod in Herrnhut insisted upon the fact that the Christian religious commitment of children, young people and parents had to be respected even in communist controlled training and education. In particular, it objected to the fact that young Christians, in contrast to their fellow pupils, are disadvantaged by purposely negative reports in the schools and by obstruction to admission to institutions of more advanced training.

Obliging Tone

In spite of the situation of the Protestant churches in the GDR, which is becoming more difficult, in their critisism of the state the synod members tried for a moderate tone. Apparently the church, in safeguarding its point of view, does not want through incautious criticism to endanger the limited respect assured it by Honecker. Therefore, this is also no doubt how the comment at the synod is to be understood that the necessary authorizations for care packages to support Polish communities and church facilities had readily been issued by the GDR Ministry for Foreign Trade.

Bishop Krusche, reelected the League's synod president, will be 65 in November and will occupy this office only until the end of the year.

RUSSO-PRUSSIAN ALLIANCE OF 1813 TIED TO GDR-SOVIET ALLIANCE

Dresden SAECHSISCHE ZEITUNG in German 9 Oct 81 'wir' supplement p 2

['Past and Current History' feature article by Dr Gerd Fesser: "A Wholesome Catastrophe--On the 175th Anniversary of the Battles of Jena and Auerstedt."]

[Text] History has recorded more than a few examples of how reactionary classes of exploiters or parts of them are inclined to dangerously false estimates of the division of power and of how they seek to cover up their own weakness by adventurous actions. An excellent example of this is the behavior of the Prussian Junkers in late summer and fall of 1806, when a military conflict between France and Prussia was in the air. The Prussian army was about to engage a combat-experienced force led by a genius of a strategist, a force that had a year earlier beaten the combined armies of two great powers--Russia and Austria.

As astonishing as it may sound, the arrogant Prussian Junker officers anticipated the approaching struggle with superconfidence. General von Ruechel twanged, "His Majesty's army has several generals of the quality of Mr. Bonaparte." A colonel even lamented that "the brave Prussians are carrying guns and sabers when sticks would suffice to run the French dogs back to their country." On 8 October the French army began marching from its points of concentration in the area of Bamberg and Bayreuth and only 6 days later, on the 14th of the month, a battle was fought near Jena and Auerstedt.

Superior Tactics of the Sharpshooters

At Jena, approximately 53,000 Prussian and Saxon soldiers faced 96,000 Frenchmen; these figures include the reinforcements that joined both sides during the day. The outcome was decided in the fight for the village of Vierzehnheiligen. This phase of the battle demonstrated especially clearly the tremendous tactical superiority of the French and the incredible stupidity of the Prussian generals. The Prussian infantry fought according to the rules of the outdated linear tactics; the French, on the other hand, used sharpshooters in the manner that had been developed in the American War of Independence. As a matter of principle, the Prussians advanced without the slightest cover in a close battleline consisting of three ranks and fired rounds without proper aim, whereas the French adapted to the terrain and, where necessary, fought in spreadout groups of marksmen.

The Prussian commander, Prince zu Hohenlohe-Ingelfingen, positioned his troops in front of Vierzehnheiligen as pedantically as if he were on a drill field, thus turning his soldiers into one gigantic target. From the houses and hedges of the village, the French infantrymen overwhelmed the enemy with murderous, carefully aimed fire. When the Prussian-Saxon battleline had suffered severe losses and had become disorganized, it was broken by deep echelons of French infantry columns and cavalry units and forced to flee.

If Napoleon himself won an easy victory at Jena, his marshal Davout performed a significant military feat at Auerstedt (more exactly, near the village of Hassenhausen). With 27,000 men he defeated the main Prussian army, which numbered 50,000. Here were the commander-in-chief, Duke Ferdinand of Brunswick, and King Frederick William III; by the way, Bluecher and Scharnhorst were also present.

Prussian State Collapsed like a House of Cards

When Napoleon smashed the Prussian army on a single day and the Prussian state collapsed like a house of cards, many contemporaries were aghast. However, the disaster was logical and inevitable because the Prussian state was rotten to the core. In this bulwark of feudal reaction, the clocks had been stopped 20 years before upon the death of Frederick II. The Junker class and the clique at court blocked all progress--even in military matters.

The example of linear tactics easily proves the point that the weaknesses of the old Prussian army system resulted directly from the outmoded feudal conditions in the country. This method of fighting was hopelessly inferior to the sharpshooter tactics of the French, and the more aware Prussian officers knew it too. There was an infantry regiment in the Prussian army commanded by Yorck that had already adopted more modern riflemen's tactics and that in 1806 made a spendid showing in the action near Altenzaun. Why could the new tactics not be introduced everywhere? Yorck's regiment consisted of the sons of forestry officials who served until they themselves obtained positions as foresters.

New Social Factors Showed Their Effect

Thus these soldiers had an incentive to excel. All other infantry regiments were comprised by the impressed sons of peasant serfs or by foreign mercenaries. The linear tactics had to be retained in these units because only so could the officers constantly see their soldiers and prevent desertions. Only after the disaster of 1806/7 did it finally begin to dawn on the Prussian government, as Friedrech Engels remarked, that the sons of free French peasants who owned their own land could not be vanquished with the sons of serfs who could be evicted from their farms at any time. At last Prussia realized that the peasant is also a human being.

The collapse of the old Prussian military state in 1806/7 produced tremendous and most contradictory results. First, the victorious Bonaparte radically rewrote the political map of Central Europe. Prussia lost about half of her territory and population. Apart from Prussia and Austria, all the German states joined the so-called Rhine Confederation, partly of their own free will, partly as a result of pressure. The Confederation was headed by Napoleon as "protector."

It soon became evident that Napoleon's victory was also an irrevocable victory of the rising capitalist system over rotten feudalism. The states of the Rhine Confederation and Prussia followed the French example in carrying out a number of civil reforms, in introducing freedom of trade and passing progressive legislation.

This was, of course, only one side of the coin. At the same time the occupying French subjected Germany, especially Prussia, to unprecedented financial exploitation. In the following years the members of the Rhine Confederation had to supply Napoleon with troops over and over again for him to use as cannon fodder in his endless wars of conquest. And the subordination of all Germany to the greed for profit of the French upper middle class inflicted severe damage on trade and commerce in general.

Tradition of the People's Army Established

The ultrareactionary clique at the Prussian court that ruled until 1806 was so discredited that for a time patriotic reformers like Stein and Scharnhorst had to be selected for top military and political positions. With iron determination these patriots prepared for the war of liberation, completely modernized the army and activated the masses of the people. Their hour came when Napoleon's "Grand Army" had been destroyed in Russia. The fiery old Bluecher wrote to Scharnhorst, "It is now time to do what I advised in 1809, that is, call the entire nation to arms and if the princes don't want to and resist, send them packing along with Bonaparte."

King Frederick William III, who was forever wavering, and the ultrareactionary nobility were very much opposed, but, under the pressure of the masses and patriotic military reformers, they had to form an alliance with Russia and begin the war of independence. Almost exactly seven years after the disaster at Jena, on 16 October 1813, began the Battle of Nations at Leipzig, in which Russian and German soldiers cast off the yoke of Napoleon's foreign domination in their common unselfish struggle.

We hold the memory of this joint effort dear, since it established the tradition of German-Russian brotherhood in arms, which has culminated in the unshakable socialistic alliance between the Soviet Army and our National People's Army.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS STUDY IN COUNTRY ASSESSED

Warsaw SPRAWY MIEDZYNARODOWE in Polish No 5, May 81 pp 141-149

[Article by Janusz Symonides; a report prepared for the national conference of representatives of the science of international relations organized by the Polish Institute of International Affairs [PISM] in June 1981]

I

[Text] In order to answer the question of what complicates the development of research on contemporary international relations in our country, and in order to point out at least several methods for eliminating these obstacles, it is necessary to present, at least briefly, the state of this discipline, its achievements and its weaknesses.

A detailed presentation of all directions of research, due to the scope of the science of international relations, would be a task beyond the framework of this paper. However, we should state that in the second half of the 1970's, this discipline underwent marked development. This was particularly evident in the scope of subjects researched. The broadening of the research front has been, above all, the result of the opening of a number of new institutes and centers, as well as the associated increase in the number of specialists studying international relations.

During this period, the Institute of Socialist Countries (Instytut Krajow Socialistycznych) in the Polish Academy of Sciences [PAN], the Research Institute for Contemporary Problems of Capitalism (Instytut Badania Wspolczesnych Problem Kapitalizmu), the Institute of International Relations of Warsaw University (Instytut Stosunkow Miedzynarodowych Uniwersytetu Warszawskiego) and the Research Center for Peace (Csrodek Badan nad Pokojem) all arose. The Institute of Basic Problems of Marxism-Leninism (Instytut Podstawowych Problemow Marksizmu-Leninizmu) took up aspects of international issues. Branches of the Polish Institute of International Affairs (Polski Instytut Spraw Miedzynarodowych) [PISM] likewise arose in Krakow and Torun. The development of political science has led to formal and informal groups studying international relations at many schools. More recently two new research centers opened for the study of international economic relations: the Institute of World Economy (Instytut Gospodarki Swiatowej) and the PAN Institute of Economics (Instytut Ekonomii).

Research on international issues of socialist countries is being conducted primarily at the Institute of Socialist Countries, at the Higher School of Social Sciences (Wyzsza Szkola Nauk Spoleczynch) [WSNS] under the PZPR Central Committee, at the Institute of Basic Problems of Marxism-Leninism, at PISM and, for international economic relations, at the Institute of Trends and Prices (Instytut Koniunktur i Cen) [IKiC] and the Main School of Planning and Statistics (Szkola Glowna Planowania i Statystyki) [SGPiS].

The major centers for research concerned with political and socioeconomic issues of developing countries are the SGPiS Institute of the Economy of Developing Countries (Instytut Gospodarki Krajow Rozwijajcych sie), the Warsaw University [UW] Institute of the Geography of Developing Countries (Instytut Geografii Krajow Rozwijajacych sie) and PISM.

Foreign policy and, in part, the domestic policy of major capitalist countries are the subjects of interest at the Research Institute for Contemporary Problems of Capitalism (Instytut Badania Wspolczesnych Problemow Kapitalizmu), the Institue for Western Affairs (Instytut Zachodni), the Silesian Institute (Instytut Slaski) in Opole, the Silesian Scientific Institute (Slaski Instytut Naukowy) in Katowice and the UW Institute for International Affairs (Instytut Spraw Miedzynarodowych). Economic relations are studied in particular at IKIC, the Institute of World Economy and at economics schools.

Research on disarmament, international security and on peace in a more general sense is conducted, above all, at PISM, at the Research Center for Peace, at the Military Political Academy (Wojskowa Akademia Polityczna), at the General Staff Academy (Akademia Sztabu Generalnego) and at SGPiS.

The opening of new centers and institutes has not surmounted all the traditional shortcomings of Polish research on contemporary international relations. One of these shortcomings is an overemphasis on history, to the neglect of current topics of such great importance as the problems of socialist countries. The research gaps continue, both in terms of territorial scope and subject matter. For example, while there has been much concentration on and significant development in research on German subjects, which is explained by our national interest and practical needs, studies of the foreign policy of other major capitalist states (besides the United States) have been insufficient. In regard to developing countries, while research on Africa has been fairly intensive, interest in Latin America has been less. What's more, studies on Polish foreign policy and our place in the world are lacking.

In evaluating the results of research in terms of its merits--i.e., the level attained by it--while in most cases the analytical-descriptive aspect and the ideological function engender no doubts, as a rule the theoretical and prognostic aspects are clearly lacking.

In the evaluations and postulates formulated about international relations in conjunction with preparation for the Second Congress of Polish Science, commentators agreed that one of the weaknesses of the science of international relations is the lack of theoretical studies. However, substantial progress has been made in Poland in this area. Research on the theory of international relations has been undertaken at the Central Methodical Political Science Center (Centralny Osrodek Metodyczny Nauk Politycznych), at the UW Institute for International Affairs, at PISM, at Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznan and at Marie Curie-Sklodowska University in Lublin. A monograph by J. Kukulka entitled "Problems of the Theory of International Relations" ["Problemy teorii stosunkow miedzynarodowych"] was published in 1978.

In the development of research on theory and methodology, an issues team studying these questions and functioning within the framework of MR. III. 3 [Interministerial III. 3] topic entitled "Socioeconomic Changes and the Foreign Policy of Capitalis and Developing Countries,"* has played an essential role. The result of this work has been the publication of a collection of 10 studies using the "small-scale printing" technique. These studies treat such subjects as the categories making up the science of international relations and the theory of policy and international relations. This issues team has also organized a series of meetings and conferences devoted to the theory of international relations.

The considerable progress made in research on the general theory of international relations has not yet been accompanied by a parallel raising of the theoretical level of studies and the creation of partial theories.

II

The answer to the questions of how we are to increase the effectiveness of research, how we are to take advantage of the considerable potential existing within the academic community, how we are to surmount the existing shortcomings caused by the unnecessary duplication of subjects, by gaps, by diffuseness and sometimes by unsound research preferences, is obvious: above all by improved organization of research and by streamlined cooperating among all centers engaged in the study of contemporary international relations.

Given a situation where these issues are researched by ministerial or regional institutes and centers, by institutes and centers under PAN or connected with schools and under the management of several ministries, a basic level of coordination is indispensable, at least to ensure that initial information concerning scientific-research plans, the assignment of the cadre and work being conducted in mutually known. Without proper research organization, contact between application and the natural theoretical base is very difficult.

See A. Lopatka, "The State and Prospects of Polish Political Research," STUDIA NAUK POLITYCZNYCH, 1973, No 3, p 37; J. Symonides, "The State and Prospects of the Development of Research on Contemporary International Relations," STUDIA NAUK POLITYCZNYCH, 1973, No 1, p 194.

*Directing particular subjects were A. Bodnar, J. Kukulka, K. Sobczak and J. Palyga. The work of the entire issues team was directed by J. Symonides.

Due to the nature of things, it is limited primarily to ministerial arrangements: in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs [MSZ]--PISM with its two branches in Krakow and Torun--in the Ministry of Foreign Trade [MHZ]--the IKiC--and in the Ministry of Justice [MS]--the Institute of Judicial Law (Instytut Prawa Sadowego).

Practice has long been aware of the need to coordinate scientific research plans and to streamline scholarly feedback; such attempts have been made for several years. As a result of discussions conducted between MSZ and the Ministry of Science, Higher Education and Technology [MNSzWiT], in mid-1975 the minister of MNSzWiT, by agreement with the minister of MSZ, created the Interministerial Council for the Coordination of Scientific Research and the Training of Cadres to Meet the Needs of Foreign Relations. The council was conceived as a consultative and advisory organ; tasks within the council's scope of scientific research include:

a) presenting opinions and participating in preparing comprehensive drafts to coordinate scientific-research work;

b) inspiring scientific-research work;

c) evaluating the scientific level and the practical applicability of research;

d) analyzing and evaluating the structure and effectiveness of research outlays.

PISM performed the functions of the secretariat of the council. Representatives of the majority of scientific, academic, ministerial and regional centers, as well as representatives of MSZ, MNSzWiT, MHZiGM [Ministry of Foreign Trade and Maritime Economy], MON [Ministry of National Defense] and the Department and Planning Commission of the PZPR Central Committee made up the 35-member council, which was chaired by Prof Dr Alfons Klafkowski. A concrete result of the council's activities was the collection and then the preliminary evaluation of research subjects from the sphere of international relations taken up by scientific institutions under both ministries. The council ceased its activities at the close of 1976/beginning of 1977. One reason for this was the fact that neither did it have any formal powers, nor did it have any real effect on the development of an organizational concept regarding the essential makeup of work concerning central and interministerial subjects.

In conjunction with the new organization of scientific research in Poland, between 1975 and 1980 there arose the hope that many elements of the coordination of research activity would be attained somewhat naturally, by means of a system of central, interministerial and ministerial problems, within which the subject matter of international relations would be found, broadly conceived. This subject matter was represented by topics W. 11. 6 [Central 11. 6]. "Processes of the International Economic Integration of Socialist Countries," coordinated by IKiC; by MR. III. 3 [Interministerial III. 3] "Socioeconomic Changes of Capitalist and Developing Countries," coordinated by the SGPiS Institute of the Economy of Developing Countries; and by R. III. 4

[Ministerial III. 4] "Problems of German History and Slavic-German and German-Polish Relations" and R. III. 11 [Ministerial III. 11] "East-West Economic Relations."

The program of central research thus conceived essentially did not generally consider the problems connected with international political relations, including the theory and methodology of international relations. As a result of efforts undertaken by MSZ and PISM, the foreign policy of capitalist and developing countries has been included in topic MR. III. 3 [Interministerial III. 3]. It has also been expanded by five issues teams localized within PISM:

I. problems of global politics and peaceful coexistence;

II. Security and cooperation in Europe;

III. problems of armaments and disarmament;

IV. problems connected with the German issue;

V. theory and methodology of research in the sphere of international relations.

The hopes tied in with the creation of these five issues teams have been implemented in varying degrees. This has been due to more and more limited financial outlays and to the fact that PISM is a budgetary unit without its own account.

It is projected for 1981-1985 that topic W.11.6 [Central 11.6] will be continued, as will topic MR.III.3 [Interministerial III.3], limited to the world economy and international economic cooperation. We note with satisfaction that among the six new focal and interministerial subjects, two concern international relations. These are topics MR.III.21 [Interministerial III.21], "The German States in the System of European Security," coordinated by the Institute for Western Affairs. The introduction of these two new interministerial topics permits better organized research, since five issues teams are included in topic MR.III.21, covering problems connected with international relations within a broad sopce!

1. Poland in the process of the development of a system of security and international cooperation;

2. tendencies in the foreign policy of major groups of states and selected countries and peaceful coexistence;

3. major factors of competition and cooperation among states with different sociopolitical systems (socioeconomic and ideological aspects);

4. problems of peace, international security, armaments and disarmament and the avoidance of international conflict;

5. contemporary theories of international relations and the Leninist concept of peaceful coexistence.

There should be added to the list of subjects coordinated on the national level the problem "The Community of Socialist States, Its Developmental Tendencies and Prospects in the Contemporary World," being implemented during the current 5-year plan by the Institute of Socialist Countries.

That of the most important questions of the science of international relations are found within the system of centrally coordinated problems is indisputably recognized as an important step in the organization of research in this discipline. Nevertheless, since international problems do not encompass the entire field of international relations either from the point of view of their subjective or their objective slope, their existence cannot exclude the urgent need to create a comprehensive coordination arrangement that would include such elements as a national plan of research, a system of subject and personnel information and the mutual ties between science and practice.

There appear to be several possibilities for resolving this question and for creating an appropriate coordination organ. If we consider the problems resulting from the various types of subordination of institutes and research centers, and the necessity of possessing a minimum amount of authority with regard to research topics implemented (as seen from the experience of the previous council), the best solution would be to appoint a Committee for the Study of International Relations within the framework of the Polish Academy of Sciences. It seems that despite the many noteworthy efforts of the Political Science Committee, it is not in a position to play the role of coordinator of the study of international relations.

Another possibility is to repeat the attempts at a coordination council appointed by the minister of science, higher education and technology and the minister of foreign affairs. However, the drawing of conclusions from shortcomings in the organization of the former council would be indispensable. In particular, the powers of the council with regard to interministerial subjects would have to be defined clearly from the very beginning and at least the directors of particular problems would have to be included in its makeup.

Independently of the creation of an appropriate "central" coordination organ, the activation or intensification of horizontal ties within the particular subdisciplines or specializations is indispensable, along with the eventual creation of centers that would have the duty of organizing various forms of such cooperation: from the exchange of information, through meetings, scientific conferences and discussions, to joint publications. This type of cooperation would certainly lead to raising the level of research effectiveness and to reducing unnecessary duplication. It would also ensure the contact with practice that is essential in many fields. At one time the Coordinating Committee for German Studies played such a role.

It appears that even without the institutionalization of such cooperation and contacts, it is possible to point out research centers that, without violating anyone's prerogatives and authority, could play a leading role in particular fields. Thus, for example, in the area of socialist countries, the Institute of Socialist Countries or the Institute of Basic Problems of Marxism-Leninism could play such a role; for developing countries, PISM; for U.S. issues, the Research Institute for Contemporary Problems of Capitalism; for Scandinavian issues, the Baltic Institute (Instytut Baltycki); for disarmament and international security, PISM; for the international workers' movement, the Institute of the International Workers' Movement in WSNS; for the theory of international relations, the Central Methodical Center or the Institute of International Relations of Warsaw University. This type of assignment could be easily expanded for the remaining specializations.

Another condition for the improved coordination of research and mutual inspiration is a suitable level of cooperation between institutes and research centers. For several years, PISM, together with MSZ, has organized annual meetings for directors of institutes of international affairs. Consideration should be given to the need for annual meetings not only for directors and managers of centers working with international relations, but also for annual scholarly and organizational meetings for all or the majority of academic employees who pursue this discipline, as well as the representatives of the director's staffs of interested ministries.

The level of and possibilities for the development of research on international relations are governed, to a considerable degree, by problems of access to world literature, especially current literature, as well as by the insufficiency of the documentation base; in a word, by the impossibility of gathering together the minimum of materials indispensable for the pursuit of this discipline.

While the situation in Warsaw, despite insufficient funds for the purchase of current literature, may be considered adequate (due to the existence of a number of libraries; e.g., PISM, MSZ, the University of Warsaw Library, the National Library, the Sejm Library and the Library of the Central Office of Statistics [GUS]), outside Warsaw the situation is very difficult and sometimes hopeless. This applies in particular to higher schools outside Warsaw.

Since the demand for an increase in foreign exchange resources to make library purchases is unrealistic given the current situation, other solutions must be considered. One of these could be the greater specialization of particular centers. If each of several employees of the same school has a different specialization, this makes the accumulation of reasonable collections impossible. Specialization also creates a greater opportunity for the acquisition of literature and documentation through broader participation in national and international cooperation.

Given reduced resources for foreign exchange purchases, we should honestly ask whether we ought not protect highly specialized libraries that, by fulfilling conditions of general accessibility, would guarantee at least the minimum of contact with worldwide scholarship. As a sidenote, a team of PISM employees, having this in mind, proposed a drastic cut in funding for trips abroad to allow the continued accumulation of periodicals of significance both to the institute and to all of Poland as well. Given the current lack of specialization among centers, the dispersal of resources for foreign exchange purchases may lead to a situation where access to all publications acquired in this manner will be impossible or exceedingly troublesome. Another possibility for broadening the documentation base from international organizations belonging to the United Nations system and from special foundations.

The publication of documents, translations and previews of specialized literature, as well as pertinent articles, creates some possibility for moderating difficulties in this sphere. Many materials of interest have been published through so-called "small-scale printing" methods by such centers as the Research Institute for Contemporary Problems of Capitalism, the Central Methodical Center and IKiC. PISM concentrates on publishing source materials, primarily through its periodical publishing of ZBIOR DOKUMENTOW, which unfortunately has been delayed about 2 years despite tremendous efforts and the fact that PISM is not to blame. Special collections of documents have been devoted to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe [CSCE] and to the Vienna negotiations; the publication of documents on the politics of the Chinese People's Republic continues. We may consider whether we ought not expand this type of activity considerably now in all institutes, making use of published periodicals for this purpose.

IV

With regard to the state of the academic cadre in international relations, the situation is fairly good. Approximately 200 specialists are employed in ministerial institutes and PAN, over 150 specialists work in the higher school system of the Ministry of Science, Higher Education and Technology and about 50 are employed in the schools of other ministries. Thus, about 400 employees pursue international relations professionally, as a basic discipline of study.

The distribution of the cadre is uneven. The largest of the research centers, PISM, employs 57 scholars; the Institute of Socialist Countries, 48; the Institute for Western Affairs, 42; the Research Institute for Contemporary Problems of Capitalism, 24. In the higher school system, the largest centers are the SGPiS Institute for the Economy of Developing Countries and the UW Institute for International Relations, which employs 21 workers.

Of course, it is not the number of employees that determines the level of scholarly discipline, but their preparation and activity. While at the beginning of the 1970's the majority of those pursuing international relations worked in this field from the angle of specific component disciplines (the history of diplomacy, international law, sociology, international economic relations, etc.), and more second-generation specialists have done their master's theses and their doctoral and habilitatus dissertations on international relations from an interdisciplinary point of view. This is the result of doctoral studies and seminars conducted in the UW Institute for International Relations in the Adam Mickiewicz University Political Science Institute and in PSIM, among others. The opening of a specialization in international relations within the Faculty of Political Science and Journalism at Warsaw University, as well as a new postgraduate program in international relations at WSNS, has also been significant for the development of this field of study.

As a sidenote, in a situation in which the number of dissertations in international relations is increasing, the possibility should be considered that doctorates and habilitatus degrees be granted in this discipline and that it be formally be separated from political science.

Foreign contacts--both participation in seminars and international meetings and stipendiary trips--play an essential role in the development of the cadre. The situation is far from satisfactory in this regard. As indicated in a poll conducted by the Methodical Political Science Center, approximately one-half of the specialists in international relations employed in the higher school system either have not been abroad at all or have been abroad only once or twice for several days as part of delegations. Given this situation, the demand for greater fairness in granting trips abroad is totally justified, although the position of the centers making requests does not always make this possible. However, the sojourns of eminent foreign specialists in our country can be put to better use.

Since the demand to increase the number of foreign research grants and scholarly exchanges has limited potential for implementation, we must ask whether all domestic possibilities for participation in scholarly life and for contact with specialized centers are fully utilized. They are not. In particular, a properly organized and utilized program of domestic apprenticeships could often replace trips abroad and could enable the scholars to take advantage of the literature and documentation base inaccessible outside Warsaw.

The demand for more national seminars and scholarly meetings is justified. At present, while there are quite a few such meetings, they bring together a fairly meager body of specialists, very often the same people. In discussing this problem internally, PISM evaluated its role as falling short of the need in this regard and proposed to increase its participation considerably in organizing scholarly life in Poland.

Various types of associations and scholarly organizations can also play an important role in the creation of a properly functioning academic community. Apart from an active section in international relations in the Polish Political Science Society, the demand for the creation of an International Relations Association deserves to be considered. Such an association exists in many countries and brings together eminent practitioners and journalists as well as scholars.

Publication possibilities are an essential condition for the development of research, especially basic research, on contemporary international relations.

Given the well-known difficulties under which Polish publishers labor, the field of international issues is relatively well represented in book publishing. Over several years, 30 monographs have merited awards from PISM as the best works on contemporary international relations; several dozen books appear annually in this field, although their publication is much delayed, often making them outdated. Polish Scientific Publishers [PWN], Book and Knowledge [KiW], the Ministry of National Defense [MON] Publishing House, Popular Science [Wiedza Powszechna] and the State Publishing House for Economics [PWE] (in the sphere of economic issues) contribute in particular to the development of the study of international relations. This does not mean, however, that every completed dissertation has had an opportunity to be printed. It is difficult to find a publisher even for habilitatus works, and doctoratheses are rather exceptionally published. The possibility of making use of so-called small-scale printers somewhat saves the situation. Publications run off on duplicating machines appear sporadically at particular schools and fairly regularly at several ministerial institutes (PISM, the Research Institute for Contemporary Problems of Capitalism, IKiC and the Central Methodical Center). Their propagation, however, is subject to criticism.

The situation is good with regard to the possibility of publishing studies and articles in the field of contemporary international relations. The academic community has at its disposal such periodicals as SPRAWY MIEDZYNARODOWE [International Affairs], PRZEGLAD STOSUNKOW MIEDZYNARODOWYCH [International Relations Review], PRZEGLAD ZACHODNI [Western Review], STUDIA NAUK POLITYCZNYCH [Studies in Political Science] and KAPITALIZM [Capitalism], as well as several bulletins and news announcements. This enables the annual publication of several hundred articles and meets the needs of the community in this area. On the other hand, the extent to which the existing periodicals inspire potential authors and arouse discussion and honest scholarly criticism is open to discussion. Much remains to be done in these matters.

A serious drawback, felt by representatives of the study of international relations, is the lack of foreign-language publications. While there are the following English-language publications--STUDIES ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS, STUDIES ON THE DEVELOPING COUNTRIES, POLISH WESTERN AFFAIRS (in the French version: LA POLOGNE ET LES AFFAIRES OCCIDENTALES), POLISH YEAR BOOK OF INTERNATIONAL LAW and POLISH PERSPECTIVES (in several language versions)--except for PISM publications, problems connected with international issues represent merely a fragment of the contents of these periodicals.

If the wealth of Polish study of international relations is to be known beyond the borders of the Polish People's Republic, if we are to participate in international dialogue, if we are to present Polish foreign policy and the position of our country in light of contemporary focal problems, while at the same time shaping its image in the international community, then the undertaking of the publication of dissertations and monographs on international relations in the languages of congresses is indispensable. The example of several other socialist countries, particularly the USSR and Hungary, is illuminating in this regard. PWN has had some success in the sphere of foreign-language publications.

One of the possibilities that has not been used enough is publication in cooperation with centers abroad, for many publications issued by PISM in cooperation with the institutes of socialist countries and Western institutes. Examples of Polish works in other countries are relatively meager.

***

In conclusion it should be stated that, despite limitations and even reductions in state outlays for research and for the cadre, in the case of international relations this does not have to mean the inevitable regression or halting of its development, although the restricted purchases of foreign-language literature undoubtedly can be severe and dangerous in the long term. Certainly, the current economic difficulties of the country stop the extensive development of this new discipline. At present, it is essential that we place greater emphasis on the quality and on the level of our work--in a word, on intensive development, on the broader introduction of the results of our research into the worldwide literature and on the fuller utilization and activation of the research potential that has been created. The opportunity for this is created, above all, by the improved organization and coordination of research, greater specialization of particular centers, better utilization of existing publication possibilities and improved cooperation among particular centers, as well as between political science and practice.

Kielce, Radom Area Party Activities

Warsaw SLOWO LUDU in Polish 16 Dec 81 pp 1, 2

[Report from the meeting of the Kielce Voivodship PZPR Executive Board: "Directing the Party Under the State of Martial Law, Intermediate Elements Within the Party Work Structure; the Sociopolitical Situation in the Voivodship]

[Text] The strengthening and discipline of party ranks are absolutely necessary under martial law conditions. Yesterday, the voivodship party committee's executive board became familiar with instructions pertaining to directing the party under conditions of danger to the security of the state and with actions, already undertaken, regarding all party members who have declined to follow published directives, among others, those prohibiting participation in strikes and all other forms of protest. There can be and there is no room in the party for those who attempt to or actually participate in them.

The executive board, in turn, adopted a resolution pertaining to party organization structure in Kielce Voivodship. Twelve regions of party activity were named and designated as the intermediate elements in the present structure of party activity. These regions, concentrating the regional organization and party echelons, will be as follows: two in Kielce (for the city and the suburban territorial echelons) and one each in Skarzysko, Ostrowiec, Strarachowice, Busko, Kazimierza Wielka, Pinczow, Jedrzejow, Wloszczowa, Konskie and Miechow.

The executive board devoted considerable attention to an evaluation of the socioeconomic situation in the voivodship subsequent to the proclamation of martial law in the nation. Noted were a distinct revival and activization of a majority of party organizations in industry and the discussions they have inspired as to the necessity of the declaration of martial law and about the aims which the party has staked out for itself. Expressing thanks and recognition to the ever increasing party action groups, with city committees, among others, in Ostrowiec, which can be distinguished by their self-sacrificing agitator work, successful actions in protection of public law and order and in defense of public property. We are very grateful to such a group of party members for squelching a conflict which was ignited for a short period the day before yesterday at the M. Nowotko Iron and Steel Foundry by a group of provocateurs.

The executive board of the voivodship committee expressed recognition and respect for the organs of public order and the soldiers of the Polish Army for their cautious but decisive and effective actions undertaken on behalf of the maintenance of law and order and their enforcement of the ordinances of the Military Council of National Salvation (WRON). There is no leniency for those who do not care about the proper functioning of their places of work, who wish to engage in adventurism or who live at the expense of someone else.

It was determined at the meeting that the method of party action must be the everyday presence of party activists among the people and working with the people. It is a task of particular importance to have the presence of party members wherever danger appears--where it is particularly difficult. The purpose of undertaking activities by the party is normalization of life, possible rapid termination of the state of martial law and taking part in the fulfillment of the program of the Ninth Party Congress and in socialist renewal.

Party Discussions

Kielce SLOWO LUDU in Polish 30 Dec 81 pp 1, 3

[Discussion between staff writer Mieczyslaw Kaca and party personnel from the Metal Products Factory in Radom [FWM Radom]: Stefan Banach, plant party secretary, and Stefan Maksym, Ryszard Bujak, Andrzej Kazmierski, Ryszard Surma and Zbigniew Korcz; date and place not specified]

[Text] The "Tin Can" which was so popular for the past 6 months--now named the Metal Products Factory in Radom [FWM]--is again an independent enterprise. Self-government, good preparation for social reforms became a contribution for the entire, over 700--man work force. Taking a considerable part in these matters--as should be apparent from the interviews--was the party organization. It performs under specific conditions.

Stefan Banach: For several times already the comrades have elected me their secretary. They expressed their confidence in me in the last election, too. We, here at the "Tin Can" were being pushed down from the forefront. Such an atmosphere was created that, in the opinion of the people, we were ceasing to be credible. Our engagement in the struggle for self-dependence of the plant, which in reality is a branch of Walter [Walter Machine Works in Radom], gave us an opportunity for full participation in those matters which are the very life of the work force.

Stefan Maksym: The Radom Enamel Works has a longer history than the metal plants [FNM]. Entire generations of workers were employed there. Then, suddenly, it was decided to change the profile of production leaving nothing of the heretofore existing technology. Thus party members also have their contribution in maintaining the production of kitchen gas ranges.

Ryszard Bujak: The pressure for rapid self-determination was so strong that even the local Solidarity gave up strike action. It passed without major tensions. And wonder of wonders--even the leader of the Interfactory Workers Commission [MKR], Antoni Sobieraj, who comes from our work force, looked the other way at nonparticipation in strike action.

Stefan Banach: Sobieraj, he's quite a character. Not too long ago, while participating in a Solidarity meeting in FWM, he presented the subject very strongly, demagogically. He stated that because of Solidarity Poles will no longer be short of anything because they have their own... oil. "All that is needed to do is to turn open the valve on petroleum oil and we will be supplied with foodstuffs by... France." He always did look in one direction--West. Others called for surrendering of PZPR party cards. Comrades Surma, Pietkowski and Lach had suffered a lot from "union activists" during the past few months.

Andrzej Kazmierski: I'm a PZPR member without much longevity. When I entered the party ranks I knew that I would have to give more of myself. In these difficult times the majority of the comrades acted the same. Our plant became independent even though we had no orders or component parts for the kitchen ranges. Nevertheless we managed to provide work for people. Instead of the 40,000 ranges projected by Walter we will produce 80,000 ranges this year.

Ryszard Surma: The most important thing for me was to retain my identity, not to fall for the demagoguery, to become resistant to attacks. I presided over a branch trade union, however, all the members were party members.

Stefan Maksym: A matter in which we all participated was to insure work for people and to insure further development for the independent FWM. We have won. The first 10, fully assembled, new gas kitchen ranges, trademarked NINA are ready for shipment. Export to Soviet Union will remain the cornerstone of our existence.

Ryszard Bujak: Participating in the temporary self-government which we have established were the representatives of all sociopolitical organizations and the best professional people. It has fulfilled a very useful role.

Andrzej Kazmierski: The draft of next year's plan is ready. The management has calculated that we should clear 24 million zlotys profit. This is based on an estimated production of 120,000 kitchen ranges. If we fulfill this plan we will lower the costs and there will be enough money left over to reconstruct the dismantled enamel works for social purposes and also be enough for pay raises.

Stefan Maksym: The party organization is not interested solely in production matters. In the new situation, we care about the atmosphere of peace in our factory. We are all acting sensibly and the members of Solidarity are also contributing their share.

Zbigniew Korcz: We have formed a propaganda-agitation team. Our activists are talking with people, reporting back their observations and doubts and making an effort to understand the needs of the workers. Today we have received a number of problems from representatives of various departments. They pertain to work conditions, pay matters and calculations. The answers are being made available, among other means, through our radio programs. We also program commentaries, we kill rumors and make appeals.

Stefan Banach: There are 185 of us [party members] in the plant. It is still a large number. We are preparing for the next round of meetings. There will be plenty of subjects to discuss, to assume a position with respect to the past, to prepare us for work under new conditions which were supposed to be easier, however, due to the existing situation it will be very complicated. Common sense and [party] discipline should accompany us with every step.

Party Secretaries Meeting

Kielce SLOWO LUDU in Polish 31 Dec 81- Jan 82 pp 1, 2

[Article: "Conference of Local Echelons' Secretaries in Kielce and Radom Voivodships--In Defense of Socialist Poland"]

[Text] Under the leadership of Maciej Lubczynski, first secretary of the Kielce Voivodship PZPR Committee, a voivodship committee conference took place including the first secretaries of city, city-gmina [parish], gmina and plant PZPR committees. The conference was devoted to the mission of party organizations during the difficult period of martial law and to the leadership role which should be played by party members in the reconstruction of the sociopolitical forces front which serves in the defense of socialist Poland. Also taking part in the conference were, among others, plenipotentiary representative of the National Defense Committee (KOK)--the military commissar for Kielce Voivodship, Col [Dipl] Stanislaw Iwanski; the plenipotentiary representative of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the PZPR and member of the party Executive Board of Kielce Voivodship--Kazimierz Matwiejuk, and also the voivodship commandant of the citizens militia (MO) in Kielce--Col Jozef Dolak, who spoke about the state of security and public order in Kielce Province. He noted that actions undertaken by the law enforcement forces during the period of martial law have considerably improved public discipline. Together with soldiers of the Polish Army and members of the Volunteer Reserve of the Citizens Militia [ORMO] it became possible to reinforce the patrolling-protective services, undertake many meaningful actions toward effective pursuit of the perpetrators of political crimes, which in turn resulted in a decrease of unlawful endangerment, principally of the criminal type. So far there has been no need in Kielce Voivodship to employ means of direct coercion. All the rumors and tales concerning the inhumane treatment of internees and other detainees, who were arrested in connection with crimes, must, therefore, evoke astonishment. In spite of the comparatively quiet atmosphere, attempts are being made in the voivoship to form new organizational structures, kept secret from the state organs, and to propagate proclamations and slogans which sow unrest among the factory work forces. Law enforcement forces are engaged in a decisive struggle against all such activities.

Next, the secretaries of the PZPR voivodship committee in Kielce informed the confreres about the current sociopolitical and economic situation in all aspects of our life. Marian Surma, secretary of the voivodship committee, reported on the principal direction of the party's organizational work in the coming period. It pertained to support of initiatives and activities of the Military Council of National Salvation [WRON], forming of a social climate of support for all activities which shield the socialist system and protect the society from a civil war. There can be no room for improvisation in this activity. The courage and responsible and meaningful work of each member of the party will count in this undertaking.

Zdzislaw Kowalski, secretary of the voivodship committee, spoke about the country's economic situation and on this background about the economic results achieved during the past 11 months in Kielce Voivodship. The volume of production, as compared to the same period of last year, has fallen to 60 billion zlotys (a drop of 12.1 percent). Advancement of the yearly plan in housing construction amounted to 57 percent. As compared to last year, purchases of grain, milk and slaughter animals [by the state] are lower. Martial law had a positive influence on work discipline and on lowering of the incidence of unexcused absences. Those phenomena, in conjunction with normal execution of daily tasks lead to expectations that Poland will emerge faster from its economic crisis.

Wladyslaw Kmitkowski, secretary of the voivodship committee, principally described propaganda-informative activities introduced since the declaration of martial law. It was mainly a matter of those political themes which prevent national peril and convince the population as to the correctness of the undertakings of WRON. Another equally important task is the maintenance of frequent personal contact by party activists with the factory work forces.

In the discussion lasting many hours, the secretaries shared their observations and experiences from party work during the initial days following the imposition of martial law. They stressed the necessity to undertake inspirational party activities aimed at filling the gap in factories which had resulted as a consequence of the suspension of trade union activities. They indicated a need to form the closest possible cooperation with youth organizations and to finish the process of purging the party of people who are not worthy of carrying the PZPR party card.

Maciej Lubczynski, first secretary of the Kielce PZPR voivodship committee, spoke at the conclusion of the conference. He stated that last year will pass into Poland's history as a significant period in the life of the party and the country. The [existing] situation created a sharp division in the society, resulting in tremendous psychological devastation, particularly among the youth. The party, acting under conditions of grave political struggle and being attacked from within and without, did manage, nevertheless, to conduct a democratic reporting and election campaign which culminated in the Ninth Extraordinary PZPR Congress. The members of the party were the first to take up the effort of reconstruction of confidence in the party, not hesitating to own up to past mistakes, and actively conducted the activities of their echelons. This fact is even more worthy of attention in that the comrades who assumed positions of authority in the party at all echelons often had very little experience in that kind of activity. Praise is due to all those who stood steadfast in their faith to socialist ideology.

Efforts of the party and the government undertaken during the past year to control the crisis and to introduce political reforms and economic improvement were torpedoed with full premeditation. In order to protect the society from civil war, a decision was undertaken to impose martial law. The armed forces of Poland took upon their shoulders the burden of defending the state and the society against the enemies of socialist Poland. It is the party's share of this burden to strengthen ties with the working class, rekindle the faith in the socialist program for reconstruction of the country and to demonstrate real perspectives for overcoming the crisis. The party cannot interrupt the building of its function of promoting understanding between all the political forces of national salvation.

Next, the first secretary informed those assembled regarding the course and topics of the meeting between the plenipotentiary representatives of KOK and the first secretaries of voivodship committees which took place 2 days ago in Warsaw under the leadership of the chairman of the WRON, the first secretary of the PZPR Central Committee, Wojciech Jaruzelski. To conclude, the first secretary of the voivodship committee wished all party activists a happy new year.

A conference of the secretaries, touching on similar subjects, also took place in the voivodship bureau in Radom. Meeting on the same day were city mayors and gmina chiefs of Radom Voivodship. We shall return later to the topics which were the discussion subjects at that meeting.

New Year greetings were presented to the activists from the first secretary of the Radom Voivodship PZPR Committee, Bogdan Prus; the voivodship governor [Wojewoda], Col Eng Alojzy Wojciechowski, and the military commissar, Brig Gen Mieczyslaw Urbanski.

Discussion with Bogdan Prus

Kielce SLOWO LUDU in Polish 31 Dec 81-1 Jan 82 pp 1, 3

[Interview with Bogdan Prus, first secretary of the Radom Voivodship PZPR committee: "All Forces of the Party for Stabilization of Political and Economic Life" by staff reporters Jerzy Figas and Mieczyslaw Kaca, date and place not given]

SLOWO LUDU: The year 1981 is drawing to an end. It was not the easiest year both in terms of the economy and in sociopolitical activity. Please tell us Comrade Secretary, with what kind of personal feelings are you bidding it goodbye?

Boleslaw Prus: Mixed ones. When this year was starting it appeared that a stabilization of life would ensue, peace would come and, consequently, the results of 1981 would be better than those achieved inthe previous year. Unfortunately, this did not come to pass. During the past year there were no conditions for the conduct of normal business. The activity of the Independent Self-Governing Trade Unions [NSZZ] Solidarity turned toward adventurism and the [resultant] political confrontation did not always permit concentration on the most pressing social and economic problems.

This was a year of great tensions. Announcements of strikes and strike alerts caused nervousness and a state of excitation. The next cause turned out to be production and supply difficulties in Radom and in the voivodship. We are ending this year with considerably worse results than one would expect given the circumstances which were at our disposal.

SLOWO LUDU: To what degree--disregarding, of course, the difficulties which are, of necessity, borne by a state of martial law--did the situation in the voivodship change during the second half of December?

B.P.: I believe that the population of Radom and the voivodship have accepted, with a great degree of understanding, the decision to introduce martial law. Not only party members, but also many people from outside the party ranks are working together today to insure peace and order. All the plants are working normally. During the past couple of weeks the discipline in places of work has improved drastically, despite many problems with supply [deliveries] all the current production tasks have been properly fulfilled. The food market situation and slaughter animal purchases have improved. All this is the best proof that among the majority of the work force we have a general understanding for the demands of the present times. I wish to extend my words of thanks and recognition to the citizens of Radom and the voivodship for displaying such a great spirit of citizenship. We may, therefore, have hope that in 1982, we shall see further improvement in all aspects of our sociopolitical and economic life.

SLOWO LUDU: Since we are talking about the market and supply matters, it appears that the aid from our comrades from Magdeburg [East Germany] was more than just a symbolic gesture.

B.P.: Definitely. We have received goods which were needed very much on the market: food, footwear and children's clothing. I had an opportunity to taok, by telephone, with the first secretary of the SED district committee in Magdeburg, who was very active in arranging the entire shipment of goods to Radom. He told me that they are sending all they can share with us today. I know that our neighbors from beyond the Odra intend to continue this form of cooperation. This is an opportunity to express our thanks once more for this gesture, especially since our German comrades have their own very difficult problems.

SLOWO LUSU: The current, complex situation imposes particular obligations on party members.

B.P.: The year past has caused tremendous devastation in our routine activities; let us have no illusions that we will come out of it very soon. In any case, there is only one thing to do: All our energy must be directed toward discipline and honest work. This must apply to us all, particularly to us as party members. We are bound to follow this by the resolutions of the Ninth Congress and plenums of the party Central Committee and in particular by the decisions of the Fourth Plenum which, among others, described unequivocally the relationship of party members toward a strike. The School Committee of the Higher School of Engineering [WSI] has already taken appropriate action against PZPR members who supported actively the so-called protest action of Solidarity, which by its posture had lengthened the conflict.

During the conference of the executive board of the voivodship committee, we have laid down the rules respective to evaluations of cadre members occupying leadership positions. These activities are being coordinated with the voivodship KOK. Several decisions have been made in order to introduce changes in those areas where there are well-grounded reservations. We have adopted a principle that those persons who are incapable of carrying out their duties will be replaced with others, those who will be capable of properly directing those portions of work which are assigned to them. The political workers cadre is subject to similar evaluation.

SLOWO LUDU: Comrade Secretary, how do you look upon those party members who are also members of Solidarity and who are taking an active part in the activities of that trade union?

B.P.: Solidarity has turned out to be an organization which has guided some groups of people upon a wrongful path. There is a need to reevaluate the activities of those PZPR members who, while being simultaneously members of Solidarity, voiced and supported the extremist tendencies of the leadership of that trade union. We will conduct appropriate discussions. I'm of the opinion that the front ranks of the party must define their position relative to those matters...

SLOWO LUDU: In listening to many people, one can detect a fear that the [part] line worked out by the Ninth Congress, the line of socialist renewal and cooperation, may be discontinued.

B.P.: The words of Gen Wojciech Jaruzelski directed to the nation during the 13 December proclamation, and underlined again in his Christmas Eve speech, have only one meaning. There is no return to that period which we have agreed to call "times prior to August 1980." A guarantee of this is contained in, among others, the attitude of party members and the activity of basic party organs and echelons based on a truly democratic state of the party.

SLOWO LUDU: What are the most urgent tasks today for the voivodship echelon of the party's basic organization?

B.P.: Unification of all the party's forces toward a most rapid stabilization of political and economic life. Many branch party organizations (OOP) and Primary Party Organizations (POP) are in the process of holding very frequent meetings. One can observe a great deal of interest in all that touches us at the place of work, at home, in the voivodship and in the nation. There are many opinions as to how we should act in a given situation and how we are to join in arriving at solutions to important problems. For instance, a question is being raised concerning a widening of party problematics pertaining to the socioexistential needs of the work force. The matter refers to the conditions which have developed as a result of the suspension of trade unions--party organizations should initiate appropriate activity and exercise control in this area over the actions of the administration. We support the formation of social commissions within plant committees. Such a task force could also be formed by the voivodship committee.

SLOWO LUDU: We are finding ourselves in the forefront of an economic reform.

B.P.: Yes, this is in accordance with the assumptions and the laws which are currently in force, the reform will be implemented. There's no doubt that the implementation requires additional, complementary decisions. Generally speaking, the work on the reform has to continue, amendments have to introduced as they are dictated by the conditions of life. Because of this, for a certain period of time, the direction of the economy--especially now, taking into consideration the state of martial law--has to contain certain elements of directive type. The basic postulate of the reform: self-financing, must be taken into consideration from the very onset.

SLOWO LUFU: Any wishes for the New Year?

B.P.: Common participation in the restitution of the fatherland, to make it a land of peace and orderliness, a land of industrious people. We have to prove that we are worthy of Poland. If we do work better then we will also solve our basic problems better, we will be able to satisfy, to an ever-increasing extent, our existential needs.

The executive board of the voivodship committee has issued an appeal to all party members for a full commitment in solving assorted difficulties. What we wrote in our appeal I consider to be justifiably included in an address to all the inhabitants of Radom and the voivodship.

I wish you, above all, good health, the least of troubles and the satisfaction which comes from knowing that you have done your job well.

FUNCTIONS, ACTIVITIES OF VOIVODSHIP DEFENSE COMMITTEES DESCRIBED

Gdansk Meeting

Warsaw ZOLNIERZ POLSKI in Polish No 6, 7 Feb 82 p2

[Article by Wladyslaw Misiolek: "Minutes of One Meeting -- The Voivodship Defense Committee in Operation"]

[Text] The Voivodship Defense Committees (WKO) are nothing new, although many of us did not learn of their existence until after the declaration of martial law. The committees were created on the authorization of the Sejm law dated November 1967 on the universal obligation to defend the country.

Under peaceful conditions, the tasks of the WKO consist mainly of directing a broadly-conceived range of defense matters in the voivodship.

In the martial law situation, the committees discharge leadership functions in relation to the local bodies of administration, coordinate the work of factories, state and cooperative institutions, and social organizations.

After the declaration of martial law, the first WKO action consisted mainly of insuring law and order, the satisfaction of people's basic living needs, the functioning of the administration, and the maintenance of production continuity. Taking into consideration the instructions of the supreme officials, the WKOs sharpened their requirements concerning one-man leadership and the responsibility of voivodship governors, city presidents, directors, and heads of plants.

The WKOs consist of voivodship governors and their deputies, secretaries of voivodship party committees, commandants of voivodship citizens' militias (MO), and chiefs of the Voivodship Military Staff. Plenipotentiaries of the National Defense Committee, who are authorized to oversee the activity of the committees, take part in WKO work.

Gdansk, 6 January

I had the opportunity to attend a local meeting of the Voivodship Defense Committee. Because of my profession, I have often "served at" sessions, meetings, conferences, and general assemblies of various sorts of groups, and I know from experience how difficult it was to sort out the concrete matter, the problems resolved, and the issues handled, from among the millions of words and Baroque ceremonies. Now that I am faced with the task of recounting the proceedings of a WKO session of 2 and a half hours, I find that I confront another difficulty: a list of all the matters taken care of would exceed a single article. I am therefore forced to limit myself to a few examples and a couple of reflections on the method and style of the Gdansk WKO's work.

The session which I attended was 16th such meeting to be held. The first was held the day after the declaration of martial law, that is, 14 December. The next ones were held daily, and it is only recently that the WKO has been coming together every other day.

The information from Col dyplomowany [academy graduate] Zenon Molczyk, chief of the Voivodship Military Staff and simultaneously plenipotentiary of the KOK [National Defense Committee] at the Gdansk WKO, shows that the following issues predominated in the past activity of the committee:

Undertaking of production in all plants of the region, including such giants as the Lenin Shipyards in Gdansk,

Working toward the effective and efficient operation of administration,

Introduction of law and order, the insuring of safety and security to residents, and the adherence to the demands stemming from martial law.

The WKO not only makes decisions but also scrupulously monitors their implementation.

But the successive WKO meetings begin with the normal military punctuality, without any ceremony or even a call to order. The voivodship governor who is at the same time the WKO head says: "We are starting."

First Point: Human Affairs

This means an assessment of the status and functioning of the health and social welfare service in the voivodship. An army surgeon gives a talk. I have the impression of listening to a military report on the condition of the hospitals, pharmacies, social welfare establishments, nurseries, child welfare facilities, and so on.

Nothing is concealed. The information about what is going well is presented in most cursory form, with broader treatment being given to the shortcomings and difficulties, including proposals for their solution. I note certain facts:

In conjunction with the introduction of civil war, it was necessary to tighten up the criteria for admitting patients to hospitals, in order to insure the necessary reserve of beds. House calls by physicians were curtailed. The restrictions did not apply to mother and child care. The current situation is making it possible to gradually remove the restrictions. The hospitals are operating on whole-day staffing patterns, and this also applies to epidemiological and x-ray units.

Provisions were made to insure the necessary supply of blood, an action which military assistance made possible. The production of blood substitutes was expanded. The shortage of certain drugs was watched, especially antibiotics and analgesics. It was therefore necessary to introduce certain restrictions (for example, certain medications are being sold in single packages, and others require prescriptions).

The supply of fuel and heating to public health facilities is good. The voivodship hospital must have an independent source of electric power. Therefore, this request to the KOK plenipotentiary: "Comrade Colonel--Perhaps the army can provide us with two assemblies [generators?]... And one more thing: owing to the severe winter the ambulances cannot reach all points. For this reason we are asking for two transport vehicles..."

The response: "As to the assemblies, I will have to find out what the possibilities are, but the armored vehicles can be given to you at the end of the meeting." Then the voivodship physician's suggestion: "If the orthopedic workshops could be shifted somewhere else, then the voivodship hospital would be able to accommodate several dozen more beds."

The voivodship governor's response was that the matter could be considered settled.

Suggestion: The health service has been asking for years to have the building in which the Youth Palace is located transferred to it.

Response: You will get it. We will find someplace else for the young people.

Suggestion: There are great difficulties with insuring assistance for some of the elderly, the ill, and the disabled, and these people under our care find themselves in very difficulty housing conditions. The severe winter may even endanger their lives. Meanwhile, the recreation centers of the municipal economy and ZREMB are not fully utilized...

Response: Beginning tomorrow, half the places in these facilities will be at your disposal.

And this is the way it went, proposal after proposal, suggestion after suggestion. Even matters which have been at issue for years now are being taken care of right away, on the spot. This is the military style of operation and military efficiency.

Second Point: Also Human Affairs

This means service to the population on the part of post offices. The director of the District Post Office presents the issues.

I have the impression that time has gone backwards and again we are listening to a meeting at which people are talking about everything and nothing. Initially the person speaking tells the members of the commit tee in a "lecture" about the limitations in the working of the post office resulting from martial law, which in this body is simply untactful. The first unable to contain himself is the voivodship governor:

"We would like to know what is being done, so that despite these restrictions there will be fewer complaints about the workings of the post office. We cannot adopt the principle that we are limiting our operations and everything is all right. What is being done to use the period of telephone silence to make a technical review of the equipment? The time has finally come for our post office too to operate the way post offices in every civilized country operate. We cannot do much to make people come out of the shops satisfied, but they ought not to have to complain about the post office."

There are more critical views. The district attorney points out that in the course of monitoring management personnel we must not fire people for their activity prior to 13 December, unless it was clearly inimical or violated the law. The commandant of the voivodship MO is of the same opinion.

The KOK plenipotentiary: "We cannot accept the information given us. Because the director has been unable to prepare straightforward material, I am calling for the creation of a three-person committee to familiarize us with the operation of the post office at next week's meeting of our committee.

With this then, the joking around came to an end.

Third Point: Human Affairs Once More

This means a review of the proposals to resume the activity of the cultural facilities. The head of the propaganda staff makes his report.

The stabilization of the sociopolitical situation in the voivodship provides encouragement for the gradual restoration of the operation of the theaters, motion picture houses, museums, houses of culture, and so on, but it is necessary to follow certain requirements of martial law, such as obtaining the approval of the censors to put on a presentation (most of the theaters have met this requirement). We cannot neglect the fact that in the cultural community people's attitudes vary. Therefore, it is necessary to take into account the possibility that somebody will want to exploit a cultural presentation to sow unrest.

After a review of all the pros and cons it was decided first of all that the theaters for children would be reopened, and then the local movie houses, followed by the urban movie houses, museums, exhibitions, and so on.

Fourth Point: Winter Alarm

This means measures taken to counteract the effects of the sudden onslaught of winter. The deputy governor of the voivodship speaks.

This point was not planned. The situation dictated it. Beginning 13 December the tricity has been living through a sudden onslaught of winter: a severe cold snap, copious precipitation of snow, and biting wind. New falls occur right after the snow plows pass through the streets. There are numerous breakdowns of the trains and streetcars. As the result of the partial interruption of transportation, a number of people never made it to work. There are serious problems with supply.

The first attempts to handle the cold snap were undertaken in the early morning, but because they proved inadequate it was necessary to mobilize all means and forces, directing them to the most important sectors of the front (for example, in order to provide for the functioning of urban transportation, it was necessary to give up the removal of snow from the expressway around the tricity).

The voivodship governor makes the decision to give the winter alarm and authorizes his deputy to take the necessary action required by the situation.

The subject will be continued at the next meeting of the committee.

Fifth Point: Various Matters

This includes personnel issues, first of all.

The director of the children's facility is removed from his position for failure to concern himself adequately with those under his care. If the accusation that the children's packages coming from foreign assistance have been stolen from is confirmed, then the case will be referred to the courts.

Two directors were appointed. For the time being they will handle the duties of the director. If they work out, they will be appointed to the position permanently.

So much for the reporter's notes from the meeting of the Gdansk Voiovdship Defense Committee. They do not tell everything about this meeting, but this is not just because I managed to note down barely some of the issues discussed. It also has to do with the method and style of the operation of the WKO. Therefore I have also to write something else for our readership:

PS to the Minutes

1. The committee operates in basically a military style. One has the impression that finally the time of empty words has passed and that it is deeds which count. The principle of operation is simple enough: an analysis of the needs and possibilities, immediate decision, implementation.

2. There is not a shred of bureaucratic nonsense. It is as though all sorts of regulations impeding action have disappeared. Of course, there are regulations and they are in effect. It is just that they are finally being treated like something which is to facilitate action, not hamper it.

3. All the issues taken up were human affairs. And they were resolved in view of the needs of the residents of the voivodship.

4. The notion of "holding office" has come to an end. Work in positions of leadership is social service. Anybody who does not understand this must go. The main criterion for personnel decisions consists of expert skill and the ability to operate efficiently.

5. If the method and style of operation from the period of martial law become a fixed habit, then we can be more peaceful about the future and less worried.

Comments of Warsaw Commissioner

Warsaw ZOLNIERZ WOLNOSCI in Polish 9 Feb 82 pp 1,2

[Interview with Gen Dywizji Dr Habilitowany Wladyslaw Mroz, National Defense Committee [KOK] plenipotentiary, and military commissar of the capital city and voivodship of Warsaw, by PAP reporter Witold Smolarek: "Not By an Argument of Force, But by Force of Argument"]

> [Text] Reflections on the subject of the activity of the Voivodship National Defense Committee, which has been in operation for more than 7 weeks, and on the issues related to an important leadership function, that of supervision (in the military inspectorate), are shared in a Polish Press Agency interview with Wladyslaw Mroz.

[Question] One of the important conditions for getting out of the crisis is the efficient operation of the bodies of administration and authority. Under martial law conditions, the voivodship defense committees [WKO] play the role of coordinator of the efforts undertaken in this realm. What does the balancesheet of the action taken up until now look like?

[Answer] We are going into the 8th week of difficult work conceived as a form of support for the bodies of state and economic leadership. Unfortunately, reality clearly shows that there is a very great deal to do to "put our house in order," and that too often, instead of being merely a source of additional energy, the military commissars and military groups subordinate to them are in certain instances forced to step over into the prerogatives of the administrative bodies, in order to liberate social initiative and civic action to overcome the crisis. Up until now we have conducted more than 15 comprehensive reviews and two problematic (interview-photoinformational) reviews. They have covered areas of life which are sensitive for any complex, especially a great complex in the capital. This means milk distribution, bakeries, urban transport companies and the urban sanitation enterprise, CPN construction, Polish State Railways (Warsaw railway junction), the automobile factory and Ursus mechanical plants, Warsaw-Wola section, thermal-electric power system, and Otwock and Piaseczno. We directed our successive "hard blows" at monitoring the level of support for meat and food stores. We do intend to perform our own sort of anatomical investigation of the operation of all spheres of life. The conclusion? Criminal lack of sense of responsibility on the part of the leadership of the plants and enterprises, waste of public property, lack of compunction with regard to self and others, weak leadership and administration, poor working conditions, glaring neglect in the realm of occupational health and safety and fire prevention, poor level of sanitary and hygienic conditions of facilities, and inadequate concern for the social existential conditions of workers, and, above all, complete lack of monitoring and control of the very important function of management. There are many weak points in management. This is shown by both theory and practice. This is directly related to the neglect of monitoring and accountability.

[Question] What is going on, for example, when the conclusions overall consist of the picture you gave above?

[Answer] What ought to be going on. We analyze the causes, look for the remedies, give concrete conclusions and request immediate consequences, where called for, in relation to those people guilty of neglect. This is not the first time that it has worked out that a great deal can be nearly remedied "in the course of the march," as we used to say in the army. It also turned out that only in-depth monitoring can upgrade the situation which still rather frequently exists around us, one which at one time Gen Wojciech Jaruzelski defined in this way: "Some work while others watch, others watch while people work."

[Question] Here we are getting into the sphere of control methodology, and in the army this was called inspection. In the hope of generalization, please expand on this subject.

[Answer] Inspection, control, monitoring, accountability. These are an extremely important oversight function. Our military practice has proved that only in-depth control can produce benefit. On the other hand, taking the issue in exact terms, this means the straightforward execution of the suggestions resulting from this control. What is more, shallow, superficial control is a greater evil than no control at all. Here we should remember to respect the definition of good work, which closes with this statement: "Each does his own work, each works well, each reports when he is finished, and each is controlled and held to account."

[Question] What should be taken into account at the stage of planning control? How should the control group be selected?

[Answer] The control plan (annual, quarterly) is kept absolutely secret and encompasses the weakest, most neglected parts of the controlled group. The focus should be on the basic functional echelons (for example, the bakeries, transport security, milk distribution, and so on); basic administrative bodies (for example, city districts, towns, parishes (gminy)); basic production groups (industrial plants, state farms, cooperatives, and so on). The controlling body should be made up of good specialists, experts with high-level ethics and morals, people of objectivity, a sense of principle, thoroughness, and ... bonhommie! The way the control operation is prepared is vital. Each person should simply understand the significance of it, have the maximum information about the installation to be examined, know the purpose of the investigation and its problem sphere and so on. Instructions should be conducted with the utmost care prior to the investigation. This is often made light of and not appreciated. If this happens, it is a grave error.

[Question] And how is the control done?

[Answer] In the army we break it down into three stages, by convention, of course. First we do the initial control, which represents sort of a "pass" to the basic control. The final stage is a summation of the control which has been completed. Among other things, the first stage checks on order, occupational health and safety, fire protection, sanitation and hygiene... and checks to see that the recommendation of previous visits has been acted upon. If the general result is unsatisfactory, then the basic control is not conducted. Let us assume that the result was favorable.

We pass on to the basic control, which should begin with listening to the information (report) from the director, the superior, on the subject of the situation in the unit being controlled. Later the individual subcommissions of the control body check, examine, and analyze, for example, the moral-political condition, discipline and attitudes among the workers, the basic activity of the enterprise, and the way this activity is safeguarded and insured in terms of materials and organization and in the realm of the safeguarding of order, regularity, and social-existential conditions. After all the necessary action has been completed, the workers' complaints have been listened to, and photographs have been made to show glaring examples of neglect and the reports are drawn up, then there is a summing up along with a list of recommendations and a date for compliance.

It is extremely important to use the control results and to check to see that all the control recommendations are carried out. This is handled by the individual units of the administration and by military people, and, if need be, by the WKO.

I have presented the issues very briefly concerning "control methodology." We must add that they are no secret to any of those upon whose sense of responsibility and honesty depends the functioning of the enterprises, offices, and bodies serving the state and the economy, all of us.

A final reflection: in all our action, the purpose of which is to introduce peace, order, discipline, concern for state property, production continuity, and so on, we should always remember that the effect of the control should be achieved not with the argument of force but with the force of argument.

MARTIAL LAW REGULATIONS FOR HIGHER SCHOOLS PUBLISHED

Warsaw RZECZPOSPOLITA in Polish 25 Jan 82 p 6

[Article: "How Higher Schools Are Working"]

[Text] Some higher schools have already fully resumed teaching activities. In others, preparations for undertaking interrupted studies are continuing.

Before making the decision to set in motion academic studies, the Ministry of Science, Higher Schools and Technology [MNSzWIT] prepared two documents. They are: Guidelines concerning the operation of higher schools during the period of compulsory martial law and Provisional Regulations for daytime studies in higher schools subject to the minister of NSzWIT. These documents, consulted upon in deliberations with rectors, stated briefly regulate the operational prcoedure of schools during the period of martial law and the conditions which must be fulfilled for higher schools to resume their statutory activity in full. All members of the academic community, therefore, should familiarize themselves with the contents of these documents. We wish to facilitate this. Hence, we are printing a column devoted entirely to one subject--the functioning of schools during the period of martial law.

Law Continues to be Binding

As everyone knows, the beginning of the current academic year was extremely stormy. What added to this was the different interpretations of the regulations of the "old" law from 5 November 1958 on higher schooling made in the spirit of the contents of statements included in the draft of the "new" law. The "Guidelines" mentioned state unequivocally: "Higher schools operate on the basis of the law from 1958 and regulations issuing from the martial law decree."

In conjunction with this, the rector runs the school--singlehandedly. He acts through the medium of the other one-man organs of the school. This means that the rector assumes full responsibility for the entire makeup of the activities of his institution. Similarly, the other persons assume responsibility for the activities of the organizational units they supervise.

The administrative organs (senate, faculty council) perform the functions of advising and offering opinions to rectors and deans. Their composition was defined by the regulations of the 1958 law. However, the representatives of the organizations which have had their activities suspended do not participate in the meetings of these organs.

The rector is responsible for familiarizing all employees and students with the regulations and decisions of the authorities issued in conjunction with martial law and he has the obligation to execute these regulations within the scope of his authority. He likewise guarantees the protection of the school grounds in accordance with the current requirements. He also is to step up preventive measures the purpose of which is to avert manifestations of the violation of social discipline and legal norms by the entire academic community. An especially important duty of the rector is to counteract attempts to act in ways not permitted by martial law regulations and to inform the authorities and the minister of NSzWIT about all attempts at such action.

During the period that martial law remains in effect, all employees are bound by intensified work discipline. Moreover, in conjunction with the suspension of the statutory activity of trade unions, the provisions of the Charter of the Rights and Duties of the Teacher and the labor code are not binding where they touch upon coordinating decisions of the cadre with trade unions, e.g.: the hiring, firing, promotion, transfer, remuneration, distinguishing, and punishment of employees.

The rector, taking into account the special requirements issuing from the introduction of martial law and the need to make up for lost time in teaching activities, may order employees to execute tasks exceeding their former duties.

Intensifed work discipline means an increase in the significance of periodic evaluations of teaching-upbringing and the scholarly-research activities of university teachers. The guidelines clearly state the duty of conducting these evaluations according to the recommendations of a letter from the minister of NSzWIT dated 30 November 1979. They also stipulate that the self-evaluation of the university teacher, checked by his direct superiors and then verified by the Academic Council and the Scholarly Council, should foster the determination of the problems and obstacles encountered in the teacher's work, resulting in the possibility and obligation of proposals made for streamlining and changes.

Within the area of scholarly-research work, it is recommended that work be verified from the viewpoint of its particular applicability to the development of the economy, the national culture and the development of the academic cadre. The rector approves research plans within the framework of the financial possibilities of the school.

Study and the Students

The rector confirms changes in the organization of the course of studies made for the purpose of compensating for lost time. These changes are to be adapted to the specific situation of particular schools and directions of study. At the same time, the general principle established in the Guidelines is binding, namely: compensating for lost time is to take place during the course of two or, at most, three successive semesters without extending the normal time of studies. Only in exceptional cases is it possible, with the approval of the minister of NSzWIT, to extend studies for the last year by one semester. However, classes during the summer semester of the 1981/82 academic year may be extended. Recruitment for the first year of studies will be conducted in September, without additional fall recruitment.

In the area of foreign language study, students are obliged to participate in two courses. It is compulsory that one of these courses be in a language, the study of which the student is continuing.

The implementation of the teaching-upbringing process in higher schools during the period of martial law must be characterized by intensified discipline in studies, intensified teaching and the strict observance of regulations. These requirements are stated precisely in the Provisional Regulations for daytime study (introduced by an order of the minister dated 8 January 1982). The Provisional Regulations are binding for all schools subject to the minister of NSzWIT. These regulations establish the obligation "of the student to be present at all classes stipulated by the plan of studies." As formerly, the dean establishes the forms of checking a student's presence and the procedure for validating absences. On the other hand, the statement previously in effect that the person conducting a class in a given subject may excuse a student from some teaching activities in this subject no longer applies. The dean has also lost the power to grant a student permission to undertake steady remunerative work.

The disciplinary responsibility of the student is specified in paragraph 10 of the Provisional Regulations, which reads:

1. A student assumes disciplinary responsibility for disciplinary offenses according to the principles outlined in separate regulations. This likewise refers to cases of offenses committed as stipulated in article 50 of the Decree on martial law (DZIENNIK USTAW Legal Gazette, no 29, 1981, item 154).

2. In the event that it is ascertained that provisions of article 46-48 (DZIENNIK USTAW, no 29, 1981, item 154) have been violated, the rector on his own initiative removes the student from the list of students without initiating a disciplinary proceeding.

With regard to the principles of the organization of studies, the Provisional Regulations do not specify detailed principles and possible organizational variants of the academic year. These follow the plans and framework of teaching programs previously in effect. The rector confirms detailed teaching programs. These are announced to students together with the list of literature needed during the first 2 weeks after the beginning of classes. The rector also determines the detailed organization of the academic year on the basis of compulsory plans of study, he divides the year into semesters and establishes the dates for the examination session.

The principles of studies taking place according to individual plans and programs have remained virtually unchanged. The sole exception to this is the previous statement that studies carried out in this way may lead to the shortening of the period of study. The Provisional Regulations also do not preserve the provisions enabling a student to participate in selected classes in the same or another higher school. With regard to apprenticeships, the general provision is binding that the dean determines their program following from the plans of study and specifies the manner of and conditions for granting credit.

Examinations and Granting Credit

Relatively major changes have been made in the principles of awarding credit for the year of studies. Due to their practical significance for students, we are quoting the provisions of chapter 4 of the Regulations in full, except for paragraph 26, which maintains the scale of evaluation previously applied unchanged.

Section 20. The rector determines the organization and procedure for awarding credit for the year (semester).

Section 21. The granting of credit for a subject which includes an examination is done on the basis of:

1) awarding credit for classes in the given subject based on an evaluation of the active part the student takes in these classes and by obtaining positive evaluations of classwork (tests, running checks, projects and the like).

2) an examination, which is a check of the level to which the student has mastered the material specified in the program for this subject.

2. The granting of credit for a subject which does not include an examination is done on the basis of parragraph 1 item 1.

3. The person conducting a given subject may excuse a student from participating in some classes if that student is doing research within the framework of research teams implementing topics which are part of the plan of the institution or which emanate from agreements with units of the socialized economy. He may likewise grant credit for exercises, seminars and examinations in the subject with which the student's research work is thematically linked, contingent upon the student's fulfillment of the requirements emanating from the study program.

Section 22 1. The person conducting classes grants credit for the classes.

2. In cases warranted by the requirements of the teaching process, the dean may establish the obligation of granting credit for all or some classes in a given subject before the examination is passed.

Section 23 1. Those giving lectures in a given subject conduct the examination.

2. In exceptional cases, in a given year the dean may authorize those lecturing in related subjects to conduct examinations.

3. On the basis of the plan of studies and the organization of the [academic] year specified by the rector, the dean determines the examinations which the students are obliged to take during a given session.

4. A student may take the examinations discussed in paragraph 3 before the exam session, if the examiner agrees to this.

Section 24 In the event that a student does not pass all of the examinations established in the course of section 23 paragraph 3, the dean may make a decision not to admit the student to a repeat session and not to grant credit for the year (or semester) of studies.

Section 25 1. An examination for each subject stipulated in the plan of studies takes place separately and is subject to separate evaluation.

2. In the event that a student obtains an unsatisfactory evaluation on an examination, the student is entitled to the right to one repeat session.

Section 27 1. Students attaining the best results in study in a given year of study, showing the greatest improvement by comparison with the previous period and demonstrating the proper moral and civic attitude who fulfill the obligations emanating from the regulations of the law in an exemplary manner may receive awards and distinctions.

2. The criteria and procedure of granting awards and distinctions are determined by the rector, with the exception of monetary awards. The principles for granting monetary awards are specified in separate regulations.

Section 28 1. Upon the suggestion of a student, submitted within 2 days from the examination date, the dean orders an examination by committee, in exceptional and specially warranted cases. This should take place within 7 days from the date the proposal is submitted.

2. On his own initiative, the dean may order an examination by committee, in the event that a student does not pass a repeat examination.

3. An examination by committee takes place before a committee composed of the dean or the assistant dean as committee chairman, the examiner who conducted the previous examination, a second specialist in the subject area covered by the examination or in a related subject and the tutor for the year.

Section 29 With regard to a student who has not been granted credit for a year of studies, the dean hands down a decision to:

1) permit the year of studies to be repeated, with the exception of students in their first year of studies,

2) remove the student from the list of students,

3) conditionally permit the student to undertake studies in the following year (in special cases specified by the rector).

2. The dean may remove a student from the list of students in the course of the academic year if he does not demonstrate sufficient progress in his studies, as ascertained by a running check. The dean makes such a decision after having solicited the opinion of the tutor for the year.

3. A student may obtain permission to repeat a year not more than once during the period of studies.

Section 30 A student who is repeating a year of studies is not obliged to obtain credit for subjects in which he has received at least a good evaluation.

Section 31 1. The reacceptance for studies of a person who has interrupted studies or who has been removed from the list of students during the first year of studies follows the general principles for recruitment for higher studies.

2. The principles of reacceptance for the second year or for more advanced years of studies are specified in separate regulations.

Student Organizations

1. In conjunction with a decision of the ministry of NSzWIT dated 5 January 1982, concerning the dissolution of the Independent Association of Students [NZS], the rector decides how to designate the property of this organization. The rector may assign persons employed by the NZS or suspended student organizations to other work on the campus of the institution. If this is not possible, these persons take on work as directed by the local organ of the State administration.

2. The property of student organizations suspended during the period of obligatory martial law, i.e.: the Socialist Union of Polish Students [SZSP], the Student Sport Union [AZS] and the Polish Student Union [PZA], as well as of school organizations is taken into receivership by the rector of the higher school; in committee on the basis of protocol. The rector determines the makeup of the inventory committee and the receivership which safeguards the property of the organization. The rector may also hand down a decision concerning the utilization of the property of suspended organizations by organizational units of the school. The receivership performs actions indispensable for keeping the property from deteriorating.

3. In accordance with the Guidelines, the rector may grant his approval to the undertaking of activities of cultural sections and scientific circles within the framework of the altered program and the principles of organization of the educational process; the rector appoints the persons administratively responsible for the activity of these sections.

4. In conjunction with the suspension of the activities of AZS:

--Study Programs of Physical Education and Sports assume supervision of and take charge of AZS teams participating in the State system of matches, insuring them instruction-training conditions, food and shelter as well as participation in the sporting events gradually being revived by the GKKFiS Central Committee of Physical Culture and Sport. Teams participating in any type of match and sporting event use the school name, without the words "AZS."

--Study Programs of Physical Education and Sports likewise take on the activity formerly conducted by AZS School Clubs, according to the principles discussed above, by agreement with the rector's plenipotentiary. This is with regard to conducting events and mass intramural and intermural matches.

--In the event of the participation of competitors from higher school teams in community teams, their participation in sporting events and matches must be approved by the governor's (mayor's) plenipotentiary, who formerly was in charge of the community management of AZS.

5. The ALMATUR Central Office of Travel and Tourism BPiT, together with its subordinate units and property have been taken over by the plenipotentiary of the minister of NSzWIT, while the property and activity of ALMATUR BPiT school agencies is assumed by the plenipotentiary and board appointed by the rector. The activity of voivodship ALMATUR BPiT's, together with the centers and property belonging to them have been taken over by the plenipotentiaries of voivodes (presidents). Therefore, the activity of the rector's plenipotentiary and the board for ALMATUR BPiT affairs which extends beyond the voivodship should be approved by the plenipotentiaries for the organs of the local administration.

6. The Provisional Regulations, by virtue of their scope, do not encompass changes in the program and organizational principles of the educational process in higher schools and student houses associated with the suspension of the activity of organizations and self-governing student bodies. These changes are initiated by the rector, who appoints the appropriate plenipotentiaries and adminsitrators for matters such as culture, sports and student houses and determines the persons responsible for taking charge of the activity of scientific circles, sporting and cultural clubs and the like.

The rector likewise initiates provisional regulations for the functioning of student houses, specifying such matters as the organization of entry to outsiders and the manner of establishing control over entry.

Material Assistance

The material assistance from which students benefited up to December 1981 inclusively is resumed from the date on which classes resume.

The regulations previously in effect in the granting of new stipends, awards and distinctions to students excelling academically, as well as the principles of student utilization of student houses and cafeterias are binding.

There is the change that the functions of making recommendations and rendering opinions foreseen for student organizations of self-governing student bodies are assumed by the plenipotentiaries of the rector and deans for affairs of material assistance. These are appointed from among university teachers or administrative employees permanently employed in the higher school. The rector may order the appointment of a two- or three-person team to assist the plenipotentiary.

During the current school year, the periods of utilization of scholarship assistance previously in effect are binding, namely:

--normal stipends funded for a 10-month period, allowing for exceptions defined by regulations,

--stipends funded for 12 months.

Students do not incur a charge for a period during which they did not make use of a student house. In conjunction with this, one-half of the December charge already incurred (60 zlotys), should be credited to their accounts due for residence in the student house following the beginning of classes.

Two basic types of leaves are retained, i.e., the short-term leave and the year's leave. A reason justifying the granting of a leave is a long-term illness or serious personal circumstances. During the entire period of studies, the year's leave may be obtained only once, unless the reason for the leave is a long-term or recurring illness. During both types of leaves, the student retains his valid school identification and the right to take advantage of free medical care. In exceptional cases, he may receive material benefits during this time. The dean, at the recommendation of the tutor for the year for the student group, makes the decision on this matter.

Social Activity

In accordance with Decision No 2 of the Economic Committee of the Council of Ministers, dated 21 December 1981, social activity should be concentrated on the streamlining of the organization of the collective feeding of employees, the organization of the sale of consumer articles in schools and guaranteeing pensioners and annuitants the possibility of making use of various services of a social nature.

Rectors are also obliged to take over and perfect the various forms of social activity conducted by trade unions, also to pay out statutory benefits and ensure the effective functioning of employee benefit loan funds.

Cadre Worktime

University teachers employed fulltime on the basis of appointment or on the basis of a labor agreement are bound during the academic year to execute teaching activities emanating from the teaching program of study within the following scope, defined in terms of so-called computed hours:

--professors and docents--210 hours,
--adjuncts, senior assistants and assistants--270 hours,
--senior lecturers--300 hours,
--lecturers--360 hours,
--foreign language teachers, teachers of defense subjects, physical education and other subjects--540 hours,
--teachers of practical skills--840 hours.

One computed hour equals 45 minutes of actual lectures, lessons, discussion, drill, proseminars and seminars encompassed by plans of daily studies, evening studies and correspondence studies, as well as postgraduate and doctoral studies.

Trips Abroad

Under conditions of martial law, the number of trips abroad has been reduced. Nevertheless, it is indispensable that the most valuable forms of cooperation be preserved and that the continuity of contacts with the leading scientific centers, participation in joint research endeavors and in major international shows be ensured. For these reasons we should:

1) implement trips issuing from intergovernmental agreements and understandings, as well as from agreements concerning the direct cooperation of schools and scientific institutions,

2) give preference to trips which have the purpose of implementing joint research efforts; scientific apprenticeships (particularly long-term ones), especially when they concern priority subjects for the economy, science and culture; research or teaching work in scientific institutions abroad based on intergovernmental agreements, contracts concluded by foreign trade enterprises and agreements for direct cooperation,

3) facilitate the participation of Polish scholars in leading international scientific gatherings,

4) continue student trips made for the purpose of doing all of one's work in higher studies in socialist countries, on the basis of interstate agreements, and the trips of students sent through MNSzWIT for so-called partial studies (one to two semesters).

What is the obligatory procedure for trips abroad?

I. To Socialist Countries (with the exception of Yogoslavia)

a. The rectors of higher schools and the directors of other academic institutions who had the authority before 13 December 1981 to make recommendations that service passports be issued retain that right. The directors of other institutions act according to the principles previously in effect in this area.

b. All passports issued before 13 December 1981 which carry a provision of validity only for socialist countries (one for several socialist countries) preserve their validity and do not require renewal before trips made to these countries.

c. Passports issued before 13 December 1981, carrying a provision of validity "for all countries of Europe" or "all countries of the world" must be renewed before the making of trips to socialist countries. The appropriate territorial passport organ (Voivodship Headquarters of the Citizens' Militia [MO]) renews the passport at the recommendation: of the rectors of higher schools, the directors of academic institutions authorized to make recommendations that service passports be issued or the superior organ having this authorization (for institutions not authorized to issue service passports).

II. To Other Countries

a. The ministers or directors of central offices alone are authorized to make recommendations that service passports be issued.

b. The rectors of higher schools and the directors of academic institutions submit recommendations to the appropriate ministers concerning the issuance of service passports together with supporting material, which includes the nature of the sojourn abroad and the anticipated academic results, the formal basis of the trip, sources of financing and personal data.

c. When a decision has been made, the recommendations discussed above are returned to those making the recommendations.

d. Approved passport recommendations are then implemented at the appropriate territorial MO voivodship headquarters.

III. Applications for sojourn visas in institutes of foreign States are handled exclusively by the appropriate ministries or central offices.

BRIEFS

LETTER TO KREISKY--Vienna (SK)--For over 5 years a socialist party has been operating semilegally in Poland. Its leadership was arrested after the proclamation of martial law because it had refused to collaborate with the police against KOR [Workers' Self-Defense Committee] and other leftist groups. This emerges from a letter which Chancellor Kreisky received from a Polish prison. Conditions in the prisons are very tough: Up to eight prisoners are kept in cells of less than 20 square meters. The temperature in the cells hardly ever exceeds 14 degrees C. The food is of poor quality and inadequate quantity and is mostly served cold. Open-air exercise, although stipulated for 1 hour daily, is mostly reduced to 45 minutes and often altogether canceled. Prisoners who go on hunger strikes are not given any medical care. IASI PAPER'S REVIEW OF CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE CRITICIZED

Bucharest SCINTEIA in Romanian 14 Jan 82 p 4

[Article by C. Stanescu]

[Text] A retrospective view of the literature of the 70's, which have barely ended, even if it is a provisional one, is welcome and timely anytime. CONVORBIRI LITERARE, the Iasi journal, has published such a discussion in the last several issues. The opinions of the participants in the "retrospective view" are inciting, some are judicious. Primarily what is remarkable is the signalling of the appearance of a large number of valuable books, novels, poetry, volumes of literary criticism and history, all of them indicating an emphasis on the thematic and stylistic diversity of literature. Second, we should note the judicious review of the contribution of some new writers to the development of today's literary creation. Many penetrating observations concern literary criticism and historyofthe political-ideological climate of this period, in which the utilization of the literary heritage continues at a high level and the reestablishment of some important writers of the past in critical editions. Some opinions formulated by the participants in this "retrospective"view" raise questions, however. As Alex. Stefanescu writes, "Starting in 1971, literary life loses much of its celebrated ebullience which characterized it in the preceding decade. The enthusiasm of renaissance gradually is replaced by an atmosphere of concentrated work." As if this "enthusiasm" excludes concentrated work. No opposition or exclusion between these concepts exists;rather, logically, a relationship of consequence exists. What may be understood is the critic's desire to establish some arbitrary oppositions lacking intelligible criterion. As the author points out, writers now are asserting themselves as "solitary navigators" or "through declared integration in the retinue of certain personalities." How many should be in the retinue and what tasks they should fulfill alongside the "suzerain personality" which facilitates their assertion are quiet matters for this author of the unusual view of the assertion of the young writer. Dividing writers into two clearly defined camps defined by an imaginary barrier, Alex. Stefanescu then comes with a Maniheist view of the literary landscape, republishing in a surprisingly simplistic manner the formula of the"idealist-realist" novel of the 50's, in which the characters split into the two radically differing categories and both just as illusory: the negativists and positivists, the "angels" and "devils." The critic "reads" the current literary landscape like a novel of the past worked out in the school of Maniheist realism. A curious metamorphosis! Characterizing the decade which has ended, he believes he has discovered the republishing of an old dispute between the "traditionalists" and "modernists," "between supporters of the message and those of expressiveness," accusing the former of all the "bad things," among which the worst is that it gives literature a "mission" and a "message." We are totally confused, since he does not say what "message" these "traditionalists" support and what "mission" they are giving to literature. What is certain is that they are seen as the bad spirits of literature, a category "defined by the transformation of literature into a mission, through the announced seriousness and through the complete and energetic solidarization of the militants." What can one say faced with the critic's holy scorn for the"outrage"of the message and mission on the purity of the "noble gratuitousness," as literature appears to be for him? Judging according to the logic of this "celebrated" angle, the fact that a "traditionalist" prose writer like Sadoveanu, let us say, is the creator of an artistic style, of a unique expressiveness in Romanian literature would be incompatible with the existence of the mission and message of this literature! And inversely: when "the message" makes its appearance, style and expressiveness automatically disappear! These oppositions are as peremptory as they are false and there is no need to say again that the expressiveness of a sumptuous literary style in a novel like"Principele" does not oppose in the least the book's philosophical message. Or does Al. S. believe that a novel like "Cartea Milionarului" is a "pure" and gratuitous linguistic adventure!? Imagining "conflicts" between the supporters of the message and of expressiveness, Alex. Stefanescu introduces false opposition, outside of literature, in discussing current literary phenomenon.

It is hard to say to whom this view is of use. Perhaps Al. Dobrescu, a participant in the same discussion, who takes over "deepening" the ideas. As Al. D. writes, "The 70's start with an emphatic question regarding the syntheses dedicated to the present. Has something changed in the meantime? Have the obstacles become easier to overcome? Will they be overcome or will the techniques for climbing over them have progressed? I would like to formulate an affirmative answer. However, the reality plucks me by the sleeve,reminding me that since 1970 up until now not even a synthesis of the contemporary literary phenomenon has appeared." The difficulties which explain this situation, as we see from a long list, are: "unprocessed knowledge of the ideologicaldirections," "dogmatism," "simplifying view," "conformism," "mistaken tendency to equate literary value with any production in which the demands of the moment take on an explicit formulation," "undermining of aesthetic demands" and many others. Yet it should be observed in passing: why did not all this hinder Al. Piru, for example, from writing and publishing, even at the end of last year, a much discussed history of Romanian literature from its beginnings up to the present? Is it because of "dogmatism" that the "nonconformist" books of the critic Gh. Grigurcu appeared about contemporary poets and critics? Did "undermining of aesthetic demands" help Eugen Simion to publish "Romanian Writers Today" at the same time? Or I. D. Balan, with "Resurrection of a Poet: Aron Cotrus" or Mircea Martin, with "G. Calinescu and the Complexes of Romanian Literature" and many others? Clearly, there is a lack of great and complete syntheses. However, to make this absence due to the context full of imaginary obstacles is, at most, childish. On the contrary, the context was the solicitant and it is precisely these syntheses that were requested in history, science, art and literature. Yet they have not appeared to the necessary extent. Al. D. explains for us: "As an example, let us take a restricted period very near to us, that is, the 70's, and let us see what kind and how serious are the obstacles which must be overcome for an understanding of it. The first year, 1971, is marked by one decisive event for the later evolution of literature. The theses of July, published then, fix a new framework for the cultural movement (and, of course, the literary movement), a much stricter one, before which clear and unequivocal tasks are posed. The attention given artistic creation increases, the ideological guidance intensifies and it does not refer just to general principles, to the role of art in society, to its action of knowledge and its highly educational function but also to the selection of subjects and the angle from which they are viewed." Legitimate and judicious evaluations, stressing the significance and importance of these ideas which, as we know, had positive implications for literary-artistic creation. However, Al. D. has another opinion: "This broad program was carried out in a literary production of disconcerting diversity and, understood, value." And a long string follows of confusions denounced by Al. D. with great energy. What should we understand? Clearly, all this confusion, in the end equal to an involution, appears to the combative publicist, as he himself says, as results of that "decisive event for the later evolution of literature." A grave error, which the rich picture of literature of this period itself divulges and is impossible to be ignored by an objective critical spirit. Of course, from this picture we do not exclude the rejects, mediocre books lacking substance and value. They are nearly inevitable but they do not strike a characteristic note. Clearly, the author omits a basic thing: the theses of July were not merely "published" then but, rather, discussed throughout the party, with the broad participation of people in culture and art; they were not simply an "ideological directive" but rather an innovative orientation of vast theoretical proportions. Second, they were not and could not be a "program for literary production," as Al. D. naively believes, leading one to understand, simplistically, that the "planning" of books, subjects and even of angles from which they should be viewed and, eventually, "approached" in the volumes of writers was recommended. Discussing the ideological orientation of literature in this way, Al. D. only republishes a truly dogmatic view in the problem of the party's guidance of art and literature, a view criticized and debated following the 9th party congress. It is surprising to meet in a young critic the recrudescense of this narrow and restricting view at a time when the orientation of literature allows the writer full freedom to select his subjects, motives, angles of view, according to his own inward approval and, above all, proper for each one's talent.

Further, the critic from Iasi looks gloomily at literature and discovers that the talented ones have become "dogmatics," while the writers without talent are champions of civic courage, that "the thirst for what is real no longer is the prerogative of the true writers" while "talent has reached the point of traveling the paths of conformism with exposed joy." He also sees--and how much he sees!--how writings at odds with grammar have become "at the head of the ads for modern literature" and he does not hesitate to write these lines, which we contemplate as having long career in a possible anthology of detractors from modern literature: "Our prose writers write poorly, convinced that the graduates of the industrial secondary schools, taught to limit their horizon of knowledge to exact sciences and that brute good citizenship takes the place of anything. The scornful, out of ignorance, of the tradtional forums but avid for experiments, are in the situation of those painters who do not hesitate to throw paint on the canvas in one outburst before being capable of drawing a hand correctly. And, yet, the critics have made them the stars of literature." Such vehement scorn for literature--even if it is in the name of the ideal heights for artistic achievement--seems to me unable to originate from the pen of someone who truly loves literature and respects the creators of it, the great ones and less great. Of course, neither does criticism, in an overall way, escape this painful condemnation since, if it did not cause it, "easily agreed to establishing a state of confusion." "Instead of defending the specific nature of literature," (from whom--editor's note), discouraging annexing tendencies and hindering the ambiguity of values, it was the first not to take into account its purpose." It permitted the "interference of foreign powers (foreign from the cause) in the internal affairs of criticism." Forgetting his surroundings, Al. D. "discovers" an ocean of obiedience, discovers the disappearance of "independent spirits" and touchingly asks, "The question is whether these spirits still exist today, when the independence of opinion brings a "Fata Morgana.'" In the end, in his opinion, "Just two critics today seem to satisfy this terrible condition: Gheorghe Grigurcu and Al. Cistelecan!!" How unilateral this view is in relationship to the diversity of criticism and literature of this period, with its many successes, almost does not have to be pointed out. It is impossible not to see anything but blind ambition and partisan resentment, a "black imagination" and an unfree awareness despite its "criticism." A similar view with that of the critic Gh. Grigurcu, a participant in the same discussion and one which, illustrated by intolerance and passion (basically noncritical), sees in current literature a "grotesque campaign of order," with hidden plans "carried in the office workers' briefcases." "Any retort was smothered, with a state of uniformization of critical awareness having been decreed ," writes Gh. Grigurcu, alarmed and alarmingly, having discovered with the same unlikely "black imagination" the "heads of aggressive proletcultism," in exchange protecting the ones he considers the delicate exponents of the authentic current critical spirit in an almost comic way: they "are placed not only in the little house (!) of the 'modernist' element but, rather, through the force of their works, they also cover the Maiorescu-Lovinescu tradition which they continue with indisputable legitimacy." In the opinion of Gh. G.,those in this "little house" possess all the qualities: "the pluralism of ideas," "the civility of relationships," "disengagement," "candor," "solid culture," "a sense of value," "awareness of history," "responsibility of their mission," and so forth. All that remains is for you to ask yourself how all these great qualities fit into the "little house?!" Among the residents of Gh. G.'s modernist "little house" we do not meet either S. Ciocu-lescu or Al. Piru, either V. Rapeanu, P. Marcea or I. Vlad: really, as Gh. G. said, "Intolerance is the most serious danger." Observing in passing that among those also not fitting in Gh. G.'s "little house" is Eugen Simion, the well-known Lovinescu exegetist, we recall that he is one of the critics who criticized Gh. G.'s intolerance and even his obtuseness toward the great values of contemporary poetry and so we can understand Gh. G.'s unforgiving treatment of those who have not forgiven him.

Finally, subjectivism ,arbitrariness and intolerance freely bloom against the common ground of this "discussion" by CONVORBIRI LITERARE from the old Moldavian capital, which throughout time has accustomed us to another style of literary and artistic life, to discussions on a high ideological level as well as intellectual and moral level, to polemics of ideas expressed with must more clarity, useful to the progress of Romanian literature and consolidation of its values. And how could it use for distinguishing and consolidating values a discussion in which nobody wants to recognize anyone else, in which it is discovered that writers "write poorly," while the critics are living barricaded in "little houses" (probably under siege!), a discussion in which even a balanced critic "consolidates" values by demolishing in passing two great writings by Tudor Arghezi, who "had paid too great a tributewith 'Cintare Omului' and '1907?!'" Should we believe that CONVORBIRI LITERARE has proposed to build its readership in this way regarding the development of current Romanian literature, to instruct its readers, to make them understand more deeply and clearly the ideological quality and general level of today's creation? Such discussions are too much a form of getting even nourished by an uncritical passion and too little an expression of an objective critical spirit in order to truly be useful to the literary climate and development of literature.

PRACTICE OF ACCEPTING OUT-OF-DATE DOCTORAL THESES DEPLORED

Bucharest SCINTEIA in Romanian 14 Jan 82 p 4

[Article by Mihai Iordanescu]

[Text] Clearly, the more than 14,000 specialists who hold doctor's degrees today in the most diverse scientific branches represent--or should represent--an inexhaustiblesource of innovative thinking, of ideas capable of actually improving all areas of our social-economic life. The picture thus completed could offer even higher, more optimistic proportions if with anticipation works were to be introduced into this evaluation, works which these doctoral candidates are to work out to receive the title of doctor,works which, as we well know, are based or should be based on a profound and creative investigation of the "hottest" aspects of the dialectics of our social-economic life.

Really, the number of doctoral candidates is a remarkable scientific potential but, in proportion to the giant arsenal of information opportunities and, in particular, the experimental base whose expenses are supported entirely by the state, the due date for fulfilling this potential still remains uncertain. The value of return enters so little into the evaluation of a doctoral work that what overall seems so well orchestrated is often consumed at the real level of matters often without resonance and with temporary results.

And the truths are found best in the field of agronomic scientific research. Not only the strictness of the agricultural calendar, with critical due dates for the proposed projects but, in particular, the organic nature and complexity of stages in the evolution--very spectacular recently--of scientific research require even more powerfully that the entire system for conferring the title of doctor make its presence actually felt within production, so that each work is a certain factor, which can be checked in practice. Despite this, it is precisely here that the current system for conferring the degree of doctor favors an incomprehensible lack of limits and checking in compiling the work. For example, of the 624 specialists today included in the doctoral degree system at the Nicolae Balcescu Agronomic Institute, 52 enrolled before 1965, of course, without having completed their work until now. An evenlarger figure is seen by those with a "seniority" of between 10-15 years.And such "records" actually are met in other agronomic institutes; for the branches of agriculture, horticulture and veterinary medicine as a whole, of the approximately 1,400 doctoral candidates existing at this time, more than 1,000 have a seniority of greater than 5-6 years, which is calculatedas the time needed to work out and turn in the work. Despite this,nobody and nothing requires them to respect any kind of schedule for concluding and presenting the work so that, as we have seen, decades can go by from the point the doctoral thesis is admitted and it is presented.

And all this is under conditions where, as we know, agronomic scientific research is completely and urgently being requested to make its great contribution to solving many of the problems confronting our agriculture. In the spirit of these demands, the Ministry of Education and Instruction a year ago issued a circular which states that "the subjects for the doctoral theses are to be established by the professors' councils at the faculties or scientific councils of the research institutes in collaboration with the production and social-cultural units in close connection with the goals provided in the program-directive for research and with the annual and long-range research plans of the central research institutes and higher education institutions." A fully justifiable decision, a rational one, particularly since we know that the goals of the Program-directive for research havea strict, firm and scientifically substantiated nature, entering like a basic component into the very strategy of our society's development. For that reason, assuming that each professoral council and scientific council would propose to completely respect these indications, how could they do it from the moment that the doctoral subject established and recommended in this way lacks one of the elements which insures its identity: specification of the length of time in which it is to be worked out? This is an organizational aspect of value, often decisive for the social effectiveness of the doctoral thesis.

But there also is an internal aspect which refers to the specific nature of agronomic research. In the areas mentioned, incomparably more than in others, the time factor is the decisive factor. Anybody can admit here the existence of the "time of gold," of an optimum period--only one!--for intervention and scientific finalization, through the loss of which the ideals, solutions, technologies, no matter how valuable, remain in the stage of indefinite potentiality.

Admitting that the subject for the work of each doctoral candidate is an acute problem, what assurance can we still have that it will be applied, from the moment that one never knows when it will be finished?

"Actually, none, as long as the instructions for the organization and completion of the doctoral thesis tolerates maximum instability of the schedules," university professor and docent Liviu Pop, head of the chair of agricultural phytotechnology in the faculty of agriculture in Craiova, answers. It can be explained, can it not? The data for a current experiment no longer can aid in working out a solution to be applied 9-10 years later or even more when generally a doctoral candidate finishes his work. The conditions will be different then, the very complexity of the problem will be different, the priorities will be different, too, so that one should not be surprised when, having been completed at such a long time after the theme was begun as an urgent matter, such a work ends by enriching the archives of the agronomic institutes.

And such a fact causes other equal ones, among which also is the utilization of the research forces, which, of course, involve the doctoral thesis, not always in the key, decisive sectors for raising agricultural production. Of the 90 doctoral candidates enrolled in the N. Balcescu Agronomic Institute in 1981, 46 are working are working in research-design, 20 in instruction and only 24 in production, while just 5 (among whom, just 2 were declared successful) are in the agricultural production cooperatives. The situation is not a balanced one even for the branches mentioned as a whole. Why? Among other reasons, also because the lack of strictness in establishing the schedules means that the current system for conferring the doctoral degree, in particular, tends to devote the post-university scientific training even less to stimulating a continuous creative effort. So the doctoral degree frequently becomes a goal connected with promotion in the hierarchy and not a means for effective and efficient intervention to improve social and economic life.

SINGLE-YEAR TERMS UNDER FIRE IN THREE REPUBLICS

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1622, 31 Jan 82 pp 8-9

[Article by Stevan Niksic in the column "League of Communists": "The Dilemma of the Single-Year Term"]

[Text] In a few months it will be just 4 years since Tito stated his "political testament" from the speaker's platform of the 11th LCY Congress in the Sava Center in Belgrade. In his message to the delegates--the concluding speech of the Congress--he resolutely appealed for the promotion of collective labor, the strengthening of responsibility and unity in Yugoslav society. This theme, as a sort of leitmotif, was also dominant in Tito's public appearances during the last years of his life. "I have given much thought to these questions. And I am profoundly convinced that such an approach has still further affirmed collective labor and responsibility, contributing to further democratization of labor in all self-managing and political bodies and preventing individuals from realizing their unhealthy ambitions to be leaders," he said several months later, at a congress of labor unions, explaining his well-known proposal("initiative") for the promotion of collective labor. This proposal, as is known, contained the suggestion that the "sojourn" in high political offices, "from the community to the federal level," be shortened to 1 year.

During the past few weeks, in connection with discussions of changes in the bylaws of the League of Communists, there has been renewed interest in collective labor and the single-year term. And, perhaps somewhat unexpectedly, the first time that the practical realization of this idea has been publicly discussed, there have been official proposals for the partial modification of certain postulates which until now have been accepted as inherent in this idea by the League of Communists.

Why Now?

There has been practically constant discussion of how to realize Tito's suggestion in the League of Communists since the moment when it was made. The Presidency of the LCY Central Committee has passed resolutions about collective labor, and the Central Committee has discussed the matter several times. The subject should again be found on the agenda of one of the next sessions of the Central Committee. And all of the other party leaderships in the country, from republic and province to township, as well as all of the branch organizations, have been occupied with this topic for the last few years: basic positions have been taken, and practical solutions, which are already being widely applied, have been considered. It would, however, be logical to bring this subject up again on the occasion of the definitive formulation of decisions about the bylaws. It is equally logical, now that the idea has already been put into practice for 2 or 3 years and tried out, that we should think somewhat differently about collective labor and the single-year term in political forums than we did when this idea first made its appearance.

One, Two or Four?

Proposals that there be some degree of deviation from the strict rule of the single-year term in individual party leaderships are, of course, only proposals. The debate still continues, opinions are somewhat divided, and it is impossible at the present to state its final outcome.

The possibility that in future there might be some deviation in the township leaderships of the League of Communists from the strict application of the 1-year term for the highest officials was announced for the first time in a report of the Bylaws Committee of the LCY Central Committee which was anticipated by members of the Central Committee at the last session. "It has been proposed," the document states, "that this term be 2 plus 2 years, along with other suggestions." The Bylaws Committee did not, however, explain these proposals but suggested that the matter be discussed at the session of the Central Committee and that suitable resolutions be adopted. But it was obvious that the opinions of the members of the LCY Central Committee were divided. It is characteristic that much attention was paid to the Bylaws Committee's viewpoint that, as concerns the organization of the forum of the League of Communists at various "levels," the Bylaws of the LCY should formulate only the basic principles. Everything else, in such a view, could be left to the republics and provinces or the opstinas for their regulation. Individual speakers explicitly supported this possibility as proposed by the Bylaws Committee, while others ardently attacked it. Finally it was resolved that everything must be discussed once more in detail. The opportunity for this would be coming up in the near future at a special session of the LCY Central Committee, at which members would analyze previous experience in the application of resolutions concerning the realization of Tito's proposal, adopted in April 1979. It was stated that at this time it would also be possible to consider individual suggestions put forth in connection with the discussion of changes in the bylaws and related to the "prolongation of term" under discussion.

Proposals that the term of office of high administrative officials in Opstina organizations of the League of Communists be longer than 1 year were, to the author's knowledge, made by three republic organizations: Slovenia, Montenegro and Serbia. The Central Committee of the League of Communists of Slovenia proposed, namely, that the term of office of the president of a township conference be 2 years and that it be subject to one renewal. This means a total of 4 years. In Montenegro, it was proposed that the head of an opstina party leadership have a term of 2 years, "under the condition that a new organization be adopted for the forums and the entities of the municipal League of Communists." In addition, a second variant was mentioned--a term of one year--"inasmuch as this office is filled by a volunteer." In Serbia, as explained at the most recent session of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia [LCS] by Budimir Vukasinovic, a member of its Presidency, the appropriate committee proposed the following: presidents of Opstina, inter Opstina and the City Conference of the League of Communists of Belgrade would be elected for 2 years, and could in addition be chosen for the same offices one more time. As in the proposal from Slovenia, individual party officials could thus remain in the same position for at most 4 years.

The LCS Central Committee did, however, propose several other solutions, about which the Central Committee was also informed. It was, for example, suggested that it not be possible for 1- and 2-year terms to be renewed, that one ought to wait for the session of the LCYCC before taking appropriate stands.... In the ensuing discussion it appeared that there is no unity of opinion among all members of the LCSCC as concerns these proposals.

Dragoman Radoicic appears to have been most strongly opposed to the suggestion that the term of office for individual officials in the League of Communists in future be set at 2 years or that it be made possible for it to last 4 years. Although, says Radoicic, a complete appraisal of how to realize Comrade Tito's proposal was not offered at the LCS, "we are offered certain decisions which are completely out of line with resolutions accepted by the entire LCS." Recalling the proposal once accepted, that the term of office for all administrative offices be 1 year and that it might not be renewed, Radoicic considered the present proposal only a "piece out of context," and that therefore the Central Committee could not take a stand on the issue.

Other members of the LYSCC who had come out against this proposal were, however, significantly better informed about the committee's proposal. Henrik Selic, for example, was of the opinion that it would be dangerous if this were to result in a dividing line being drawn between those who were more and those who were less important to collective labor. He considered that there are great variations within a republic, that the situation is fundamentally different in Nis, for example, than in Trgoviste, and different in Belgrade than in Crna Trava... More account should be taken of actual conditions, says Selic, and flexible solutions should be sought. All previous experience in the application of this idea, in his opinion, speaks against the strict application of the 1-year term in all areas and at all levels... A discussion of this subject showed that there are a fair number of supporters of a unified solution for the entire LCS and the LCY, no matter which of the solutions might finally win out. Both provinces [of Serbia] were united in their opinion that the terms of administrative officials in the League of Communists last only 1 year and that they not be subject to renewal.

"I think that we must find the strength to come to an agreement in Yugoslavia. If we agree that it be 2 years, let it be 2," said Husamedin Azemi. Dedo Hasimbegovic, at this same session of the Central Committee, expressed the fear that the privilege of renewing one's term of office might be misused.

Nor was the discussion in the LYSCC on the length of the term of office in individual party forums brought to a conclusion. Judging by all of this, when proposals for changes in the bylaws are made in the near future at a public discussion, all members of the League of Communists will have an opportunity to have their say on the subject.

The Fate of "Rotation"

The present dilemma of how to apply the single-year term in the township organizations of the League of Communists and proposals that this term be lengthened to 2 years or perhaps even to 4, it is stressed, are the result not of any desire to abuse Tito's proposal, but rather of a desire to apply it as effectively as possible, to follow the spirit of his idea of collective labor and to adapt practical solutions to actual conditions and needs.

One can, nevertheless, understand the fear of those who consider that under the pressure of arguments for "practicality" and "different specific conditions" the substance of Tito's plan and his far-sighted warning of the danger of an increase in political bureaucracy, of bureaucratic arbitrariness of individuals and groups and the usurpation of power from the working class, might all easily be lost sight of along with his "testament," in which he called upon all communists, workers and citizens of Yugoslavia to prevent individuals from realizing their unhealthy ambitions to be leaders. It is, therefore, not out of place to recall the fate of a similar idea, in vogue almost 20 years ago. We are thinking of an amendment to the federal constitution, ratified in 1963, which was popularly known as "rotation."

More specifically, it was appended to the Yugoslav constitution in 1963 that no individual may be chosen more than twice in a row for the same political office in a sociopolitical unit. A similar principle was applied for members of workers councils. Individual holders of public offices, particularly directors of work organizations, were according to the constitution bound by the principle of compulsory reappointment every 4 years, and were not subject to the principle of limitation of repeated candidacy. Edvard Kardelj, on one occasion during this period, said that he was in favor of the principle of rotation but did not believe that it would be a necessary feature of the Yugoslav political system as a self-management system. "I think that in a normally functioning democratic mechanism this principle is not necessary," was Kardelj's opinion. Stressing, however, that he was speaking of a historically necessary means of struggle against bureaucracy in contemporary Yugoslav society, Kardelj added: "Whether the principle of rotation of office will be retained in the future is a question which will be resolved not by us but by future generations..."

The principle of rotation, as provided by the constitution, affected only "government" offices and not those in sociopolitical organizations. During the first years of application of this principle, which has remained in essence unchanged and is contained in the present constitution, ratified in 1974, it was shown to be in fact quite effective in its role in the democratization of personnel policy.

Trivial Criticisms

Last week the Constitutional Committee of the Parliament of the Socialist Republic of Serbia discussed political offices and officials, a discussion which would appear to be connected with the coming elections. This time it was a discussion of the meaning of the term "same office," mentioned in the republic's constitution. In the second amendment to the constitution of the Socialist Republic of Serbia is found the principle of limitation of repeated consecutive election or appointment to the same office. It turned out, however, that this principle can be interpreted in (at least) two ways. The question is, namely, whether "same office" refers to all offices of any particular category or not. Offices such as, for example, "republic secretary," republic inspector, head of an agency... Irrespective of whether one is republic secretary for economy and the other, perhaps, for culture... If these were not the same office, then most likely there would be nothing to prevent someone who is currently secretary in one sector from "obtaining" a second term in another sector.

A sort of curiosity is the interpretation which was accepted at this time at the session of the Constitutional Committee. It was concluded, namely, that the phrase "same office" be considered to denote only those offices which are completely identical. In other words, this means that there would be nothing to prevent a republic secretary currently in "control"of one sector to be "reassigned to another sector during the next term of office, or to stop the president of one council of an assembly from being elected president of another council of the same assembly for the following term. The chief of one opstina body, who has held this office for a total of 8 years, could change his "company" and remain chief for 8 more years...

INCREASE IN FEDERAL JOB-HOLDERS DISCUSSED

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 10 Feb 82 p 2

[Article by Jovan Radovanovic: "From the Federation and Back"]

[Text] While on the one hand it is difficult to attract highly-qualified personnel of proven abilities to work in government agencies, on the other hand those whose term of office has long since expired are reluctant to depart, so that the number of employees in the machinery of government, despite all sorts of criticism, increases from year to year.

"The more subordinates, the greater the general." With this saying Zlata Rakic-Josifova, delegate of the party organization of federal labor unions, attempted recently to explain the constant expansion of the "upper echelon" of the administration.

Speaking right at a session of the Conference of Local Branches of the League of Communists [employed] in federal agencies and organizations, devoted to personnel policy, Josifova interpreted the uninterrupted increase in number of employees, especially in the auxiliary services of federal agencies and to the detriment of highly qualified, trained personnel, whose abilities have been proven both at work and politically--for whom, by the way, the federal government is experiencing a chronic shortage--as due in part to the great powers of decision-making accorded to administrators. Four administrators will be hired before two truly capable, qualified advisors. This results in an increase in people involved in technical matters, as couriers and copyists. Many "subordinates" [means] few thinkers and few original ideas.

Figures Under Criticism

Government expansion is constantly the focus of social criticism. Despite this, the federal government itself is always pointing out its shortages of personnel, in this case highly qualified personnel. The Committee of the Conference of Local Branches of the League of Communists [employed] in federal agencies and organizations attempted to convince us that the numbers so often cited can often be deceptive.

Namely, the 28,220 employees of federal agencies and organizations also include members of the Presidency of SFRY, the presidencies of socio-political organizations, as well as those employed in the Association of Yugoslav Railroad Workers, in several news agencies, in scholarly institutes, libraries, and museums. The federal government as it is usually understood--to be secretaries, commissions, bureaus, departments, and the various technical services of the Federal Executive Council employs 17,236 workers and 366 high officials and supervisors.

The greatest numbers are employed by four federal government agencies: the Federal [Secretariat] of Foreign Affairs, the Federal [Secretariat for] Internal Affairs, the Federal Flight Control Administration, and the Federal Customs Administration--10,837 workers. The technical services of the Federal Executive Council, which comprise various repair services and auxiliary services, employ 2,165 workers. It thus turns out that all the remaining agencies of the federal government, federal organizations and technical services of the Federal Executive Council employ a total of 4,234 people. This is literally what is found in the statistical survey of personnel--"a total of 4,234 workers."

Both Sides of the Coin

We do not wish to take up in this article the question of whether there are many or few employees or whether they are utilized rationally enough. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note two facts: from 1975 until the middle of last last year the number of workers employed in agencies of the federal government rose by 3,897. Throughout this period according to the accepted system of listing there remained between two and two-and-one-half thousand unfilled positions at all times. The second fact is related to the first: there are practically six times as many unskilled workers as was anticipated in the job plan! This is why one-third of the positions requiring high qualifications remained unfilled for years.

Why?

Positions other than those of high government officials and administrators are no longer as attractive as they once were.

Qualified skilled personnel are reluctant to enter the labor organizations of federal agencies. The reasons for this are: great responsibility, complicated assignments, salaries no longer so attractive, increased difficulty of quickly being granted a [government owned] apartment, and spouse's employment and children's schooling in the case of relocation from one of the republics or provinces. Many are discouraged by the hierarchical, bureaucratic relations in the federal administration.

This is, nevertheless, only one side of the coin. In the rather sharply critical analysis prepared for the session of the Conference of the Local Branches of the League of Communists [employed] in the federal agencies and organizations, it is stated literally that there is still quite a lot of poor work and overpayment but little reward for work well done and that the wrong people for the job remain for too long in important positions. Although members of the Conference Committee justified the severity of their critical formulations by the need for an analysis which would have a mobilizing effect all are of the opinion that there is much room for critical evaluation of personnel policies everywhere, including federal organizations.

Ministerial Rank

If on the one hand it is thought that capable people are reluctant to begin working in federal organizations, there is a sizeable group of those who when their terms of office are up are still more reluctant to return to the milieu from which they have come. And while there is talk that "incomplete persons" should not be allowed to begin working in federal institutions, meaning by this those who have inadequate training, not formal training but experience, others mention the "structural surpluses of personnel." And although in a large number of work organizations it is clear that there are younger workers, there is mention of the accumulation and even the invention of administrative positions with "ministerial rank" for "deserving friends."

There were also those at the session of the Conference who accused a federal social legal officer of self-management because in a recent issue of BORBA he made public some facts about the large number of people with special status and authority. The facts cannot be altered by objections that none of this is new, that these are well-known things, and that the legal officer should have done something about this instead of "advertising" the matter in the newspapers. But the fact cannot be denied that there are people in federal organizations holding fabricated positions, so that we find directors of sections in which there is not a single employee.

Unassigned for Years

A special case is that of the so-called unassigned personnel, or available personnel. In the federal government alone there are 180 unassigned personnel in organizations from the republics and provinces who have been doing practically nothing for 5 or more years or, as stated more tactfully in the records, who are "not engaged in work." There is in fact a law that high government officials are entitled to receive their salary for one year after their term of office has ended, while if they have been in high administrative offices for more than 12 years this right is extended to 3 years, and if they have been administrators for more than 20 years--to 6 years.

The majority of such people, we learn, are in fact close to retirement, and after finishing all their terms of office, could not be returned to the position in which they had started their career decades earlier because these positions simply no longer exist. Among them are honorable and worthy veterans who built up this system and who are now ashamed of the fact that there are no longer any assignments for them--but their pay envelopes are full on the first of every month. But there is a considerable number of those who are suited by such a status, for whom there is no place in the organizations from which they came, which sometimes play dumb, forgetting their "own" people, or even openly refuse to take them back.

Thought up as a means to "entice" the required personnel, as a protective device to increase the security of those who in a moment of panic might wonder what would happen after their term of office had expired, this arrangement, judging by the criticism with which it is met, has in practice become distorted. There is an ever increasing demand, therefore, that the republics and provinces state specifically their responsibilities and obligations towards those personnel whom they send to work for the federal government and whom they afterward, it turns out, avoid taking back.
